Night was coming on, meantime, very fast; but absorbed by the distresses of the shivering groups around me, I had scarce remembered that my own invitation was but to the banquet and ball—and my dinner, consequently, nine miles off, at Ardrossan. Thanking Heaven, that, at least, I had no ladies to share my evening's pilgrimage, I followed the queen of beauty down the muddy and slippery staircase, and, when her majesty had stepped into her carriage, I stepped over ankles in mud and water, and began my wade toward the castle.

Six hours of rain, and the trampling of such an immense multitude of men and horses, had converted the soft and moist sod and soil of the park into a deep and most adhesive quagmire. Glancing through the labyrinth of vehicles on every side, and seeing men and horses with their feet completely sunk below the surface, I saw that there was no possibility of shying the matter, and that wade was the word. I thought, at first, that I had a claim for a little sympathy on the score of being rather slenderly shod (the impalpable sole of a pattern leather-boot being all that separated me from the subsoil of the estate of Eglinton); but overtaking, presently, a party of four ladies who had lost several shoes in the mire, and were positively wading on in silk stockings, I took patience to myself from my advantage in the comparison, and thanked fate for the thinnest sole with leather to keep it on. The ladies I speak of were under the charge of a most despairing-looking gentleman, but had neither cloak nor umbrella, and had evidently made no calculations for a walk. We differed in our choice of the two sides of a slough, presently, and they were lost in the crowd; but I could not help smiling, with all my pity of their woes, to think what a turning up of prunella shoes there will be, should Lord Eglinton ever plough the chivalric field of the Tournament.

As I reached the castle, I got upon the Macadamised road, which had the advantage of a bottom somewhere, though it was covered with a liquid mud, of which every passing foot gave you a spatter to the hips. My exterior was by this time equally divided between water and dirt, and I trudged on in comfortable fellowship with farmers, coal-miners, and Scotch lasses—envying very much the last, for they carried their shoes in their hands, and held their petticoats, to say the least, clear of the mud. Many a good joke they seemed to have among them, but as they spoke in Gaelic, it was lost on my Sassenach ears.

I had looked forward with a faint hope to a gingerbread and ale-cart, which I remembered having seen in the morning established near the terminus of the railroad, trusting to refresh my strength and patience with a glass of anything that goes under the generic appellation of "summat;" but though the cart was there, the gingerbread shelf was occupied by a row of Scotch lasses, crouching together under cover from the rain, and the pedlar assured me that "there wasna a drap o' speerit to be got within ten mile o' the castle." One glance at the railroad, where a car with a single horse was beset by some thousands of shoving and fighting applicants, convinced me that I had a walk of eight miles to finish my "purgation by" tournament; and as it was getting too dark to trust to any picking of the way, I took the middle of the rail-track, and set forward.

"Oh, but a weary wight was he
When he reached the foot of the dogwood tree."

Eight miles in a heavy rain, with boots of the consistence of brown paper, and a road of alternate deep mud and broken stone, should entitle one to the green!

turban. I will make the pilgrimage of a Hadji from the "farthest inn" with half the endurance.

I found my Liverpool friends over a mutton-chop in the snug parlor of our host, and with a strong brew of hot toddy, and many a laugh at the day's adventures by land and water, we got comfortably to bed "somewhere in the small hours." And so ended the great day of the tournament.

After witnessing the disasters of the first day, the demolition of costumes, and the perils by water, of masqueraders and spectators, it was natural to fancy that the tournament was over. So did not seem to think several thousands of newly-arrived persons, pouring from steamer after steamer upon the pier of Ardrossan, and in every variety of costume, from the shepherd's maul to the courtier's satin, crowding to the rail-cars for Eglington. It appeared from the chance remarks of one or two who came to our lodgings to deposit their carpet-bags, that it had rained very little in the places from which the steamers had come, and that they had calculated on the second as the great day of the joust. No dissuasion had the least effect upon them, and away they went, bedecked and merry, the sufferers of the day before looking out upon them, from comfortable hotel and lodging, with prophetic pity.

At noon the sky brightened; and as the cars were running by this time with diminished loads, I parted from my agreeable friends, and bade adieu to my garret at Ardrossan. I was bound to Ireland, and my road lay by Eglington to Irvine and Ayr. Fellow-passengers with me were twenty or thirty men in Glengary bonnets, plaids, &c.; and I came in for my share of the jeers and jokes showered upon them by the passengers in the return-cars, as men bound on a fruitless errand. As we neared the castle, the crowds of people with disconsolate faces waiting for conveyances, or standing by the reopened gingerbread carts in listless idleness, convinced my companions, at last, that there was nothing to be seen, for that day at least, at Eglington. I left them sitting in the cars, undecided whether to go on or return without losing their places; and seeing a coach marked "Irvine" standing in the road, I jumped in without question or ceremony. It belonged to a private party of gentlemen, who were to visit the castle and tilting-ground on their way to Irvine; and as they very kindly insisted on my remaining after I had apologised for the intrusion, I found myself "booked" for a glimpse of the second day's attractions.

The avenue to the castle was as crowded as on the day before; but it was curious to remark how the general aspect of the multitude was changed by the substitution of disappointment for expectation. The lagging gait and surlily silence, instead of the elastic step and merry joke, seemed to have darkened the scene more than the withdrawal of the sun, and I was glad to wrap myself in my cloak, and remember that I was on the wing. The banner flying at the castle tower was the only sign of motion I could see in its immediate vicinity; the sail-cloth coverings of the pavilion were dark with wet; the fine sward was everywhere disfigured with traces of mud, and the whole scene was dismal and uncomfortable. We kept on to the lists, and found them, as one of my companions expressed it, more like a cattle-pen after a fair than a scene of pleasure—trodden, wet, miry, and deserted. The crowd, content to view them from a distance, were assembled around the large booths on the ascent of the rising ground toward the castle, where a band was playing some merry reels, and the gingerbread and ale venders plied a busy vocation. A look was enough; and we shaped our course for Irvine, sympathizing deeply with the disappointment of the high-spirited and generous lord of the Tournay. I heard at Irvine, and farther on, that the tilting would be renewed, and the banquet and ball given on the succeeding days; but after the wreck of dresses and peril of health I had witnessed, I was persuaded that the best that could be done would be but a slender patching up of the original glories, as well as a halting rally of the original spirits of the tournament. So I kept on my way.

SKETCHES OF TRAVEL.

CHAPTER I.

LONDON.

THERE is an inborn and iobred distrust of "foreigners" in England—continental foreigners, I should say—which keeps the current of French and Italian society as distinct amid the sea of London, as the blue Rhone in Lake Lemman. The word "foreigner," in England, conveys exclusively the idea of a dark-complexioned and whiskered individual, in a frogged coat and distressed circumstances; and to introduce a smooth-cheeked, plainly-dressed, quiet-looking person by that name, would strike any circle of ladies and gentlemen as a palpable misnomer. The violent and unhappy contrast between the Parisian's mode of life in London and in Paris, makes it very certain that few of those bien nés et convenablement riches will live in London for pleasure; and then the flood of political émigrés, for the last half century, has monopolised hair-dressing, &c., &c., to such a degree, that the word Frenchman is synonymous in English ears with barber and dancing-master. If a dark gentleman, wearing either whisker or mustache, chance to offend John Bull in the street, the first opprobrious language he hears—the strongest that occurs to the fellow's mind—is, "Get out, you — Frenchman!"

All this, malgré the rage for foreign lions in London society. A well-introduced foreigner gets easily into this, and while he keeps his cabriolet and confines himself to frequenting soirées and accepting invitations to dine, he will never suspect that he is not on an equal footing with any "milor" in London. If he wishes to be disenchanted, he has only to change his lodgings from Long's to Great Russell street, or (bitterer and readier trial) to propose marriage to the honorable Augusta or Lady Fanny.

Everybody who knows the society of Paris, knows something of a handsome and very elegant young baron of the Faubourg St. Germain, who, with small fortune, very great taste, and greater credit, contrived to go on very swimmingly as an adorable roué and vaurien till he was hard upon twenty-five. At the first crisis in his affairs, the ladies, who hold all the politics in their laps, got him appointed consul to Algiers, or minister to Venezuela, and with this pretty pretext for selling his horses and dressing-gowns, these cherished articles brought twice their original value, saved his loyauté, and set him up in fans and monkeys at his place of exile. A year of this was enough for the darling of Paris, and not more than a day before his desolate loves would have ceased to mourn for him, he galloped into his hotel with a new fashion of whiskers, a black female slave, and the most delicious histories of his adventures during the ages he had been exiled. Down to the earth and their previous obscurity dropped the rivals who were just beginning to usurp his glories. A new stud, an indescribable vehicle, a suite of rooms à l'Africaine, and a mystery, preserved at some expense, about his negress, kept all Paris, including his new creditors, in admiring astonishment for a year. Among the crowd of his worshippers, not the last or least fervent, were the fair-haired and glowing beauties who assemble at the levées of their ambassador in the Rue St. Honoré, and upon whom le beau Adolphe had looked as pretty savages, whose frightful toilets and horrid French accent might be tolerated one evening in the week—vu le souper!

Eclipses will arrive as calculated by insignificant astronomers, however, and debts will become due as presumed by vulgar tradesmen. Le beau Adolphe began to see another crisis, and betook himself to his old advisers, who were desolés to the last degree; but there was a new government, and the blood of the Faubourg was at a discount. No embassies were to be had for nothing. With a deep sigh, and a gentle tone, to spare his feelings as much as possible, his friend ventures to suggest to him that it will be necessary to sacrifice himself.

"Ahi! mais comment!"

"Marry one of these bêtes Anglaises, who drink you up with their great blue eyes, and are made of gold!"

Adolphe buried his face in his gold-fringed oriental pocket-handkerchief; but when the first agony was passed, his resolution was taken, and he determined to go to England. The first beautiful creature he should see, whose funds were enormous and well-invested, should bear away from all the love, rank, and poverty of France, the perfumed hand he looked upon.

A flourishing letter, written in a small, cramped hand, but with a seal on whose breadth of wax and Jazon all the united heraldry of France was interwoven, arrived, through the ambassador's despatch box, to the address of Miladi —, Belgrave square, announcing, in full, that le beau Adolphe was coming to London to marry the richest heiress in good society; and as Paris could not spare him more than a week, he wished those who had daughters to marry, answering the description, to be bien prévenus of his visit and errand. With the letter came a compend of his genealogy, from the man who spoke French in the confusion of Babel to le dit Baron Adolphe.

To London came the valet of le beau baron, two days before his master, bringing his slippers and dressing-gown to be aired after their sea-voyage across the channel. To London followed the irresistible youth, cursing, in the politest French, the necessity which subtracted a week from a life measured with such "diamond sparks" as his own in Paris. He sat himself down in his hotel, sent his man Porphyre with his card to every noble and rich house, whose barbarian tenants he had ever seen in the Champs Elysées, and waited the result. Invitations from fair ladies, who remembered him as the man the French belles were mad about, and from literary ladies, who wanted his whiskers and black eyes to give their soirées the necessary foreign complexion, flowed in on all sides, and Monsieur Adolphe selected his most mignon cane and his happiest design in a stocking, and "rendered himself" through the rain like a martyr.

No offers of marriage the first evening!

None the second!!

None the third!!!

Le beau Adolphe began to think either that English papas did not propose their daughters to people as in France; or, perhaps, that the lady whom he had commissioned to circulate his wishes had not sufficiently advertised him. She had, however.

He took advice, and found it would be necessary to take the first step himself. This was disagreeable, and he said to himself, "Le jeu ne vaut pas le chandelle!" but his youth was passing, and his English fortune was at interest.

He went to Almack's and proposed to the first authenticated fortune that accepted his hand for a waltz. The young lady first laughed, and then told her mother, who told her son, who thought it an insult, and called out le beau Adolphe, very much to the astonishment of himself and Porphyre. The thing was explained, and the baron looked about the next day for one pas si bête. Found a young lady with half a million sterling, proposed in a morning call, and was obliged to ring for assistance, his intended having gone into convulsions with laughing at him. The story by this time had got pretty well distributed through the different strata of London society; and when le beau Adolphe convinced that he would not succeed with the noble heiresses of Belgrave square, condescended, in his extremity, to send his heart by his valet to a rich little vulgarian, who "never had a grandfather," and lived in Harley street, he narrowly escaped being prosecuted for a nuisance, and, Paris being now in the possession of the enemy, he buried his sorrows in Belgium. After a short exile his friends procured him a vice-consulate in some port in the north sea, and there probably at this moment he sorrowfully vegetates.

This is not a story founded upon fact, but literally true. Many of the circumstances came under my own observation; and the whole thus affords a laughable example of the esteem in which what an English fox-hunter would call a "trashy Frenchman" is held in England, as well as of the travestie produced by transplanting the usages of one country to another.

Ridiculous as any intimate mixture of English and French ideas and persons seems to be in London, the foreign society of itself in that capital is exceedingly spiritual and agreeable. The various European embassies and their attachés, with their distinguished travellers, from their several countries, accidentally belonging to each; the French and Italians, married to English noblemen and gentry, and living in London, and the English themselves, who have become cosmopolite by residence in other countries, form a very large society in which mix, on perfectly equal terms, the first singers of the opera, and foreign musicians and artists generally. This last circumstance gives a peculiar charm to these réunions, though it imparts a pride and haughty bearing to the prima donna and her fraternity, which is, at least, sometimes very inconvenient to themselves. The remark recalls to my mind a scene I once witnessed in London, which will illustrate the feeling better than an essay upon it.

I was at one of those private concerts given at an enormous expense during the opera season, at which "assisted" Julia Grisi, Rubini, Lablache, Tamburini, and Ivanhoff. Grisi came in the carriage of a foreign lady of rank, who had dined with her, and she walked into the room looking like an empress. She was dressed in the plainest white, with her glossy hair put smooth from her brow, and a single white japonica dropped over one of her temples. The lady who brought her chaperoned her during the evening, as if she had been her daughter, and under the excitement of her own table and the kindness of her friends, she sung with a rapture and a freshet of glory (if one may borrow a word from the Mississippi) which set all hearts on fire. She surpassed her most applauded hour on the stage—for it was worth her while. The audience was composed, almost exclusively, of those who are not only cultivated judges, but who sometimes repay delight with a present of diamonds.

Lablache shook the house to its foundations in his turn; Rubini ran through his miraculous compass with the ease, truth, and melody, for which his singing is unsurpassed; Tamburini poured his rich and even fulness on the ear, and Russian Ivanhoff, the one southern singing-bird who has come out of the north, wire-drew his fine and spiritual notes, till they who had been flushed, and tearful, and silent, when the others had sang, drowned his voice in the poorer applause of exclamation and surprise.

The concert was over by twelve, the gold and silver paper bills of the performance were turned into fans, and every one was waiting till supper should be announced—the prima donna still sitting by her friend, but surrounded by foreign attachés, and in the highest elation at her own success. The doors of an inner suite of rooms were thrown open at last, and Grisi's cordon of admirers prepared to follow her in and wait on her at supper. At this moment, one of the powdered menials of the house stepped up and informed her very respectfully that supper was prepared in a separate room for the singers!

Medea, in her most tragic hour, never stood so absolutely the picture of hate as did Grisi for a single instant, in the centre of that aristocratic crowd. Her chest swelled and rose, her lips closed over her snowy teeth, and compressed till the blood left them, and, for myself, I looked unconsciously to see where she would strike. I knew, then, that there was more than fancy—there was nature and capability of the real—in the imaginary passions she plays so powerfully. A laugh of extreme amusement at the scene from the high-born woman who had accompanied her, suddenly turned her humor, and she stopped in the midst of a muttering of Italian, in which I could distinguish only the terminations, and, with a sort of theatrical quickness of transition, joined heartily in her mirth. It was immediately proposed by this lady, however, that herself and their particular circle should join the insulted prima donna at the lower table, and they succeeded by this manœuvre in retaining Rubini and the others, who were leaving the house in a most unequivocal Italian fury.

I had been fortunate enough to be included in the invitation, and, with one or two foreign diplomatic men, I followed Grisi and her amused friend to a small room on a lower floor, that seemed to be the housekeeper's parlor. Here supper was set for six (including the man who had played the piano), and on the side-table stood every variety of wine and fruit, and there was nothing in the supper, at least, to make us regret the table we had left. With a most imperative gesture and rather an amusing attempt at English, Grisi ordered the servants out of the room, and locked the door, and from that moment the conversation commenced and continued in their own musical, passionate, and energetic Italian. My long residence in that country had made me at home in it; every one present spoke it fluently; and I had an opportunity I might never have again, of seeing with what abandonment these children of the sun throw aside rank and distinction (yet without forgetting it), and join with those who are their superiors in every circumstance of life, in the gayeties of a chance hour.

Out of their own country these singers would probably acknowledge no higher rank than that of the kind and gifted lady who was their guest; yet, with the briefest apology at finding the room too cold after the heat of the concert, they put on their cloaks and hats as a safeguard to their lungs (more valuable to them than to others); and as most of the cloaks were the worse for travel, and the hats opera-hats with two corners, the grotesque contrast with the diamonds of one lady, and the radiant beauty of the other, may easily be imagined.

Singing should be hungry work, by the knife and fork they played; and between the excavations of the truffle pies, and the bumpers of champagne and burgundy, the words were few. Lablache appeared to be an established droll, and every syllable he found time to utter was received with the most unbounded laughter. Rubini could not recover from the slight he conceived put upon him and his profession by the separate table; and he continually reminded Grisi, who by this time had quite recovered her good humor, that, the night before, supping at Devonshire house, the duke of Wellington had held her gloves on one side, while his grace, their host attended to her on the other.

"E vero!" said Ivanhoff, with a look of modest admiration at the prima donna.

"E vero, e bravo!" cried Tamburini, with his sepulchral-talking tone, much deeper than his singing.

"Sì, sì, sì, bravo!" echoed all the company; and the haughty and happy actress nodded all round with a radiant smile, and repeated, in her silver tones, "Grazie! cari amici! grazie!"

As the servants had been turned out, the removal of the first course was managed in pic-nic fashion; and when the fruit and fresh bottles of wine were set upon the table by the attachés, and younger gentlemen, the health of the princess who honored them by her presence was proposed in that language, which, it seems to me, is more capable than all others of expressing affectionate and respectful devotion. All uncovered and stood up, and Grisi, with tears in her eyes, kissed the hand of her benefactress and friend, and drank her health in silence.

It is a polite and common accomplishment in Italy to improvise in verse, and the lady I speak of is well known among her immediate friends for a singular facility in this beautiful art. She reflected a moment or two with the moisture in her eyes, and then commenced, low and soft, a poem, of which it would be difficult, nay impossible, to convey, in English, an idea of its music and beauty. It took us back to Italy, to its heavenly climate, its glorious arts, its beauty and its ruins, and concluded with a line of which I remember the sentiment to have been, "out of Italy every land is exile!"

The glasses were raised as she ceased, and every one repeated after her, "Fuori d'Italia tutto è esilio!"

"Ma!" cried out the fat Lablache, holding up his glass of champagne, and looking through it with one eye, "siamo ben esiliati qua!" and, with a word of drollery, the party recovered its gayer tone, and the humor and wit flowed on brilliantly as before.

The house had long been still, and the last carriage belonging to the company above stairs had rolled from the door, when Grisi suddenly remembered a bird that she had lately bought, of which she proceeded to give us a description, that probably penetrated to every corner of the silent mansion. It was a mocking-bird, that had been kept two years in the opera-house, and between rehearsal and performance had learned parts of everything it had overheard. It was the property of the woman who took care of the wardrobes. Grisi had accidentally seen it, and immediately purchased it for two guineas. How much of embellishment there was in her imitations of her treasure I do not know; but certainly the whole power of her wondrous voice, passion, and knowledge of music, seemed drunk up at once in the wild, various, difficult, and rapid mixture of the capricious melody she undertook. First came, without the passage which it usually terminates, the long, throat-down, gurgling, water-toned trill, in which Rubini (but for the bird and its mistress, it seemed to me) would have been inimitable: then, right upon it, as if it were the beginning of a bar, and in the most unbreathing continuity, followed a brilliant passage from the Barber of Seville, run into the passionate prayer of Anna Bolena in her madness, and followed by the air of "Suoni la tromba intrepida!" the tremendous duet in the Puritani, between Tamburini and Lablache. Up to the sky, and down to the earth again—away with a note of the wildest gladness, and back upon a note of the most touching melancholy—if the bird but half equals the imitation of his mistress, he were worth the jewel in a sultan's turban.

"Giulia!" "Giulietta!" "Giulietta!" cried out one and another, as she ceased, expressing in their Italian diminutives, the love and delight she had inspired by her incomparable execution.

The stillness of the house in the occasional pauses of conversation reminded the gay party, at last, that it was wearing late. The door was unlocked, and the half-dozen sleepy footmen hanging about the hall were despatched for the cloaks and carriages; the drowsy porter was roused from his deep leathern dormeuse, and opened the door—and broad upon the street lay the cold gray light of a summer's morning. I declined an offer to be set down by a friend's cab, and strolled off to Hyde Park to surprise myself with a sunrise; balancing the silent rebuke in the fresh and healthy countenances of early laborers going to their toil, against the effervescence of a champagne hour, which, since such come so rarely, may come, for me, with what untimeliness they please.

CHAPTER II.

THE STREETS OF LONDON.

It has been said, that "few men know how to take a walk." In London it requires some experience to know where to take a walk. The taste of the perambulator, the hour of the day, and the season of the year, would each affect materially the decision of the question.

If you are up early—I mean early for London—say ten o'clock—we would start from your hotel in Bond street, and hastening through Regent street and the Quadrant (deserts at that hour), strike into the zigzag of thronged alleys, cutting traversely from Coventry street to Covent Garden. The horses on the cabstand in the Haymarket "are at this hour asleep." The late supper-eaters at Dubourg's and the Café de l'Europe were the last infliction upon their galled withers, and while dissipation slumbers they may find an hour to hang their heads upon the bit, and forget gall and spavin in the sunshiny drowse of morning. The cabman, too, nods on his perch outside, careless of the custom of "them as pays only their fare," and quite sure not to get "a gemman to drive" at that unseasonable hour. The "waterman" (called a "waterman," as he will tell you, "because he gives hay to the 'orses") leans against the gas-lamp at the corner, looking with a vacant indifference of habit at the splendid coach with its four blood bays just starting from the Brighton coach-office in the Crescent. The sidewalk of Coventry street, usually radiant with the flaunting dresses of the fail and vicious, is now sober with the dull habiliments of the early-stirring and the poor. The town (for this is town, not city) beats its more honest pulse. Industry alone is abroad.

Rupert street on the left is the haunt of shabby-genteel poverty. To its low-doored chop-houses steal the more needy loungers of Regent street, and in confined and greasy, but separate and exclusive boxes, they eat their mutton-chop and potato, unseen of their gayer acquaintances. Here comes the half-pay officer, whose half-pay is halved or quartered with wife and children, to drink his solitary half-pint of sherry, and over a niggardly portion of soup and vegetables, recall, as well as he may in imagination, the gay dinners at mess, and the companions now grown cold—in death or worldliness! Here comes the sharper out of luck, the debtor newly out of prison. And here comes many a "gay fellow about town," who will dine to-morrow, or may have dined yesterday, at a table of unsparring luxury, but who now turns up Rupert street at seven, cursing the mischance that draws upon his own slender pocket for the dinner of to-day. Here are found the watchful host and the suspicious waiter—the closely-measured wine, and the more closely-measured attention—the silent and shrinking company, the close-drawn curtain, the suppressed call for the bill, the lingering at the table of those who value the retreat and the shelter to recover from the embarrassing recognition and the objectless saunter through the streets. The ruin, the distress, the despair, that wait so closely upon the heels of fashion, pass here with their victims. It is the last step within the bounds of respectability. They still live "at the West end," while they dine in Rupert street. They may still linger in the park, or stroll in Bond street, till their better-fledged friends flit to dinner at the clubs, and within a stone's throw of the luxurious tables and the gay mirth they so bitterly remember, sit down to an ill-dressed meal, and satisfy the calls of hunger in silence. Ah, the outskirts of the bright places in life are darker for the light that shines so near them! How much sweeter is the coarsest meal shared with the savage in the wilderness, than the comparative comfort of cooked meats and wine in a neighborhood like this!

Come through this narrow lane into Leicester square. You cross here the first limit of the fashionable quarter. The Sablonière hotel is in this square; but you may not give it as your address unless you are a foreigner. This is the home of that most miserable fish out of water—a Frenchman in London. A bad French hotel, and two or three execrable French restaurants, make this spot of the metropolis the most habitable to the exiled habitué of the Palais Royal. Here he gets a mocking imitation of what, in any possible degree, is better than the sacré biftek, or the half-raw mutton-chop and barbarous boiled potato! Here he comes forth, if the sunshine perchance for one hour at noon, and paces up and down on the sidewalk, trying to get the better of his bile and his bad breakfast. Here waits for him at three, the shabby, but most expensive remise cab, hired by the day for as much as would support him a month in Paris. Leicester square is the place for conjurors, bird-fanciers, showmen, and generally for every foreign novelty in the line of nostrums and marvels. If there is a dwarf in London, or a child with two heads, or a learned pig, you will see one or all in that building, so radiant with placards, and so thronged with beggars.

Come on through Cranbourne alley. Old clothes, second-hand stays, idem shawls, capes, collars, and ladies' articles of ornamental wear generally: cheap straw-bonnets, old books, gingerbread, and stationery! Look at this once-expensive and finely-worked muslin cape! What fair shoulders did it adorn when these dingy flowers were new—when this fine lace-edging bounded some heaving bosom, perhaps, like frost-work on the edge of a snow-drift. It has been the property of some minion of elegance and wealth, vicious or virtuous, and by what hard necessity came it here? Ten to one, could it speak, its history would keep us standing at this shop window, indifferent alike to the curious glances of these passing damsels and the gentle eloquence of the Jew on the other side, who pays us the unflattering compliment of suggesting an improvement in our toilet by the purchase of the half-worn habiliments he exposes.

I like Cranbourne alley, because it reminds me of Venice. The half-daylight between the high and overhanging roofs, the just audible hum of voices and occupation from the different shops, the shuffling of hasty feet over the smooth flags, and particularly the absence of horses and wheels, make it (in all but the damp air and the softer speech) a fair resemblance to those close passages in the rear of the canals between St. Mark's and the Rialto. Then I like studying a pawnbroker's window, and I like ferreting in the old book-stalls that abound here. It is a good lesson in humility for an author to see what he can be bought for in Cranbourne alley. Some "gentle reader," who has paid a guinea and a half for you, has resold you for two-and-sixpence. For three shillings you may have the three volumes, "as good as new," and the shopman, by his civility, pleased to be rid of it on the terms. If you would console yourself, however, buy Milton for one-and-sixpence, and credit your vanity with the eighteen-pence of the remainder.

The labyrinth of alleys between this and Covent Garden, are redolent of poverty and pot-houses. In crossing St. Martin's lane, life appears to have become suddenly a struggle and a calamity. Turbulent and dirty women are everywhere visible through the open windows; the half-naked children at the doors look already care-worn and incapable of a smile; and the men throng the gin-shops, bloated, surly, and repulsive. Hurry through this leprous spot in the vast body of London, and let us emerge in the Strand.

You would think London Strand the main artery of the world. I suppose there is no thoroughfare on the face of the earth where the stream of human life runs with a tide so overwhelming. In any other street in the world you catch the eye of the passer-by. In the Strand, no man sees another except as a solid body, whose contact is to be avoided. You are safe nowhere on the pavement without all the vigilance of your senses. Omnibuses and cabs, drays, carriages, wheelbarrows, and porters, beset the street. Newspaper-hawkers, pickpockets, shop-boys, coal-heavers, and a perpetual and selfish crowd dispute the sidewalk. If you venture to look at a print in a shop-window, you arrest the tide of passengers, who immediately walk over you; and, if you stop to speak with a friend, who by chance has run his nose against yours rather than another man's, you impede the way, and are made to understand it by the force of jostling. If you would get into an omnibus you are quarrelled for by half-a-dozen who catch your eye at once, and after using all your physical strength and most of your discrimination, you are most probably embarked in the wrong one, and are going at ten miles the hour to Blackwell, when you are bound to Islington. A Londoner passes his life in learning the most adroit mode of threading a crowd, and escaping compulsory journeys in cabs and omnibuses; and dine with any man in that metropolis from twenty-five to sixty years of age, and he will entertain you, from the soup to the Curaçoa, with his hair-breadth escapes and difficulties with cads and coach-drivers.

CHAPTER III.

LONDON.

A LONDONER, if met abroad, answers very vaguely any questions you may be rash enough to put to him about "the city." Talk to him of "town," and he would rather miss seeing St. Peter's, than appear ignorant of any person, thing, custom, or fashion, concerning whom or which you might have a curiosity. It is understood all over the world that the "city" of London is that crowded, smoky, jostling, omnibus and cab-haunted portion of the metropolis of England which lies east of Temple Bar. A kind of debatable country, consisting of the Strand, Covent Garden, and Tottenham Court road, then intervenes, and west of these lies what is called "the town." A transit from one to the other by an inhabitant of either is a matter of some forethought and provision. If milord, in Carlton Terrace, for example, finds it necessary to visit his banker in Lombard street, he orders—not the blood bay and the cane tilbury which he is wont to drive in the morning—but the crop roadster in the cab, with the night harness, and Poppet his tiger in plain hat and gaiters. If the banker in Lombard street, on the contrary, emerges from the twilight of his counting-house to make a morning call on the wife of some foreign correspondent, lodging at the Clarendon, he steps into a Piccadilly omnibus, not in the salt-and-pepper creations of his Cheapside tailor, but (for he has an account with Stultz also for the west-end business) in a claret-colored frock of the last fashion at Crockford's, a fresh hat from New Bond street, and (if he is young) a pair of cherished boots from the Rue St. Honoré. He sits very clear of his neighbors on the way, and, getting out at the crossing at Farrance's, the pastry cook, steps in and indulges in a soup, and then walks slowly past the clubs to his rendezvous, at a pace that would ruin his credit irrevocably if practised a mile to the eastward. The difference between the two migrations is, simply, that though the nobleman affects the plainness of the city, he would not for the world be taken for a citizen; while the junior partner of the house of Firkins and Co. would feel unpleasantly surprised if he were not supposed to be a member of the clubs, lounging to a late breakfast.

There is a "town" manner, too, and a "city" manner, practised with great nicety by all who frequent both extremities of London. Nothing could be in more violent contrast, for example, than the manner of your banker when you dine with him at his country-house, and the same person when you meet him on the narrow sidewalk in Throgmorton street. If you had seen him first in his suburban retreat, you would wonder how the deuce such a cordial, joyous, spare-nothing sort of good fellow could ever reduce himself to the cautious proportions of Change alley. If you met him first in Change alley, on the contrary, you would wonder, with quite as much embarrassment, how such a cold, two-fingered, pucker-browed slave of mammon could ever, by any license of interpretation, be called a gentleman. And when you have seen him in both places, and know him well, if he is a favorable specimen of his class, you will be astonished still more to see how completely he will sustain both characters—giving you the cold shoulder, in a way that half insults you, at twelve in the morning, and putting his home, horses, cellar, and servants, completely at your disposal at four in the afternoon. Two souls inhabit the banker's body, and each is apparently sole tenant in turn. As the Hampstead early coach turns the corner by St. Giles's, on its way to the bank, the spirit of gain enters into the bosom of the junior Firkins, ejecting, till the coach passes the same spot at three in the afternoon, the more gentlemanly inhabitants. Between those hours, look to Firkins for no larger sentiment than may be written upon the blank lines of a note of hand, and expect no courtesy that would occupy the head or hands of the junior partner longer than one second by St. Paul's. With the broad beam of sunshine that inundates the returning omnibus emerging from Holborn into Tottenham Court road, the angel of port wine and green fields passes his finger across Firkins's brow, and presto! the man is changed. The sight of a long and narrow strip of paper, sticking from his neighbor's pocket, depreciates that person in his estimation, he criticises the livery and riding of the groom trotting past, says some very true things of the architecture of the new cottage on the roadside, and is landed at the end of his own shrubbery, as pleasant and joyous-looking a fellow as you would meet on that side of London. You have ridden out to dine with him, and as he meets you on the lawn, there is still an hour to dinner, and a blood horse spatters round from the stables, which you are welcome to drive to the devil if you like, accompanied either by Mrs. Firkins or himself; or, if you like it better, there are Mrs. Firkins's two ponies, and the chaise holds two and the tiger. Ten to one Mrs. Firkins is a pretty woman, and has her whims, and when you are fairly on the road, she proposes to leave the soup and champagne at home to equalize their extremes of temperature, drive to Whitehall Stairs, take boat and dine, extempore, at Richmond. And Firkins, to whom it will be at least twenty pounds out of pocket, claps his hands and says—"By Jove, it's a bright thought! touch up the near pony, Mrs. Firkins." And away you go, Firkins amusing himself the whole way from Hampstead to Richmond, imagining the consternation of his cook and butler when nobody comes to dine.

There is an aristocracy in the city, of course, and Firkins will do business with twenty persons in a day whom he could never introduce to Mrs. Firkins. The situation of that lady with respect to her society is (she will tell you in confidence) rather embarrassing. There are many very worthy persons, she will say, who represent large sums of money or great interests in trade, whom it is necessary to ask to the Lodge, but who are far from being ornamental to her new blue satin boudoir. She has often proposed to Firkins to have them labelled in tens and thousands according to their fortunes; that if, by any unpleasant accident, Lord Augustus should meet them there, he might respect them like — in algebra, for what they stand for. But as it is, she is really never safe in calculating on a société choisie to dine or sup. When Hook or Smith is just beginning to melt out, or Lady Priscilla is in the middle of a charade, in walks Mr. Snooks, of the foreign house of Snooks, Son, and Co.—"unexpectedly arrived from Lisbon, and run down without ceremony to call on his respectable correspondent."

"Isn't it tiresome?"

"Very, my dear madam! But then you have the happiness of knowing that you promote very essentially your husband's interests, and when he has made a plum —"

"Yes, very true; and then, to be sure, Firkins has had to build papa a villa, and buy my brother Wilfred a commission, and settle an annuity on my aunt, and fit out my youngest brother Bob to India; and when I think of what he does for my family, why I don't mind making now and then a sacrifice; but, after all, it's a great evil not to be able to cultivate one's own class of society."

And so murmurs Mrs. Firkins, who is the prettiest and sweetest creature in the world, and really loves the husband she married for his fortune; but as the prosperity of Haman was nothing while Mordecai sat at the gate, it is nothing to Mrs. Firkins that her father lives in luxury, that her brothers are portioned off, and that she herself can have blue boudoirs and pony-chaises ad libitum, while Snooks, Son, and Co., may at any moment break in upon the charade of Lady Priscilla!

There is a class of business people in London, mostly bachelors, who have wisely declared themselves independent of the West End, and live in a style of their own in the dark courts and alleys about the Exchange, but with a luxury not exceeded even in the silken recesses of May Fair. You will sometimes meet at the opera a young man of decided style, unexceptionable in his toilet, and quiet and gentleman-like in his address, who contents himself with the side alley of the pit, and looks at the bright circles of beauty and fashion about him with an indifference it is difficult to explain. Make his acquaintance by chance, and he takes you home to supper in a plain chariot on the best springs Long Acre can turn out; and while you are speculating where, in the name of the prince of darkness, these narrow streets will bring you to, you are introduced through a small door into saloons, perfect in taste and luxury, where, ten to one, you sup with the prima donna, or la première danseuse, but certainly with the most polished persons of your own sex, not one of whom, though you may have passed a life in London, you ever met in society before. There are, I doubt not, in that vast metropolis, hundreds of small circles of society, composed thus of persons refined by travel and luxury, whose very existence is unsuspected by the fine gentleman at the West End, but who, in the science of living agreeably, are almost as well entitled to rank among the cognoscenti as Lord Sefton or the "member for Finsbury."

CHAPTER IV.

LONDON.

You return from your ramble in "the city" by two o'clock. A bright day "toward," and the season in its palmy time. The old veterans are just creeping out upon the portico of the United Service club, having crammed "The Times" over their late breakfast, and thus prepared their politics against surprise for the day; the broad steps of the Athenæum are as yet unthronged by the shuffling feet of the literati, whose morning is longer and more secluded than that of idler men, but who will be seen in swarms, at four, entering that superb edifice in company with the employés and politicians who affect their society. Not a cab stands yet at the "Travellers," whose members, noble or fashionable, are probably at this hour in their dressing-gowns of brocade or shawl of the orient, smoking a hookah over Balzac's last romance, or pursuing at this (to them) desert time of day some adventure which waited upon their love and leisure. It is early yet for the park; but the equipages you will see by-and-by "in the ring" are standing now at Howell and James's, and while the high-bred horses are fretting at the door, and the liveried footmen lean on their gold-headed sticks on the pavement, the fair creature whose slightest nod these trained minions and their fine-limbed animals live to obey, sits upon a three-legged stool within, and in the voice which is a spell upon all hearts, and with eyes to which rank and genius turn like Persians to the sun, discusses with a pert clerk the quality of stockings!

Look at these equipages and their appointments! Mark the exquisite balance of that claret-bodied chariot upon its springs—the fine sway of its sumptuous hammer-cloth in which the un-smiling coachman sits buried to the middle—the exact fit of the saddles, setting into the curve of the horses' backs so as not break, to the most careless eye, the fine lines which exhibit action and grace! See how they stand together, alert, fiery, yet obedient to the weight of a silken thread; and as the coachman sees you studying his turn-out, observe the imperceptible feel of the reins and the just-visible motion of his lips, conveying to the quick ears of his horses the premonitory, and, to us, inaudible sound, to which, without drawing a hair's breadth upon the traces, they paw their fine hoofs, and expand their nostrils impatiently! Come nearer, and find a speck or a raised hair, if you can, on these glossy coats! Observe the nice fitness of the dead-black harness, the modest crest upon the panel, the delicate picking out of white in the wheels, and, if you will venture upon a freedom in manners, look in through the window of rose-tinted glass, and see the splendid cushions and the costly and perfect adaptation of the interior. The twinmated footmen fly to the carriage-door, and the pomatumed clerk who has enjoyed a tête-à-tête for which a prince-royal might sigh, and an ambassador negotiate in vain, hands in his parcel. The small foot presses on the carpeted step, the airy vehicle yields lightly and recovers from the slight weight of the descending form, the coachman inclines his ear for the half-suppressed order from the footman, and off whirls the admirable structure, compact, true, steady, but magically free and fast—as if horses, footmen, and chariot were but the parts of some complicated centaur—some swift-moving monster upon legs and wheels!

Walk on a little farther to the Quadrant. Here commences the most thronged promenade in London. These crescent colonnades are the haunt of foreigners on the lookout for amusement, and of strangers in the metropolis generally. You will seldom find a town-bred man there, for he prefers haunting his clubs; or, if he is not a member of them, he avoids lounging much in the Quadrant, lest he should appear to have no other resort. You will observe a town dandy getting fidgety after his second turn in the Quadrant, while you will meet the same Frenchman there from noon till dusk, bounding his walk by those columns as if they were the bars of a cage. The western side toward Piccadilly is the thoroughfare of the honest passer-by; but under the long portico opposite, you will meet vice in every degree, and perhaps more beauty than on any other paré in the world. It is given up to the vicious and their followers by general consent. To frequent it, or to be seen loitering there at all, is to make but one impression on the mind of those who may observe you.

The two sides of Regent street continue to partake of this distinction to the end. Go up on the left, and you meet the sober citizen perambulating with his wife, the lady followed by her footman, the grave and the respectable of all classes. Go up on the other, and in color and mien it is the difference between a grass-walk and a bed of tulips. What proof is here that beauty is dangerous to its possessor! It is said commonly of Regent street, that it shows more beauty in an hour than could be found in all the capitals of the continent. It is the beauty, however, of brilliant health—of complexion and freshness, more than of sentiment or classic correctness. The English features, at least in the middle and lower ranks, are seldom good, though the round cheek, the sparkling lip, the soft blue eyes and hair of dark auburn, common as health and youth, produce the effect of high and almost universal beauty on the eye of the stranger. The rarest thing in these classes is a finely-turned limb, and to the clumsiness of their feet and ankles must be attributed the want of grace usually remarked in their movements.

Regent street has appeared to me the greatest and most oppressive solitude in the world. In a crowd of business men, or in the thronged and mixed gardens of the continent, the pre-occupation of others is less attractive, or at least, more within our reach, if we would share in it. Here, it is wealth beyond competition, exclusiveness and indifference perfectly unapproachable. In the cold and stern mien of the practised Londoner, it is difficult for a stranger not to read distrust, and very difficult for a depressed mind not to feel a marked repulsion. There is no solitude, after all, like the solitude of cities.

"O dear, dear London" (says the companion of Asmodeus on his return from France), "dear even in October! Regent street, I salute you! Bond street, my good fellow, how are you? And you, oh, beloved Oxford street, whom the opium-eater called 'stony-hearted,' and whom I, eating no opium, and speaking as I find, shall ever consider the most kindly and maternal of all streets—the street of the middle classes—busy without uproar, wealthy without ostentation. Ah, the pretty ankles that trip along thy pavement! Ah! the odd country-cousin bonnets that peer into thy windows, which are lined with cheap yellow shawls, price one pound four shillings, marked in the corner! Ah! the brisk young lawyers flocking from their quarters at the back of Holborn! Ah! the quiet old ladies, living in Duchess street, and visiting thee with their eldest daughters in the hope of a bargain! Ah, the bumpkins from Norfolk just disgorged by the Bull and Mouth—the soldiers—the milliners—the Frenchmen—the swindlers—the porters with four-post beds on their backs, who add the excitement of danger to that of amusement! The various shifting, motley group that belong to Oxford street, and Oxford street alone! What thoroughfares equal thee in the variety of human specimens! In the choice of objects for remark, satire, admiration! Besides, the other streets seem chalked out for a sect—narrow-minded and devoted to a coterie. Thou alone art catholic—all-receiving. Regent street belongs to foreigners, cigars, and ladies in red silk, whose characters are above scandal. Bond street belongs to dandies and picture-dealers. St. James's street to club loungers and young men in the guards, with mustaches properly blackened by the cire of Mr. Delcroix; but thou, Oxford street, what class can especially claim thee as its own? Thou mockest at oligarchies; thou knowest nothing of select orders! Thou art liberal as air—a chartered libertine; accepting the homage of all, and retaining the stamp of none. And to call thee 'stony-hearted!'—certainly thou art so to beggars—to people who have not the WHEREWITHAL. But thou wouldst not be so respectable if thou wert not capable of a certain reserve to paupers. Thou art civil enough, in all conscience, to those who have a shilling in their pocket—those who have not, why do they live at all?"

CHAPTER V.

LONDON.

It is near four o'clock, and in Bond street you might almost walk on the heads of livery-servants—at every stride stepping over the heads of two ladies and a dandy exclusive. Thoroughfare it is none, for the carriages are creeping on, inch by inch, the blood-horses "marking time," the coachman watchful for his panels and whiplashes, and the lady within her silken chariot, lounging back, with her eyes upon the passing line, neither impatient nor surprised at the delay, for she came there on purpose. Between the swaying bodies of the carriages, hesitating past, she receives the smiles and recognitions of all her male acquaintances; while occasionally a female ally (for allies against the rest of the sex are as necessary in society to women, as in war to monarchs)—occasionally, I say, a female ally announced by the crest upon the blinker of an advancing horse, arrives opposite her window, and, with only the necessary delay in passing, they exchange, perhaps, inquiries for health, but, certainly, programmes, comprehensive though brief, for the prosecution of each other's loves or hates. Occasionally a hack cab, seduced into attempting Bond street by some momentary opening, finds itself closed in, forty deep, by chariots, butckas, landaus, and family coaches; and amid the imperturbable and unanswerable whips of the hammercloth, with a passenger who is losing the coach by the delay, he must wait, will-he-nill-he, till some "pottering" dowager has purchased the old lord his winter flannels, or till the countess of Loiter has said all she has to say to the guardsman whom she has met accidentally at Pluckrose, the perfumer's. The three tall fellows, with gold sticks, would see the entire plebeian population of London thrice-sodden in vitriol, before they would advance miladi's carriage a step, or appear to possess eyes or ears for the infuriated cabman.

Bond street, at this hour, is a study for such observers, as, having gone through an apprenticeship of criticism upon all the other races and grades of men and gentlemen in the world, are now prepared to study their species in its highest fashionable phase—that of “nice persons” at the West End. The Oxford-street “swell,” and the Regent-street dandy, if seen here, are out of place. The expressive word “quiet” (with its present London signification), defines the dress, manner, bow, and even physiognomy, of every true denizen of St. James’s and Bond street. The great principle among men of the clubs, in all these particulars, is to subdue—to deprive their coats, hats, and manners, of everything sufficiently marked to be caricatured by the satirical or imitated by the vulgar. The triumph of style seems to be that the lines which define it shall be imperceptible to the common eye—that it shall require the difficult education which creates it to know its form and limit. Hence an almost universal error with regard to English gentlemen—that they are repulsive and cold. With a thousand times the heart and real politeness of the Frenchman, they meet you with the simple and unaffected address which would probably be that of shades in Elysium, between whom (we may suppose) there is no longer etiquette or concealment. The only exceptions to this rule in London, are, first and alone, Count —, whose extraordinary and original style, marked as it is, is inimitable by any man of less brilliant talents and less beauty of person, and the king’s guardsmen, who are dandies by prescriptive right, or, as it were, professionally. All other men who are members of Brooks’s and the Traveller’s, and frequent Bond street in the flush of the afternoon, are what would be called in America, plain, unornamental, and, perhaps, ill-dressed individuals, who would strike you more by the absence than the possession of all the peculiarities which we generally suppose marks a “picked man of countries.” In America, particularly, we are liable to error on this point, as, of the great number of our travellers for improvement, scarce one in a thousand remains longer in London than to visit the tower and the Thames tunnel. The nine hundred and ninety-nine reside principally, and acquire all they get of foreign manner and style, at Paris—the very most artificial, corrupt, and affected school for gentlemen in the polite world.

Prejudice against any one country is an illiberal feeling, which common reflection should, and which enlightened travel usually does, entirely remove. There is a vulgar prejudice against the English in almost all countries, but more particularly in ours, which blinds its entertainers to much that is admirable, and deprives them of the good drawn from the best models. The troop of scurrilous critics, the class of English bagmen, and errant vulgarians of all kinds, and the industriously-blown coals of old hostilities, are barriers which an educated mind may well overlook, and barriers beyond which lie, no doubt, the best examples of true civilization and refinement the world ever saw. But we are getting into an essay when we should be turning down Bruton street, on our way to the park, with all the fashion of Bond street and May Fair.

May Fair! what a name for the core of dissipated and exclusive London! A name that brings with it only the scent of crushed flowers in a green field, of a pole wreathed with rose, booths crowded with dancing peasant-girls, and nature in its holiday! This—to express the costly, the courtlike, the so-called “heartless” precinct of fashion and art, in their most authentic and envied perfection. Mais, les extrêmes se touchent, and, perhaps, there is more nature in May Fair than in Rose Cottage or Honeysuckle Lodge.

We stroll on through Berkeley square, by Chesterfield and Curzon streets to the park gate. What an aristocratic quiet reigns here! How plain are the exteriors of these houses: how unexpressive these doors, without a name, of the luxury and high-born pride within! At the open window of the hall sit the butler and footman, reading the morning paper, while they wait to dispense the “not at home” to callers not disappointed. The rooks are noisy in the old trees of Chesterfield house. The painted window-screens of the probably still-slumbering Count —, in his bachelor’s den, are closely drawn, and, as we pass Seymour place, a crowd of gay cabs and diplomatic chariots, drawn up before the dark-green door at the farther extremity, announce to you the residence of one whose morning and evening levées are alike thronged by distinction and talent—the beautiful Lady —.

This short turn brings us to the park, which is rapidly filling with vehicles of every fashion and color, and with pedestrians and horsemen innumerable. No hackney-coach, street-cab, cart, or pauper, is allowed to pass the porters at the several gates: the road is macadamized and watered, and the grass within the ring is fresh and verdant. The sun here triumphs partially over the skirt of London smoke, which sways backward and forward over the chimneys of Park lane, and, as far as it is possible so near the dingy halo of the metropolis, the gay occupants of these varied conveyances “take the air.”

Let us stand by the railing a moment, and see what comes by. This is the field of display for the coachman, who sits upon his sumptuous hammercloth, and takes more pride in his horses than their owner, and considers them, if not like his own honor and blood, very like his own property. Watch the delicate handling of his ribands, the affected nonchalance of his air, and see how perfectly, how admirably, how beautifully, move his blood horses, and how steadily and well follows the compact carriage! Within (it is a dark-green calèche, and the liveries are drab, with red edgings) sits the oriental form and bright spiritual face of a banker’s wife, the daughter of a noble race, who might have been, but was not, sacrificed in “marrying into the finance,” and who soars up into the sky of happiness, like the unconscious bird that has escaped the silent arrow of the savage, as if her destiny could not but have been thus fulfilled. Who follows? D’Israeli, alone in his cab; thoughtful, melancholy, disappointed in his political schemes, and undervaluing his literary success, and expressing, in his scholar-like and beautiful profile, as he passes us, both the thirst at his heart and the satiety at his lips. The liverly of his “tiger” is neglected, and he drives like a man who has to choose between running and being run against, and takes that which leaves him the most leisure for reflection. Poor D’Israeli! With a kind and generous heart, talents of the most brilliant order, an ambition which consumes his soul, and a father who expects everything from his son; lost for the want of a tact common to understandings fathoms deep below his own, and likely to drive in Hyde Park forty years hence, if he die not of the corrosion of disappointment, no more distinguished than now, and a thousand times more melancholy.

An open barouche follows, drawn by a pair of dark bays, the coachman and footman in suits of plain gray, and no crest on the panels. A lady, of remarkable small person, sits, with the fairest foot ever seen, just peeping from under a cashmere, on the forward cushion, and from under her peculiarly plain and small bonnet burn, in liquid fire, the most lambent and spiritual eyes that night and sleep ever hid from the world. She is a niece of Napoleon, married to an English nobleman; and beside her sits her father, who refused the throne of Tuscany, a noble-looking man, with an expression of calm and tranquil resignation in his face, unusually plain in his exterior, and less alive than most of the gay promenaders to the bright scene passing about him. He will play in the charade at his daughter’s soirée in the evening, however, and forget his exile and his misfortunes; for he is a fond father and a true philosopher.

CHAPTER VI.

LONDON.

If you dine with all the world at seven, you have still an hour or more for Hyde Park, and "Rotten Row;" this half mile between Oxford street and Piccadilly, to which the fashion of London confines itself, as if the remainder of the bright green park were forbidden ground, is now fuller than ever. There is the advantage in this condensed drive, that you are sure to see your friends here, earlier or later, in every day—(for wherever you are to go with horses, the conclusion of the order to the coachman is, "home by the park")—and then if there is anything new in the way of an arrival, a pretty foreigner, or a fresh face from the country, some dandy's tiger leaves his master at the gate, and brings him at his club, over his coffee, all possible particulars of her name, residence, condition, and whatever other circumstances fall in his way. By dropping in at Lady —'s soirée in the evening, if you were interested in the face, you may inform yourself of more than you would have drawn in a year's acquaintance from the subject of your curiosity. Malapropos to my remark, here comes a turn-out, concerning which and its occupant I have made many inquiries in vain—the pale-colored chariot, with a pair of grays, dashing toward us from the Seymour gate. As it comes by you will see, sitting quite in the corner, and in a very languid and elegant attitude, a slight woman of perhaps twenty-four, dressed in the simplest white cottage-bonnet that could be made, and, with her head down, looking up through heavy black eyelashes, as if she but waited till she had passed a particular object, to resume some engrossing reverie. Her features are Italian, and her attitude, always the same indolent one, has also a redolence of that land of repose; but there has been an English taste, and no ordinary one, in the arrangement of that equipage and its dependants; and by the expression, never mistaken in London, of the well-appointed menials, you may be certain that both master and mistress (if master there be), exact no common deference. She is always alone, and not often seen in the park; and whenever I have inquired of those likely to know, I found that she had been observed, but could get no satisfactory information. She disappears by the side toward the Regent's park, and when once out of the gate, her horses are let off at a speed that distances all pursuit that would not attract observation. There is a look of "Who the deuce can it be?" in the faces of all the mounted dandies, wherever she passes, for it is a face which once seen is not easily thought of with indifference, or forgotten. Immense as London is, a woman of anything like extraordinary beauty would find it difficult to live there incognito a week; and how this fair incomprehensible has contrived to elude the curiosity of Hyde-park admiration, for nearly two years, is rather a marvel. There she goes, however, and without danger of being arrested for a flying highwayman you could scarcely follow.

It is getting late, and, as we turn down toward the clubs, we shall meet the last and most fashionable comers to the park. Here is a horseman, surrounded with half a dozen of the first young noblemen of England. He rides a light bay horse with dark legs, whose delicate veins are like the tracery of silken threads beneath the gloss of his limbs, and whose small, animated head seems to express the very essence of speed and fire. He is the most beautiful park horse in England; and behind follows a high-bred milk-white pony, ridden by a small, faultlessly-dressed groom, who sits the spirited and fretting creature as if he anticipated every movement before the fine hoof rose from the ground. He rides admirably, but his master is more of a study. A luxuriance of black curls escapes from the broad rim of a peculiar hat, and forms a relief to the small and sculpture-like profile of a face as perfect, by every rule of beauty, as the Greek Antinous. It would be too feminine but for the muscular neck and broad chest from which the head rises, and the indications of great personal strength in the Herculean shoulders. His loose coat would disguise the proportions of a less admirable figure; but, au reste, his dress is without fold or wrinkle, and no figurante of the ballet ever showed finer or more skillfully developed limbs. He is one of the most daring in this country of bold riders; but modifies the stiff English school of equestrianism, with the ease and grace of that of his own country. His manner, though he is rather Anglomane, is in striking contrast to the grave and quiet air of his companions; and between his recognitions, right and left, to the passing promenaders, he laughs and amuses himself with the joyous and thoughtless gayety of a child. Acknowledged by all his acquaintances to possess splendid talents, this "observed of all observers" is a singular instance of a modern Sybarite—content to sacrifice time, opportunity, and the highest advantages of mind and body, to the pleasure of the moment. He seems exempt from all the usual penalties of such a career. Nothing seems to do its usual work on him—care, nor exhaustion, nor recklessness, nor the disapprobation of the heavy-handed opinion of the world. Always gay, always brilliant, ready to embark at any moment, or at any hazard, in anything that will amuse an hour, one wonders how and where such an unwanted meteor will disappear.

But here comes a carriage without hammercloth or liveries; one of those shabby-genteel conveyances, hired by the week, containing three or four persons in the highest spirits, all talking and gesticulating at once. As the carriage passes the "beau-knot" (as —, and his inseparable troop are sometimes called), one or two of the dandies spur up, and resting their hands on the windows, offer the compliments of the day to the only lady within, with the most earnest looks of admiration. The gentlemen in her company become silent, and answer to the slight bows of the cavaliers with foreign monosyllables, and presently the coachman whips up once more, the horsemen drop off, and the excessive gayety of the party resumes its tone. You must have been struck, as the carriage passed, with the brilliant whiteness and regularity of the lady's teeth, and still more with the remarkable play of her lips, which move as if the blood in them were imprisoned lightning. (The figure is strong, but nothing else conveys to my own mind what I am trying to describe.) Energy, grace, fire, rapidity, and a capability of utter abandonment to passion and expression, live visibly on those lips. Her eyes are magnificent. Her nose is regular, with nostrils rimmed round with an expansive nerve, that gives them constantly the kind of animation visible in the head of a fiery Arab. Her complexion is one of those which, dark and wanting in brilliance by day, light up at night with an alabaster fairness; and when the glossy black hair, which is now put away so plainly under her simple bonnet, falls over her shoulders in heavy masses, the contrast is radiant. The gentlemen in that carriage are Rubini, Lablache, and a gentleman who passes for the lady's uncle; and the lady is Julia Grisi.

The smoke over the heart of the city begins to thicken into darkness, the gas-lamps are shooting up, bright and star-like, along the Kensington road, and the last promenaders disappear. And now the world of London, the rich and gay portion of it at least, enjoy that which compensates them for the absence of the bright nights and skies of Italy—a climate within doors, of comfort and luxury, unknown under brighter heavens.

CHAPTER VII.

ISLE OF WIGHT—RYDE.

"INSTEAD of parboiling you with a soirée or a dinner," said a sensible and kind friend, who called on us at Ryde, "I shall make a pic-nic to Netley." And on a bright, breezy morning of June, a merry party of some twenty of the inhabitants of the green Isle of Wight shot away from the long pier, in one of the swift boats of those waters, with a fair wind for Southampton.

Ryde is the most American-looking town I have seen abroad; a cluster of white houses and summery villas on the side of a hill, leaning up from the sea. Geneva, on the Seneca lake, resembles it. It is a place of baths, boarding-houses, and people of damaged constitutions, with very select society, and quiet and rather primitive habits. The climate is deliciously soft, and the sun seems always to shine there.

As we got out into the open channel, I was assisting the skipper to tighten his bowline, when a beautiful ship, in the distance, putting about on a fresh track, caught the sun full on her snowy sails, and seemed to start like an apparition from the sea.

"She's a liner, sir!" said the bronzed boatman, suspending his haul to give her a look of involuntary admiration.

"An American packet, you mean?"

"They're the prettiest ships afloat, sir," he continued, "and the smartest handled. They're out to New York, and back again, before you can look round, a'most. Ah, I see her flag now—stars and stripes. Can you see it, sir?"

"Are the captains Englishmen, principally?" I asked.

"No, sir! all 'calkylators,' sharp as a needle!"

"Thank you," said I; "I am a calculator too!"

The conversation ceased, and I thought from the boatman's look, that he had more respect than love for us. The cloud of snowy sail traversed the breadth of the channel with the speed of a bird, wheeled again upon her opposite tack, and soon disappeared from view, taking with her the dove of my imagination to return with an olive-branch from home. It must be a cold American heart whose strings are not swept by that bright flag in a foreign land, like a harp with the impassioned prelude of the master.

Coves were soon upon our lee, with her fairy fleet of yachts lying at anchor—Lord Yarborough's frigate-looking craft asleep amid its dependant brood, with all its fine tracery of rigging drawn on a cloudless sky, the picture of what it is, and what all vessels seem to me a thing for pleasure only. Darting about like a swallow on the wing, a small, gayly-painted sloop-yacht, as graceful and slender as the first bow of the new moon, played off the roadstead for the sole pleasure of motion, careless whither; and meantime the low-fringed shores of the Southampton side grew more and more distinct, and before we had well settled upon our cushions, the old tower of the abbey lay sharp over the bow.

We enjoyed the first ramble through the ruins the better, that to see them was a secondary object. The first was to select a grassy spot for our table. Threading the old unroofed vaults with this errand, the pause of involuntary homage exacted by a sudden burst upon an arch or a fretted window, was natural and true; and for those who are disturbed by the formal and trite enthusiasm of companions who admire by a prompter, this stalking-horse of another pursuit was not an indifferent advantage.

The great roof over the principal nave of the abbey has fallen in, and lies in rugged and picturesque masses within the Gothic shell—windows, arches, secret staircases, and gray walls, all breaking up the blue sky around, but leaving above, for a smooth and eternal roof, an oblong and ivy-fringed segment of the blue plane of heaven. It seems to rest on those crumbling corners as you stand within.

We selected a rising bank under the shoulder of a rock, grown over with moss and ivy, and following the suggestion of a pretty lover of the picturesque, the shawls and cloaks, with their bright colors, were thrown over the nearest fragments of the roof, and everybody unbonneted and assisted in the arrangements. An old woman who sold apples outside the walls was employed to build a fire for our teakettle in a niche where, doubtless, in its holier days, had stood the effigy of a saint; and at the pedestals of a cluster of slender columns our attendants displayed upon a table a show of pasties and bright wines, that, if there be monkish spirits who walk at Netley, we have added a poignant regret to their purgatories, that their airy stomachs can be no more vino ciboque grata.

We were doing justice to a pretty shoulder of lamb, with mint sauce, when a slender youth who had been wandering around with a portfolio, took up an artist's position in the farther corner of the ruins, and began to sketch the scene. I mentally felicitated him on the accident that had brought him to Netley at that particular moment, for a prettier picture than that before him an artist could scarce have thrown together. The inequalities of the floor of the abbey provided a mossy table for every two or three of the gayly-dressed ladies, and there they reclined in small and graceful groups, their white dresses relieved on the luxuriant grass, and between them, half buried in moss, the sparkling glasses full of bright wines, and an air of ease and grace over all, which could belong only to the two extremes of Arcadian simplicity, or its high-bred imitation. We amused ourselves with the idea of appearing, some six months after, in the middle ground of a landscape, in a picturesque annual; and I am afraid that I detected, on the first suggestion of the idea, a little unconscious attitudinizing in some of the younger members of the party. It was proposed that the artist should be invited to take wine with us; but as a rosy-cheeked page donned his gold hat to carry our compliments, the busy draughtsman was joined by one or two ladies not quite so attractive-looking as himself, but evidently of his own party, and our messenger was recalled. Sequitur—they who would find adventure should travel alone.

The monastic ruins of England derive a very peculiar and touching beauty from the bright veil of ivy which almost buries them from the sun. This constant and affectionate mourner draws from the moisture of the climate a vividness and luxuriance which is found in no other land. Hence the remarkable loveliness of Netley—a quality which impresses the visitors to this spot, far more than the melancholy usually inspired by decay.

Our gayety shocked some of the sentimental people rambling about the ruins, for it is difficult for those who have not dined to sympathize with the mirth of those who have. How often we mistake for sadness the depression of an empty stomach! How differently authors and travellers would write, if they commenced the day, instead of ending it, with meats and wine! I was led to these reflections by coming suddenly upon a young lady and her companion (possibly her lover), in climbing a ruined staircase sheathed within the wall of the abbey. They were standing at one of the windows, quite unconscious of my neighborhood, and looking down upon the gay party of ladies below, who were still amid the débris of the feast arranging their bonnets for a walk.

"What a want of soul," said the lady, "to be eating and drinking in such a place!"

"Some people have no souls," responded the gentleman.

After this verdict, I thought the best thing I could do was to take care of my body, and I very carefully backed down the old staircase, which is probably more hazardous now than in the days when it was used to admit damsels and haunches of venison to the reverend fathers.

I reached the bottom in safety, and informed my friends that they had no souls, but they manifested the usual unconcern on the subject, and strolled away through the echoing arches, in search of new points of view and fresh wild-flowers. "Commend me at least," I thought, as I followed on, "to those whose pulses can be quickened even by a cold pie and a glass of champagne. Sadness and envy are sown thickly enough by any wayside."

We were embarked once more by the middle of the afternoon, and with a head wind, but smooth water and cool temperature, beat back to Ryde. If the young lady and her lover have forgiven or forgotten us, and the ghosts of Netley, frocked or petticoated, have taken no umbrage, I have not done amiss in marking the day with a stone of the purest white. How much more sensible is a party like this, in the open air, and at healthy hours, than the untimely and ceremonious civilities usually paid to strangers. If the world would mend by moralising, however, we should have had a Utopia long ago.

CHAPTER VIII.

COMPARISON OF THE CLIMATE OF EUROPE AND AMERICA.

ONE of Hazlitt's nail-driving remarks is to the effect that he should like very well to pass the whole of his life in travelling, if he could anywhere borrow another life to spend afterward at home. How far action is necessary to happiness, and how far repose—how far the appetite for novelty and adventure will drive, and how far the attractions of home and domestic comfort will recall us—in short, what are the precise exactions of the antagonistic principles in our bosoms of curiosity and sloth, energy and sufferance, hope and memory—are questions which each one must settle for himself, and which none can settle but he who has passed his life in the eternal and fruitless search after the happiest place, climate, and station.

Contentment depends upon many things within our own control, but, with a certain education, it depends partly upon things beyond it. To persons delicately constituted or delicately brought up, and to all idle persons, the principal ingredient in the cup of enjoyment is climate; and Providence, that consults "the greatest happiness of the greatest number," has made the poor and the roughly-nurtured independent of the changes of the wind. Those who have the misfortune to be delicate as well as poor—those, particularly, for whom there is no hope but in a change of clime, but whom pitiless poverty compels to languish in vain after the reviving south, are happily few; but they have thus much more than their share of human calamity.

In throwing together my recollections of the climates with which I have become acquainted in other lands, I am aware that there is a greater difference of opinion on this subject than on most others. A man who has agreeable society about him in Montreal, but who was without friends in Florence, would be very likely to bring the climate in for its share of the difference, and prefer Canada to Italy; and health and circumstances of all kinds affect, in no slight degree, our susceptibility to skies and atmosphere. But it is sometimes interesting to know the impressions of others, even though they agree not with our own; and I will only say of mine on this subject, that they are so far likely to be fair, as I have been blessed with the same perfect health in all countries, and have been happy alike in every latitude and season.

It is almost a matter of course to decry the climate of England. The English writers themselves talk of the suicidal months; and it is the only country where part of the livery of a mounted groom is his master's great-coat strapped about his waist. It is certainly a damp climate, and the sun shines less in England than in most other countries. But to persons of full habit this moisture in the air is extremely agreeable; and the high condition of all animals in England, from man downward, proves its healthfulness. A stranger who has been accustomed to a brighter sky, will, at first, find a gloom in the gray light so characteristic of an English atmosphere; but this soon wears off, and he finds a compensation, as far as the eye is concerned, in the exquisite softness of the verdure, and the deep and enduring brightness of the foliage. The effect of this moisture on the skin is singularly grateful. The pores become accustomed to a healthy action, which is unknown in other countries; and the bloom by which an English complexion is known all over the world is the index of an activity in this important part of the system, which, when first experienced, is almost like a new sensation. The transition to a dry climate, such as ours, deteriorates the condition and quality of the skin, and produces a feeling, if I may so express it, like that of being glazed. It is a common remark in England, that an officer's wife and daughters follow his regiment to Canada at the expense of their complexions; and it is a well-known fact that the bloom of female beauty is, in our country, painfully evanescent.

The climate of America is, in many points, very different from that of France and Great Britain. In the middle and northern states, it is a dry, invigorating, bracing climate, in which a strong man may do more work than in almost any other, and which makes continual exercise, or occupation of some sort, absolutely necessary. With the exception of the "Indian summer," and here and there a day scattered through the spring and the hot months, there is no weather tempered so finely that one would think of passing the day in merely enjoying it, and life is passed, by those who have the misfortune to be idle, in continual and active dread of the elements. The cold is so acrid, and the heat so sultry, and the changes from one to the other are so sudden and violent, that no enjoyment can be depended upon out-of-doors, and no system of clothing or protection is good for a day together. He who has full occupation for head and hand (as by far the greatest majority of our countrymen have) may live as long in America as in any portion of the globe—vide the bills of mortality. He whose spirits lean upon the temperature of the wind, or whose nerves require a genial and constant atmosphere, may find more favorable climes; and the habits and delicate constitutions of scholars and people of sedentary pursuits generally, in the United States, prove the truth of the observation.

The habit of regular exercise in the open air, which is found to be so salutary in England, is scarcely possible in America. It is said, and said truly, of the first, that there is no day in the year when a lady may not ride comfortably on horseback; but with us, the extremes of heat and cold, and the tempestuous character of our snows and rains, totally forbid, to a delicate person, anything like regularity in exercise. The consequence is, that the habit rarely exists, and the high and glowing health so common in England, and consequent, no doubt, upon the equable character of the climate in some measure, is with us sufficiently rare to excite remark. "Very English-looking," is a common phrase, and means very healthy-looking. Still our people last—and though I should define the English climate as the one in which the human frame is in the highest condition, I should say of America, that it is the one in which you could get the most work out of it.

Atmosphere, in England and America, is the first of the necessaries of life. In Italy, it is the first of its luxuries. We breathe in America, and walk abroad, without thinking of these common acts but as a means of arriving at happiness. In Italy, to breathe and to walk abroad are themselves happiness. Day after day—week after week—month after month—you wake with the breath of flowers coming in at your open window, and a sky of serene and unfathomable blue, and mornings and evenings of tranquil, assured, heavenly purity and beauty. The few weeks of the rainy season are forgotten in these long halcyon months of sunshine. No one can have lived in Italy a year, who remembers anything but the sapphire sky and the kindling and ever-seen stars. You grow insensibly to associate the sunshine and moonlight only with the fountain you have lived near, or the columns of the temple you have seen from your window, for on no objects in other lands have you seen their light so constant.

I scarce know how to convey, in language, the effect of the climate of Italy on mind and body. Sitting here, indeed, in the latitude of thirty-nine, in the middle of April, by a warm fire, and with a cold wind whistling at the window, it is difficult to recall it, even to the fancy. I do not know whether life is prolonged, but it is infinitely enriched and brightened, by the delicious atmosphere of Italy. You rise in the morning, thanking Heaven for life and liberty to go abroad. There is a sort of opiate in the air, which makes idleness, that would be the vulture of Prometheus in America, the dove of promise in Italy. It is delicious to do nothing—delicious to stand an hour looking at a Savoyard and his monkey—delicious to sit away the long, silent noon, in the shade of a column, or on the grass of a fountain—delicious to be with a friend without the interchange of an idea—to dabble in a book, or look into the cup of a flower. You do not read, for you wish to enjoy the weather. You do not visit, for you hate to enter a door while the weather is so fine. You lie down unwillingly for your siesta in the hot noon, for you fear you may oversleep the first coolness of the long shadows of sunset. The fancy, meantime, is free, and seems liberated by the same languor that enervates the severer faculties; and nothing seems fed by the air but thoughts, which minister to enjoyment.

The climate of Greece is very much that of Italy. The Mediterranean is all beloved of the sun. Life has a value there, of which the rheumatic, shivering, snow-breasting, blue-devilled idler of northern regions has no shadow, even in a dream. No wonder Dante mourned and languished for it. No wonder at the sentiment I once heard from distinguished lips—Fuori d'Italia tutto è esilio.

This appears like describing a Utopia; but it is what Italy seemed to me. I have expressed myself much more to my mind, however, in rhyme, for a prose essay is, at best, but a cold medium.

CHAPTER IX.

STRATFORD-ON-AVON.

"ONE-P'UN'-FIVE outside, sir, two p'un' in."

It was a bright, calm afternoon in September, promising nothing but a morrow of sunshine and autumn, when I stepped in at the "White Horse Cellar," in Piccadilly, to take my place in the Tantivy coach for Stratford-on-Avon. Preferring the outside of the coach, at least by as much as the difference in the prices, and accustomed from long habit to pay dearest for that which most pleased me, I wrote myself down for the outside, and deposited my two pounds in the horny palm of the old ex-coachman, retired from the coach, and playing clerk in this dingy den of parcels and portmanteaus. Supposing my business concluded, I stood a minute speculating on the weather-beaten, cramp-handed old Jehu before me, and trying to reconcile his ideas of "retirement from office" with those of his almost next door neighbor, the hero of Strathfieldsaye.

I had mounted the first stair toward daylight, when a touch on the shoulder with the end of a long whip—a technical "reminder," which probably came easier to the old driver than the phrasing of a sentence to a "gemman"—recalled me to the cellar.

"Fifteen shillin', sir," said he laconically, pointing with the same expressive exponent of his profession to the change for my outside place, which I had left lying on the counter.

"You are at least as honest as the duke," I soliloquised, as I pocketed the six bright and substantial half-crowns.

I was at the "White Horse Cellar" again the following morning at six, promising myself with great sincerity never to rely again on the constancy of an English sky. It rained in torrents. The four inside places were all taken, and with twelve fellow-outside, I mounted to the wet seat, and begging a little straw by way of cushion from the ostler, spread my umbrella, abandoned my knees with a single effort of mind to the drippings of the driver's weather-proof upper Benjamin, and away we sped. I was "due" at the house of a hospitable catholic baronet, a hundred and two miles from London, at the dinner-hour of that day, and to wait till it had done raining in England is to expect the millennium.

London in the morning—I mean the poor man's morning, daylight—is to me matter for the most speculative and intense melancholy. Hyde park in the sunshine of a bright afternoon, glittering with equipages and gay with the Aladdin splendors of rank and wealth, is a scene which sends the mercurial qualities of the blood trippingly through the veins. But Hyde park at daylight seen from Piccadilly through fog and rain, is perhaps, of all contrasts, to one who has frequented it in its bright hours, the most dispiriting and dreary. To remember that behind the barricaded and wet windows of Apsley house sleeps the hero of Waterloo—that under these crowded and fog-wrapped houses lie, in their dim chambers breathing of perfume and luxury, the high-born and nobly-moulded creatures who preserve for the aristocracy of England the palm of the world's beauty—to remember this, and a thousand other associations linked with the spot, is not at all to diminish, but rather to deepen, the melancholy of the picture. Why is it that the deserted stage of a theatre, the echo of an empty ball-room, the loneliness of a frequented promenade in untimely hours—any scene, in short, of gaiety gone by but remembered—oppresses and dissatisfies the heart! One would think memory should re-brighten and re-populate such places.

The wheels hissed through the shallow pools in the Macadam road, the regular pattering of the small hoofs in the wet carriage-tracks maintained its quick and monotonous beat on the ear; the silent driver kept his eye on the traces, and "reminded" now and then with but the weight of his slight lash a lagging wheeler or leader, and the complicated but compact machine of which the square foot that I occupied had been so nicely calculated, sped on its ten miles in the hour with the steadfastness of a star in its orbit, and as independent of clouds and rain.

"Est ce que monsieur parle François!" asked at the end of the first stage my right-hand neighbor, a little gentleman, of whom I had hitherto only remarked that he was holding on to the iron railing of the seat with great tenacity.

Having admitted in an evil moment that I had been in France, I was first distinctly made to understand that my neighbor was on his way to Birmingham purely for pleasure, and without the most distant object of business—a point on which he insisted so long, and recurred to so often, that he succeeded at last in persuading me that he was doubtless a candidate for the French clerkship of some exporter of buttons. After listening to an amusing dissertation on the rashness of committing one's life to an English stage-coach, with scarce room enough for the perch of a parrot, and a velocity so diablement dangereux, I tired of my Frenchman; and, since I could not have my own thoughts in peace, opened a conversation with a straw-bonnet and shawl on my left—the property, I soon discovered, of a very smart lady's maid, very indignant at having been made to change places with Master George, who, with his mother and her mistress, were dry and comfortable inside. She "would not have minded the outside place," she said, "for there were sometimes very agreeable gentlemen on the outside, very!"—but she had been promised to go inside, and had dressed accordingly; and it was very provoking to spoil a nice new shawl and best bonnet, just because a great school-boy, that had nothing on that would damage chose not to ride in the rain."

"Very provoking, indeed!" I responded, letting in the rain upon myself unconsciously, in extending my umbrella forward so as to protect her on the side of the wind.

"We should have gone down in the carriage, sir," she continued, edging a little closer to get the full advantage of my umbrella; "but John the coachman has got the hinfuenzy, and my missis wo'n't be driven by no other coachman; she's as obstinate as a mule, sir. And that isn't all I could tell, sir; but I scorn to hurt the character of one of my own sex." And the pretty abigail pursed up her red lips, and looked determined not to destroy her mistress's character—unless particularly requested.

I detest what may be called a proper road-book—even would it be less absurd than it is to write one on a country so well conned as England.

I shall say nothing, therefore, of Marlow, which looked the picture of rural loveliness though seen through fog, nor of Oxford, of which all I remember is that I dined there with my teeth chattering, and my knees saturated with rain. All England is lovely to the wild eye of an American unused to high cultivation; and though my enthusiasm was somewhat damp, I arrived at the bridge over the Avon, blessing England sufficiently for its beauty, and much more for the speed of its coaches.

The Avon, above and below the bridge, ran brightly along between low banks, half sward, half meadow; and on the other side lay the native town of the immortal wool-comber—a gay cheerful-looking village, narrowing in the centre to a closely-built street, across which swung, broad and fair, the sign of the "Red horse." More ambitious hotels lay beyond, and broader streets; but while Washington Irving is remembered (and that will be while the language lasts), the quiet inn in which the great Geoffrey thought and wrote of Shakspeare will be the altar of the pilgrim's devotions.

My baggage was set down, the coachman and guard tipped their hats for a shilling, and, chilled to the bone, I raised my hat instinctively to the courtesy of a slender gentlewoman in black, who, by the keys at her girdle, should be the landlady. Having expected to see a rosy little Mrs. Boniface, with a brown pinafore and worsted mittens, I made up my mind at once that the inn had changed mistresses. On the right of the old-fashioned entrance blazed cheerily the kitchen fire, and with my enthusiasm rather dashed by my disappointment, I stepped in to make friends with the cook, and get a little warmth and information.

"So your old mistress is dead, Mrs. Cook," said I, rubbing my hands with great satisfaction between the fire and a well-roasted chicken.

"Laik, sir, no, she isn't!" answered the rosy lass, pointing with a dredging-box to the same respectable lady in black who was just entering to look after me.

"I beg pardon, sir," she said, dropping a courtesy; "but are you the gentleman expected by Sir Charles —?"

"Yes, madam. And can you tell me anything of your predecessor who had the inn in the days of Washington Irving?"

She dropped another courtesy, and drew up her thin person to its full height, while a smile of gratified vanity stole out at the corners of her mouth.

"The carriage has been waiting some time for you, sir," she said, with a softer tone than that in which she had hitherto addressed me; "and you will hardly be at C— in time for dinner. You will be coming over to-morrow or the day after, perhaps, sir; and then, if you would honor my little room by taking a cup of tea with me, I should be pleased to tell you all about it, sir."

I remembered a promise I had nearly forgotten, that I would reserve my visit to Stratford till I could be accompanied by Miss J. P——, whom I was to have the honor of meeting at my place of destination; and promising an early acceptance of the kind landlady's invitation, I hurried on to my appointment over the fertile hills of Warwickshire.

I was established in one of those old Elizabethan country-houses, which, with their vast parks, their self-sufficing resources of subsistence and company, and the absolute deference shown on all sides to the lord of the manor, give one the impression rather of a little kingdom with a castle in its heart, than of an abode for a gentleman subject. The house itself (called, like most houses of this size and consequence in Warwickshire, a "Court.") was a Gothic, half-castellated square, with four round towers, and innumerable embrasures and windows; two wings in front, probably more modern than the body of the house, and again two long wings extending to the rear, at right angles, and enclosing a flowery and formal parterre. There had been a trench about it, now filled up, and at a short distance from the house stood a polyangular and massive structure, well calculated for defence, and intended as a strong-hold for the retreat of the family and tenants in more troubled times. One of these rear wings enclosed a catholic chapel, for the worship of the baronet and those of his tenants who professed the same faith; while on the northern side, between the house and the garden, stood a large protestant stone church, with a turret and spire, both chapel and church, with their clergyman and priest, dependant on the estate, and equally favored by the liberal and high-minded baronet. The tenantry formed two considerable congregations, and lived and worshipped side by side, with the most perfect harmony—an instance of real Christianity, in my opinion, which the angels of heaven might come down to see. A lovely rural graveyard for the lord and tenants, and a secluded lake below the garden, in which hundreds of wild ducks swam and screamed unmolested, completed the outward features of C— court.

There are noble houses in England, with a door communicating from the dining-room to the stables, that the master and his friends may see their favorites, after dinner, without exposure to the weather. In the place of this rather bizarre luxury, the oak-panelled and spacious dining-hall of C—— is on a level with the organ loft of the chapel, and when the cloth is removed, the large door between is thrown open, and the noble instrument pours the rich and thrilling music of vespers through the rooms. When the service is concluded, and the lights on the altar extinguished, the blind organist (an accomplished musician, and a tenant on the estate), continues his voluntaries in the dark until the hall-door informs him of the retreat of the company to the drawing-room. There is not only refinement and luxury in this beautiful arrangement, but food for the soul and heart.

I chose my room from among the endless vacant but equally luxurious chambers of the rambling old house; my preference solely directed by the portrait of a nun, one of the family in ages gone by—a picture full of melancholy beauty, which hung opposite the window. The face was distinguished by all that in England marks the gentlewoman of ancient and pure descent; and while it was a woman with the more tender qualities of her sex breathing through her features, it was still a lofty and sainted sister, true to her cross, and sincere in her vows and seclusion. It was the work of a master, probably Vandyke, and a picture in which the most solitary man would find company and communion. On the other walls, and in most of the other rooms and corridors, were distributed portraits of the gentlemen and soldiers of the family, most of them bearing some resemblance to the nun, but differing, as brothers in those wild times may be supposed to have differed, from the gentle creatures of the same blood, nursed in the privacy of peace.

CHAPTER X.

VISIT TO STRATFORD-ON-AVON—SHAKSPEARE.

ONE of the first visits in the neighborhood was naturally to Stratford-on-Avon. It lay some ten miles south of us, and I drove down, with the distinguished literary friend I have before mentioned, in the carriage of our kind host, securing, by the presence of his servants and equipage, a degree of respect and attention which would not have been accorded to us in our simple character of travellers. The prim mistress of the "Red Horse," in her close black bonnet and widow's weeds, received us at the door with a deeper courtesy than usual, and a smile of less wintry formality; and proposing to dine at the inn, and "suck the brain" of the hostess more at our leisure, we started immediately for the house of the wool-comber—the birthplace of Shakspeare.

Stratford should have been forbidden ground to builders, masons, shopkeepers, and generally to all people of thrift and whitewash. It is now rather a smart town, with gay calicoes, shawls of the last pattern, hardware, and millinery, exhibited in all their splendor down the widened and newer streets; and though here and there remains a glorious old gloomy and inconvenient abode, which looks as if Shakspeare might have taken shelter under its eaves, the gayer features of the town have the best of it, and flaunt their gaudy and unrespected newness in the very windows of that immortal birthplace. I stepped into a shop to inquire the way to it.

"Shaksper's 'ouse, sir? Yes, sir!" said a dapper clerk, with his hair astonished into the most impossible directions by force of brushing; "keep to the right, sir! Shaksper lived in the wite 'ouse, sir—the 'ouse, you see beyond, with the windy swung up, sir."

A low, old-fashioned house, with a window suspending on a hinge, newly whitewashed and scrubbed, stood a little up the street. A sign over the door informed us in an inflated paragraph, that the immortal Will Shakspeare was born under this roof, and that an old woman within would show it to us for a consideration. It had been used until very lately, I had been told, for a butcher's shop.

A "garrulous old lady" met us at the bottom of the narrow stair leading to the second floor, and began—not to say anything of Shakspeare—but to show us the names of Byron, Moore, Rogers, &c., written among thousands of others on the wall! She had worn out Shakspeare! She had told that story till she was tired of it! or (what, perhaps, is more probable) most people who go there fall to reading the names of the visitors so industriously, that she has grown to think some of Shakspeare's pilgrims greater than Shakspeare.

"Was this old oaken chest here in the days of Shakspeare, madam?" I asked.

"Yes, sir, and here's the name of Byron—here with a capital B. Here's a curiosity, sir."

"And this small wooden box!"

"Made of Shakspeare's mulberry, sir. I had sich a time about that box, sir. Two young gemmen were here the other day—just run up, while the coach was changing horses, to see the house. As soon as they were gone I misses the box. Off scuds my son to the 'Red Horse,' and there they sat on the top looking as innocent as may be. 'Stop the coach,' says my son. 'What do you want?' says the driver. 'My mother's mulberry-box!—Shakspeare's mulberry-box!—One of them 'ere young men's got it in his pocket.' And true enough, sir, one on 'em had the impudence to take it out of his pocket, and flings it into my son's face; and you know the coach never stops a minnit for nothing, sir, or he'd a' smarted for it."

Spirit of Shakspeare! dost thou not sometimes walk alone in this humble chamber! Must one's inmost soul be fretted and frightened always from its devotion by an abominable old woman? Why should not such lucrative occupations be given in charity to the deaf and dumb? The pointing of a finger were enough in such spots of earth!

I sat down in despair to look over the book of visitors, trusting that she would tire of my inattention. As it was of no use to point out names to those who would not look, however, she commenced a long story of an American who had lately taken the whim to sleep in Shakspeare's birth-chamber. She had shaken him down a bed on the floor, and he had passed the night there. It seemed to bother her to comprehend why two thirds of her visitors should be Americans—a circumstance that was abundantly proved by the books.

It was only when we were fairly in the street that I began to realize that I had seen one of the most glorious altars of memory—that deathless Will Shakspeare, the mortal, who was, perhaps (not to speak profanely), next to his Maker, in the divine faculty of creation, first saw the light through the low lattice on which we turned back to look.

The single window of the room in which Scott died at Abbotsford, and this in the birth-chamber of Shakspeare, have seemed to me almost marked with the touch of the fire of those great souls—for I think we have an instinct which tells us on the spot where mighty spirits have come or gone, that they came and went with the light of heaven.

We walked down the street to see the house where Shakspeare lived on his return to Stratford. It stands at the corner of a lane, not far from the church where he was buried, and is a newish un-Shaksperian looking place—no doubt, if it be indeed the same house, most profanely and considerably altered. The present proprietor or occupant of the house or site took upon himself some time since the odium of cutting down the famous mulberry-tree planted by the poet's hand in the garden.

I forgot to mention in the beginning of these notes that two or three miles before coming to Stratford we passed through Shottery, where Anne Hathaway lived. A nephew of the excellent baronet whose guests we were occupied the house. I looked up and down the green lanes about it, and glanced my eye round upon the hills over which the sun has continued to set and the moon to ride in her love-inspiring beauty ever since. There were doubtless outlines in the landscape which had been followed by the eye of Shakespeare when coming, a trembling lover, to Shottery—doubtless, tints in the sky, crops on the fields, smoke-wreaths from the old homesteads on the high hill-sides, which are little altered now. How daringly the imagination plucks back the past in such places! How boldly we ask of fancy and probability the thousand questions we would put, if we might, to the magic mirror of Agrippa? Did that great mortal love timidly, like ourselves? Was the passionate outpouring of his heart simple, and suited to the humble condition of Anne Hathaway, or was it the first fiery coinage of Romeo and Othello? Did she know the immortal honor and light poured upon woman by the love of genius? Did she know how this common and oft-est terrestrial passion becomes fused in the poet's bosom with celestial fire, and, in its wondrous elevation and purity, ascends lambently and musically to the very stars? Did she coy it with him? Was she a woman to him, as commoner mortals find woman—capricious, tender, cruel, intoxicating, cold—everything by changes impossible to calculate or foresee? Did he walk home to Stratford, sometimes, despairing, in perfect sick-heartedness, of her affection, and was he recalled by a message or a lover's instinct to find her weeping and passionately repentant?

How natural it is by such questions and speculations to betray our innate desire to bring the lofty spirits of our common mould to our own inward level—to seek analogies between our affections, passions, appetites, and theirs—to wish they might have been no more exalted, no more fervent, no more worthy of the adorable love of woman than ourselves! The same temper that prompts the depreciation, the envy, the hatred, exercised toward the poet in his lifetime, mingles, not inconsiderably, in the researches so industriously prosecuted after his death into his youth and history. To be admired in this world, and much more to be beloved for higher qualities than his fellow-men, insures to genius not only to be persecuted in life, but to be fettered out with all his frailties and imperfections from the grave.

The church in which Shakespeare is buried stands near the banks of the Avon, and is a most picturesque and proper place of repose for his ashes. An avenue of small trees and vines, ingeniously overlaid, extends from the street to the principal door, and the interior is broken up into that confused and accidental medley of tombs, pews, cross-lights, and pillars, for which the old churches of England are remarkable. The tomb and effigy of the great poet lie in an inner chapel, and are as described in every traveller's book. I will not take up room with the repetition.

It gives one an odd feeling to see the tomb of his wife and daughter beside him. One does not realize before, that Shakespeare had wife, children, kinsmen, like other men—that there were those who had a right to lie in the same tomb; to whom he owed the charities of life; whom he may have benefited or offended; who may have influenced materially his destiny, or he theirs; who were the inheritors of his household goods, his wardrobe, his books—people who looked on him—on Shakespeare—as a landholder, a renter of a pew, a townsman; a relative, in short, who had claims upon them, not for the eternal homage due to celestial inspiration, but for the charity of shelter and bread had been poor, for kindness and ministry had been sick, for burial and the tears of natural affection when he died. It is painful and embarrassing to the mind to go to Stratford—to reconcile the immortality and the incomprehensible power of genius like Shakespeare's, with the space, tenement, and circumstance of a man! The poet should be like the sea-bird, seen only on the wing—his birth, his slumber, and his death, mysteries alike.

I had stipulated with the hostess that my baggage should be put into the chamber occupied by Washington Irving. I was shown into it to dress for dinner—a small neat room, a perfect specimen, in short, of an English bedroom, with snow-white curtains, a looking-glass the size of the face, a well-polished grate and poker, a well-fitted carpet, and as much light as heaven permits to the climate.

Our dinner for two was served in a neat parlor on the same floor—an English inn dinner—simple, neat, and comfortable, in the sense of that word unknown in other countries. There was just fire enough in the grate, just enough for two in the different dishes, a servant who was just enough in the room, and just civil enough—in short, it was, like everything else in that country of adaptation and fitness, just what was ordered and wanted, and no more.

The evening turned out stormy, and the rain pattered merrily against the windows. The shutters were closed, the fire blazed up with new brightness, the well-fitted wax lights were set on the table; and when the dishes were removed, we replaced the wine with a tea-tray, and sent for the hostess to give us her company and a little gossip over our cups.

Nothing could be more nicely understood and defined than the manner of English hostesses generally in such situations, and of Mrs. Gardiner particularly in this. Respectful without servility, perfectly sure of the propriety of her own manner and mode of expression, yet preserving in every look and word the proper distinction between herself and her guests, she insured from them that kindness and ease of communication which would make a long evening of social conversation pass, not only without embarrassment on either side, but with mutual pleasure and gratification.

"I have brought up, mem," she said, producing a well-polished poker from under her black apron, before she took the chair set for her at the table—"I have brought up a relic for you to see, that no money would buy from me."

She turned it over in my hand, and I read on one of the flat sides at the bottom—"GEOFFREY CRAYON'S SCEPTRE."

"Do you remember Mr. Irving," asked my friend, "or have you supposed, since reading his sketch of Stratford-on-Avon, that the gentleman in number three might be the person?"

The hostess drew up her thin figure, and the expression of a person about to compliment herself stole into the corners of her mouth.

"Why, you see, mem, I am very much in the habit of observing my guests, and I think I may say I know a superior gentleman when I see him. If you remember, mem" (and she took down from the mantelpiece a much-worn copy of the Sketch-Book), "Geoffrey Crayon tells the circumstance of my stepping in when it was getting late, and asking if he had rung. I knows it by that, and then the gentleman I mean was an American, and I think, mem, besides" (and she hesitated a little, as if she was about to advance an original and rather venturesome opinion)—"I think I can see that gentleman's likeness all through this book."

A truer remark or a more just criticism was perhaps never made on the Sketch-Book. We smiled, and Mrs. Gardiner proceeded:—

"I was in and out of the coffee-room the night he arrived, mem, and I sees directly by his modest ways and timid look that he was a gentleman, and not fit company for the other travellers. They were all young men, sir, and business travellers, and you know, mem, ignorance takes the advantage of modest merit, and after their dinner they were very noisy and rude. So, I says to Sarah, the chambermaid, says I, 'That nice gentleman can't get near the fire, and you go and light a fire in number three, and he shall sit alone, and it shan't cost him nothing, for I like the look on him.' Well, mem, he seemed pleased to be alone, and after his tea, he puts his legs up over the grate, and there he sits with the poker in his hand till ten o'clock. The other travellers went to bed, and at last the house was as still as midnight, all but a poke in the grate now and then in number three, and every time I heard it, I jumped up and lit a bed-candle, for I was getting very sleepy, and I hoped he was getting up to ring for a light. Well, mem, I nodded and nodded, and still no ring at the bell. At last I says to Sarah, says I, 'Go into number three, and upset something, for I am sure that gentleman has fallen asleep.'—'La, ma'am,' says Sarah, 'I don't dare.'—'Well, then,' says I, 'I'll go.' So I opens the door, and I says, 'If you please, sir, did you ring?'—little thinking that question would ever be written down in such a beautiful book, mem. He sat with his feet on the fender poking the fire, and a smile on his face, as if some pleasant thought was in his mind. 'No, ma'am,' says he, 'I did not.' I shuts the door, and sits down again, for I hadn't the heart to tell him that it was late, for he was a gentleman not to speak rudely to, mem. Well, it was past twelve o'clock, when the bell did ring. 'There,' says I to Sarah, 'thank Heaven he has done thinking, and we can go to bed.' So he walked up stairs with his light, and the next morning he was up early and off to the Shakspeare house, and he brings me home a box of the mulberry-tree, and asks me if I thought it was genuine, and said it was for his mother in America. And I loved him still more for that, and I'm sure I prayed she might live to see him return."

"I believe she did, Mrs. Gardiner; but how soon after did you set aside the poker?"

"Why, sir, you see there's a Mr. Vincent that comes here sometimes, and he says to me one day—'So, Mrs. Gardiner, you're finely immortalized. Read that.' So the minnit I read it, I remembered who it was, and all about it, and I runs and gets the number three poker, and locks it up safe and sound, and by-and-by I sends it to Brummagem, and has his name engraved on it, and here you see it, sir—and I wouldn't take no money for it."

I had never the honor to meet or know Mr. Irving, and I evidently lost ground with the hostess of the "Red Horse" for that misfortune. I delighted her, however, with the account which I had seen in a late newspaper, of his having shot a buffalo in the prairies of the west; and she soon courtesied herself out, and left me to the delightful society of the distinguished lady who had accompanied me. Among all my many loiterings in many lands, I remember none more intellectually pure and gratifying, than this at Stratford-on-Avon. My sleep, in the little bed consecrated by the slumbers of the immortal Geoffrey, was sweet and light; and I write myself his debtor for a large share of the pleasure which genius like his lavishes on the world.

CHAPTER XI.

CHARLECOTE.

ONCE more posting through Shottery and Stratford-on-Avon, on the road to Kenilworth and Warwick, I felt a pleasure in becoming an habitué in Shakspeare's town—in being recognised by the Stratford post-boys, known at the Stratford inn, and remembered at the toll-gates. It is pleasant to be welcomed by name anywhere; but at Stratford-on-Avon, it is a recognition by those whose fathers or predecessors were the companions of Shakspeare's frolics. Every fellow in a slouched hat—every idler on a tavern bench—every saunterer with a dog at his heels on the highway—should be a deer-stealer from Charlecote. You would almost ask him, "Was Will Shakspeare with you last night?"

The Lucys still live at Charlecote, immortalized by a varlet poacher who was tried before old Sir Thomas for stealing a buck. They have drawn an apology from Walter Savage Landor for making too free with the family history, under cover of an imaginary account of the trial. I thought, as we drove along in sight of the fine old hall, with its broad park and majestic trees—very much as it stood in the days of Sir Thomas, I believe—that most probably the descendants of the old justice look even now upon Shakspeare more as an offender against the game-laws than as a writer of immortal plays. I venture to say, it would be bad tact in a visiter to Charlecote to felicitate the family on the honor of possessing a park in which Shakspeare had stolen deer—to show more interest in seeing the hall in which he was tried than in the family portraits.

On the road which I was travelling (from Stratford to Charlecote) Shakspeare had been dragged as a culprit. What were his feelings before Sir Thomas! He felt, doubtless, as every possessor of the divine fire of genius must feel, when brought rudely in contact with his fellow-men, that he was too much their superior to be angry. The humor in which he has drawn Justice Shallow proves abundantly that he was more amused than displeased with his own trial. But was there no vexation at the moment? A reflection, it might be, from the estimate of his position in the minds of those who were about him—who looked on him simply as a stealer of so much venison. Did he care for Anne Hathaway's opinion then?

How little did Sir Thomas Lucy understand the relation between judge and culprit on that trial! How little did he dream he was sitting for his picture to the pestilent varlet at the bar; that the deer-stealer could better afford to forgive him than he the deer-stealer! Genius forgives, or rather forgets, all wrongs done in ignorance of its immortal presence. Had Ben Jonson made a wilful jest on a line in his new play, it would have rankled longer than fine and imprisonment for deer-stealing. Those who crowd back and trample upon men of genius in the common walk of life; who cheat them, misrepresent them, take advantage of their inattention or their generosity in worldly matters, are sometimes surprised how their injuries, if not themselves, are forgotten. Old Adam Woodcock might as well have held malice against Roland Grame for the stab in the stuffed doublet of the Abbot of Mistrule.

Yet, as I might have remarked in the paragraph gone before, it is probably not easy to put conscious and secret superiority entirely between the mind and the opinions of those around who think differently. It is one reason why men of genius love more than the common share of solitude—to recover self-respect. In the midst of the amusing travesty he was drawing in his own mind of the grave scene about him, Shakspeare possibly felt at moments as like a detected culprit as he seemed to the gamekeeper and the justice. It is a small penalty to pay for the after worship of the world! The ragged and proverbially ill-dressed peasants who are selected from the whole campagna, as models to the sculptors of Rome, care little what is thought of their good looks in the Corso. The disguised proportions beneath their rags will be admired in deathless marble, when the noble who scarce deigns their possessor a look will lie in forgotten dust under his stone scutcheon.

CHAPTER XII.

WARWICK CASTLE.

WERE it not for the "out-heroded" descriptions in the guide-books, one might say a great deal of Warwick castle. It is the quality of overdone or ill-expressed enthusiasm to silence that which is more rational and real. Warwick is, perhaps, the best kept of all the famous old castles of England. It is a superb and admirably-appointed modern dwelling, in the shell, and with all the means and appliances preserved, of an ancient stronghold. It is a curious union, too. My lady's maid and my lord's valet coquet upon the bartizan, where old Guy of Warwick stalked in his coat-of-mail. The London cockney, from his two days' watering at Leamington, stops his pony-chaise, hired at half-a-crown the hour, and walks Mrs. Popkins over the old draw-bridge as peacefully as if it were the threshold of his shop in the Strand. Scot and Frenchman saunter through fosse and tower, and no ghost of the middle ages stalks forth, with closed visor, to challenge these once natural foes. The powdered butler yawns through an embrasure, expecting "mildy," the countess of this fair domain, who in one day's posting from London seeks relief in Warwick Castle from the routs and soirées of town. What would old Guy say, or the "noble imp" whose effigy is among the escutcheoned tombs of his fathers, if they could rise through their marble slabs, and be whirled over the drawbridge in a post-chaise? How indignantly they would listen to the reckoning within their own portcullis, of the rates for chaise and postillion. How astounded they would be at the butler's bow, and the proffered officiousness of the valet. "Shall I draw off your lordship's boots? Which of these new vests from Staub will your lordship put on for dinner?"

Among the pictures at Warwick, I was interested by a portrait of Queen Elizabeth (the best of that sovereign I ever saw); one of Machiavelli, one of Essex, and one of Sir Philip Sidney. The delightful and gifted woman whom I had accompanied to the castle observed of the latter, that the hand alone expressed all his character. I had often made the remark in real life, but I had never seen an instance on painting where the likeness was so true. No one could doubt, who knew Sir Philip Sidney's character, that it was a literal portrait of his hand. In our day, if you have an artist for a friend, he makes use of you while you call, to "sit for the hand" of the portrait on his easel. Having a preference for the society of artists myself, and frequenting their studios habitually, I know of some hundred and fifty unsuspecting gentlemen on canvass, who have procured for posterity and their children portraits of their own heads and dress-coats to be sure, but of the hands of other persons!

The head of Machiavelli is, as is seen in the marble in the gallery of Florence, small, slender, and visibly "made to creep into crevices." The face is impassive and calm, and the lips, though slight and almost feminine, have an indefinable firmness and character. Essex is the bold, plain, and blunt soldier history makes him, and Elizabeth not unequally, nor (to my thinking) of an uninteresting countenance; but, with all the artist's flattery, ugly enough to be the abode of the murderous envy that brought Mary to the block.

We paid our five shillings for having been walked through the marble hall of Castle Warwick, and the dressing-room of its modern lady, and, gratified much more by our visit than I have expressed in this brief description, posted on to Kenilworth.

CHAPTER XIII.

KENILWORTH.

ON the road from Warwick to Kenilworth, I thought more of poor Pierce Gaveston than of Elizabeth and her proud earls. Edward's gay favorite was tried at Warwick, and beheaded on Blacklow hill, which we passed soon after leaving the town. He was executed in June; and I looked about on the lovely hills and valleys that surround the place of his last moments, and figured to myself very vividly his despair at this hurried leave-taking of this bright world in its brightest spot and hour. Poor Gaveston! It was not in his vocation to die! He was neither soldier nor prelate, hermit nor monk. His political sins, for which he suffered, were no offence against good-fellowship, and were ten times more venial than those of the "black dog of Arden," who betrayed and helped to murder him. He was the reckless minion of a king, but he must have been a merry and pleasant fellow; and now that the world (on our side the water at least), is grown so grave, one could go back with Old Mortality, and freshen the epitaph of a heart that took life more gayly.

As we approached the castle of the proud Leices-ter, I found it easier to people the road with the flying Amy Robsart and her faithful attendant, with Mike Lambourne, Flibbertigibbet, Richard Varney, and the troop of mummurs and players, than with the more real characters of history. To assist the romance, a little Italian boy, with his organ and monkey, was fording the brook on his way to the castle, as if its old towers still held listeners for the wandering minstrel. I tossed him a shilling from the carriage window, and while the horses slowly forded the brook, asked him in his own delicious tongue, where he was from.

"Son' di Firenze, signore!"

"And where are you going?"

"Li! al castello."

Come from Florence and bound to Kenilworth! Who would not grind an organ and sleep under a hedge, to answer the hail of the passing traveller in terms like these? I have seen many a beggar in Italy, whose inheritance of sunshine and leisure in that delicious clime I could have found it in my heart to envy, even with all its concomitants of uncertainty and want; but here was a bright-faced and ink-eyed child of the sun, with his wardrobe and means upon his back, travelling from one land to another, and loitering wherever there was a resort for pleasure, without a friend or a care; and, upon my life, I could have donned his velveteen jacket, and with his cheerful heart to button it over, have shouldered his organ, put my trust in i forestieri, and kept on for Kenilworth. There really is, I thought, as I left him behind, no profit or reward consequent upon a life of confinement and toil; no moss ever gathered by the unturned stone, that repays, by a thousandth part, the loss of even this poor boy's share of the pleasures of change. What would not the tardy winner of fortune give to exchange his worn-out frame, his unlovable and furrowed features, his dulled senses, and his vain regrets, for the elastic frame, the unbroken spirits, and the redeemable, yet not oppressive poverty of this Florentine regazzo? The irrecoverable gem of youth is too often dissolved, like the pearl of Cleopatra, in a cup which thins the blood and leaves disgust upon the lip.

The magnificent ruins of Kenilworth broke in upon my moralities, and a crowd of halt and crippled ciceroni beset the carriage-door as we alighted at the outer tower. The neighborhood of the Spa of Leamington, makes Kenilworth a place of easy resort; and the beggars of Warwickshire have discovered that your traveller is more liberal of his coin than your sinner-at-home. Some dozens of pony-chaises and small, crop saddle-horses, clustered around the gate, assured us that we should not muse alone amid the ruins of Elizabeth's princely gift to her favorite. We passed into the tilt-yard, leaving on our left the tower in which Edward was confined, now the only habitable part of Kenilworth. It gives a comfortable shelter to an old seneschal, who stands where the giant probably stood, with Flibbertigibbet under his doublet for a prompter; but it is not the tail of a rhyme that serves now for a passport.

Kenilworth, as it now stands, would probably disenchanted almost any one of the gorgeous dreams conjured up by reading Scott's romance. Yet it is one of the most superb ruins in the world. It would scarce be complete to a novel-reader, naturally, without a warder at the gate, and the flashing of a spear-point and helmet through the embrasures of the tower. A horseman in armor should pace over the draw-bridge, and a squire be seen polishing his cuirass through the opening gate; while on the airy bartizan should be observed a lady in hoop and farthingale, philandering with my lord of Leicester in silk doublet and rapier. In the place of this, the visitor enters Kenilworth as I have already described, and stepping out into the tilt-yard, he sees, on an elevation before him, a fretted and ivy-covered ruin, relieved like a cloud-castle on the sky; the bright blue plane of the western heavens shining through window and broken wall, flecked with waving and luxuriant leaves, and the crusted and ornamental pinnacles of tottering masonry and sculpture just leaning to their fall, though the foundations upon which they were laid, one would still think, might sustain the firmament. The swelling root of a creeper has lifted that arch from its base, and the protruding branch of a chance-sprung tree (sown perhaps by a field-sparrow) has unseated the key-stone of the next; and so perish castles and reputations, the masonry of the human hand, and the fabrics of human forethought; not by the strength which they feared, but by the weakness they despised! Little thought old John of Gaunt, when these rudely-hewn blocks were heaved into their seat by his herculean workmen, that, after resisting fire and foe, they would be sapped and overthrown at last by a vine-tendrill and a sparrow!

Clinging against the outer wall, on that side of the castle overlooking the meadow, which was overflowed for the aquatic spots of Kenilworth, stands an antique and highly ornamental fireplace, which belonged, doubtless, to the principal hall. The windows on either side looking forth upon the fields below, must have been those from which Elizabeth and her train observed the feats of Arion and his dolphin; and at all times, the large and spacious chimney-place, from the castle's first occupation to its last, must have been the centre of the evening revelry, and conversation of its guests. It was a hook whereon to hang a revelry, and between the roars of vulgar laughter which assailed my ears from a party lolling on the grass below, I contrived to figure to myself, with some distinctness, the personages who had stood about it. A visit to Kenilworth, without the deceptions of fancy, would be as disconnected from our previous enthusiasm on the subject as from any other scene with which it had no relation. The general effect at first, in any such spot, is only to dispossess us, by a powerful violence, of the cherished picture we had drawn of it in imagination; and it is only after the real recollection has taken root and ripened—after months, it may be—that we can fully bring the visionary characters we have drawn to inhabit it. If I read Kenilworth now, I see Mike Lambourne stealing out, not from the ruined postern which I clambered through, over heaps of rubbish, but from a little gate that turned noiselessly on its hinges, in the unreal castle built ten years ago in my brain.

I had wandered away from my companion, Miss Jane Porter, to climb up a secret staircase in the wall, rather too difficult of ascent for a female foot, and from my elevated position I caught an accidental view of that distinguished lady through the arch of a Gothic window, with a background of broken architecture and foliage—presenting, by chance, perhaps the most fitting and admirable picture of the authoress of the Scottish Chiefs, that a painter in his brightest hour could have fancied. Miss Porter, with her tall and striking figure, her noble face (said by Sir Martin Shee to have approached nearer in its youth to his beau idéal of the female features than any other, and still possessing the remains of uncommon beauty), is at all times a person whom it would be difficult to see without a feeling of involuntary admiration. But standing, as I saw her at that moment, motionless and erect, in the morning dress, with dark feathers, which she has worn since the death of her beloved and gifted sister, her wrists folded across, her large and still beautiful eyes fixed on a distant object in the view, and her nobly-cast lineaments reposing in their usual calm and benevolent tranquillity, while, around and above her, lay the material and breathed the spirit over which she had held the first great mastery—it was a tableau vivant which I was sorry to be alone to see.

Was she thinking of the great mind that had evoked the spirits of the ruins she stood among—a mind in which (by Sir Walter's own confession) she had first bared the vein of romance which breathed so freely for the world's delight? Were the visions which sweep with such supernatural distinctness and rapidity through the imagination of genius—visions of which the millionth portion is probably scarce communicated to the world in a literary lifetime—were Elizabeth's courtiers, Elizabeth's passions, secret hours, interviews with Leicester—were the imprisoned king's nights of loneliness and dread, his hopes, his indignant, but unheeded thoughts—were all the possible circumstances, real or imaginary, of which that proud castle might have been the scene, thronging in those few moments of reverie through her fancy? Or was her heart busy with its kindly affections, and had the beauty and interest of the scene but awakened a thought of one who was most wont to number with her the sands of those brighter hours?

Who shall say? The very question would perhaps startle the thoughts beyond recall—so elusive are even the most angelic of the mind's unseen visitants!

I have recorded here the speculations of a moment while I leaned over the wall of Kenilworth, but as I descended by the giddy staircase, a peal of rude laughter broke from the party in the fosse below, and I could not but speculate on the difference between the various classes whom curiosity draws to the spot. The distinguished mind that conceives a romance which enchants the world, comes in the same guise and is treated but with the same respect as theirs. The old porter makes no distinction in his charge of half-a-crown, and the grocer's wife who sucks an orange on the grass, looks at the dark crape hat and plain exterior—her only standards—and thinks herself as well dressed, and therefore equal or superior to the tall lady, whom she presumes is out like herself on a day's pleasuring. One comes and goes like the other, and is forgotten alike by the beggars at the gate and the seneschal within, and thus invisibly and unsuspected, before our very eyes, does genius gather its golden fruit, and while we walk in a plain and commonplace world, with commonplace and sordid thoughts and feelings, the gifted walk side by side with us in a world of their own—a world of which we see distant glimpses in their after-creations, and marvel in what unsunned mine its gems of thought were gathered!

CHAPTER XIV.

A VISIT TO DUBLIN ABOUT THE TIME OF THE QUEEN'S MARRIAGE.

THE usual directions for costume, in the corner of the court card of invitation, included, on the occasion of the queen's marriage, a wedding favor, to be worn by ladies on the shoulder, and by gentlemen on the left breast. This trifling addition to the dress of the individual was a matter of considerable importance to the milliners, hatters, etc., who, in a sale of ten or twelve hundred white cockades (price from two dollars to five) made a very pretty profit. The power of giving a large ball to the more expensive classes, and ordering a particular addition to the costume—in other words, of laying a tax on the rich for the benefit of the poor, is exercised more frequently in Ireland than in other countries, and serves the double purpose of popularity to the lord lieutenant, and benefit to any particular branch of industry that may be suffering from the decline of a fashion.

The large quadrangular court-yard of the castle rattled with the tramp of horses' feet and the clatter of sabres and spurs, and in the uncertain glare of torches and lamps, the gay colors and glittering arms of the mounted guard of lancers had a most warlike appearance. The procession which the guard was stationed to regulate and protect, rather detracted from the romantic effect—the greater proportion of equipages being the covered hack cars of the city—vehicles of the most unmitigated and ludicrous vulgarity. A coffin for two, set on its end, with the driver riding on the turned-down lid, would be a very near resemblance; and the rags of the driver, and the translucent leanness of his beast, make it altogether the most deplorable of conveyances. Here and there a carriage with liveries, and here and there a sedan-chair with four stout Milesian calves in blue stockings trotting under the poles, rather served as a foil than a mitigation of the effect, and the hour we passed in the line, edging slowly toward the castle, was far from unfruitful in amusement. I learned afterward that even those who have equipages in Dublin go to court in hack cars as a matter of economy—one of the many indications of that feeling of lost pride which has existed in Ireland since the removal of the parliament.

A hall and staircase lined with files of soldiers is not quite as festive an entrance to a ball as the more common one of alleys of flowering shrubs; but with a waltz, by a military band resounding from the lofty ceiling, I am not sure that it does not temper the blood as aptly for the spirit of the hour. It was a rainy night, and the streets were dark, and the effect upon myself of coming suddenly into so enchanted a scene—arms glittering on either side, and a procession of uniforms and plumed dames winding up the spacious stairs—was thrilling, even with the chivalric scenes of Eglinton fresh in my remembrance.

At the head of the ascent we entered a long hall, lined with the private servants of Lord Ebrington, and the ceremony of presentation having been achieved the week before, we left the throne-room on the right, and passed directly to St. Patrick's Hall, the grand scene of the evening's festivities. This, I have said before, is the finest ball-room I remember in Europe. Twelve hundred people, seated, dancing, or promenading, were within its lofty walls on the night whose festivities I am describing; and at either end a gallery, supported by columns of marble, contained a band of music, relieving each other with alternate waltzes and quadrilles. On the long sides of the hall were raised tiers of divans, filled with chaperons, veteran officers, and other lookers-on, and at the upper end was raised a platform with a throne in the centre, and seats on either side for the family of the lord lieutenant and the more distinguished persons of the nobility. Lord Ebrington was rather in his character of a noble host than that of viceroy, and I did not observe him once seated under his canopy of state; but with his aids and some one of the noble ladies of his family on his arm, he promenaded the hall conversing with his acquaintances, and seemingly enjoying in a high degree the brilliant gayety of the scene. His dress, by the way, was the simple diplomatic dress of most continental courts, a blue uniform embroidered with gold, the various orders on his breast forming its principal distinction. I seldom have seen a man of a more calm and noble dignity of presence than the lord lieutenant, and never a face that expressed more strongly the benevolence and high purity of character for which he is distinguished. In person, except that he is taller, he bears a remarkably close resemblance to the Duke of Wellington.

We can scarcely conceive, in this country of black coats, the brilliant effect of a large assembly in which there is no person out of uniform or court-dress—every lady's head nodding with plumes, and every gentleman in military scarlet and gold or lace and embroidery. I may add, too, that in this country of care-worn and pale faces, we can as little conceive the effect of an assembly rosy with universal health, habitually unacquainted with care, and abandoned with the apparent child-like simplicity of high breeding, to the inspiring gayety of the hour. The greater contrast, however, is between a nation where health is the first care, and one in which health is never thought of till lost; and light and shade are not more contrasted than the mere general effect of countenance in one and in the other. A stranger travelling in our country, once remarked to me that a party he had attended seemed like an entertainment given in the convalescent ward of a hospital—the ladies were so pale and fragile, and the men so unjoyous and sallow. And my own invariable impression, in the assemblies I have first seen after leaving my own country was a corresponding one—that the men and women had the rosy health and untroubled gayety of children round a May-pole. That this is not the effect of climate, I do most religiously believe. It is over-much care and over-much carelessness—the corroding care of an avid temerity in business, and the carelessness of all the functions of life till their complaints become too imperative to be disregarded. But this is a theme out of place.

The ball was managed by the grand chamberlain (Sir William Leeson), and the aids-de-camp of the lord lieutenant, and except that now and then you were reminded by the movement around you that you stood with your back to the representative of royalty, there was little to draw your attention from the attractions of the dance. Waltz, quadrille, and gallop, followed each other in giddy succession, and "what do you think of Irish beauty?" had been asked me as often as "how do you like America?" was ever mumbled through the trumpet of Miss Martineau, when I mounted with a friend to one of the upper divans, and tried, what is always a difficult task, and nowhere so difficult as in Ireland, to call in the intoxicated fancy, and anatomize the charm of the hour.

Moore's remark has been often quoted—"there is nothing like an Irish woman to take a man off his feet;" but whether this figure of speech was suggested by the little bard's common soubriquet of "Jump-up-and-kiss-me" Tom Moore, or simply conveyed his idea of the bewildering character of Irish beauty, it contains, to any one who has ever travelled (or waltzed) in that country, a very just, as well as realizing description. Physically, Irish women are probably the finest race in the world—I mean, taller, better limbed and chested, larger eyed, and with more luxuriant hair, and freer action, than any other nation I have observed. The Phœnician and Spanish blood which has run hundreds of years in their veins, still kindles its dark fire in their eyes, and with the vivacity of the northern mind and the bright color of the northern skin, these southern qualities mingle in most admirable and superb harmony. The idea we form of Italian and Grecian beauty is never realized in Greece and Italy, but we find it in Ireland, heightened and exceeded. Cheeks and lips of the delicacy and bright tint of carnation, with snowy teeth, and hair and eyebrows of jet, are what we should look for on the palette of Appelles, could we recall the painter, and reanimate his far-famed models; and these varied charms, united, fall very commonly to the share of the fair Milesian of the upper classes. In other lands of dark eyes, the rareness of a fine-grained skin, so necessary to a brunette, makes beauty as rare—but whether it is the damp softness of the climate or the infusion of Saxon blood, a coarse skin is almost never seen in Ireland. I speak now only of the better-born ranks of society, for in all my travels in Ireland, I did not chance to see even one peasant-girl of any pretensions to good looks. From north to south, they looked, to me, coarse, ill-formed, and repulsive.

I noticed in St. Patrick's Hall what I had remarked ever since I had been in the country, that with all their beauty, the Irish women are very deficient in what in England is called style. The men, on the contrary, were particularly comme il faut, and as they are a magnificent race (corresponding to such mothers and sisters), I frequently observed I had never seen so many handsome and elegant men in a day. Whenever I saw a gentleman and lady together, riding, driving, or walking, my first impression was, almost universally, that the man was in attendance upon a woman of an inferior class to his own. This difference may be partly accounted for by the reduced circumstances of the gentry of Ireland, which keeps the daughters at home, that the sons may travel and improve; but it works differently in America, where, spite of travel and every other advantage to the contrary, the daughters of a family are much oftener lady-like than the sons are gentleman-like. After wondering for some time, however, why the quick-witted women of Ireland should be less apt than those of other countries in catching the air of high breeding usually deemed so desirable, I began to like them better for the deficiency, and to find a reason for it in the very qualities which make them so attractive. Nothing could be more captivating and delightful than the manners of Irish women, and nothing, at the same time, could be more at war with the first principles of English high breeding—coldness and réserve. The frank, almost hilarious “how are you?” of an Irish girl, her whole-handed and cordial grasp, as often in the day as you meet her, the perfectly un-missy-ish, confiding, direct character of her conversation, are all traits which would stamp her as somewhat rudely bred in England, and as desperately vulgar in New York or Philadelphia.

Modest to a proverb, the Irish woman is as unsuspecting of an impropriety as if it were an impossibility, and she is as fearless and joyous as a midshipman, and sometimes as noisy. In a ball-room she looks ill-dressed, not because her dress was ill-put-on, but because she dances, not glides, sits down without care, pulls her flowers to pieces, and if her head-dress incommodes her, gives it a pull or a push—acts which would be perfect insanity at Almack's. If she is offended, she asks for an explanation. If she does not understand you, she confesses her ignorance. If she wishes to see you the next day, she tells you how and when. She is the child of nature, and children are not “stylish.” The niminy-piminy, eye-avoiding, finger-tipped, drawing, don't-touch-me manner of some of the fashionable ladies of our country, would amuse a cold and reserved English woman sufficiently, but they would drive an Irish girl into hysterics. I have met one of our fair country-people abroad, whose “Grecian stoop,” and exquisitely subdued manner, was invariably taken for a fit of indigestion.

The ball-supper was royally sumptuous, and served in a long hall thrown open at midnight; and in the gray of the morning, I left the floor covered with waltzers, and confessed to an Irish friend, that I never in my life, not even at Almack's, had seen the half as much true beauty as had brightened St. Patrick's Hall at the celebration of the queen's marriage.

CHAPTER XV.

CLOSING SCENES OF THE SESSION AT WASHINGTON.

THE paradox of “the more one does, the more one can do,” is resolved in life at Washington with more success than I have seen it elsewhere. The inexorable bell at the hotel or boarding-house pronounces the irrevocable and swift transit of breakfast to all sleepers after eight. The elastic depths of the pillow have scarcely yielded their last feather to the pressure of the sleeper's head, before the drowse is rudely shaken from his eyelids, and with an alacrity which surprises himself, he finds his toilet achieved, his breakfast over, and himself abroad to lounge in the sunshine till the flag waves on the capitol. He would retire to his chamber to read during these two or three vacant hours, but the one chair in his pigeon-hole creaks, or has no back or bottom, or his anthracite fire is out, or is too hot for the size of the room; or, in short, Washington, from whatever cause, is a place where none read except those who stand up to a padlocked newspaper. The stars and stripes, moving over the two wings of the capitol at eleven, announce that the two chambers of legislation are in session, and the hard-working idler makes his way to the senate or the house. He lingers in the lobby awhile, amused with the button-hole seizers plying the unwilling ears of members with their claims, or enters the library, where ladies turn over prints, and enfilade, with their battery of truant eyes, the comers-in at the green door. He then gropes up the dark staircase to the senate gallery, and stifles in the pressure of a hot gallery, forgetting, like listeners at a crowded opera, that bodily discomfort will unlink the finest harmonies of song or oratory. Thence he descends to the rotunda to draw breath and listen to the more practical, but quite as earnest eloquence of candidates for patents; and passes, after while, to the crowded gallery of the house, where, by some acoustic phenomena in the construction of the building, the voices of the speakers comes to his ear as articulate as water from a narrow-necked bottle. “Small blame to them!” he thinks, however: for behind the brexia columns are grouped all the fair forms of Washington; and in making his bow to two hundred despotic lawgivers in feathers and velvet, he is readily consoled that the duller legislators who yield to their sway are inaudible and forgotten. To this upper house drop in, occasionally, the younger or gayer members of the lower, bringing, if not political scandal, at least some slight résumé of what Mr. Somebody is beating his desk about below; and thus, crammed with the day's trifles or the day's business, and fatigued from heel to eyelid, our idler goes home at five to dress for dinner and the night's campaign, having been up and on his legs for ten mortal hours.

Cold water and a little silence in his own room have rather refreshed him, and he dines at six with a party of from fifteen to twenty-five persons. He discusses the vital interests of fourteen millions of people over a glass of wine with the man whose vote, possibly, will decide their destiny, and thence hurries to a ball-room crammed like a perigord-pie, where he pants, elbows, eats supper, and waltzes till three in the morning. How human constitutions stand this, and stand it daily and nightly, from the beginning to the end of a session, may well puzzle the philosophy of those who rise and breakfast in comfortable leisure.

I joined the crowd on the twenty-second of February, to pay my respects to the president, and see the cheese. Whatever veneration existed in the minds of the people toward the former, their curiosity in reference to the latter predominated, unquestionably. The circular paré, extending from the gate to the White House, was thronged with citizens of all classes, those coming away having each a small brown paper parcel and a very strong smell; those advancing manifesting, by shakings of the head and frequent exclamations, that there may be too much of a good thing, and particularly of a cheese. The beautiful portico was thronged with boys and coach-drivers, and the odor strengthened with every step. We forced our way over the threshold, and encountered an atmosphere, to which the mephitic gas floating over Aver-nus must be faint and innocuous. On the side of the hall hung a rough likeness of the general, emblazoned with eagle and stars, forming a background to the huge tub in which the cheese had been packed; and in the centre of the vestibule stood the "fragrant gift," surrounded with a dense crowd, who, without crackers, or even "malt to their cheese," had, in two hours, eaten and purveyed away fourteen hundred pounds! The small segment reserved for the president's use counted for nothing in the abstractions.

Glad to compromise for a breath of cheeseless air, we desisted from the struggle to obtain a sight of the table, and mingled with the crowd in the east room. Here were diplomats in their gold coats and officers in uniform, ladies of secretaries and other ladies, soldiers on volunteer duty, and Indians in war-dress and paint. Bonnets, feathers, uniforms, and all—it was rather a gay assemblage. I remembered the descriptions in travellers' books, and looked out for millers and blacksmiths in their working gear, and for rudeness and vulgarity in all. The offer of a mammoth cheese to the public was likely to attract to the presidential mansion more of the lower class than would throng to a common levee. Great-coats there were, and not a few of them, for the day was raw, and unless they were hung on the palings outside, they must remain on the owners' shoulders; but, with a single exception (a fellow with his coat torn down his back, possibly in getting at the cheese), I saw no man in a dress that was not respectable and clean of his kind, and abundantly fit for a tradesman out of his shop. Those who were much pressed by the crowd put their hats on; but there was a general air of decorum which would surprise any one who had pinned his faith on travellers. An intelligent Englishman, very much inclined to take a disgust to mobocracy, expressed to me great surprise at the decency and proper behavior of the people. The same experiment in England, he thought, would result in as pretty a riot as a paragraph-monger would desire to see.

The president was down stairs in the oval reception room, and, though his health would not permit him to stand, he sat in his chair for two or three hours, and received his friends with his usual bland and dignified courtesy. By his side stood the lady of the mansion, dressed in full court costume, and doing the honors of her place with a grace and amenity which every one felt, and which threw a bloom over the hour. General Jackson retired, after a while, to his chamber, and the president-elect remained to support his relative, and present to her the still thronging multitude, and by four o'clock the guests were gone, and the "banquet hall" was deserted. Not to leave a wrong impression of the cheese, I dined afterward at a table to which the president had sent a piece of it, and found it of excellent quality. It is like many other things, more agreeable in small quantities.

Some eccentric mechanic has presented the president with a sulkey, made entirely (except the wheels) of rough-cut hickory, with the bark on. It looks rude enough, but has very much the everlasting look of old Flickory himself; and if he could be seen driving a high-stepping, bony old iron-gray steed in it, any passer by would see that there was as much fitness in the whole thing as in the chariot of Bacchus and his reeling leopards. Some curiously-twisted and gnarled branches have been very ingeniously turned into handles and whip-box, and the vehicle is compact and strong. The president has left it to Mr. Van Buren.

In very strong contrast to the sulkey, stood close by, the elegant phaeton, made of the wood of the old frigate Constitution. It has a seat for two, with a driver's box, covered with a superb hammercloth, and set up rather high in front; the wheels and body are low, and there are bars for baggage behind; altogether, for lightness and elegance, it would be a creditable turn out for Long Acre. The material is excessively beautiful—a fine-grained oak, polished to a very high degree, with its colors delicately brought out by a coat of varnish. The wheels are very slender and light, but strong, and, with all its finish, it looks a vehicle capable of a great deal of service. A portrait of the Constitution, under full sail, is painted on the panels.

CHAPTER XVI.

THE INAUGURATION.

WHILE the votes for president were being counted in the senate, Mr. Clay remarked to Mr. Van Buren, with courteous significance:—

"It is a cloudy day, sir!"

"The sun will shine on the fourth of March!" was the confident reply.

True to his augury, the sun shone out of heaven without a cloud on the inaugural morning. The air was cold, but clear and life-giving; and the broad avenues of Washington for once seemed not too large for the thronging population. The crowds who had been pouring in from every direction for several days before, ransacking the town for but a shelter from the night, were apparent on the spacious sidewalks; and the old campaigners of the winter seemed but a thin sprinkling among the thousands of new and strange faces. The sun shone alike on the friends and opponents of the new administration, and, as far as one might observe in a walk to the capitol, all were made cheerful alike by its brightness. It was another augury, perhaps, and may foretell a more extended fusion under the light of the luminary new risen. In a whole day passed in a crowd composed of all classes and parties, I heard no remark that the president would have been unwilling to hear.

I was at the capitol a half hour before the procession arrived, and had leisure to study a scene for which I was not at all prepared. The noble staircase of the east front of the building leaps over three arches, under one of which carriages pass to the basement door; and, as you approach from the gate, the eye cuts the ascent at right angles, and the sky, broken by a small spire at a short distance, is visible beneath. Broad stairs occur at equal distances, with corresponding projections; and from the upper platform rise the outer columns of the portico, with ranges of columns three deep extending back to the pilasters. I had often admired this front with its many graceful columns, and its superb flight of stairs, as one of the finest things I had seen in the world. Like the effect of the assembled population of Rome waiting to receive the blessing before the front of St. Peter's, however, the assembled crowd on the steps and at the base of the capitol heightened inconceivably the grandeur of the design. They were piled up like the people on the temples of Babylon in one of Martin's sublime pictures—every projection covered, and an inexpressible soul and character given by their presence to the architecture. Boys climbed about the bases of the columns, single figures stood on the posts of the surrounding railings in the boldest relief against the sky; and the whole thing was exactly what Paul Veronese would have delighted to draw. I stood near an accomplished artist who is commissioned to fill one of the panels of the rotunda, and I can not but hope he may have chosen this magnificent scene for his subject.

The republican procession, consisting of the presidents and their families, escorted by a small volunteer corps, arrived soon after twelve. The General and Mr. Van Buren were in the constitution phaeton, drawn by four grays, and as it entered the gate, they both rode uncovered. Descending from the carriage at the foot of the steps, a passage was made for them through the dense crowd, and the tall white head of the old chieftain, still uncovered, went steadily up through the agitated mass, marked by its peculiarity from all around it.

I was in the crowd thronging the opposite side of the court, and lost sight of the principal actors in this imposing drama, till they returned from the senate chamber. A temporary platform had been laid, and railed in on the broad stair which supports the portico, and, for all preparation to one of the most important and most meaning and solemn ceremonies on earth—for the inauguration of a chief magistrate over a republic of fifteen millions of freemen—the whole addition to the open air, and the presence of the people, was a volume of holy writ. In comparing the impressive simplicity of this consummation of the wishes of a mighty people, with the tricked-out ceremonial, and hollow show, which embarrass a corresponding event in other lands, it was impossible not to feel that the moral sublime was here—that a transaction so important, and of such extended and weighty import, could borrow nothing from drapery or decoration, and that the simple presence of the sacred volume, consecrating the act, spoke more thrillingly to the heart than the trumpets of a thousand heralds.

The crowd of diplomatists and senators in the rear of the columns made way, and the ex-president and Mr. Van Buren advanced with uncovered heads. A murmur of feeling rose up from the moving mass below, and the infirm old man, emerged from a sick-chamber, which his physician had thought it impossible he should leave, bowed to the people, and, still uncovered in the cold air, took his seat beneath the portico. Mr. Van Buren then advanced, and with a voice remarkably distinct, and with great dignity, read his address to the people. The air was elastic, and the day still; and it is supposed that near twenty thousand persons heard him from his elevated position distinctly. I stood myself on the outer limit of the crowd, and though I lost occasionally a sentence from the interruption near by, his words came clearly articulated to my ear.

When the address was closed, the chief justice advanced and administered the oath. As the book touched the lips of the new president, there arose a general shout, and expression of feeling common enough in other countries, but drawn with difficulty from an American assemblage. The sons, and the immediate friends of Mr. Van Buren, then closed about him; the ex-president, the chief justice, and others, gave him the hand of congratulation, and the ceremony was over. They descended the steps, the people gave one more shout as they mounted the constitution carriage together, and the procession returned through the avenue, followed by the whole population of Washington.

Mr. Van Buren held a levee immediately afterward, but I endeavored in vain to get my foot over the threshold. The crowd was tremendous. At four, the diplomatic body had an audience; and in replying to the address of Don Angel Calderon, the president astonished the gold coats, by addressing them as the democratic corps. The representatives of the crowded heads of Europe stood rather uneasily under the epithet, till it was suggested that he possibly meant to say diplomatic.

CHAPTER XVII.

WASHINGTON IN THE SESSION.

THERE is a sagacity acquired by travel on the subject of forage and quarters, which is useful in all other cities in the world where one may happen to be a stranger, but which is as inapplicable to the emergencies of an arrival in Washington as waltzing in a shipwreck. It is a capital whose peculiarities are as much sui generis as those of Venice; but as those who have become wise by a season's experience neither remain on the spot to give warning, nor have recorded their experiences in a book, the stranger is worse off in a coach in Washington than in a gondola in the "city of silver streets."

It is well known, I believe, that when the future city of Washington was about being laid out, there were two large lot-buyers or land-owners, living two miles apart, each of whom was interested in having the public buildings upon the centre of his own domain. Like children quarrelling for a sugar horse, the subject of dispute was pulled in two, and one got the head, the other the tail. The capitol stands on a rising ground in solitary grandeur, and the president's house and department buildings two miles off on another. The city straddles and stretches between, doing its best to look continuous and compact; but the stranger soon sees that it is, after all, but a "city of magnificent distances," built to please nobody on earth but a hackney-coachman.

The new-comer, when asked what hotel he will drive to, thinks himself very safe if he chooses that nearest the capitol—supposing, of course, that, as Washington is purely a legislative metropolis, the most central part will naturally be near the scene of action. He is accordingly set down at Gadsby's, and, at a price that would startle an English nobleman, he engages a pigeon-hole in the seventh heaven of that boundless caravansary. Even at Gadsby's, however, he finds himself over half a mile from the capitol, and wonders, for two or three days, why the deuce the hotel was not built on some of the waste lots at the foot of Capitol hill, an improvement which might have saved him, in rainy weather, at least five dollars a day in hack-hire. Meantime the secretaries and foreign ministers leave their cards, and the party and dinner-giving people shower upon him the "small rain" of pink billets. He sets apart the third or fourth day to return their calls, and inquires the addresses of his friends (which they never write on their cards, because, if they did, it would be no guide), and is told it is impossible to direct him, but the hackney-coachmen all know! He calls the least ferocious-looking of the most bullying and ragged set of tatterdemalions he has ever seen, and delivers himself and his visiting-list into his hands. The first thing is a straight drive two miles away from the capitol. He passes the president's house, and getting off the smooth road, begins to drive and drag through cross lanes and open lots, laid out according to no plan that his loose ideas of geometry can comprehend, and finds his friends living in houses that want nothing of being in the country, but trees, garden, and fences. It looks as if it had rained naked brick houses upon a waste plain, and each occupant had made a street with reference to his own front door. The much-shaken and more-astonished victim consumes his morning and his temper, and has made, by dinner-time, but six out of forty calls, all imperatively due, and all scattered far and wide with the same loose and irreconcilable geography.

A fortnight's experience satisfies the stranger that this same journey is worse at night than at morning; and that, as he leaves his dinner which he pays for at home, runs the risk of his neck, passes an hour or two on the road, and ruins himself in hack-hire, it must be a very—yes, a very pleasant dinner-party to compensate him. Consequently, he either sends a "p. p. c." to all his acquaintances, and lives incog., or, which is a more sensible thing, moves up to the other settlement, and abandons the capitol.

Those who live on the other side of the president's house are the secretaries, diplomatists, and a few wealthy citizens. There is no hotel in this quarter, but there are one or two boarding-houses, and (what we have been lucky enough to secure ourselves) furnished lodgings, in which you have everything but board. Your dinner is sent you from a French cook's near by, and your servant gets your breakfast—a plan which gives you the advantage of dining at your own hour, choosing your own society, and of having covers for a friend or two whenever it suits your humor, and at half an hour's warning. There are very few of these lodgings (which combine many other advantages over a boarding-house), but more of them would be a good speculation to house-owners, and I wish it were suggested, not only here, but in every city in our country.

Aside from society, the only amusement in Washington is frequenting the capitol. If one has a great deal of patience and nothing better to do, this is very well; and it is very well at any rate till one becomes acquainted with the heads of the celebrated men in both the chambers, with the noble architecture of the building, and the routine of business. This done, it is time wearily spent for a spectator. The finer orators seldom speak, or seldom speak warmly, the floor is oftener occupied by prosing and very sensible gentlemen, whose excellent ideas enter the mind more agreeably by the eye than the ear, or, in other words, are better delivered by the newspapers, and there is a great deal of formula and etiquetual sparring which is not even entertaining to the members, and which consumes time "consuently." Now and then the senate adjourns when some one of the great orators has taken the floor, and you are sure of a great effort the next morning. If you are there in time, and can sit, like Atlas with a world on your back, you may enjoy a front seat and hear oratory, unsurpassed, in my opinion, in the world.

The society in Washington, take it all in all, is by many degrees the best in the United States. One is prepared, though I can not conceive why, for the contrary. We read in books of travels, and we are told by everybody, that the society here is promiscuous, rough, inelegant, and even barbarous. This is an untrue representation, or it has very much changed.

There is no city, probably no village in America, where the female society is not refined, cultivated, and elegant. With or without regular advantages, woman attains the refinements and the tact necessary to polite intercourse. No traveller ever ventured to complain of this part of American society. The great deficiency is that of agreeable, highly-cultivated men, whose pursuits have been elevated, and whose minds are pliable to the grace and changing spirit of conversation. Every man of talents possesses these qualities naturally, and hence the great advantage which Washington enjoys over every other city in our country. None but a shallow observer, or a malicious book-maker, would ever sneer at the exteriors or talk of the ill-breeding of such men as form, in great numbers, the agreeable society of this place—for a man of great talents never could be vulgar; and there is a superiority about most of these which raises them above the petty standard which regulates the outside of a coxcomb. Even compared with the dress and address of men of similar positions and pursuits in Europe, however (members of the house of commons, for example, or of the chamber of deputies in France), it is positively the fact that the senators and representatives of the United States have a decided advantage. It is all very well for Mr. Hamilton, and other scribblers whose books must be spiced to go down, to ridicule a Washington soirée for English readers; but if the observation of one who has seen assemblies of legislators and diplomatists in all the countries of Europe may be fairly placed against his and Mrs. Trollope's, I may assert, upon my own authority, that they will not find, out of May Fair in England, so well-dressed and dignified a body of men. I have seen as yet no specimen of the rough animal described by them and others as the "western member;" and if David Crockett (whom I was never so fortunate as to see) was of that description, the race must have died with him. It is a thing I have learned since I have been in Washington, to feel a wish that foreigners should see congress in session. We are so humbugged, one way and another, by travellers' lies.

I have heard the observation once or twice from strangers since I have been here, and it struck myself on my first arrival, that I had never seen within the same limit before, so many of what may be called "men of mark." You will scarce meet a gentleman on the sidewalk in Washington who would not attract your notice, seen elsewhere, as an individual possessing in his eye or general features a certain superiority. Never having seen most of the celebrated speakers of the senate, I busied myself for the first day or two in examining the faces that passed me in the street, in the hope of knowing them by the outward stamp which, we are apt to suppose, belongs to greatness. I gave it up at last, simply from the great number I met who might be (for all that features had to do with it) the remarkable men I sought.

There is a very simple reason why a congress of the United States should be, as they certainly are, a much more marked body of men than the English house of commons or lords, or the chamber of peers or deputies in France. I refer to the mere means by which, in either case, they come by their honors. In England and France the lords and peers are legislators by hereditary right, and the members of the commons and deputies from the possession of extensive property or family influence, or some other cause, arguing, in most cases, no great personal talent in the individual. They are legislators, but they are devoted very often much more heartily to other pursuits—hunting or farming, racing, driving, and similar out-of-door passions common to English gentlemen and lords, or the corresponding penchants of French peers and deputies.

It is only the few great leaders and orators who devote themselves to politics exclusively. With us every one knows it is quite the contrary. An American politician delivers himself, body and soul, to his pursuit. He never sleeps, eats, walks, or dreams, but in subservience to his aim. He can not afford to have another passion of any kind till he has reached the point of his ambition—and then it has become a morient necessity from habit. The consequence is, that no man can be found in an elevated sphere in our country, who has not had occasion for more than ordinary talent to arrive there. He inherited nothing of his distinction, and has made himself. Such ordeals leave their marks, and they who have thought, and watched, and struggled, and contended with the passions of men as an American politician inevitably must, can not well escape the traces of such work. It usually elevates the character of the face—it always strongly marks it.

A-propos of "men of mark ;" the dress circle of the theatre, at Power's benefit, not long since, was graced by three Indians in full costume—the chief of the Foxes, the chief of the Ioways, and a celebrated warrior of the latter tribe, called the Sioux-killer. The Fox is an old man of apparently fifty, with a heavy, aquiline nose, a treacherous eye, sharp as an eagle's, and a person rather small in proportion to his head and features. He was dressed in a bright scarlet blanket, and a crown of feathers, with an eagle's plume, standing erect on the top of his head, all dyed in the same deep hue. His face was painted to match, except his lips, which looked of a most ghastly sallow, in contrast with his fiery nose, forehead, and cheeks. His tomahawk lay in the hollow of his arm, decked with feathers of the same brilliant color with the rest of his drapery. Next him sat the Sioux-killer, in a dingy blanket, with a crown made of a great quantity of the feathers of a pea-hen, which fell over his face, and concealed his features almost entirely. He is very small, but is famous for his personal feats, having, among other things, walked one hundred and thirty miles in thirty successive hours, and killed three Sioux (hence his name) in one battle with that nation. He is but twenty-three, but very compact and wiry-looking, and his eye glowed through his veil of hen-feathers like a coal of fire.

Next to the Sioux-killer sat "White Cloud," the chief of the Ioways. His face was the least warlike of the three, and expressed a good nature and freedom from guile, remarkable in an Indian. He is about twenty-four, has very large features, and a fine, erect person, with broad shoulders and chest. He was painted less than the Fox chief, but of nearly the same color, and carried, in the hollow of his arm, a small, glittering tomahawk, ornamented with blue feathers. His head was encircled by a kind of turban of silver-fringed cloth, with some metallic pendants for earrings, and his blanket, not particularly clean or handsome, was partly open on the breast, and disclosed a calico shirt, which was probably sold to him by a trader in the west. They were all very attentive to the play, but the Fox chief and White Cloud departed from the traditional dignity of Indians, and laughed a great deal at some of Power's fun. The Sioux-killer sat between them, as motionless and grim as a marble knight on a tomb-stone.

The next day I had the pleasure of dining with Mr. Power, who lived at the same hotel with the Indian delegation ; and while at dinner he received a message from the Ioways, expressing a wish to call on him. We were sitting over our wine when White Cloud and the Sioux-killer came in with their interpreter. There were several gentlemen present, one of them in the usual undress uniform, whose face the Sioux-killer scrutinized very sharply. They smiled in bowing to Power, but made very grave inclinations to the rest of us. The chief took his seat, assuming a very erect and dignified attitude, which he preserved immovable during the interview ; but the Sioux-killer drew up his legs, resting them on the round of the chair, and, with his head and body bent forward, seemed to forget himself, and give his undivided attention to the study of Power and his naval friend.

Tumblers of champagne were given them, which they drank with great relish, though the Sioux-killer provoked a little ridicule from White Cloud, by coughing as he swallowed it. The interpreter was a half-breed between an Indian and a negro, and a most intelligent fellow. He had been reared in the Ioway tribe, but had been among the whites a great deal for the last few years, and had picked up English very fairly. He told us that White Cloud was the son of old White Cloud, who died three years since, and that the young chief had acquired entire command over the tribe by his mildness and dignity. He had paid the debts of the Ioways to the traders, very much against the will of the tribe ; but he commenced by declaring firmly that he would be just, and had carried his point. He had come to Washington to receive a great deal of money from the sale of the lands of the tribe, and the distribution of it lay entirely in his own power. Only one old warrior had ventured to rise in council and object to his measures ; but when White Cloud spoke, he had dropped his head on his bosom and submitted. This information and that which followed was given in English, of which neither of the Ioways understood a word.

Mr. Power expressed a surprise that the Sioux-killer should have known him in his citizen's dress. The interpreter translated it, and the Indian said in answer :—

"The dress is very different, but when I see a man's eye I know him again."

He then told Power that he wished, in the theatre, to raise his war-cry and help him fight the three bad-looking men who were his enemies (referring to the three bailiffs in the scene in Paddy Carey). Power asked what part of the play he liked best. He said that part where he seized the girl in his arms and ran off the stage with her (at the close of an Irish jig in the same play).

The interpreter informed us that this was the first time the Sioux-killer had come among the whites. He had disliked them always till now, but he said he had seen enough to keep him telling tales all the rest of his life. Power offered them cigars, which they refused. We expressed our surprise ; and the Sioux-killer said that the Indians who smoked gave out soonest in the chase ; and White Cloud added, very gravely, that the young women of his tribe did not like the breaths of the smokers. In answer to an inquiry I made about the comparative size of Indians and white men, the chief said that the old men of the whites were larger than old Indians, but the young whites were not so tall and straight as the youths of his tribe. We were struck with the smallness of the chief's hands and feet ; but he seemed very much mortified when the interpreter translated our remark to him. He turned the little sallow fingers over and over, and said that old White Cloud, his father, who had been a great warrior, had small hands like his. The young chief, we were told by the interpreter, has never yet been in an engagement, and is always spared from the heavier fatigues undergone by the rest of the tribe.

They showed great good nature in allowing us to look at their ornaments, tomahawks, &c. White Cloud wore a collar of bear's claws, which marked him for a chief ; and the Sioux-killer carried a great cluster of brass bells on the end of his tomahawk, of which he explained the use very energetically. It was to shake when he stood over his fallen enemy in he fight, to let the tribe know he had killed him. After another tumbler of champagne each, they rose to take their leave, and White Cloud gave us his hand gently, with a friendly nod. We were all amused, however, with the Sioux-killer's more characteristic adieu. He looked us in the eye like a hawk, and gave us each a grip of his iron fist, that made the blood tingle under our nails. He would be an awkward customer in a fight, or his fixed lips and keen eye very much belie him.

CHAPTER XVIII.

WASHINGTON AFTER THE SESSION.

THE leaf that is lodged in some sunny dell, after drifting on the whirlwind—the Indian's canoe, after it has shot the rapids—the drop of water that has struggled out from the Phlegethon of Niagara, and sleeps on the tranquil bosom of Ontario—are faint images of contrast and repose, compared with a Washingtonian after the session. I have read somewhere, in an oriental tale, that a lover, having agreed to share his life with his dying mistress, took her place in the grave six months in the year. In Bagdad it might have been a sacrifice. In Washington I could conceive such an arrangement to make very little difference.

Nothing is done leisurely in our country; and, by the haste with which everybody rushes to the railroad the morning after the rising of congress, you would fancy that the cars, like Cinderella's coach, would be changed into pumpkins at the stroke of twelve. The town was evacuated in a day. On the fifth of March a placard was sent back by the innkeepers at Baltimore, declaring that there was not so much as a garret to be had in that city, and imploring gentlemen and ladies to remain quietly at Washington for twenty-four hours. The railroad engine, twice a day, tugged and puffed away through the hills, drawing after it, on its sinuous course, a train of brick-colored cars, that resembled the fabulous red dragon trailing its slimy length through the valley of Crete. The gentlemen who sit by the fire in the bar-room at Gadsby's, like Theodore Hook's secretary, who could hear his master write "Yours faithfully" in the next room, learned to distinguish "Received payment" from "Sundries," by listening to the ceaseless scratch of the bookkeeper. The ticket-office at the depot was a scene of struggle and confusion between those who wanted places; while, looking their last on these vanishing paymasters, stood hundreds of tatterdemajons, white, yellow, and black, with their hands in their pockets, and (if sincere regret at their departure could have wrung it forth) a tear in their eye. The bell rang, and the six hundred departures flocked to their places—young ladies, with long faces, leaving the delights of Washington for the dull repose of the country—their lovers, with longer faces, trying, in vain, to solve the X quantity expressed by the aforesaid "Sundries" in their bill—and members of congress with long faces, too—for not one in twenty has "made the impression" he expected; and he is moralizing on the decline of the taste for eloquence, and on the want of "golden opportunity" for the display of indignant virtue!

Nothing but an army, or such a concourse of people as collects to witness an inauguration, could ever make Washington look populous. But when congress, and its train of ten thousand casual visitors are gone, and only the official and indigenous inhabitants remain, Balbec, or Palmyra, with a dozen Arabs scattered among its ruins, has less a look of desolation. The few stragglers in the streets add to its loneliness—producing exactly the effect sometimes given to a woodland solitude by the presence of a single bird. The vast streets seem grown vaster and more disproportionate—the houses seem straggling, to greater distances—the walk from the president's house to the capital seems twice as long—and new faces are seen here and there, at the doors and windows—for cooks and innkeepers that had never time to lounge, lounge now, and their families take quiet possession of the unrented front parlor. He who would be reminded of his departed friends should walk down on the avenue. The carpet, associated with so many pleasant recollections—which has been pressed by the dainty feet of wits and beauties—to tread on which was a privilege and a delight—is displayed on a heap of old furniture, and while its sacred defects are rudely scanned by the curious, is knocked down, with all its memories, under the hammer of the auctioneer. Tables, chairs, ottomans—all linked with the same glowing recollections—go for most unworthy prices; and while, humiliated with the sight, you wonder at the artificial value given to things by their possessors, you begin to wonder whether your friends themselves, subjected to the same searching valuation, would not be depreciated too! Ten to one, if their characters were displayed like their carpets, there would come to light defects as unsuspected!

The person to whom this desolation is the "unkindest cut" is the hackney-coachman. "His vocation" is emphatically gone! Gone is the dollar made every successive half hour! Gone is the pleasant sum in compound addition, done "in the head," while waiting at the doors of the public offices! Gone are the short, but profitable, trips to the theatre! Gone the four or five families, all taken the same evening to parties, and each paying the item of "carriage from nine till twelve!" Gone the absorbed politician, who would rather give the five-dollar bill than wait for his change! the lady who sends the driver to be paid at "the bar;" the uplifted fingers, hither and thither, which embarrass his choice of a fare—gone, all! The chop-fallen coachy drives to the stand in the morning and drives home at noon; he creeps up to Fuller's at a snail-pace, and, in very mockery of hope, asks the homeward-bound clerk from the department if he wants a coach! Night comes on, and his horses begin to believe in the millenium—and the cobwebs are wove over his whip-socket.

These changes, however, affect not unpleasantly the diplomatic and official colony extending westward from the president's. The inhabitants of this thin-sprinkled settlement are away from the great thoroughfare, and do not miss its crowds. The cessation of parties is to them a relief from night-journeys, colds, card-leavings, and much wear and tear of carriage-horses. They live now in dressing-gowns and slippers, read the reviews and the French papers, get their dinners comfortably from the restaurateurs, and thank Heaven that the capital is locked up. The attachés grow fat, and the despatches grow thin.

There are several reasons why Washington, till the month of May, spite of all the drawbacks in the picture delineated above, is a more agreeable residence than the northern cities. In the first place, its climate is at least a month earlier than that of New York, and, in the spring, is delightful. The trees are at this moment (the last week in March) bursting into buds; open carriages are everywhere in use; walking in the sun is oppressive; and for the last fortnight, this has been a fair chronicle of the weather. Boston and New York have been corroded with east winds, meantime, and even so near as Baltimore, they are still wrapped in cloaks and shawls. To those who, in reckoning the comforts of life, agree with me in making climate stand for nine tenths, this is powerful attraction.

Then the country about Washington, the drives and rides, are among the most lovely in the world. the banks of Rock creek are a little wilderness of beauty. More bright waters, more secluded bridle-paths, more sunny and sheltered hill-sides, or finer mingling of rock, hill, and valley, I never rode among. Within a half hour's gallop, you have a sylvan retreat of every variety of beauty, and in almost any direction; and from this you come home (and this is not the case with most sylvan rides) to an excellent French dinner and agreeable society, if you like it. You have all the seclusion of a rural town, and none of its petty politics and scandal—all the means and appliances of a large metropolis, and none of its exactions and limitations. That which makes the charm of a city, and that for which we seek the country, are equally here, and the penalties of both are removed.

Until the reflux of population from the Rocky mountains, I suppose Washington will never be a metropolis of residence. But if it were an object with the inhabitants to make it more so, the advantages I have just enumerated, and a little outlay of capital and enterprise, would certainly, in some degree, effect it. People especially who come from Europe, or have been accustomed to foreign modes of living, would be glad to live near a society composed of such attractive materials as the official and diplomatic persons at the seat of government. That which keeps them away is, principally, want of accommodation, and, in a less degree, it is want of comfortable accommodation in the other cities which drives them back to Europe. In Washington you must either live at an hotel or a boarding-house. In either case, the mode of life is only endurable for the shortest possible period, and the moment congress rises, every sufferer in these detestable places is off for relief. The hotels are crowded to suffocation; there is an utter want of privacy in the arrangement of the suites of apartments; the service is ill-ordered, and the prices out of all sense or reason. You pay for that which you have not, and you can not get by paying for it that which you want.

The boarding-house system is worse yet. To possess but one room in privacy, and that opening on a common passage; to be obliged to come to meals at certain hours, with chance table companions, and no place for a friend, and to live entirely in your bedroom or in a public parlor, may truly be called as abominable a routine as a gentleman could well suffer. Yet the great majority of those who come to Washington are in one or the other of these two categories.

The use of lodgings for strangers or transient residents in the city does not, after all the descriptions in books, seem at all understood in our country. This is what Washington wants, but it is what every city in the country wants generally. Let us describe it as if it was never before heard of, and perhaps some enlightened speculator may advance us half a century in some of the cities, by creating this luxury.

Lodgings of the ordinary kind in Europe generally consist of the apartments on one floor. The house, we will suppose, consists of three stories above the basement, and each floor contains a parlor, bedroom, and dressing-room, with a small antechamber. (This arrangement of rooms varies, of course, and a larger family occupies two floors.) These three suites of apartments are neatly furnished; bed-clothes, table-linen, and plate, if required, are found by the proprietor, and in the basement story usually lives a man and his wife, who attend to the service of the lodgers; i. e., bring water, answer the door-bell, take in letters, keep the rooms in order, make the fires, and, if it is wished, do any little cookery in case of sickness. These people are paid by the proprietor, but receive a fee for extra service, and a small gratuity, at departure, from the lodger. It should be added to this, that it is not infra dig. to live in the second or third story.

In connexion with lodgings, there must be of course a cook or restaurateur within a quarter of a mile. The stranger agrees with him for his dinner, to consist of so many dishes, and to be sent to him at a certain hour. He gives notice in the morning if he dines out, buys his own wine of the wine-merchant, and thus saves two heavy items of overcharge in the hotel or boarding-house. His own servant makes his tea or coffee (and for this purpose has access to the fire in the basement), and does all personal service, such as brushing clothes, waiting at table, going on errands, &c., &c. The stranger comes in, in short, at a moment's warning, brings nothing but his servant and baggage, and finds himself in five minutes at home, his apartments private, and every comfort and convenience as completely about him as if he had lived there for years.

At from ten to fourteen dollars a week, such apartments would pay the proprietor handsomely, and afford a reasonable luxury to the lodger. A cook would make a good thing of sending in a plain dinner for a dollar a head (or more if the dinner were more expensive), and at this rate, a family of two or more persons might have a hundred times the comfort now enjoyed at hotels, at certainly half the cost.

We have been seduced into a very unsentimental chapter of "ways and means," but we trust the suggestions, though containing nothing new, may not be altogether without use. The want of some such thing as we have recommended is daily and hourly felt and complained of.

THE FOUR RIVERS.

THE HUDSON—THE MOHAWK—THE CHENANGO—THE SUSQUEHANNAH.

SOME observer of nature offered a considerable reward for two blades of striped grass exactly similar. The infinite diversity, of which this is one instance, exists in a thousand other features of nature, but in none more strikingly than in the scenery of rivers. What two in the world are alike! How often does the attempt fail to compare the Hudson with the Rhine—the two, perhaps, among celebrated rivers, which are the nearest to a resemblance? Yet looking at the first determination of a river's course, and the natural operation of its search for the sea, one would suppose that, in a thousand features, their valleys would scarce be distinguishable.

I think, of all excitements in the world, that of the first discovery and explanation of a noble river, must be the most eager and enjoyable. Fancy "the bold Englishman," as the Dutch called Hendrich Hudson, steering his little yacht, the Halve-Manc, for the first time through the Highlands! Imagine his anxiety for the channel forgotten as he gazed up at the towering rocks, and round upon the green shores, and onward, past point and opening bend, miles away into the heart of the country; yet with no lessening of the glorious stream beneath him, and no decrease of promise in the bold and luxuriant shores! Picture him lying at anchor below Newburgh, with the dark pass of the "Wey-Gat" frowning behind him, the lofty and blue Catskills beyond, and the hill-sides around covered with the red lords of the soil, exhibiting only less wonder than friendliness. And how beautifully was the assurance of welcome expressed, when the "very kind old man" brought a bunch of arrows, and broke them before the stranger, to induce him to partake fearlessly of his hospitality!

The qualities of the Hudson are those most likely to impress a stranger. It chances felicitously that the traveller's first entrance beyond the sea-board is usually made by the steamer to Albany. The grand and imposing outlines of rock and horizon answer to his anticipations of the magnificence of a new world; and if he finds smaller rivers and softer scenery beyond, it strikes him but as a slighter lineament of a more enlarged design. To the great majority of tastes, this, too, is the scenery to live among. The stronger lines of natural beauty affect most tastes; and there are few who would select country residence by beauty at all, who would not sacrifice something to their preference for the neighborhood of sublime scenery. The quiet, the merely rural—a thread of a rivulet instead of a broad river—a small and secluded valley, rather than a wide extent of view, bounded by bold mountains, is the choice of but few. The Hudson, therefore, stands usually foremost in men's aspirations for escape from the turmoil of cities; but to my taste, though there are none more desirable to see, there are sweeter rivers to live upon.

I made one of a party, very lately, spent upon a rambling excursion up and down some of the river-courses of New York. We had anticipated empty boats, and an absence of all the gay company usually found radiating from the city in June, and had made up our minds for once to be contented with the study of inanimate nature. Never were wiseheads more mistaken. Our kind friend, Captain Dean, of the Stevens, stood by his plank when we arrived, doing his best to save the lives of the female portion of the crowd rushing on board; and never, in the most palmy days of the prosperity of our country, have we seen a greater number of people on board a boat, nor a stronger expression of that busy and thriving haste, which is thought to be an exponent of national industry. How those varlets of newsboys contrive to escape in time, or escape at all, from being crushed or carried off; how everybody's baggage gets on board, and everybody's wife and child; how the hawesers are slipped, and the boat got under way, in such a crowd and such a crush, are matters understood, I suppose, by Providence and the captain of the Stevens—but they are beyond the comprehension of the passenger.

Having got out of hearing of "Here's the Star!" "Buy the old major's paper, sir?" "Here's the Express!" "Buy the New-Era?" "Would you like a New-Era, sir?" "Take a Sun, miss?" and a hundred such deafening cries, to which New York has of late years become subject, we drew breath and comparative silence off the green shore of Hoboken, thanking Heaven for even the repose of a steamboat, after the babel of a metropolis. Stillness, like all other things, is relative.

The passage of the Hudson is doomed to be bewritten, and we will not again swell its great multitude of describers. Bound onward, we but gave a glance, in passing, to romantic Undercliff and Cro'-Nest, hallowed by the sweetest poetry our country has yet committed to immortality; gave our malison to the black smoke of iron-works defacing the green mantle of nature, and our benison to every dweller on the shore who has painted his fence white, and smoothed his lawn to the river; and sooner than we used to do by some five or six hours (ere railroads had supplanted the ploughing and crawling coaches to Schenectady), we fed our eyes on the slumbering and broad valley of the Mohawk.

How startled must be the Naiad of this lovely river to find her willowy form embraced between railroad and canal! one intruder on either side of the bed so sacredly overshadowed! Pity but there were a new knight of La Mancha to avenge the hamadryads and water-nymphs of their wrongs from wood-cutters and contractors! Where sleep Pan and vengeful Oread, when a Yankee settler hews me down twenty wood-nymphs of a morning! There lie their bodies, limbless trunks, on the banks of the Mohawk, yet no Dutchman stands sprouting into leaves near by, nor woollen jacket turning into bark, as in the retributive olden time! We are abandoned of these gods of Arcady! They like not the smoke of stean funnels!

Talking of smoke reminds me of ashes. Is there no way of frequenting railroads without the loss of one's eyes. Must one pay for velocity as dearly as Cacus for his oxen? Really this new invention is a blessing—to the oculists! Tenthousand small crystals of carbon cutting right and left among the fine vessels and delicate membranes of the eye, and all this amid glorious scenery, where to go bandaged (as needs must), is to slight the master-work of nature! Either run your railroads away from the river courses, gentlemen contractors, or find some other place than your passengers' eyes to bestow your waste ashes! I have heard of "lies in smiles," but there's a lye in tears, that touches the sensibilities more nearly!

There is a drowsy beauty in these German flats that seems strangely profaned by a smoky monster whisking along twenty miles in the hour. The gentle canal-boat was more homogeneous to the scene. The hills lay off from the river in easy and sleepy curves, and the amber Mohawk creeps down over its shallow gravel with a deliberateness altogether and abominably out of tune with the iron rails. Perhaps it is the rails out of tune with the river—but any way there is a discord. I am content to see the Mohawk, canal, and railroad inclusive, but once a year.

We reached the head waters of the Chenango river, by what Miss Martineau celebrates as an "exclusive extra," in an afternoon's ride from Utica. The latter thrifty and hospitable town was as redolent of red bricks and sunshine as usual; and the streets, to my regret, had grown no narrower. They who laid out the future legislative capital of New York, must have been lovers of winter's wind and summer's sun. They forgot the troubles of the near-sighted—it requires spectacles to read the signs or see the shops from one side to the other; they forgot the perils of old women and children in the wide crossings; they forgot the pleasures of shelter and shade, of neighborly vis-à-vis, of comfortable-lookingness. I maintain that Utica is not a comfortable-looking town. It affects me like the clown in the pantomime, when he sits down without bending his legs—by mere straddling. I would not say anything so ungracious if it were not to suggest a remedy—a shady mall up and down the middle! What a beautiful town it would be—like an old-fashioned shirt bosom, with a frill of elms! Your children would walk safely within the rails, and your country-neighbors would expose their "sa'ace," and cool their tired oxen in the shade. We felt ourselves compensated for paying nearly double price for our "extra," by the remarkable alacrity with which the coach came to the door after the bargain was concluded, and the politeness with which the "gentleman who made out the way-bill," acceded to our stipulation. He bowed us off, expressed his happiness to serve us, and away we went.

The Chenango, one of the largest tributaries to the Susquehannah, began to show itself, like a small brook, some fifteen or twenty miles from Utica. Its course lay directly south—and the new canal kept along its bank, as deserted, but a thousand times less beautiful in its loneliness than the river, whose rambling curves it seemed made to straighten. We were not in the best humor, for our double-priced "extra" turned out to be the regular stage; and while we were delivering and waiting for mails, and taking in passengers, the troop of idlers at tavern-doors amused themselves with reading the imaginative production called our "extra way-bill," as it was transferred, with a sagacious wink, from one driver's hat to the other. I thought of Paddy's sedan-chair, with the bottom out. "If it were not for the name of the thing," said he, as he trotted along with a box over his head.

I say we were not in the best of humors with our prompt and polite friend at Utica, but even through these bilious spectacles, the Chenango was beautiful. Its valley is wide and wild, and the reaches of the capricious stream through the farms and woods along which it loiters, were among the prettiest effects of water scenery I have ever met. There is a strange loneliness about it; and the small towns which were sprinkled along the hundred miles of its course, seem rather the pioneers into a western wilderness, than settlements so near the great thoroughfare to the lakes. It is a delicious valley to travel through, barring "corduroy." Tre-men-dous! exclaims the traveller, as the coach drops into a pit between two logs, and surges up again—Heaven only knows how. And, as my fellow-passenger remarked, it is a wonder the road does not echo—"tree-mend-us!"

Five miles before reaching the Susquehannah, the road began to mend, the hills and valleys assumed the smile of cultivation, and the scenery before us took a bolder and broader outline. The Chenango came down full and sunny to her junction, like the bride, who is most lovely when just losing her virgin name, and pouring the wealth of her whole existence into the bosom of another; and, untroubled with his new burden, the lordly Susquehannah kept on his majestic way, a type of such vainly-dreaded, but easily-borne responsibilities.

At Binghamton, we turned our course down the Susquehannah. This delicious word, in the Indian tongue, describes its peculiar and constant windings, and I venture to say that on no river in the world are the grand and beautiful in scenery so gloriously mixed. The road to Owego follows the course of the valley rather than of the river, but the silver curves are constantly in view; and, from every slight elevation, the majestic windings are seen—like the wanderings of a vein, gleaming through green fringes of trees, and circling the bright islands which occasionally divide their waters. It is a swift river, and singularly living and joyous in its expression.

At Owego there is a remarkable combination of bold scenery and habitable plain. One of those small, bright rivers, which are called "creeks" in this country, comes in with its valley at right angles, to the vale and stream of the Susquehannah, forming a star with three rays, or a plain with three radiating valleys, or a city (in the future, perhaps), with three magnificent exits and entrances. The angle is a round mountain, some four or five hundred feet in height, which kneels fairly down at the meeting of the two streams, while another round mountain, of an easy acclivity, lifts gracefully from the opposite bank, as if rising from the same act of homage to Nature. Below the town and above it, the mountains, for the first time, give in to the exact shape of the river's short and capricious course; and the plain on which the town stands, is enclosed between two amphitheatres of lofty hills, shaped with the regularity and even edge of a coliseum, and resembling the two halves of a leaf-lined vase, struck apart by a twisted wand of silver.

Owego creek should have a prettier name—for its small vale is the soul and essence of loveliness. A meadow of a mile in breadth, fertile, soft, and sprinkled with stately trees, furnishes a bed for its swift windings; and from the edge of this new tempe, on the southern side, rise three steppes, or natural terraces, over the highest of which the forest rears its head, and looks in upon the meeting of the rivers, while down the sides, terrace by terrace, leap the small streamlets from the mountain-springs, forming each again its own smaller dimple in this loveliest face of Nature.

There are more romantic, wilder places than this in the world, but none on earth more habitably beautiful. In these broad valleys, where the grain-fields, and the meadows, and the sunny farms, are walled in by glorious mountain sides, not obtrusively near, yet by their noble and wondrous outlines, giving a perpetual refreshment, and an hourly-changing feast to the eye—in these valleys, a man's household gods yearn for an altar. Here are mountains that, to look on but once, "become a feeling"—a river at whose grandeur to marvel—and a hundred streamlets to lace about the heart. Here are fertile fields, nodding with grain; "a thousand cattle" grazing on the hills—here is assembled together, in one wondrous centre, a specimen of every most loved lineament of Nature. Here would I have a home! Give me a cottage by one of these shining streamlets—upon one of these terraces, that seem steps to Olympus, and let me ramble over these mountain sides, while my flowers are growing, and my head silvering in tranquil happiness. He whose Penates would not root ineradicably here, has no heart for a home, nor senses for the glory of Nature!

EPHEMERA.

FROM SARATOGA.

TO THE JULIA OF SOME YEARS AGO.

August 2, 1843.

I HAVE not written to you in your boy's lifetime—that fine lad, a shade taller than yourself, whom I sometimes meet at my tailor's and bootmaker's. I am not very sure, that after the first month (bitter month) of your marriage, I have thought of you for the duration of a reverie—fit to be so called. I loved you—lost you—swore your ruin and forgot you—which is love's climax when jilted. And I never expected to think of you again.

Beside the astonishment at hearing from me at all, you will be surprised at receiving a letter from me at Saratoga. Here where the stars are, that you swore by—here, where the springs and colonnades, the woodwalks and drives, the sofas and swings, are all coated over with your delicious perjuries, your “protested” protestations, your incalculable bankruptcy of sighs, tears, caresses, promises! Oh, Julia—mais, retiens toi, ma plume!

I assure you I had not the slightest idea of ever coming here again in the world—not the slightest! I had a vow in heaven against it, indeed. While I hated you—before I forgot you, that is to say—I would not have come for your husband's million—(your price, Julia!) I had laid Saratoga away with a great seal, to be reopened in the next star I shall inhabit, and used as a lighthouse of warning. There was one bannister at Congress Hall, particularly—across which we parted nightly—the next object my hand touched after losing the warm pressure of yours—the place I leaned over with a heart under my waistcoat which would have sealed Olympus to be nearer to you, yet was kept back by that mahogany and your “no”—and I will believe that devils may become dolls, and ghosts play around us like the smoke of a cigar, since over that bannister I have thrown my leg and sat thinking of the past without phrensy or emotion! And none have a better right than we to laugh now at love's passionate eternities! For we were lovers, Julia—I, as I know, and you, as I believe—and in that entry, when we parted to dream, write, contrive for the blissful morrow—anything but sleep and forget—in that entry and over that bannister were said words of tenderness and devotion, from as deep soundings of two hearts as ever plummet of this world could by possibility fathom. You did love me—monster of untruth and forgetfulness as you have since been bought for—you did love me! And that you can ride in your husband's carriage and grow fat, and that I can come here and make a mock of it, are two comments on love worthy of the commonplace-book of Mephistophiles. Fie on us!

I came to Saratoga as I would look at a coat that I had worn twenty years before—with a sort of vacant curiosity to see the shell in which I had once figured. A friend said, “Join me at Saratoga!” and it sounded like, “Come and see where Julia was adorable.” I came in a railcar, under a hot sun, and wanted my dinner, and wished myself where Julia, indeed, sat fat in her fauteuil—wished it, for the good wine in the cellar and the French cook in the kitchen. And I did not go down to “Congress Hall,” the old palais d'amour—but in the modern and comfortable parlor of the “United States,” sat down by a pretty woman of these days, and chatted about the water-lily in her bosom and the boy she had up stairs—coldly and every-day-ishly. I had been there six hours, and you had not entered my thoughts. Please to believe that, Julia!

But in the evening there was a ball at Congress Hall. And though the old house is unfashionable now, and the lies of love are elsewhere told and listened to, there was a movement among the belles in its favor, and I appended myself to a lady's arm and went boldly. I say boldly, for it required an effort. The twilight had fallen, and with it had come a memory or two of the Springs in our time. I had seated myself against a pillar of the colonnade of the “United States,” and looked down toward Congress Hall—and you were under the old vineclad portico, as I should have seen you from the same spot, and with the same eye of fancy, sundry years ago. So it was not quite like a passionless antiquary that I set foot again on that old-time colonnade, and, to say truth, as the band struck up a waltz, I might have had in my lip a momentary quiver, and some dimness in my world-weary eye. But it passed away.

The ball was comme ça, and I found sweet women (as where are they not—given, candles and music?) and aired my homage as an old stager may. I danced without thinking of you uncomfortably, though the ten years' washing of that white floor has not quite washed out the memory of your Arab instep with its embracing and envied sandal, gliding and bounding, oh how airily! For you had feet, absolute in their perfection, dear Julia!—had you not?

But I went out for fresh air on the colonnade, in an evil and forgetful moment. I strolled alone toward the spring. The lamp burned dim, as it used to burn, tended by Cupid's minions. And on the end of the portico, by the last window of the music-room, under that overhanging ivy, with stars in sight that I would have sworn to for the very same—sat a lady in a dress like yours as I saw you last, and black eyes, like jet lamps framed in velvet, turning indolently toward me. I held by the railing, for I am superstitious, and it seemed to me that I had only to ask why you were there—for, ghostly or bodily, there I saw you! Back came your beauty on my memory with yesterday's freshness of recollection. Back came into my heart the Julia of my long-accursed adoration! I saw your confiding and bewildering smile, your fine-cut teeth of pearl, your over-bent brow and arch look from under, your lily shoulders, your dimpled hands. You were there, if my senses were sufficient evidence, if presence be anything without touch—bodily there!

Of course it was somebody else. I went in and took a julep. But I write to tell you that for a minute—a minute of enormous capacity—I have loved you once more. For one minute, while you probably were buried deep in your frilled pillow—(snoring, perhaps—who knows?)—for one minute, fleeting and blissful, you have been loved again—with heart, brain, blood, all on fire with truth, tenderness, and passionate adoration—by a man who could have bought you (you know I could!) for half the money you sold for! And I thought you would like to know this, Julia! And now, hating you as before, in your fleshy forgetfulness, Yours not at all.

Did it ever strike you how much more French than English we are in many of the qualities, especially the superficialities and physiognomy, of our national character? In dressing, dancing, congregating—in chivalry to women, facility of adaptation to new circumstances, inflammability of excitement, elasticity of recuperation from trouble—in complexion and figure even, how very French! The remark, perhaps, is more particularly true of New York. Where in the world is there such a copy of the sweeter features of the jour de l'an at Paris, as to-day in the bons-bons shops of Broadway? Here, as there, ingenuity and art are taxed to their utmost to provide gay and significant presents of confectionary for children and friends, and the shops are museums of curiosities. Everybody has a child or two by the hand; everybody is abroad, and alive to the spirit and baby-supremacy of the hour; everybody abandons his monotone of daily life, to strike into the general diaphanous, a full octave higher, for Christmas. But Christmas has not these superficial features in England. This is the way they keep Christmas in France; and the French extravagance of confectionary is one of the outer indices of the original from which we copy, and points us directly to Paris.

Were the language of the three countries the same, we should seem to a traveller's eye, I am inclined to think, much more like a nation of French origin than English. Although our communication with England is much more intimate, we hardly copy anything English except its literature and religion. Our fashions in dress, male as well as female, are principally Parisian. The style of cookery in our hotels, and at all private tables of any pretension, is French. Our houses are furnished a la Française; our habits of society, our balls, private concerts, and places of entertainment for the idlers about town, are all French. We have a hundred French bootmakers to one English. We have a large colony of Americans in Paris engaged in the business of exporting French fabrics, elegancies, and conveniences, for this country, and almost none of the same class in England. In fact, if England is our mother-country, France is the foster-nurse from whom we draw the most of our nourishment, of the tasteful and ornamental order.

In the society of New York I think the predominance of Gallicism over Anglicism is still more striking. The French language is heard all over a crowded drawing-room; and with costume entirely, and furniture mainly, French, it is difficult sometimes at a party in this city, not to fancy one's self on the other side of the Atlantic. Frenchmen are quite at home in New York, while no Frenchman is at home in England. And lately the fashion of soirées, beginning with music and ending with a dance, another Parisian usage, has followed on the heels of the matinées which I referred to in a previous letter. We certainly have not inherited, with our English blood, the English reluctance to copy even an excellence, if it be French; and it is a curious mark of the difference made in such matters by national antipathy, that, with a separation of only twenty miles from the French coast, the English assimilate not at all, even to the acknowledged superiorities of French life, while we, at a distance of three thousand miles, copy them with the readiness of a contiguous country.

There was, of course, a period when every word on the country was English; and it would be a curious chapter in a historical memoir to trace back our Gallicism to its incipient point, and give its rise and progress in detail. And, apropos of suggestions, which sometimes travel like the seed in the migrating bird, what an interesting book might be written (and by no man living so admirably and ably as by your correspondent, Mr. Walsh) tracing the influences that have spread from our country eastward; and to what degree our institutions, opinions, and discoveries, have affected European countries, and paid back our debt of literature and refinement!

The snow-storm of Wednesday cleared up at night-fall with an old-fashioned frosty and sparkling north-wester. While the south wind was disputing his ground, however, the sun found a chink to creep through, and quietly took to himself the scanty remainder of the city's mantle of snow. I chanced to look down upon the Park while the ground was covered, and I wished that the common council might see it with my eyes, for the fountain was playing beautifully in a basin of spotless white, which, if exactly imitated in marble, would be better worthy of that radiant column than the mingled mud and greensward that commonly surround it. I have been surprised to notice the complete satiety of public curiosity to this superb object. A column of water, fifty or sixty feet high, is continually playing in the most thronged thoroughfare of the city, and it already attracts as little attention as the trees in the Park, or the liberty-cap on Tammany hall. Seldom a passer-by stops to gaze at it; and I have watched in vain, in my daily stroll through Broadway, for the turning toward it of the refined eyes of shoppers and dangles. I understand there is to be another jet in the Bowling-Green, and another on the Battery—though this last will be bringing the rural water-nymph into very close contact with the uproarious Neptune.

The joy of New York comes to Broadway as color comes with the same impulse to the cheek. The excitement of shoving off the old year and helping in the new, was made visible by a pave as thronged on Saturday night at twelve, as it commonly is on a holiday at noon. Sunday (the superseded first) was pretty gayly infringed upon by sleighing parties; for even in Broadway the sleighing was tolerable, and, out of town, said to be excellent. To-day is "black Monday" for horse-flesh! Such ringing of sleigh-bells and plunging of runners through the mud-holes, and laughing, and whipping, and hurrying by, is enough to give inexperienced Forty-three a most confused impression of the world he is called upon to govern. It is snowing slightly at this moment, and gives promise of a violent storm by noon.

The temperance people have made a strong effort to discontenance, this year, the giving of wine and other stimulants to visitors on New Year's day. But there is a much more powerful principle at work in the same cause, or rather in a cause which covers this—the destroying of the custom of New Year's visiting altogether—and that principle is omnipotent fashion. The aristocratic feeling now is against the receiving on that day; and some of the leading fashionables have reduced their observance of the custom to a matter of pasteboard—a servant standing at the door to take in cards. The truth is, the good feeling of the day has been abused of late years. The hilarity amounted to a general saturnalia, in which everybody went anywhere and everywhere to drink and shake hands, and exclusiveness was very much offended, and so, very often were propriety and delicacy—three very implacable members of society! Once well understood that fashionable people do not receive—presto! the custom will vanish like a ghost at cock-crowing. If this formidable gun could be brought to bear upon some other things, now?

A score at least of the aristocratic dames in the upper part of Broadway have adopted the fashion of a matinée—receiving visits one morning only in the week. This is rather a usage en prince, but, ambitious as it seems, it is a novelty which common sense might father if it had been disowned by fashion. In the first place, it leaves to those who thus entertain, six mornings in the week, if they please, of excusable closed doors—a very available privilege for very many important uses. In the second place, it saves much outlay of time consumed in ineffectual attempts to see people; it times your visit when the ladies are in a dress-humor to receive! and (last, though perhaps least important) the class of gregarious idlers, so fast increasing in our country, are provided with a resource against ennui, which may profitably take the place of less innocent amusement. It may be put down as an accidental advantage, also, that ladies may dress very gayly with propriety to pass two or three hours in a reception-room, and, with this compensation, perhaps our fair countrywomen may be willing to forego that showiness of street costume which has been so often objected to. The most becoming toilet (which is undoubtedly that of out-doors, at least to all women past seventeen) must have its field of display, and this necessity has been amply proved by the fashion peculiar to our country of dressing highly for steamboat-decks and street promenades—the only opportunities for showing the hat and its accompaniments. In England, ladies dress plainly in the street, but they dress showily for Hyde park and the opera. In default of a Hyde park and an opera, our persevering countrywomen have adopted the matinée. Séquitur—Broadway will be shorn of the genteeler rays of its splendor; ladies will heighten the style of their visiting toilets till they can not visit without equipages, and so the aristocracy of money takes another long stride toward exclusiveness and empire.

An advertisement of “fifteen Indians and squaws to be seen at the American Museum in their NATIVE costume,” drew me into this place of popular resort last evening. I found a crowd of five or six hundred people collected in the upper story, and the performances of a small theatre going on, with the Indians sitting, in full costume, on the stage; not “native costume,” certainly, unless they are born in wampum and feathers. There were only nine Indians upon the stage, and several of these seemed to have bad coughs; and I was told that those who were not visible were confined to their skins with severe colds and fevers. I am not surprised that these hardy sons of the forest succumb under the delicacies (?) of civilization. They all sleep in one small room in the museum building, their buffalo-skins spread around a stove—heated to an insufferable degree with anthracite coal—and they ascend to the terrace-roof of the house to smoke their pipes, and are regaled with a daily sleigh-ride, changing their temperature continually from ninety to zero. The old chief who “has killed with his own hand one hundred Osages, three Mohawks, two Sioux, and one Pawnee,” and “No-chee, or the Man of Fire,” are the principal victims to the luxury of anthracite. I saw but one of the squaws, “Doh-kum-me, or the Productive Pumpkin,” a handsome and benign looking woman, who was married a few days ago to Cow-kick-ke, son of the principal chief of the Iowas. The bride and bridegroom sat together, she leaning very affectionately upon her husband; but I observed that the “Productive Pumpkin” modestly turned her eyes away during the pirouettes of La Petite Celeste, a savage naïseric which will, of course, wear away with civilization. Still, I could wish that some of the “daughters of the pale faces,” in this respect, at least, were more like “Productive Pumpkin.” These Indians, I believe, are well authenticated as the first people of their important tribes; and the question arises whether, in becoming a shilling show at the museum, they have entered civilized society upon a stratum parallel to their own. Is “Nonos-ee, the She-Wolf” (a niece of Blackhawk, and, of course, an Indian princess), on a level, as to rank, with the dancing and singing girls of a museum? But this question of comparative rank would lead a great way, and, as it stands, it makes a very pretty topic of discussion for your female readers.

You will have seen mentioned in the papers the death of the young squaw at the museum. She had been married but six weeks, and was a very beautiful creature. I saw her, a few days ago, at the Park theatre, with a circlet of jewels around her head, and thought her by far the prettiest woman in the house. She was the survivor of the two females of the party, the other squaw having died a few weeks since. The immediate cause of her death was a violent cold, taken in coming home a night or two before from a ball at the Tivoli. The omnibus in which they were returning broke down in Hudson street, and they were obliged to walk a mile through a light snow falling at the time. Their thin moccasins were no protection, and four or five of the Indians were ill the next morning, the bride worst of all. She died in dreadful agony, of congestion of the blood, on the third day, spite of the best medical attendance and every care on the part of the ladies of the neighborhood. The Indians were all standing around her, and on being told that she was dead, they tore the rings from their ears, and stood for some minutes in silence, with the blood streaming upon their cheeks. Their grief afterward became quite uncontrollable. They washed off all the paint with which they have been so gayly bedecked while here, and painted the dead bride very gaudily for burial. She was interred in the Greenwood cemetery. The most passionate affection existed between her and her husband. He is a magnificent fellow, the handsomest Indian we have ever had in the cities, and a happier marriage was never celebrated. She followed close at his heels wherever he went, and had scarce been separated from him five minutes at a time since her marriage. The poor fellow is an object of great commiseration now, for he seems completely inconsolable. His wife was the idol of the party. They are very impatient to be away since this melancholy event, and will start westward as soon as the sick recover.

Public opinion, which is notoriously unkind to the misdoings of old men, has at last taken up the matter of—

"Winter lingering in the lap of May."

There are strong symptoms (in everything but the inflexible thermometer) that the spring is universally believed to have arrived. A steamboat made its way on Wednesday as far as Poughkeepsie, ploughing up the ice where it was at least eighteen inches thick. People were running out from every side to meet her, and many climbed up her sides while she was making way. Some heavily-laden sleighs were obliged to whip up to get out of her course, and altogether the skirmish between hot and cold water (both a Pou-trance) is said to have been very daringly fought.

The "town" is "verdant." The enchanting spring-hats of the ladies are breezily exposed in the plate-glass windows of the milliners. The airy, delicate, daisy-mead patterns for ladies' wear in the transition month make every shop-window like a landscape of May in Arcady; the men-tailors "turn out for lining to the sun" the light woofs of the "demme!" tribe for the semi-season; the Croton pipers water the streets; the small wooden signs hang on every leafless tree in the park, warning you to "keep off the grass;" people are beginning to discuss the resorts of the sultry season; and, in fact, everything is here but the month itself. The table is set, and the hour and the appetite come, but the dinner is not served.

"Oh! ever thus from childhood's hour!" &c.

Apropos of Croton water—there has been a great overturn lately of "mill-privileges" in some of the cellars of New York. The authorities have ferreted out, it is said, an incredible quantity of usurped water-power, applied to almost every branch of mechanism, and drawn very quietly from the main "race" down Broadway. One scratches one's head and wonders he never thought of it before, the adaptation seems so simple; but as the Common Council will hear no argument about "natural privileges" and "backwater," the interloping wheels will easily be stopped turning.

As I presume you are interested in the one portion of New York made classic by a foreign pen, let me jot you down a mem. or two from my first visit to Dickens's Hole at the Five Points, made one evening last week with a distinguished party under the charge of the Boz officer.

I had had an idea that this celebrated spot was on the eastern limit of the city, at the end of one of the omnibus-routes, and was surprised to find that it was not more than three minutes' walk from Broadway, and in full view from one of the fashionable corners. It lies, indeed, in a lap between Broadway and the Bowery, in what was once a secluded valley of the island of Manhattan, though to believe it ever to have been green or clean, requires a powerful effort of imagination. We turned into Anthony street at half-past ten, passed "the Tombs," and took the downward road, as did Orpheus and Dickens before us. It was a cold night, but women stood at every door with bare heads and shoulders, most of them with something to say, and, by their attitudes, showing a complete insensibility to cold. In everything they said, they contrived to bring in the word "shilling." There were very few men to be seen, and those whom we met skulked past as if avoiding observation—possibly ashamed to be there, possibly shrinking from any further acquaintance with officer Stevens, though neither of these feelings seemed to be shared by the females of the community. A little turn to the left brought us up against what looked to me a blind, tumble-down board fence; but the officer pulled a latch and opened a door, and a flight of steps was disclosed. He went down first and threw open a door at the bottom, letting up a blaze of light, and we followed into the grand subterranean Almack's of the Five Points. And really it looked very clean and cheerful. It was a spacious room with a low ceiling, excessively white-washed, nicely sanded, and well lit, and the black proprietor and his "ministering spirits" (literally fulfilling their vocation behind a very tidy bar) were well-dressed and well-mannered people, and received Mr. Stevens and his friends with the politeness of grand chamberlains. We were a little early for the fashionable hour, the "ladies not having arrived from the theatres;" and, proposing to look in again after making the round of the other resorts, we crept up again to the street.

Our next dive was into a cellar crowded with negroes, eating, drinking, and dancing, one very well made mulatto-girl playing the castanets, and imitating Elsie in what she called the cracoveragain. In their way, these people seemed cheerful, dirty, and comfortable. We looked in afterward at several drinking-places, thronged with creatures who looked over their shoulders very significantly at the officer; found one or two barrooms kept by women who had preserved the one virtue of neatness (though in every clean place the hostess seemed a terrible virago), and it was then proposed that we should see some of the dormitories of this Alsatia. And at this point must end all the cheerfulness of my description. This is called "murdering alley," said our guide. We entered between two high brick walls, with barely room to pass, and by the police-lantern made our way up a broken and filthy staircase, to the first floor of a large building. Under its one roof the officer thought there usually slept a thousand of these wretched outcasts. He knocked at a door on the left. It was opened unwillingly by a woman who held a dirty horse-blanket over her breast, but at the sight of the police-lantern she stepped back and let us pass in. The floor was covered with human beings asleep in their rags; and when called by the officer to look in at a low closet beyond, we could hardly put our feet to the ground, they lay so closely together, black and white, men, women, and children. The doorless apartment beyond, of the size of a kennel, was occupied by a woman and her daughter, and the daughter's child, lying together on the floor, and covered by rags and cloths of no distinguishable color, the rubbish of bones and dirt only displaced by their emaciated limbs. The sight was too sickening to endure, but there was no egress without following close to the lantern. Another door was opened to the right. It disclosed a low and gloomy apartment, perhaps eight feet square. Six or seven black women lay together in a heap, all sleeping except the one who opened the door. Something stirred in a heap of rags, and one of the party removing a dirty piece of carpet with his cane, discovered a newborn child. It belonged to one of the sleepers in the rags, and had had an hour's experience of the tender mercies of this world! But these details are disgusting, and have gone far enough when they have shown those who have the common comforts of life how inestimably, by comparison, they are blessed! For one, I had never before any adequate idea of poverty in cities. I did not dream that human beings, within reach of human aid, could be abandoned to the wretchedness which I there saw—and I have not described the half of it, for the delicacy of your readers would not bear it, even in description. And all these horrors of want and abandonment lie almost within sound of your voice, as you pass Broadway! The officers sometimes make a descent, and carry off swarms to Blackwell's Island—for all the inhabitants of the Five Points are supposed to be criminal and vicious—but still thousands are there, subjects for tears and pity, starving, like rats and dogs, with the sensibilities of human beings!

As we returned we heard screams and fighting on every side, and the officers of the watch were carrying off a party to the lock-up-house. We descended once more to the grand ballroom, and found the dance going on very merrily. Several very handsome mulatto women were in the crowd, and a few "young men about town," mixed up with the blacks; and altogether it was a picture of "amalgamation," such as I had never before seen. I was very glad to get out of the neighborhood, leaving behind me, I am free to confess, all discontent with my earthly allotment. One gentleman who was with us left behind him something of more value, having been robbed at Almack's of his keys, pencilcase, and a few dollars, the contents of two or three pockets. I wind up my "notes" with the hope that the true picture I have drawn may touch some moving-spring of benevolence in private societies, or in the Common Council, and that something may be soon done to alleviate the horrors of the Five Points.

I took a stroll or two while in Boston, and was struck with the contrast of its physiognomy to that of New York. There is a look of staid respectability and thrift in everything that strikes the eye in Boston. The drays, carts, omnibuses, and public vehicles, are well horsed and appointed, and driven by respectable-looking men. The people are all clad very warmly and very inelegantly. The face of every pedestrian in the street has a marked errand in it—gentlemen holding their nerves to the screw till they have achieved the object of being out of doors, and ladies undergoing a "constitutional" to carry out a system. There are no individuals in Boston—they are all classes. It is a cohesive and gregarious town, and half a dozen portraits would give you the entire population. Every eye in Boston seems to move in its socket with a check—a fear of meeting something that may offend it—and all heads are carried in a posture of worthy gravity, singularly contagious. It struck me the very leaves in the bakers' windows had a look of virtuous exaction, to be eaten gravely, if at all.

New York seems to me to differ from all this, as a dish of rice, boiled to let every grain fall apart, differs from a pot of mush. Every man you meet with in our city walks with his countenance free of any sense of observation or any dread of his neighbor. He has evidently dressed to please himself, and he looks about with an eye wholly at ease. He is an integer in the throng, untroubled with any influence beyond the risks of personal accident. There is neither restraint nor curiosity in his look, and he neither expects to be noticed by the passers-by, nor to see anything worthy of more than half a glance in the persons he meets. The moving sights of the city have all the same integral and stand-alone character. The drays, instead of belonging to a company, are each the property of the man who drives it; the hacks and cabs are under no corporate discipline, every ragged whip doing as he likes with his own vehicle; and all the smaller trades seem followed by individual impulse, responsible to nothing but police-law. Boston has the advantage in many things, but a man who has any taste for cosmopolitanism would very much prefer New York.

Croton, which ripples round the sidewalk of the park, and goes down the great throat of the drain, seemed giving the dry city to drink. The pavement of Broadway burst into flower. Birds were hung out at the windows; hyacinths were put out to breathe; and open casements and doors, lounging footsteps and cheerful voices in the street, all gave sweet token of summer. Thursday was a fine day, too, with a little soupeon of east wind in its blandishments, and the evening set in with a gentle summer rain, welcome as most things are after their opposites, for the dust was a nuisance; and to-day, Friday, it rains mildly and steadily.

March made an expiring effort to give us a spring-day yesterday. The morning dawned mild and bright, and there was a voluptuous contralto in the cries of the milkmen and the sweeps, which satisfied me, before I was out of bed, that there was an arrival of a south wind. The Chinese proverb says, "when thou hast a day to be idle, be idle for a day;" but for that very elusive "time when," I irresistibly substitute the day the wind sweetens after a sour northeaster. Oh, the luxury (or curse, as the case may be!) of breakfasting leisurely with an idle day before one!

I strolled up Broadway between nine and ten, and encountered the morning tide down; and if you never have studied the physiognomy of this great thoroughfare in its various fluxes and refluxes, the differences would amuse you. The clerks and workies have passed down an hour before the nine o'clock tide, and the sidewalk is filled at this time with bankers, brokers, and speculators, bound to Wall street; old merchants and junior partners, bound to Pearl and Water; and lawyers, young and old, bound for Nassau and Pine. Ah, the faces of care! The day's operations are working out in their eyes; their hats are pitched forward at the angle of a stagecoach with all the load on the driver's seat, their shoulders are raised with the shrug of anxiety, their steps are hurried and short, and mortal face and gait could scarcely express a heavier burden of solicitude than every man seems to bear. They nod to you without a smile, and with a kind of unconscious recognition; and, if you are unaccustomed to walk out at that hour, you might fancy that, if there were not some great public calamity, your friends, at least, had done smiling on you. Walk as far as Niblo's, stop at the greenhouse there, and breathe an hour in the delicious atmosphere of flowering plants, and then return. There is no longer any particular current in Broadway. Foreigners coming out from the cafés, after their late breakfast, and idling up and down, for fresh air; country-people shopping early; ladies going to their dress-makers in close veils and demi-toilets; errand-boys, news-boys, duns, and doctors, make up the throng. Toward twelve o'clock there is a sprinkling of mechanics going to dinner—a merry, short-jacketed, independent-looking troop, glancing gayly at the women as they pass, and disappearing around corners and up alleys, and an hour later Broadway begins to brighten. The omnibuses go along empty, and at a slow pace, for people would rather walk than ride. The side-streets are tributaries of silks and velvets, flowers and feathers, to the great thoroughfare; and ladies, whose proper mates (judging by the dress alone) should be lords and princes, and dandies, shoppers, and loungers of every description, take crowded possession of the paré. At nine o'clock you look into the troubled faces of men going to their business, and ask yourself "to what end is all this burden of care?" and at two, you gaze on the universal prodigality of exterior, and wonder what fills the multitude of pockets that pay for it! The faces are beautiful, the shops are thronged, the sidewalks crowded for an hour, and then the full tide turns, and sets upward. The most of those who are out at three are bound to the upper part of the city to dine; and the merchants and lawyers, excited by collision and contest above the depression of care, join, smiling, in the throng. The physiognomy of the crowd is at its brightest. Dinner is the smile of the day to most people, and the hour approaches. Whatever has happened in stocks or politics, whoever is dead, whoever ruined since morning, Broadway is thronged with cheerful faces and good appetites at three! The world will probably dine with pleasure up to the last day—perhaps breakfast with worldly care for the future on doomsday morning! And here I must break off my Daguerreotype of yesterday's idling, for the wind came round easterly and raw at three o'clock, and I was driven in-doors to try industry as an opiate.

Wednesday was a long warm summer's day, with no treachery in it to the close; and the rivulet of

The first day of freedom from medical embargo is equivalent, in most men's memories, to a new first impression of existence. Dame Nature, like a provident housewife, seems to take the opportunity of a sick man's absence to whitewash and freshen the world he occupies. Certainly, I never saw the bay of New York look so beautiful as on Sunday noon; and you may attribute as much as you please of this impression to the "Claude Lorraine spectacles" of convalescence, and as much more as pleases you to the fact that it was an intoxicating and dissolving day of spring.

The Battery on Sunday is the Champs-Élysées of foreigners. I heard nothing spoken around me but French and German. Wrapped in my cloak and seated on a bench, I watched the children and the poodle-dogs at their gambols, and it seemed to me as if I were in some public resort over the water. They bring such happiness to a day of idleness—these foreigners—laughing, talking nonsense, totally unconscious of observation, and delighted as much with the passing of a rowboat, or a steamer, as an American with the arrival of his own "argosy" from sea. They are not the better class of foreigners who frequent the Battery on Sunday. They are the newly-arrived, the artisans, the German toymakers and the French boot-makers—people who still wear the spacious-hipped trousers and scant coats, the gold rings in the ears, and the ruffled shirts of the lands of undandified poverty. They are there by hundreds. They hang over the railing and look off upon the sea. They sit and smoke on the long benches. They run hither and thither with their children, and behave as they would in their own garden, using and enjoying it just as if it were their own. And an enviable power they have of it!

There had been a heavy fog on the water all the morning, and quite a fleet of the river-craft had drifted with the tide close on to the Battery. The soft south wind was lifting the mist in undulating sweeps, and covering and disclosing the spars and sails with a phantom effect quite melo-dramatic. By two o'clock the breeze was steady and the bay clear, and the horizon was completely concealed with the spread of canvass. The grass in the Battery plots seemed to be growing visibly meantime, and to this animated seapicture gave a foreground of tender and sparkling green; the trees look feathery with the opening buds; the children rolled on the grass, and the summer seemed come. Much as Nature loves the country, she opens her green lap first in the cities. The valleys are asleep under the snow, and will be for weeks.

I think I may safely announce to you the opening of a new channel for literature. Mr. Stetson, mine host of the Astor, as you are aware, is a man of genius, whose advent, like Napoleon's, was the answer to a demand in the national character. The peculiarly American passion for life in hotels, and the mammoth size to which these luxurious caravansaries have grown, demanded some mind capable of systematizing and generalizing, and of bringing these Napoleonic qualities to bear upon the confused details of comfort and comestibles. I need not enlarge upon the well-known military discipline of the Johns and Thomases at the Astor, as most of your readers have witnessed their matutinal drill, and seen the simultaneous apparition of the smoking joints, when the hundred and ten covers have been whisked off by the word of command, like the heads of so many Paynim knights decapitated in their helmets. It has been reserved for this epoch to take and digest beef and pudding by platoon, in martinet obedience to a controlling spirit in white apron and carving-knife; but, as I said before, it was the exigency of the era, and the historian who records the national trait will emblazon the name of Stetson as its interpreter and moulding genius. I am wandering a little from my design, however, which was simply to make an admiring comment on the tact and adaptation of Mr. Stetson, and to show how such minds open the doors to important changes and innovations. Mr. Stetson's observing eye had long since detected that, if there was any point in which his table d'hôte suffered by comparison with private and princely banquets, it was in the poverty of conversation and the absence of general hilarity. This, of course, was owing partly to the temperance reform, but more particularly to the want of topics common to the guests, the persons meeting there being but slightly acquainted. Music would have furnished a good diaphanous for harmonizing the animal spirits of the company, but this was too expensive; and the first tentative to the present experiment was the introduction of a very facetious wine list on the back of the carte. When people no longer smiled at "Wedding Wine," "Wanton Madeira, exceedingly delicate," &c., the French carte was suddenly turned into English (explaining many a sphinx riddle to faithful believers in the cook), and a postscript was added, containing a list of the times of arrival and departure of the mails, and information relative to steamboats and railroads. And with the spring, I understand, this is to be extended into a "Daily Prandial Gazette," and a copy to be furnished to each guest with the soup, containing the arrivals of the day at the hotel, the range of the thermometer, the prospect of rain, "burstings-up" in Wall street, and general advice as to the use of the castors—the whole adapted to the meridian of a table d'hôte, and the ascertained demand of subjects for conversation.

In this improvement your prophetic eye will see, probably, a new field for the ambition of authors (the addition of one poem per diem, for example, coming quite within the capacity of such a gazette), and, if I might venture to saddle Mr. Stetson with advice, I should recommend that it be confined as long as possible to the debuts of young poets, the genial criticism with which they would be read at such time and place being an "aching void" in their present destiny.

The City Hotel re-opens to-morrow under the care of the omni-recongnant Willard and his partner of the olden time. The building has been entirely refreshed, refitted, and refurbished, and I am told that in comfort and luxury it far exceeds any hotel in this country. The advances in the commodiousness and elegance of these public houses, their economy compared with housekeeping, and the difficulty of obtaining tolerable servants, combine to make an inroad upon the Lares and Penates of the metropolis, which may have an influence upon national character at least worth the noting. Hundreds of persons who, up to these disastrous times, have nursed their domestic virtues in the privacy of their own firesides, are now living at these gregarious palaces, passing their evenings in such society as chance brings together, and subjecting their children to such influences of body and mind as belong more properly to a community of Owen. Other more obvious objections aside, these collections of families are not the most harmonious communities in the world, and the histories of the conflicting dignities and jostling interests of these huddled masses will yet furnish most amusing material to some future Pickwickian writer. The ladies of the Carlton have lately sent in a remonstrance against the admission of errandless bachelors into their privileged drawing-room, and the brawls of the Guelphs and Ghibellines are but a faint type of the contentions in the ladies' wing of the Astor for places at table, &c., &c. I should like to have the opinion of some such generalizing mind as Dr. Channing's or Mr. Adams's as to whether the peculiar gregariousness of Americans is a crudity of national character which will refine away, or is only a kind of bolder crystallization characteristic of the freer nuclei of our institutions. Channing long ago fastened the reproach upon us of having weaker domestic ties than the nations of Europe, though he did not see in it a possible adaptation of Providence to the wants of a wide country waiting for emigrants from families easily dismembered; and it would not require much ingenuity, perhaps, to find a special Providence in the fact commented on above. But this is getting to be a sermon.

Since commencing this letter, I have taken a stroll up Broadway, and looked in at the City hotel. Willard was in his place behind the bar, a little fatter than of old, and somewhat gray with cabbage-growing, but his wonderful memory of names and faces seemed in full vigor; and, what with the tone of voice, the dexterity of furnishing drinks, the off-hand welcome to every comer-in, and the mechanical answering of questions and calling to servants, he seemed to have begun precisely where he left off, and his little episode of farming must seem to him scarcely better than a dream. A servant showed us over the house. A new gentlemen's dining-room, lighted from the roof, has been built in the area behind, and the old dining-room is cut up into a reading-room and private parlors. The famous assembly-room in the second story is also divided up into parlors and ladies' dining-room; but the garnishing and furnishing of the public and private parlors are quite beyond anything I know of short of the houses of nobility and royal palaces. The carpets are of the finest Wilton and Brussels; the paper upon the walls of the latest Parisian pattern; a new piano in every parlor; and the beds and their belongings of the most enticing freshness and comfortability. The proprietors have not seen fit, however, to adopt the fashion of "prices to suit the times," but have begun, plump and bold, at two dollars a day, and a shilling a drink. Until the fine edge of all this novelty wears off, they may reap a harvest which will repay them for their outlay in paint and garnish. One remark might be dropped into Willard's ear to some advantage—that while he has been resting on his oars at Dorchester, the people "on the town" have become over-epicurean in their exactions of luxuries at hotels, and it will take some "sharp practice" to beat the "United States" at Philadelphia, and the Astor here. People, at first, who have been accustomed to live at the latter place, will find a certain relief at not being helped to fish and pudding by fire of platoon, but in the long run the systematic service of the Astor achieves comfort. The Atlantic hotel, opposite the Bowling Green, is also in progress of rifacimento; and its old landlord, Anderson, who made a fortune in it once, and kept one of the best houses in the country, opens with it again on the 1st of May.

I am happy to announce to you that the leaves of the trees in Trinity churchyard have fairly come to light. The foliage in this enclosure is always a week in advance of all others in the city, possibly from cadaverous stimulus ("to such base uses may we come at last"), and perhaps accelerated particularly, this year, by the heat of the steam-engine, which, with remorseless travestie, perpetually saws stone for the new building over the "requiescat in pace!" I read the names on desecrated tombstones every day in passing, and associate them in my mind with the people aggrieved (of whom one always has a list, longer or shorter). Poor ghosts! as if there was no other place for a steam-engine and a stonecutter's saw than a-top of the sod which (if hymn and prayer go for anything) is expected to "lie lightly on the dead man's breast!" There is many a once wealthy aristocrat, powdered over with the pumice of that abominable saw, who, if he could rise and step down into Wall street, would make sharp reckoning with heirs and executors for suffering his small remainder of this world's room and remembrance to be so robbed of its poetry and respect! Meantime, this exquisitely-conceived piece of architecture (Trinity church) is rising with admirable effect, and, when completed, it will doubtless be the first Gothic structure in America.

We had rather a novel turn-out of a four-in-hand yesterday in Broadway—a vehicle drawn by four elephants. There was some grandeur in the spectacle, and some drollery. These enormous specimens of the animal, most like us in intellect and least like us in frame, are part of a menagerie; and they drew, in the wagon to which they were attached, a band of music belonging to the concern. They were, all four, en chemise—covered with white cotton cloths to the knees—but, Elssler-like, making great display of their legs and ivory. The ropes were fastened to their tusks, and they were urged by simple pounding on the rear—which was very like flogging the side of a hill, for they were up to the second stories of the houses. To walk round one of these animals in a tight fit of a booth is a very different thing from seeing him paraded under the suitable ceiling of the sky. I had no idea they could go over the ground so swimmingly. They glided along with the ease of scows going down with the tide, and, with their trunks playing about close to the pavement, seemed to be walking Broadway like some other loafers—looking for something green!

The Battery, or, as it has been called in England, the "Marine Parade," is never lovelier than in the early freshness of the morning. The air is yet unimpaired by the myriad fires of the city—the dew is untrodden, and the velvet sheensparkles in the sunshine—the walks are all neatly swept; and, treading pleasantly upon the elastic earth, invigorated by the fresh breeze from the sea, we cast our eyes over a scene of beauty and enchantment unsurpassed in the world. The correspondent of the Intelligencer says: I have been out on the Battery this morning enjoying life, and everything I saw was in the same humor—trees, children, ladies, and ships-of-war. The very port-holes of the Warspite seemed pleased to have their eyelids up. The Battery is a good deal thronged before breakfast, and really I do not remember a promenade in Europe which contains so much that is beautiful. Just now we have three men-of-war lying on the stream—the majestic North Carolina and the Independence having come round to their summer moorings. Jersey shore looks fringed with willows, and the islands and Brooklyn heights are bright and verdant. The Croton river is bubbling up in a superb fountain in Castle Garden. The craft in the bay always seem doing a melo-drama—they cross and mingle so picturesquely; and the trees are always there; and the grass grows better for the children's playing on it. Many thanks to fashion for having taken the rich up-town and left their palaces and the Battery to those who "board."

I have spent an afternoon, since I wrote to you, in the "animal kingdom" of Herr Driesbach. Four elephants together were rather an uncommon sight, to say nothing of the melo-drama performed by the lion-tamer. There was another accidental feature of interest, too—the presence of one or two hundred deaf and dumb children, whose gestures and looks of astonishment quite divided my curiosity with the show. Spite of the repulsiveness of the thought, it was impossible not to reflect how much of the difference between us and some of the brute animals lies merely in the gift of speech, and how nearly some human beings, by losing this gift, would be brought to their level. I was struck with the predominating animal-look in the faces of the boys of the school, though there were some female children with countenances of a very delicate and intellectual cast.

I was an hour too early for the "performances," and I climbed into the big saddle worn by "Siam," and made a leisurely study of the four elephants and their keepers and visitors. I had not noticed before that the eyes of these huge animals were so small. Those of "Hannibal," the nearest elephant to me, resembled the eyes of Sir Walter Scott; and I thought, too, that the forehead was not unlike Sir Walter's. And, as if this was not resemblance enough, there was a copious issue from a bump between his forehead and his ear! (What might we not expect if elephants had "eaten paper and drunk ink?") The resemblance ceased with the legs, it is but respectful to Sir Walter to say; for Hannibal is a dandy, and wears the fashionable gaiter-trowser, with a difference—the gaiter fitted neatly to every toe! The warlike name of this elephant should be given to Siam, for the latter is the great warrior of the party, and in a fight of six hours with "Napoleon," some three months since, broke off both his tusks. He looks like a most determined brute. "Virginus" (the showman told me) killed his keeper, and made an escape into the marshes of Carolina, not long ago; and, after an absence of six weeks, was subdued and brought back by a former keeper, of whose discipline he had a terrific recollection. There are certainly different degrees of animability in their countenances. I looked in vain for some of the wrinkles of age, in the one they said was much the oldest. Unlike us, their skins grow smoother with time—the enviable rascals! I noticed, by-the-way, that though the proboscis of each of the others was as smooth as dressed leather, that of Siam resembled, in texture, a scrubbing-brush, or the third day of a stiff beard. Why he should travel with a "hair-trunk," and the others not, I could not get out of the showman. The expense of training and importing these animals is enormous, and they are considered worth a great deal of money. The four together consume about two hundred weight of hay and six bushels of oats per diem. Fortunately they do their own land transportation, and carry their own trunks.

At four o'clock Siam knelt down, and four or five men lifted his omnibus of a saddle upon his back. The band then struck up a march, and he made the circuit of the immense tent; but the effect of an elephant in motion, with only his legs and trunk visible (his body quite covered with the trappings), was singularly droll. It looked like an avenue taking a walk, preceded by a huge caterpillar. I could not resist laughing heartily. After one round, Siam stopped, and knelt again to receive passengers. The wooden steps were laid against his eyebrow, and thence the children stepped to the top of his head, though here and there a scrambler shortened the step by putting his foot into the ear of the patient animal. The saddle was at last loaded with twelve girls; and with this "fearful responsibility" on his back, the elephant rose and made his rounds, kneeling and renewing his load of "innocence" at every circuit.

The lion-tamer presently appeared, and astonished the crowd rather more than the elephant. A prologue was pronounced, setting forth that a slave was to be delivered up to wild beasts, etc., etc. A green cloth was spread before the cages in the open tent ("parlous work," I thought, among such tender meat as two hundred children), and out sprang suddenly a full-grown tiger, who seized the gentleman in flesh-colored tights by the throat. A struggle ensues, in which they roll over and over on the ground, and finally, the victim gets the upper hand, and drags out his devourer by the nape of his neck. I was inclined to think once or twice that the tiger was doing more than was set down for him in the play; but as the Newfoundland dog of the establishment looked on very quietly, I reserved my criticism.

The Herr next appeared in the long cage with all his animals—lions, tigers, leopards, etc. He pulled them about, put his hands in their mouths, and took as many liberties with his stock of peltry as if it was already made into muffs and tippets. They growled and showed their teeth, but came when they were called, and did as they were bid, very much to my astonishment. He made a bed of them, among other things—putting the tiger across the lion for a pillow, stretching himself on the lion and another tiger, and then pulling the leopard over his breast for a "comforter!" He then sat down, and played nursery. The tiger was as much as he could lift, but he seated him upright on his knees, dandled and caressed him, and finally rocked him apparently asleep in his arms! He closed with an imitation of Fanny Elssler's pirouette, with a tiger standing on his back. I was very glad, for one, when I saw him go out and shut the door.

A man then brought out a young anaconda, and twisted him round his neck (a devil of a boa it looked), and, after enveloping himself completely in other snakes, took them off again like cravats, and vanished. And so ended the show. Herr Driesbach stood at the door to bow us out, and a fine, handsome, determined-looking fellow he is.

Pardon us, ladies—those riding-hats let the sun look in upon your alabaster foreheads—ay, and even cross the bridge of your delicate noses! Take advice! Wear your hats with a pitch forward rather, like the dames in Charles the Second's time. You look very charmingly on Roulstone's well-broken and well-trained horses, but take not your pleasure at the expense of the bright complexions which we admire. "Sun-burnt," in old English, was an epithet of contumely, and let alone the sun.

"The chariest maid is prodigal enough,
If she unveil her beauty to the moon,"

We have been paid for letting the world know a great many things that were of no consequence to the world whatever—and, among other nothings, a certain metropolophobia of our own, on which we have expended a great deal of choice grammar and punctuation. We trust the world believes, by this, that, capable as we are of loving our entire species (one at a time), we hate a city collectively. Having a little moan to make, with a little moral at the close, we put this private prejudice once more into type, trusting to your indulgence, good reader.

This is June—and "where are you going this summer?" though a pertinent question enough, and seasonable, and just what anybody says to everybody he meets, has to our ear a little offence in it. If it were asked for information—a la bonne heure!—we are willing to tell any friend where we are going—this side the Styx. But though the question (asked with most affectionate earnestness by your friend) is merely a preface to enlightening you as to his own "watering-place," there must still be an answer! And suppose that answer, though not a whit attended to, touches upon your secret sorrow—your deucestobed bore! Suppose—but you see our drift! You understand, that we are to sweat out the summer solstice within the "bills of mortality!" You see that we are to comfort our bucolic nostrils as we best may, with municipal grass—picking here and there a clover-top or an aggravating dandelion 'twixt postoffice and city-hall. Heaven help us!

True, New York is "open at the top." We are prepared to be thankful for what comes down to us—air, light, and dew. But alas! Earth is our mother!—Earth, who sends all her blessings upward—Earth, who, in the city, is stoned over and hammered down, paved, flagged, suffocated—her natural breath quite cut off, or driven to escape by drain and gas-pipe—her flowers and herbs prevented—her springs shut down from gushing! This arid pavement, this hot smell of dust, this brick-color and paint—what are they to the fragrant lap of our overlaid mother, with her drapery of bright colors and tender green? Answer, oh omnibus-horse! Answer, oh worky-editor!

But there be alleviations! It is to these that hangs "the moral of our tale." We presume most men think themselves more worthy than "sparrows" of the attention of Providence, and of course most men believe in a special Providence for themselves. We do. We believe that we shall not "fall to the ground without" (a) "notice." (But this, let us hope, is anticipating.) We wish to speak now of the succedaneum thrown in our path for our pastoral deprivations—for the lost brook whose babbling current turned the wheel of our idleness. Sweet brook, that never robbed the pebbles of a ray of light in running over them! It became a type to us—that brook. Our thoughts ran brook-wise. Bright water, braiding its ripples as its ran, became our vehicle of fancy. We lagged, we dragged, we were "gravelled for lack of matter" without it. And now mark!—Providence has supplied it—(through his honor the mayor). A brook—a clear brook—not pellucid, merely, but transparent—a brook with a song, tripping as musically (when the carts are not going by) as the beloved brook now sequestered to the Philistines—trips daily before us! Our daily walk is along its border—for (say) a rod and a half. Meet us there if you will, oh congenial spirit! As we go to the postoffice, we span its fair current at the broadest, and take a fillip in our fancy for the day. Would you know its geography more definitely? Stand on the steps of the Astor, and gaze over to the sign of "P. Pussedu, wig-maker, from Italy." Drop then the divining-rod to the left, and a much frequented pump will become apparent, perched over a projecting curb-stone, around which the dancing and bright water trips with sparkling feet, and a murmur audible at least to itself. It is the outlet of the fountain in the Park, and, as Wordsworth says,

"Parching summer hath no warrant
To consume this crystal well," as an order is first necessary from the corporation.

Oh! (if it were not for being taken to the watch-house) we could sit by this brook in the moonlight, and pour forth our melancholy moan! But the cabmen wash their wheels in it now, and the echo would be, "Want a cab, sir?" Metropolises, avant!

Lady Sale's Journal of the Disasters in Afghanistan impresses us somewhat with the idea that her ladyship was a Tartar; and she was, perhaps, as "well bestowed" in the army as anywhere else, in a world so generally peaceful. It is a roughly-written book, too, in point of style. Indeed she avows: "I do not attempt to shine in rounded periods, but give everything that occurs as it comes to my knowledge." It appears, however, that some injustice to officers, committed, as she acknowledges, "in the heat of temper," have awakened a little censure in England, and have been apologized for by her ladyship. This allowed, there is much to admire—her manly modesty, among other things. Toward the close of her journal, she remarks: "Nothing can exceed the folly I have seen in the papers regarding my wonderful self—how I headed the troops, &c. Certainly I have headed the troops, for the chiefs told me to come on with them for safety sake; and thus I certainly did go far in advance of the column; but it was no proof of valor, though one of prudence." We can readily believe that the qualities which gained her ladyship such general admiration, were not of a showy order. As a "soldier's wife," the title she gives herself, she esteemed it her duty to take her part in danger, hardship, and captivity, without complaint—to oppose a brave resistance to the foe when others thought only of base submission, and to set an example of invincible fortitude to the host of meaner spirits in the camp. In the extremity of peril and suffering she never murmurs, except when the weakness of the commanders wrings from her some expression of disgust and contempt. Of all the persons attached to the army, she had the most real cause of alarm, yet manifested the least. Unlike the other ladies, she was separated from her husband, and heard continually of his battles, his exposure, his wounds. Her son-in-law dies in her arms, and she is left with her widowed daughter in the hands of a band of merciless savages, without one male relative to support her. She is harassed by continual marches in the depth of winter among mountain passes, where the path is so thickly strewn with the mangled corpses of her countrymen, that the hoofs of her horse tread them into the earth; yet these multiplied ills fail to quell her spirits or conquer her presence of mind. A bullet pierces her arm; but when the ball is extracted, she treats the wound as a scratch. This kind of fortitude is the only courage which appears estimable or becoming in a woman, and shines with as much lustre in the conduct of Lady Sale throughout those trying transactions, as in any character of which history makes mention. It is scarcely necessary to add, that few books published of late years have such strong claims upon the attention of the public as the present. The author evidently does not desire display; but her courage and magnanimity will secure, in the annals of heroic women, a foremost place for the name of FLOR-ENTINE SALE.

Porcelain and crockery, champagne and cider, sunshine and candlelight, silver cup and tin dipper, are not of more different quality to our apprehension, than people beautiful and people plain. We do not believe they are to have the same destiny. We believe that the plain and the beautiful are to be reproduced in their own likeness in another world, and that beauty must be paramount alike among men and angels. We believe everything should be given to beauty that beauty wants—everything forgiven if beauty err. We have no limit to our service of beauty—no imaginable bound to our devotion. We are secondary—subject—born thrall to beauty. And in this faith we shall die.

But beauty in America is a very differently prized commodity from beauty in England. Let us keep clear of making an essay of this, and show what we mean by parallel examples. Take two beautiful girls, of the same comparative station—Miss Smith, of London, daughter of a master-in-chancery, and Miss Brown, of New York, daughter of a master-carpenter:—for the former gentleman is about as far below an earl as the latter is below any aristocrat of New York, supposed or acknowledged.

Miss Brown, of the Bowery, is a lovely creature. She excites curiosity in Broadway. She hinders devotion, right and left, when she turns round in church. In the best society of New York there is not a prettier girl, and nature has made her elegant in her manners, and education has done as much for her as was at all necessary. Her father delights in her beauty, and her mother is very proud of her, and she carries her heart in her bosom to do what she pleases with it—but neither Mr. Brown, nor Mrs. Brown, nor Miss Brown, ever dream that her beauty will advance their condition in life one peg. They love her for it—she controls the family by it—she exercises influence as a belle in their own circle of acquaintance—but that is all. She lives a very gay and pleasant life, hears of balls in more fashionable parts of the town without dreaming that, for her beauty, she should be there, and continues a Bowery belle till she marries a Bowery beau. And beauty, once married, in that class of our country, is like a pair of shoes once sold—never inquired for again.

Miss Smith, of London, is a superb girl. Her father was of dark complexion and her mother a blonde; and jet and pearl have done their daintiest in her dark eyes and radiant skin. At twelve she is considered a beauty past accident. Her sisters, who were either "all father" or "all mother," grimy dark, or parsnip blonde, are married off to such husbands as would undertake them. But for the youngest there is a different destiny—for she is a beauty. The father wishes for advancement and a title. The mother wishes to figure in high life before she dies. And Miss Smith, young as she is, is taught the difference between a plain young lord in a cab and a handsome lawyer's clerk with a green bag. Beauty, well managed, may be made to open every door in England. Masters—the best of masters for Miss Smith! More money is spent in "finishing" her than was given to all her sisters for dowries. She is permitted to form few acquaintances of her own sex, none of the other. And when Miss Smith is sixteen, Mrs. Smith makes her first strong push at Lady Frippery (for Mr. Smith has put Lord Frippery under obligations, which make it inevitable that the first favor asked should be granted), and out comes Miss Smith, chaperoned by Lady Frippery at a mixed subscription ball. It is for the benefit of the Poles, and the liberal nobility are all there; and all the beaux of St. James's street, of course, for they like to see what novelty will turn up in such places. One hour after the ball opens, Miss Smith's beauty has been pronounced upon by half the noble eyes of London, and Lady Frippery is assailed for introductions. The beauty turns out high-bred. Lord George and Lord Frederick torment their Right Honorable mammas into calling on Mrs. Smith, and having the beauty at their next ball; and so climbs Miss Smith to a stratum of society unattainable by her father's law or her mother's wealth, or anything in the world but beauty. She is carefully watched, keeps herself chary, and by-and-by chooses between Lord Frederick and Lord George, and elevates her whole family by an alliance with the peerage—for in England there is no mésalliance if the lady descended to be of great beauty, as well as virtuous, modest, and well educated.

But—as we would show by these examples—personal beauty is undervalued in America. At least, it is less valued than in England and older countries. An eminent English artist, recently returned home, expressed his surprise that he had so few beauties among his sitters. "The motive to have a miniature done," said he, "seems, in America, to be affection. In England it is pride. Most of my sitters" (and he had a great many at a very high price) "have been old people or invalids, or persons going away; and though they wished their pictures made as good-looking as possible, their claim to good looks was no part of the reason for sitting. It was only to perpetuate that which was loved and would soon be lost."

Pray take notice, madam, that we give no opinion as to the desirableness of the English value of beauty. Whether beauty and worldly profit should be kept separate, like church and state—whether it is desecrated by aiding the uses of ambition—whether it should be the loadstar of affection or pride—we leave with you as an open question.

We know nothing of a more restless tendency than a fine, old-fashioned June day—one that begins with a morning damp with a fresh south wind, and gradually clears away in a thin white mist, till the sun shines through at last, genial and luxurious, but not sultry, and everything looks clear and bright in the transparent atmosphere. We know nothing which so seduces the very eye and spirit of a man, and stirs in him that gipsy longing, which, spite of disgrace and punishment, made him a truant in his boyhood. There is an expansive rarity in the air of such a day—a something that lifts up the lungs, and plays in the nostrils with a delicious sensation of freshness and elasticity. The close room grows sadly dull under it. The half-open blind, with its tempting glimpse of the sky, and branch of idle leaves flickering in the sun, has a strange witchery. The poor pursuits of this drossy world grow passing insignificant; and the scrawled and blotted manuscripts of an editor's table—pleasant anodyne as they are when the wind is in the east—are, at these seasons, but the "Diary of an Ennuyee"—the notched calendar of confinement and unrest. The commendatory sentence stands half-completed; the fate of the author under review, with his two volumes, is altogether of less importance than five minutes of the life of that tame pigeon that sits on the eaves washing his white breast in the spout; and the public good-will, and the cause of literature, and our own precarious livelihood, all fade into dim shadow, and leave us listening dreamily to the creeping of the sweet south upon the vine, or the far-off rattle of the hourly, with its freight of happy bowlers and gentlemen of suburban idleness.

What is it to us, when the sun is shining, and the winds bland and balmy, and the moist roads with their fresh smell of earth tempting us away to the hills—what is it, then, to us, whether a poor-devil-author has a flaw in his style, or our own leading article a "local habitation and a name?" Are we to thrust down our heart like a reptile into its cage, and close our shutter to the cheerful light, and our ear to all sounds of out-door happiness? Are we to smother our uneasy impulses, and chain ourselves down to a poor, dry thought, that has neither light, nor music, nor any spell in it, save the poor necessity of occupation? Shall we forget the turn in the green lane where we are wont to loiter in our drive, and the cool claret of our friend at the Hermitage, and the glorious golden summer sunset in which we bowl away to the city—musing and refreshed? Alas—yes! the heart must be closed, and the green lane and the friend that is happier than we (for he is idle) must be forgotten, and the dry thought must be dragged up like a wilful steer and yoked to its fellow, and the magnificent sunset, with all its glorious dreams and forgetful happiness, must be seen in the pauses of articles, and the “bleared een” of painful attention—and all this in June—prodigal June—when the very worm is all day out in the sun, and the birds scarce stop their singing from the gray light to the dewfall!

What an insufferable state of the thermometer! We knock under to Heraclitus, that fire is the first principle of all things. Fahrenheit at one hundred degrees in the shade! Our curtain in the attic unstirred! Our japonica drooping its great white flowers lower and lower. It is a fair scene, indeed! not a ripple from the pier to the castle, and the surface of the water, as Shelley says, “like a plane of glass spread out between two heavens”—and there is a solitary sloop, with the light and shade flickering on its loose sail, positively hung in the air—and a gull, it is refreshing to see him, keeping down with his white wings close to the water, as if to meet his own snowy and perfect shadow. Was ever such intense, unmitigated sunshine? There is nothing on the hard, opaque sky, but a mere rag of a cloud, like a handkerchief on a tablet of blue marble, and the edge of the shadow of that tall chimney is as definite as a hair, and the young elm that leans over the fence is copied in perfect and motionless leaves like a very painting on the broad sidewalk. How delightful the night will be after such a deluge of light! How beautiful the modest rays of the starlight, and the cool dark blue of the heavens will seem after the dazzling clearness of this sultry noon! It reminds one of that exquisite passage in Thalaba, where the spirit-bird comes, when his eyes are blinded with the intense brightness of the snow, and spreads her green wings before him!

I went to the Opera last night for the first time. The theatre was filled half an hour before the rising of the curtain, and with a very fashionable audience. The ladies had not quite made up their minds whether it was a full-dress affair, but the pit and boxes had a very paré look. The neighborhood of the orchestra, particularly, looked very Parisian and dressy, as the French beaux (whose heads are distinguishable from Yankee heads by their soigné trimness and polish) crystallize to the beau-nucleus of foreign theatres—the stalles between stage and pit! One of the drop-curtains was a view of Paris; and the principal curtain, though representing, I believe, the Croton reservoirs, had a foreground of figures such as are never to be seen on this side of the Atlantic.

The opera was “L'Ambassadeur, by Auber,” and the orchestra played the overture with a spirit and finish of execution which was quite enchanting. It was much the highest treat in music which I have yet had in this country. The story of the opera has been the rounds of the papers—an actress marrying an ambassador, trying the mortifications and vexations of sudden elevation to high-life, and returning to her profession. As a play, it was very indifferently performed, with the exception only of the part of the duenna by Madame Mathieu. As an actress of comedy (if I may judge after seeing her once) we have no one in our theatres at all comparable to this lady. Madame Lecourt was next best, and the rest, as players, were not worth criticising. As an opera, the music rested entirely on the orchestra and the prima donna, the tenor being good for nothing, and the rest mere stopgaps. The great attraction put forward in the advertisements was Mademoiselle Calvé, the prima donna, and, seeing and hearing her over such very large capitals, I was somewhat disappointed. Mademoiselle Calvé has had a very narrow escape of being a remarkably pretty person. Indeed, filled out to her model—plump as Nature intended her to be—she would be very handsome; and to be what every young Frenchwoman is, is far on the road to beauty—grace and manner, which are common to them all, having so much to do with the effect of the celestial gift. But though she trips charmingly across the stage, gives charming glances, dresses charmingly, and would probably be a very charming acquaintance, she is an inanimate and inexpressive actress. When, for example, she discovers suddenly that her old lover is in her presence (she becomes a dutchess and he still in his profession as first tenor), she exclaims, “Benedict!” as quietly as if she were calling her brother to bring her a chair. There is no interest in her acting—far less any enthusiasm or passion. She sings, however, with great sweetness and correctness, and, if she were not over-advertised, she would probably surprise most persons agreeably. After all, she is a great acquisition to the amusements of the city, and I hope, for one, that she and the “troop” may find it worth their while to do pendulum regularly between this and New Orleans.

Niblo's Garden opened last week for the season, and to compare it to “a scene of enchantment” would be doing great injustice to its things to drink. I specify this because public gardens are commonly very slipslop in what they term their “refreshments,” and (as it was a very exhausting night for the bodily juices) we had an opportunity of testing the quality of ices and “coblers.” This aside, there is a great deal about Niblo's, probably, that is very like enchantment. The ticket (price fifty cents) admits you to a brilliantly-illuminated hall, opening on one side to a delicious conservatory full of the rarest plants, and on the other to a labyrinthine garden glittering with lights and flowers; large mirrors at either end of the hall make it look interminable, and the walks are so ingeniously twisted around fountains and shrubberies, as to seem interminable too; and in the immense hall of refreshment there is a bifrons bar, which effectually embarrasses you as to the geography of your julep—all very mystical and stimulative. Thus far, however, it is only tributary to the French theatre, which is completely open on one side to the garden, with half the audience out of doors, and the lobby as cool and summery as a garden-alley. Between the acts the audience go out and air and ice themselves, and a resounding gong gives notice to the stragglers in the labyrinths that the curtain is rising. I have seen no public place so well appointed as this—waiters badged and numbered—seats commodious, and service prompt—and, above all, a very strict watch at the door for the exclusion of miscellany.

The play was “Le Vicomte de Peturieres”—a kind of Frenchification of Don Juan. The young vaurien was played by Madame Lecourt, and played with a charm of talent and vivacity for which her personification of Charlotte, in “L'Ambassadeur,” had not prepared me. She is the very soul of witching espionnerie, and made love and did mischief in her hose and doublet to the perfect delight of the audience. The other members of the French company have very much improved on the public liking since their first appearance, and, with more or less excellence, they all belong to a good school of acting. The prima donna, Mademoiselle Calvé, is too ill to appear.

One likes to see every best thing of its kind in the world, and never having been present at any of the Fashion's races, I took a cold ride to Long Island to see her gallop over the course. On the way I picked up some of the statistics of milk, from a communicative fellow-passenger "who knew," and it may or may not surprise you to know that there are three qualities in this supposed innocent simple of nature. There is milk—milk once watered, and milk twice watered; and sold as such, with three prices, by the owners of the dairies, to the venders in the city. A friend of my companion is a dairyman, he told me, and supplies the American hotel with milk No. 1, at a high price; so that in the milk line, at least, we may certify that Mr. Cozzens cozens us not. Unluckily for the Long Island cowmongers, the long arm of the Erie railroad has taken to milking Orange county for the New York market, and the profits of milk and water have very much diminished with the competition.

It was the great day of the Union races, but the course presented a very dreary sight. There were just people enough to make solitude visible, and the "timer" in the stand looked as bleak as a bell-ringer setting the clock on a cold day in a country belfry. Here and there one of the jockey-club walked about with his blue badge forlorn in his buttonhole, and here and there an unhappy-looking pie-seller set down his full baskets to blow his fingers; and there were a few sporting trotters in sulkies, and two turnouts such as are common at races, and a wight or two like myself wondering who enjoyed the "sport" except the riders. All of a sudden a single horse was discovered half round the course, and before I could find out what it was, Fashion had made one of her two-hundred-dollar rounds. To take the eight hundred (uncontested sweepstakes), she was obliged to go around four times, and I had a good opportunity to see her movement. She is smaller than I expected, and runs less like a horse and more like a greyhound than any racer I have seen. Sorrel is a color I dislike in beard or horsehair, and her complexion suited me not; but, in make, action, and particularly in expression of face, Fashion is an admirable creature. Of course it takes a sporting-eye to admire the tension of muscle in high training, and the queen of the course would be a better model for a sculptor after a month's grass; but she is a beautiful sight, and even with the little I have seen of her, I should know her again among a thousand horses—so marked is superiority, in horse or man.

The other races were nothing very extraordinary. I started for home, cold and sorry. On the road our jarvey stopped to "water horses and liquor passengers," and I got sight of a dance calculated to soften my next criticism of the Park ballet. A ferret-eyed fiddler struck up a tune, and an old farmer with gray hairs and one "hermit tooth," jumped into the middle of the barroom and commenced a jig. As the spring of his instep had gone with his teeth, he did the work on his unmitigated heels, and a more sturdy performance I never saw. He danced in greatcoat and hat, with whip in hand, and, after ending his dance by jumping up into a chair and dropping down from it like a pavior's beetle, he paid for amusing the spectators (and this was not à la Fanny the "divine") by giving the fiddler half a dollar. With a look round at the company, and an inquiry whether anybody would like "something wet," he took his drink and got into his wagon. This is one man's taste in a flare-up.

There is a great change in the "surface of society" within the last two days—straw and white hats having become nearly universal. As we are a nation of black coats (the English call Broadway a procession of undertakers), this somewhat brightens up the superficial aspect of the city. Summer came upon us with a jump out of a raw easterly fog, and what with the lack of premonition, and the natural incredulity of flannel waistcoats, people went about yesterday clad for cold weather and looking uncomfortably hot. Today the surprised clouds are gathering for a thunder-storm.

I see by the papers that the snow prophesied for June by Lorenzo Dow, has fallen in several parts of the country. The other two horns of his triple prophesy for June, 1843, have also come true, for there is "no king in England," and "no president over the United States"—strictly speaking.

I quite longed yesterday for a magnetic eye, to look into the heads of two or three Chinese who were let loose in the vestibule of the Astor, newly landed from a Canton trader. Their "first impressions" of New York, fully daguerreotyped, would be amusing. I understand they have come over in the suite of the Rev. Mr. Boone, missionary from Kulan-sa (wherever that is).

During the summer solstice, the guests at the gentleman's ordinary at the Astor are to be furnished with linen jackets to dine in—one on the back of every chair, "without respect of (the size of) persons." I am told privately that half the expense of these airy furnishings is borne by the venders of fancy suspenders, as it is presumed that no gentleman will be willing to "shift himself" before company who is not daintily provided in this line.

Fond, as we are reproached with being, of foreigners in the ornamental walks of society, I observe, by the general tenor of advertisements, that we prefer the indigenous worky. "Wanted," says an advertiser in the True Sun, "a smart American woman who can go right through with the work of a small religious family." Vague as this specification would seem to an English eye, the advertiser's want is most definitely expressed to an American.

You will have seen with regret the accounts of the sudden death of Mr. Abbott—one of the few remaining actors of the Kemble school. He was, in private life, one of the most agreeable and cultivated of men, and is deeply regretted. I understand that his widow is entitled to a pension from the Theatrical Fund of London, of about seven hundred dollars per annum. She was married to him a few months since—a Miss Buloid of the Park theatre. Abbott is said to have been, in his youth, one of the gay associates of the Prince of Wales.

The Broughams have returned from Boston, and commenced an engagement at the Park Theatre. We are likely to have no more theatrical importations for some time, I think, the late declension of the drama having somewhat damped the repute in London of American starrng. Actors coming out, now, require an advance, and an insurance of a certain degree of success, and this our managers are not in a condition to pay. The sufferers by theatrical depression in this country are the actors, who do not get their money unless they draw it. In England the manager must pay his company, by the law of rigorous usage, and he is the sufferer till his theatre closes.

Booth has been playing wonderfully well at the Park of late, and I understand that the pretty Mrs. Hunt has been cast in one or two new characters, which have drawn out her abilities, very much to the pleasure and surprise of the theatre-goers.

Broadway has a very holiday aspect now from the competition in the splendor of omnibuses. Several new ones of mammoth size have been turned out, drawn by four and six horses, and painted in the gayest colors. The handsomest one I have seen is called "The Edwin Forrest."

The Scotch, who have formed themselves into a military company, and dress in the uniform of the highland regiments of the British army, came out yesterday in philebig and tartan, making a most imposing and gallant appearance. The bare legs looked rather cool in Broadway, but nature suits the animal to his native climate, and Scotch legs are very comfortably hairy. I observed that a physician, with no distinctive dress except a plaid scarf over his shoulder, walked with the lieutenant—ready for ministering to any member of the corps who might find the exposure unsalutary. He should be skilled in curing rheumatism, I should say. Apropos of adaptations of the physiological features to climate, it is said, I know not with how much truth, that there are islands north of Great Britain where the females are web-footed. Hence, perhaps, Grace Darling's heroic self-confidence on the water.

New York is all alive with a new musical prodigy—Mr. Wallace. There is no doubt that he is so far the best pianist we have ever heard in this country, as to dwarf all others in comparison. The musical people all allow this with enthusiasm. As a violinist, those who should know say he is equal to Paganini. I have not heard him, but I understand he is a most unconscious man of genius, very eccentric, and is on his way back to Ireland, after having traversed South and North America on foot. His pedestrian and musical passions are strangely compounded. He has set to a magnificent air a national anthem, which has been sung by the class under the direction of Mr. George Loder, of this city, with immense effect. In this anthem Mr. Wallace has made a remarkable contribution to the musical stores of this country.

Editors have a very sublime way of lumping Europe, Asia, Africa, and America, and under the diminished monosyllable of the "world," spanning it with their reflections as they would shade an ant-hill with an umbrella. We tell you with becoming coolness what the "gay world" is about, viz.: that a few families up-town have taken to giving matinées. By the "pious world," we convey the Broadway Tabernacle—by the "mercantile world," Wall street or Pearl. The English have become tired of the phrase, and call the world "Mrs. Grundy." What will be said about anything, anywhere between the antipodes, is, "what will Mrs. Grundy say?" And we like this—(as we like anything which aggrandizes the editorial individual)—only there is the little inconvenience, that when we wish to speak of the world, as defined in the dictionary, we are subjected to a periphrasis which cumbers our style, or we have to explain that we really mean Europe, Asia, Africa, and America.

The world is getting on—wrote we at the head of this article, and scratched it out again till we had made a comment on the phrase. We were going into a little disquisition on the evident approach of a new order of things under the sun, as shown by wonderful changes and discoveries all over the world—apropos, however, of a very interesting book which has just fallen into our hands, and of which we wish to give the essence to the reader, in brief. We will omit the disquisition on the approach of the millenium (to write which, to say the truth, we sat down this morning), for the weather is too hot, on second thoughts, to do more than allude to a subject connected with a general conflagration. Let us come at once to the book in question.

Elevation by hemp has been considered a sovereign remedy for low spirits, and indeed for most of the intolerable evils of life—subject, however, to the drawback that the remedy could be used but once. Will our readers believe that this drawback is entirely removed by a late discovery?

Intoxication has been long known to be a state of very considerable happiness, subject to a "tariff which amounts to a prohibition," viz.: complete destruction of the physical man by the residuum. Will the reader believe that, by this same discovery, the residuous penalty is removed?

By the same discovery, the hydrophobia is changed to a death of physical pleasure—acute and chronic rheumatism are first modified into ecstasy, then cured—a "persuasion of high rank" is engendered in the bosom of the humblest, a "feeling as if flying" is communicated to the dulllest and most plethoric. And all this with no penalty, no subsequent physical prostration, none of the long train of evils which, till now, have been the inseparable pursuers of intoxication.

In telling our readers thus much, we have given them the butt-end of one of the most curious subjects we have for a long time been called upon to handle. What we have said is far from a joke. A drug has been discovered by the English in India, which has these wonderful properties; and the mode in which it is gathered, which we will tell with the same butt-endity, is as novel as the drug. "Men clad in leathern dresses run through the fields, brushing through the plant with all possible violence; the soft resin adheres to the leather, and is subsequently scraped off, and kneaded into balls. In Nipal the leathern attire is dispensed with, and the resin is gathered on the skins of naked natives."

The plant from which this extraordinary drug is extracted, is Indian hemp; differing from the hemp of this and other northern countries only by the presence of this narcotic stimulant. There are several preparations of it—one for smoking, one for sweetmeats, and others for beverages and medical compounds—but the effects are, with slight variations, the same. "From the beverage, intoxication ensues in half an hour. The inebriation is of the most cheerful kind, causing the person to sing and dance, to eat food with great relish. The intoxication lasts about three hours, when sleep supervenes. No nausea or sickness of the stomach succeeds, nor are the bowels at all affected."

The preparation for smoking is called gunjah, the confection is called majoon, and the resin is called churrus. Gunjah is used for smoking only. One hundred and eighty grains, and a little dried tobacco, are rubbed in the palm of the hand, with a few drops of water. This suffices for three persons. A little tobacco is placed in the pipe first, then a layer of the prepared gunjah, then more tobacco, and the fire above all.

Four or five persons usually join in this debauch. The hookah is passed round, and each person takes a single draught. Intoxication ensues almost instantly; and from one draught to the unaccustomed, within half an hour; and after four or five inspirations to those more practised in the vice. The effects differ from those occasioned by the sidhee. Heaviness, laziness, and agreeable reveries, ensue; but the person can be readily roused, and is able to discharge routine occupations, such as pulling the punkah, waiting at table, &c. We add the following passages from the treatise:—

"The fourth case of trial was an old muscular coolie, a rheumatic malingerer, and to him half a grain of hemp resin was given in a little spirit. The first day's report will suffice for all: In two hours the old gentleman became talkative and musical, told several stories, and sang songs to a circle of highly-delegated auditors, ate the dinners of two persons subscribed for him in the ward, sought also for other luxuries we can scarcely venture to allude to, and finally fell soundly asleep, and so continued till the following morning. On the noonday visit, he expressed himself free from headache or any other unpleasant sequel, and begged hard for a repetition of the medicine, in which he was indulged for a few days and then discharged.

"While the preceding case was under treatment, and exciting the utmost interest in the school, several pupils commenced experiments on themselves to ascertain the effects of the drug. In all, the state of the pulse was noted before taking a dose, and subsequently the effects were observed by two pupils of much intelligence. The result of several trials was, that in as small doses as a quarter of a grain the pulse was increased in fullness and frequency; the surface of the body glowed; the appetite became extraordinary; vivid ideas crowded the mind; unusual loquacity occurred; and, with scarcely any exception, great aphrodisia was experienced.

"In one pupil, Dinonath Dhur, a retiring lad of excellent habits, ten drops of the tincture, equal to a quarter of a grain of the resin, induced in twenty minutes the most amusing effects I ever witnessed. A shout of laughter ushered in the symptoms, and a transitory state of cataleptic rigidity occurred for two or three minutes. Summoned to witness the effects, we found him enacting the part of a rajah giving orders to his courtiers. He could recognise none of his fellow-students or acquaintances; all, to his mind, seemed as altered as his own condition. He spoke of many years having passed since his student's days; described his teachers and friends with a piquancy which a dramatist would envy; detailed the adventures of an imaginary series of years, his travels, his attainment of wealth and power. He entered on discussions on religious, scientific, and political topics, with astonishing eloquence, and disclosed an extent of knowledge, reading, and a ready, apposite wit, which those who knew him best were altogether unprepared for. For three hours, and upward, he maintained the character he at first assumed, and with a degree of ease and dignity perfectly becoming his high situation. A scene more interesting, it would be difficult to imagine. It terminated nearly as suddenly as it commenced, and no headache, sickness, or other unpleasant symptom, followed the innocent excess."

The treatise on this subject, from which we have made the foregoing extracts, is a reprint from the Transactions of the Medical Society of Calcutta, and written by a surgeon in the Bengal army, Mr. O'Shaughnessy, now in this country. It is, as our readers will have seen by the extracts, a very able treatise; and the experiments, of which we had only room to quote here and there an exponent passage, are described with most lucid clearness. We may refer to this interesting topic again.

On the day the president arrived, the be-windowed houses of New York seemed to have none too many windows, and if all the men on the tiles had been Tyler men, the president's party might for once have been declared formidably uppermost. We know several things since Mr. Tyler's visit: how many people roofs will hold; how many heads can look out of one window; for how little ladies will wave their pocket-handkerchiefs; "what swells the soldier's warlike breast" (or, rather, what becomes of all the cotton); how much extra horse hair it takes to make a dragon; how unanimous a prayer may be put up by four hundred thousand people, for the cutting of the hair of a "prince royal;" how the devils may be cast out of a barouche and four, commonly used to take frailty to the races, and how a chief magistrate and his suite may innocently enter in; how gayly a city may be dressed with flags, partly for the president of fifteen millions of freemen, and partly for the "fat girl" of the museum; what endurance of horses' hoofs lies in the toes of female "freemen;" and how long and far, at a "sink-a-pace," will last the smile of Mr. Tyler.

I presume the entire sanitary and locomotive population of New York turned out to the show, and a very fine show it was altogether. The military companies would alone have made a sight worth coming far to see, for (by the measurement on Broadway) their brilliant uniforms cover a mile and a half—an expanse of tailoring (with the exception of the trouserless Highlanders) that should make politicians deal kindly with "cross-legs." I remarked, by the way, that, though all the officers of the companies are not fat men, all the fat men among them are officers—a tribute to avoirdupois which should delight the ghost of Sir John Falstaff, spite of his "give me the spare men, and spare me the great ones." I saw one of the plethoric captains rubbing the calf of his leg, after his march of five or six miles over the round stones, and I presume he might have said to the "prince royal," as Sir John did at Gadshill, "S'blood! I'll not bear mine own flesh as far afoot again, for all the coin in thy father's exchequer."

Some English friends who were with me, expressed continual wonder at the total absence of raggedness or poverty in the dress of the populace. We can hardly realize how striking is this feature of our country to the eye of a European. They were a good deal amused, too, with the republican license given to a fellow on horseback, either drunk or saucy, who chose to ride in the staff of one of the generals with his coat off, and with the good-nature and forbearance manifested by the crowd in their occasional resistings of the encroachments of mounted constables.

I was told that not only the president, but his friends and suite, were exceedingly surprised at the reception given him. It was certainly, in every way, calculated to show the honor paid by the people to the office of the chief magistrate; and Mr. Tyler can not but feel, that while hedged in with the dignity of his office, he is an object of interest and attention with which mere politics could have but little to do.

The president having got through with the weather of New York, it was at liberty to rain next day, and it rained. The clouds parenthesised his visit, laying the dust the night before he arrived, and holding up till the night after his departure. I presume it did not rain in Boston next morning—King Lucky having occasion for a dry day. I have heard of but one partial exception to the accurate culmination of the Tyler star. The officer in command on the Battery, finding that he could not see through the walls of Castle Garden, requested to have a flag raised, or some other sign given, to make the movement for the salute, when the president should land. "Oh!" said the marshal, "you needn't bother about that. You'll know by the cheers." The cheers not being audible, however, the artillery rather "hung fire," letting off their congratulatory welcome as the president landed—from the high flight of his oration. He had been landed from the steamboat some time before! Perhaps the congratulation was well timed, and so, very likely, his star (which must be a planet) intended to plan it. A man should be felicitated when he touches terra firma once more, after most public speeches.

There seems to be a finger pointing the way, even in the picking of flowers by the wayside, for his happy "Accidency." Some pleasurable surprise has been expressed at the careful zeal with which the president kissed the ladies twice round on several occasions, where a limited number had been introduced to him. I was at a loss to know how a man, bred in a state distinguished for the deferential proprieties, should have jumped, ready-armed, to such an act of popularity, when a visit to the presidential parlor at Howard's explained the "starry influence." A French painting, with figures of the size of life, representing

Don Juan giving Haidee a most realizing kiss, had been introduced into the apartment by the sumptuary committee! There it stood, a silent indication to thought during his hours of reverie, and as the mystic intimation occupied, frame and all, one entire wall of the room, the lesson was inevitable. Sequitur—the above-mentioned liberal dispensation of kisses.

I am told that a game of chess is child's play to the diplomacy at work, during the president's visit, for the control of his movements. Office-seekers and office-holders, "authorities," private friends, Spartans, repealers, whigs, and locofocos, tugged at his ear and button continually. I trust, if he is fond of contrast, that his ex-excellency will try a second first impression of New York a year or two hence.

The president's departure was most felicitous as to weather—the loveliness of the sunset, and the beauty of the bay, making up for him the finest of background effects. Some hundreds of people were on the Battery, and the steamboat-wharf was crowded with spectators. As the boat started, the crews of the men-of-war ran up the rigging like disturbed ants, and saluted her as she passed with three cheers. He went out of the harbor with relays of "Hail Columbia," the band on board the boat beginning with it, and the two ships taking it up as he went along. So Columbia is decidedly hailed—if it will do it any good!

I saw an amusing resurrection of a horse yesterday. One of the military companies were marching gayly down the street on their way to embark for Boston, when a blind horse in a swill-cart, whose calamity was forgotten for the instant by his occupied master, walked deliberately into one of the Croton excavations. The harness was just strong enough to break his fall, the cart was left above ground, and he stood on the bottom, as comfortably out of the way as "truth in a well." The driver was a man for an emergency, and, indeed, acted so much as if it was "part of the play," that a Chinese traveller would probably have recorded it as a melo-dramatic accompaniment to the show. He took off his coat very quietly, picked up one of the shovels of the absent workmen, and commenced filling up the ditch. The loose dirt went in very fast, and the horse, with an instinct against being buried alive, rose with the surface. From being some inches below the pavement, his head was getting above ground when I left him; and as the old man was still piling on very industriously, I presume he soon had him once more at the level of cock-crowing.

There have been various definitions of "a gentleman," but the prettiest and most poetic is that given by a young lady of this city the other day: "A gentleman," said she, "is a human being, combining a woman's tenderness with a man's courage."

"Cheap literature" is shaking in its shoes. I understand the publishers "see the expediency" of making their editions more costly, and accommodating them to the smaller sales. The great American man is surfeited with "new novels" at last. I trust that booksellers and authors will now become slightly acquainted.

What shall it be? If we understand you rightly, you would prefer on this last page, some well-contrived nonsense—to wind off trippingly, as it were. Wisdom is respectable. Pictures, poetry, prose, pathos, and puffery, are all very well—but after being instructed, you wish to be let out of school. Is that it?

Something about "town," of course. Folly lives here, all the year round. Fashion is exclusively urban. And when we have mentioned these two, we have named the persons in our acquaintance about whom there is, by much, the liveliest curiosity. What

Folly is doing in town, and what is the last antic of Fashion, are departments of news that are read before the deaths and marriages—"as nobody can deny." Fashion be our theme, then, "for the nonce." We would devote this page to it eternally, if we dared. That we should please you by so doing, we very well know. But the owl is the king of types, and wisdom has, of print, a chartered monopoly—hang her!

Well, madam, the fashions. Let us begin at the small end of the horn, and touch first upon the cockery sex—winding off with the china and porcelain.

The gentlemen, who had been previously let up, have been lately let down. Straps were abandoned by the cognoscenti last autumn—with the first "slosh." Suspenders were abandoned with the first intimation of the present summer solstice. There is at present no unnatural restraint upon trousers. They are prevented from coming up by their natural gravity—from coming down by being "caught on the hip." Shoulders are emancipated from the caprices of genuflection. The hollow of the foot suffers no longer from the shrug of incredulity. The nether man, in short, is free, sovereign, and independent.

Among the advantages of this revolution is the cleanly circumstance that the boot, in its nightly exit, is no longer compelled to make a thoroughfare of the leg of the pantaloons. This is an "inexpressible" relief. Buttons, also, are subjected no longer to the severe trials of stooping. Boots, unhappily, can no longer conceal their "often infirmities"—high polish and indifference to surprise and exposure being indispensable accompaniments to their present loose associations. As an offset to the expensiveness of this, the pantaloons themselves will not be so frequently in-kneed.

Frock-coats are going out of fashion, and Newmarket cut-aways are worn for the morning. Very well for those who have small hips, as the latter are rather spready. This exactly also great tidiness in the cut of the "continuations." Waistcoats are made longer, and with drooping wings, to conceal any little vagaries in the newly emancipated trousers. But this, too, exaggerates unbecomingly the apparent size of the hips. "The pyramid inverted" is our model, by the laws of art, as the "pyramid proper" is that of the ladies. Gaiters are the mode—but they require a neat pastern. Your greyhound breed of man looks well in them. They should be made separate from the shoe, for they require washing, and your unscrupulous dingy shoe is an abomination. Patent leather, of course, till death.

Hats are a delicate subject. There should be as many fashions of them as there are varieties of human faces. Indeed, hats should be destined and allotted to men, as irrevocably as noses and hair—suitable by infallible harmonies of physiognomy. We should be born in hats—hats that would grow without materially altering in shape or expression. We would as soon let a barber choose us a nose as a hatter a hat. And as to a fashion in hats—one fashion for all men—where is thy rebuke, oh Nature, tortured and travestied! But still, fashions there be! John Bull is at present wearing his hat very small—the Frenchman is wearing his very large. The Yankee wears his very peaked—the German wears his very flat. We scorn to give the encouragement of print to any one of these. Suit yourself—since Nature has left you unfinished. Take counsel of an artist or of a woman. Buy no hat rashly.

As to the ladies, we would not, like

"Fools, rush in where angels fear to tread,"

but we must be permitted to record our little private distress and apprehension at the utter cessation of all novelty in their fashions. The one new stuff of "Balzarine," unless we are in a most benighted state of ignorance, comprises the entire variety of the season. We meet our few sins of idolatry in the very bonnets, the very boddices, the very namelessnesses of last year's product and admiration! Are the brains of milliners subject to drought? Is invention dried up—fancy, imagination, quite sqeezed dry? Are we to be subjected to sameness in angels—one eternal and unchanging exterior? Forbid it, while the world continues sinful, oh sumptuary powers! We could not bear, in our present state of mind, the angelic livery of one eternal gown (wings, if you like to call it so), with no new hat, no ravishing garniture for the shoulders! Oh no! Immolate the milliners for their dull brains! Turn your genius into this seemingly exhausted channel, oh, unemployed painters! Show us woman—like the opal or the cloud—dressed in new colors whenever she comes into the sun! Adorably sweet as she is, she is sweeter for the outer spice of variety!

If to lack classes of society which another nation possesses, be a falling behind that nation in refinement (query, whether!), we are behind England, at least, in this degree, that we possess no class of table-talkers. Dinner-parties in this country are gatherings-together of friends, chiefly to eat, and to chat, as it may happen. The host has been at great pains to procure a haunch of venison, but he has not thought of "the wit" for dinner. He has neither overlooked the olives nor the currant-jelly—but, alas! the attic salt is forgotten! The tomatoes will flank the roast, and the celery-sauce the boiled—but who is to listen to Doctor Gabble, or draw out Alderman Mumchance? There will be two misses and no "eligible," or two eligibles and no miss. The dinner is arranged with studied selection, but the guests are invited by the alphabet. The eating will be zealous and satisfactory, but the "entertainment" as the god of dulness pleases.

So provides not his dinner, this gentleman's foreign correspondent (we take one of the same class), in Russell square. Mr. Mordaunt Figgins (large trader and small banker, of Throgmorton street) wishes, we will say for example, to give a very smart and impressive dinner to Mr. Washington, Wall street, just arrived with a travelling credit from New York. The butler sees to the dinner—ca va sans dire. Who shall be asked? Smith, of course. His jokes will be all new to the Yankee, and it will look spirituelle to have an author. He will be sure to come—for Figgins discounts his bills. Put down Smith. Who next? We must have a lord. Smith won't show off without a lord, and the American will all but go into fits to meet one at dinner. Let's see! There's old Lord Fumble, always wanting to borrow ten pounds. Put down Lord Fumble. So—a lord and a wit. Now, two good listeners. They must be ladies, of course. We shall have too many black-coats. What, ladies listen, Mrs. Figgins? The Pimpkinsons. Well—they are poor and stylish-looking, and the Yankee knows nothing of the blue-book. Say the Pimpkinsons. Now for a dandy or two, and one handsome woman that flirts, in case Jonathan is a gay man. And, I say, Mrs. Figgins, there'll be a spare seat, and you may ask your mother—only she must dress well and say nothing of "the shop." And duly at eight o'clock Mr. Figgins's guests arrive—Smith wishing bills could be discounted without black-mail interest—my Lord Fumble turning up his (inward) nose, but relieved to meet Smith—the dandies hungry and supercilious—the Misses P. delighted and frisky—and the Yankee excessively well-dressed and dumbfounded to meet Smith and a live lord. Smith talks to the lord and at the Yankee, the rest play their parts "as cast in the bill," and everybody goes off delighted. The dinner was a bit, and Smith was "never so brilliant"—if Mrs. Figgins and Mr. Washington, Wall street, can be relied on.

Let us glance at another phase of the "life of the diner-out." Mr. Smith has accepted one of his most agreeable invitations—a west-end dinner, with a nobleman for his host. Mr. Smith is the son of a musician, and of course was born with an indisputable claim to the supreme contempt of his noble convives. By his talents, and more particularly by his agreeable powers, however, he has uncured the lip of scorn, and moves in aristocratic society, a privileged intruder. In the drawing-room, before dinner, Mr. Smith is ceremoniously polite—he is the one man in the company who dare not venture to be at his ease. Dinner is announced. The ladies are handed down by those who are born his betters, and he follows, silent and alone. He takes the seat that is left, wherever it be, and feels that he must be agreeable to his neighbor, whoever it be—at least till the conversation becomes general, when he is expected to shine. Meantime his brain is busier than his stomach, for he is watching for an opening to a pun, and studying the guests around him to arm his wit and lay traps for his stories. If, by chance, he is moody or ill at ease, he has not the noble privilege of reserve or silence. Not to talk—Smith not to be funny—would be outrageous! "What was the man asked for?" were have been the first exclamation after his departure. Oh, no! he must be brilliant, route qu'il coule; and as he is expected to extemporize verses at the piano after dinner, he must be cudgelling his invention at the same time to get together the material, and weave in the current news of the day, and the current scandal of the hour, with, of course, the proper seasoning of compliment to lords and ladies present. Hic, labor, hic opus est! The dishes are removed and the desert is set on the table, and Mr. Smith, who hitherto kept up a small fire of not very old puns on the meats and their concomitants, becomes the object of general, but impassive and supercilious expectation. His listeners are waiting to be amused, without feeling the slightest obligation to draw out his wit by their own, and after this wet blanket has made his efforts hang fire for some time, the master of the house calls for "that very droll story"—the same song and story having been not only told often before, but expanded and embellished in the New Monthly or the John Bull. Wishing lords would tell stories of their own (which they never do), and dreading lest the company are already familiar with his story, Smith affects to select one listener to whom it is quite new, and to tell it for his individual amusement. In the midst of his narration, he discovers by some maladroit interruption that this person knows the story by heart, and, obliged to finish it without the zest of novelty, he makes a failure, and concludes amid a general silence. We have seen this happen once, and, from the nature of things, it must happen often. Who would wear such laurels? Who would wish this state of society introduced—this yet unforged link added to the social chain of America?

It is the common argument with the advocates of a monarchical form of government, that the arts and literature would be better fostered—that the wealth of which patronage is a growth, is only accumulated by primogeniture and entail. Heaven defend us from such fostering, say we! Heaven defend us from such patronage! No, no! Genius is proud! Genius is humbled and cowed, damped and degraded by patronage—"patronage" so called, we mean. The man gifted by his God with superiority to his fellows, does not, without an anguish of shame, yield precedence to the nobility of a king's patent. He is self-humbled when he does it. He loses the sense of superiority, without which he is no more noble in genius than the knight is noble in the field when his spurs are hacked off by the herald. There is no equality, felt or understood, between lord and author in England. It pleases authors so to represent it in books, but they never felt it. We have seen the favorites of the day in their hour of favor, and heard enough said of them to show us how much more would be said to ears more confidential. Through all the abandon, through all the familiarity of festive moments, when there is nothing which could be named which marks a distinction between noble and simple, there is an invisible arm for ever extended, with reversed hand, which the patronized author feels on his breast like a bar of iron. He never puts it aside. He never loses the remembrance of his inferiority. He is always a parasite—always a belier of God's mark of greatness, the nobility of mind.

If we are remarkable for anything worth putting your finger on, it is for a kind of divining-rod faculty that we have—useful to everybody but myself. We can point to hidden treasure with a dip infallible—if it be for another man's benefit. In our own case, and for our own profit, we are, like all enchanted rods when dropped from the hand of the enchanter—a manifest and incapable stick. In the exercise of this vicarious faculty, we are about to take a walk up Broadway (on paper), and by pointing to undiscovered values, show to several persons how they can make their fortunes.

Here we are at the Battery—the most popular resort in town, and the most beautiful promenade in the known world. Within three minutes' walk of this lovely spot reside at least two or three thousand foreigners, the lower part of Broadway being their chosen and favorite quarter, and the "marine walk" their constant lounge. Bachelors innumerable of our own nation herd hereabout. The great baths of the city are near by, and any additional inducement would be the last drop in the bucket of attraction, and would double the number of Battery-frequenter. Where in the world beside, is there—unoccupied—such a place for a café?

Disposess yourself, dear reader, of all impressions of cafés as you see them now, and of all idea of coffee and other friandises such as are commonly served to you in places so called. We speak of a Parisian café—a palace of cushions, gilding and mirrors, sumptuous as a thing rubbed out of the lamp of Aladdin, and presided over by a queen of the counter in the shape of a lady only less pretty than respectable. We speak of a luxurious and fashionable saloon, where, in the neighborhood of a lovely promenade, gentlemen and their dames and daughters can find faultless coffee, and faultless ices and fruits—a place to resort to in the slow hours, to rest in after a walk, to find refreshment after a bath, to meet friends and acquaintances. Why, in any city of Europe there would be dozens of cafés around a spot so enchanting. And we are fast overtaking Europe in the taste for these approved luxuries, and, in our opinion, the public is quite ready for this! In the month of April just gone by, there were placards "to let" upon the doors of the two houses facing the Battery between Greenwich street and Broadway. What an opportunity lost! What safer investment of capital could there be than to have expended a few thousand dollars upon the lower story and basement of this block, making of it a grand café? What in Europe could exceed the beauty of the prospect from its windows and doors, the freshness of its unpolluted air, the shade upon its sidewalk from the magnificent trees in front, and the charms of scenery and promenade immediately adjoining? We only wonder that to such a "call" of opportunity, a café did not spring through the ground like a mushroom, ready furnished with coffee and curaçoa, silver spoons and a lady at the counter!

Since we are not a Frenchman, nor a German, nor an "adult alien" of any description, we are sorry to say that these ultra-marine dwellers among us have more taste than we for fine scenery, elegant resorts, and fresh air. Foreigners monopolize the bright spot of Manhattan. The Battery is their nucleus. Fashion, indigenous fashion, has gone up town—an "up-town" hedged off from the rivers on either side by streets unfootworthy, and neighborhoods never penetrated to the water-side on any errand but business—leaving to foreigners the only spot in this vast island-city where the view and fresh air of the sea are decently accessible. On this string we have harped before, and we leave it now with a little suggestion that we can not so well bestow elsewhere—that while this café project is in process of incubation, the authorities would oblige us and the remainder of the public by giving us a comfortable seat or two with backs to them in the shady avenues of the Battery.

And now, to come up Broadway a little. In all countries but this, rooms commanding advantages of view have a proportionate high value as lodgings, and are furnished and let accordingly. Without stopping at the buildings whose value as residences are so much increased by the oppositeness of the superb structure and its leafy surroundings in Trinity churchyard, let us come at once to the Park. From the corner of the American Museum to the church in Beekman street extends a line of buildings, the advantages of which as to neighborhood and prospect would command the highest price, as lodgings, in any other city in the world. The superb fountain—the trees and grass of the enclosure—the views of the magnificent church and hotels, and the thronged pavement of Broadway opposite, are all visible from those desirable chambers. The large company of single gentlemen who occupy rooms similarly situated in other cities—gentlemen who want lodging-rooms and breakfast, and dine wherever they like—are compelled to dive into the dark side-streets, and either live in pent-up quarters quite away from this centre of attraction, or undertake the life of hotels which has, for many of them, serious objections. Luxuriously fitted and furnished, with a housekeeper and the usual appliances of English lodging-houses, this line of buildings would be unequalled in attractions to bachelors. Everything they desire in a residence would be there attained—centrality, comfort, and accessibility. We recommend to the landlords who now let rooms, commanding such advantages, for cheap lodgings, barber's shops, and lumber-rooms, to turn their attention forthwith to this obviously better account, and at the same time embellish and improve the most conspicuous part of the city.

We were going into various other details of the unimproved capabilities of New York, but verbum sap. Our drift is visible, and it is only necessary in reference to such subjects to set the wide-awake to thinking.

The extreme heats of the last week or two have depopulated country-seats, and driven thousands from the open glare and thin roofs of rural resorts, to the shady sidewalks and stone walls of the more temperate city. The dim and cool vestibules of the large hotels are thronged with these driven-in strangers; and in the refreshing atmosphere of the manifold iced drinks and their varied odors of mint and pine-apple, they bless Heaven for the cooling luxuries of cities, pitying all those whose destiny or poverty confines them to the unmitigated country. Enjoying, as we do, the blessings of metropolitan protection in July, we feel called upon to express our deep sympathy with those unfortunate beings, who, in places of public resort, or in private cottages, are fulfilling their sad destiny of sultry exposure. The once porous hill-sides and valleys, baked by the sun to the induration of a paved street, lack the delicious sprinklings of Croton water-pipes. The warm milestones, few and far between, do but remind the scorched passer-by of the gushing hydrants of Broadway. The tepid spruce-beer and chalky soda-water of the country-inns only deepen the agony of absence from "juleps" and "cobbler." What would not these poor sufferers give for a brick block between them and the sun! How would they not bless Heaven for the sight of the cold sweat on a wall of unheated and impermeable granite! What celestial bliss would it not be, to see, on a country road, at every few yards' distance, black boys, unpaid and unthanked, directing, like benign angels, streams of the pellucid element across their sultry way! Ah! the luxury, in the summer-heats, of city-walls and city refrigerations!

It has been unreflectingly thought that there were two classes of human beings overworked and uncared for. It has been said that there was no Providence for housemaids and editors. The predecessors of these laborious animals, it was supposed, had, in some previous metempsychosis, committed sins which doomed their posterity to perpetual toil. It is true, theirs is a destiny of crash, in a world, for others, of comparative diaper and dimity. But, mark the alleviations! The first of July comes round, and Heaven inflicts upon the task-masters and mistresses of these oppressed maids, a locomotive insanity. With toil and sweat they pack up their voluminous traps, and embarking in a seething boat they depart, panting and red-faced, on their demented travels. They go from place to place, packing and unpacking, fretting and sweating from day to day, and arriving at last at the grand fool-dom of Saratoga, they take up their lodging for a month in chambers of pill-box dimensions, pitifully persuaded that the smell of pine partitions, and the pitchy closeness of shingled roofs reeking in the sun, are the fragrance of the fields, and a blessed relief from the close air of the city! So, for weeks, they absent themselves, deluded. The housemaid, meantime, has possession of the cool and spacious dwellings deserted for her use. The dragged muscles relax over her collar-bone and shoulders, for she has now no water to carry up-stairs and down. She recovers the elasticity in the small of her back, and the natural distribution of red and white in her flushed and overheated complexion. The well-contrived blinds, closed in the freshness of the morning-hours, keep the house cool and dim for her noontide repose. The spacious drawing-rooms are hers, in which to wander at will, barefoot if she likes, on the luxurious carpets. The bath-rooms are near her bed, and the ice-man comes daily to the door, and unless she choose to step out upon the sidewalk at noon, she scarce need know it is summer. Ah, the still coolness of thick brick walls and ample rooms within! Her worn-out frame recovers its powers, and in the goodness of her heart she can afford to send pitying thoughts after the exiled and infatuated sufferers at Saratoga!

Negatively blessed is her fellow-sufferer, the editor, meantime—liable as he is to this same locomotive lunacy, and kept within reach of enjoyable and health-preserving luxuries by the un-let-up-able nature of his vocation. Nor this alone. He has his minor reliefs. Omnipotent as he necessarily is, and mostly with the unhappy class self-exiled to the inclement country, his weary arm now lies supine in delicious indolence at his side. The habitual five hundred visits, per diem, of his right hand to the rim of his hat, are no more exacted. The two hundred and fifty suggestions, per diem, as to the conduct of his paper, the course of his politics, and his private morals, are no longer to be thankfully received. The city is full, but full of strangers, charmingly inconscious of his extreme need of counsel. He walks to and fro at ease, looking blandly at the hydrants, blandly at the strange faces, blandly at the deliciously unfamiliar contents of the omnibuses. He dwells in a crowd, in heavenly solitude. He is like a magnetized finger on the body of a man with a toothache—apart from the common pulse, sequestered from the common pain—yet in his habitual place and subject to no separation. He has no engagements to meet gentlemen or committees, for the better manufacture of public opinion. He can shilling it to Staten Island for sea-air, or sixpence it to Harlem for an evening sight of the blood-warm grass, in blessed silence! And so fly the summer months, like three leaves of the book of paradise turned back by chance; and, refreshed with new courage, the doomed editor renews, in September, the multitudinous extras of his vocation. Oh kindly Providence, even for housemaids and editors!

A true leaf from the thoughts of a woman of genius on the subject of woman's love, is stuff to dwell upon in the reading. We totally differ from one of the sweetest writers of the time, Mrs. Seba Smith, on the following disparaging passage touching the love of a gentle and confiding woman as contrasted with that of a proud one. Let our readers judge. The passage occurs, by-the-way, in a story which is the gem of the whole year of monthlies, called "The Proud Ladye"—in Godey's Lady's Book. "The love of a gentle and confiding woman, with its perpetual appeals to tenderness and protection, must be dear, very dear to a manly heart; but then it too often lacketh that exclusive and earnest devotion which imparts a last touch of value, its sympathies are too readily excited, and the images of others, faint and shadowy it may be, yet still images, too often sit, side by side, with the beloved. But the love of a proud woman, with its depths of untold tenderness, rarely stirred, yet, when once awakened, welling up a perpetual fountain of freshness and beauty, its concentrated and earnest faith, its unmingled sympathies, its pure shrine, raised to the beloved, burning no incense upon strange altars, and admitting no strange oblations, the love of such a one should invest manhood with tenfold dignity—should make him feel as a priest in the very presence of the divinity."

"Things lost in air" are not always unproductive, Signora Castellan having received, last night, about two thousand dollars for singing four songs. Signor Giampietro, her husband, may well say that "a sweet voice is a most excellent thing in woman." I made one of the twenty-five hundred who composed the audience of this successful cantatrice last evening, and having missed her introductory concert, this was the first time I had seen her. I should take Madame Castellan to be about twenty-three. She is a plump little Jewess, with an advantage not common to plumpitude—a very uppish and thoroughbred neck, charmingly set on. A portrait of her dimpled shoulders and the back of her head would be a fit subject for Titian. Her countenance expresses an indolent sweetness, with none of the wide-awake so common to her tribe—and, indeed, the description of the Persian beauty by Hafiz occurred to me in looking at her:—

"Her heart is full of passion and her eyes are full of sleep."

A most amiable person I am sure she is—but, unless I am much mistaken, there is none of Malibran's intellectual volcano in the "crayther," and the molten lava is what is wanting to make her equal or comparable to that wonderful woman. I certainly do not think we have heard a voice in this country, not even Malibran's, of more astonishing compass than Madame Castellan's. There is not a chamber in her throat where a cobweb could remain unswept for a moment. Her contralto notes are far beyond the plummet of ordinary "soundings," and as rich and effortless as the gurgle of a ringdove, while her soprano tones go up with the buoyancy of a lark, and raise on tiptoe all the audience who are not fortunate enough to obtain seats. Still, in ascending and descending on this angel's ladder, she misses a round now and then. There are transitions which catch, somehow. She wants fusion. In her trills more particularly, the balance is one-sided, and there is a nerve in the listener's besoin which is not reached by the warble. Give her more practice, however, more passionateness or brandy and water, and she would melt over these trifling flaws, without a doubt. So near perfection as she is, it seems almost impertinent to criticise her.

New York has some radii to its outer periphery which are well worth the stranger's following in the way of excursions. The promontory which makes the jumping-off place at the seaward end of the Narrows, is one of these, and upon it (next door to the fishing-huts of Galway), stands one of the most luxurious hotels in this country. A friend gave me a delightful drive to it the other day, via a little flourish among the knolls of Long Island, and, as it chanced to be the hottest day of the season, I can speak advisedly of the ocean air of Fort Hamilton. To be handed over from the Battery to such a cool place, in half an hour, by the long arm of a steamer, is one of the possibilities that make New York very habitable.

The marvel of New York just now is "THE ALHAMBRA"—an ice-cream resort lately opened a little below Niblo's. The depth of the building on Broadway is pierced for a corridor entrance, and this is lined with counters tended by the prettiest Hebes of their class. Traversing this alley of temptation, you descend to a marble-paved circular court, tented with gayly-striped awnings and gorgeous colors of barbaric architecture. The seats are around a fountain, and a statue of a water-nymph stands in the centre, holding above her head a horn, from which issues the water, in a jet resembling a glass umbrella. The basin is rimmed with flowers, the falling water makes the constant murmur which is needful for a tête-à-tête, the sky looks in through the lacings of the blue and white awning, and "the ices are made of pure cream." The whole scene is more oriental than Spanish, and would have been better named a serail or a kiosk than the Alhambra, but it is a "fairy-spot" (as well as a man can judge who has not seen fairy-land), and, for the price of an ice-cream, it gives the untravelled a new idea of luxury.

Great as the difference is between the scents of moist earth and splashed dust, the latter, faute de mieux, comes up to your nostrils very agreeably, as you sit at your summer morning's work in a city window. It is a day to be thankful for "wet" in almost any shape. Yet it shows of what accommodating stuff we are made, when, instead of the gentle ministry of the exhaling dews, we feel prepared to bless a fat negro with a leathern pipe, dispensing, as it were, the city branch of nature's distribution of moisture. The sable vicegerent of the Croton, whom I have in my eye (high Jackson)—now brushing the boots of Mr. Stopintown, the poor scribbler, now directing at the prodigal outgush of water that comes forty miles to do his bidding—stands, as well he may, petrified with astonishment at the zealous activity with which the obedient element follows the turn of his finger. Negro amazement is evidently taken in at the mouth. My friendly moistener sirs his trachea very fixedly from the beginning to the end of his easy function. Thanks to his influence, the thermometer beside me, I observe, has sunk two degrees with the tepid abatement of the morning air.

Whatever else may be left unfinished at the end of the world, we are quite sure that there has been enough written! The "bow of promise" was no security against a deluge of books—and it has come!

"Oh, for a perch on Ararat with Noah!"— the waves of this great flood receding, and nothing visible but the "unwritten" mud! We would find have books "done away." We would begin again with "two of every kind," and wait with patience for a posthumous work by Ham, Shem, or Japhet!

"Our eyes are sick of this perpetual flow
Of (Extras)—and our heart of (things to read!)"

which, we believe are Shelley's "sentiments better expressed."

And, by-the-way, it is a marvel where all these books go to. We do not mean, of course, the type and paper. We mean the spirit, black, or white, or gray, that on this bridge of print passes from the author's heart into the reader's and there abides—more difficult to cast out than the devils exiled into pork three thousand years ago, and still guarded against by the abhorrent synagogue. Fifteen millions of people, all ductile, imitative, and plastic—all, at some moment or other, waiting for a type upon which to mould their characters—and all supplied, helter-skelter, at a shilling the pair, with heroes and heroines made to sell—the creatures God has first created in his own image, taken soft from his hand, and shaped, moulded, and finished by De Kock and Bulwer! Who is there, high or low, that is not reached by these possessing and enchanting spirits? We are sure we do not overrate their power. In our own case, a novel of Bulwer's, read in a day, possesses us exclusively and irresistibly for a week, and lingers in our brain for many a day after. Like or dislike the character he draws—we can not resist the fascination. Yet you would think the reading of a book, by an editor, would be like sweeping out the water from a brook. What must it be to the farmer who reads it by his pine-knot fire in the country, and thinks of it all day over his plough—to the apprentice who reads it on Sunday and ponders on it for a week over his bench. We are only looking at them as infusions into the fountains of opinion and impulse; and, if we had time, we should like to trace them till they appeared in classes of events, or in features of national character. To do this in detail would require the space of a lecture or an essay. But, at a glance—to what do we owe the fact, that, throughout all the middle and lower classes of American life, everything except toil and daily bread is looked at through the most sentimental and romantic medium? In their notions, affections, and views of life, the Americans are really the most romantic people on earth. We do not get this from our English forefathers—the English are as much the contrary as is possible. We do not get it from our pursuits—what can be more unromantic than the daily cares of an American? We do not get it from our climate—it is a wonder how romance, fled from the soft skies of Spain and Italy, can stay among us. We get it from books—from the hoisting of the flood-gates of copyright—from the inundation of works of fiction. There are few, we venture to say—few below the more intellectual classes, whose views of life are not shaped and modelled, and whose ambitions are not aimed by characters and impulses found in the attracfive pages of "cheap literature." We do not condemn this, we repeat—we do not know that we would stop it if we could. At any rate, we prefer it to the inoculation of English low life—the brutality of the Jack Sheppard school of novels; and we vastly prefer it to the voluptuousness of the literature most popular in France. Thieves are not heroes among us, and woman is enshrined in respect and honor; and with these respective differences from England and France, we can almost rest content under the influences that make us what we are.

Sit back in your chair, and let me babble! I like just to pull the spigot out of my discretion, and let myself run. No criticisms if you please, and don't stare! Eyelids down, and stand ready for slip-slop.

I was sitting last night by the lady with the horn and the glass umbrella, at the Alhambra—I drinking a julep, she (my companion) eating an ice. The water dribbled, and the moon looked through the slits in the awning, and we chatted about Saratoga. My companion has a very generalizing mind, situated just in the rear of a very particularly fine pair of black velvet eyes, and her opinions usually come out by a little ivory gate with a pink portico—charming gate, charming portico, charming opinions. I must say I think more of intellect when it is well lodged.

I am literally at a dead loss to know whether she said it, or I said it—what my mind runs on at this moment. It's all one, for if I said it, it was with the velvet approbation of her ineffable eyes, and before such eyes I absorb and give back, like the mirror that I am. These, then, are her reflections about Saratoga.

Why, in mamma's time, it was a different affair. There was a cabinet of fashion in those days, and the question was settled with closed doors. Giants have done being born, and so have super-beautiful women—such women as used to lay down hearts like blocks in the wooden pavement, and walk on nothing else. There were about three in each city—three belles of whom every baptized person in the country knew the name, style, and probable number of victims. Their history should have been written while they lasted—for of course the gods loved them, and "whom the gods love die first," and they are dead, and have left no manuscripts nor models. Well, these belles were leagued, and kept up their dynasty by correspondence. New York was the seat of government, and the next strongest branch was at Albany (where the women at one time were lovelier than at any known place and period since the memory of woman). In New York alone, however, were married ladies admitted to the councils. Here and there a renowned beau was kept in the antechamber for advice. April came, and then commenced a vigorous exchange of couriers. "The Springs," of course, but which? Saratoga, or Lebanon, or Ballston? What carried it, or who decided it, was enshrined in the most eternal mystery—but it was decided and known to a few beaux and the proprietors of the hotels by the middle of May. Wine and Johnson's band were provided accordingly. The summer was more punctual in those days, and July particularly was seldom belated. After the fourth, the cabinet started, and then commenced a longitudinal radiation from north to south—after what, and to follow whom, was only a secret to the uninitiated. And such times—for then the people had fortunes, and the ladies drank champagne! La! how 'ma talks about it!

But now!—Eheu fugaces! (Latin for "bless my soul")—change has drank all the spirit of our dream. There is so much aristocracy in New York that there is none at all. Beauty has been scrambled for, and everybody has picked up a little. There must be valleys to make mountains—ugly people before there can be belles—but everybody being rather pretty, who can be divine? Idem, gentility! Who knows who isn't "genteel" in New York? There are fifty circles as like as pens—and not even an argument as to the perihelion. Live where you please, know whom you please, wear what you please, and ride freely in the omnibuses, and nobody makes a remark! Social anarchy!

Why, what a state of things it is when it is as much trouble to find out where the prettiest people have gone to pass the summer as it is to inquire out "good"ness in Wall street! No cherishing, either, of belle or beau descent! The daughters of the charming tyrants of ten or twenty years ago, the boys of the beaux of that time, walk about unpainted at and degenerate. The "good society" of twenty years ago is most indifferent society now.

"The vase in which roses have once been distilled" goes for a crockery pipkin.

A great pity they don't have coffee at the Alhambra! And no curaçoa—and what is ice-cream without a drop of curaçoa! It's a pretty place—a very pretty place! And there should be nobody to wait on you here but dainty and dapper slaves—such as the Moors had, with golden rings on their ankles, in the veritable Allambra. That tall, crooked blackamoer hurts my eye.

So there was no "Mr. Hicks," and no "legacy to Washington Irving." More's the pity! I wish a Mr. Hicks might be created impromptu, on purpose. And more Mr. Hickses for more authors. Birds that sing should be provided with cages and full cups. What could be done better with spare moneys than to take the footworn pilgrim of genius and send him softly down from the temple of fame shod with velvet! In every rich man's will there should be at least one line illuminated with a bequest to genius. Heaven give us a million that we may set the glorious example!

And now, lady, who are you that in this gossiping dream has held converse with me! I have murmured to the black cross, suspended by its braid of hair upon your throat of ivory, without asking your name—content that you listened. But now (if spiritual visisters have arms)—put your arm in mine and come out under a better-devised ceiling! The night is fragrant. Heaven is sifting love upon us through the sieve of the firmament—starlight, you took it for! And as much falls in Broadway as elsewhere. And the stars are as sweet, seen from this sidewalk, as they are from the fountain of Egeria. I have sighed in both places, and know. "Allons! faites moi l'amour—car je suis dans mon humeur des Dimanches."

We are making a study of this big book of a city we live in. We mean, in good time, to peruse it all—its blotted passages no less than the lines of it which fall in pleasant places. And we'll tell you what we think of it as we go along. Not with shovel and pickaxe. Order is a law of industry, and industry, as the child of sin, we virtuously abhor. We shall read this great book, as we do everything else—in the style of the antelapsarians—idly and paradise-wise. The ant and the "little busy bee" were unknown to Adam and Eve, it may be safely conjectured; and we scorn to take them for models, as enjoined in the primer. Butterflies for ever! We shall flit from flower to flower, and tilt upon any stem that we fancy will support us—as do these full-dress and fainant gentlemen of no care. Pray expect nothing in particular! Stand ready to hop off. Any perfume that comes down the wind may tempt us to follow its invisible track back—for so butterflies detect the self-betraying flowers of Paradise. (Though, for this zigzagery in our courses it is, that we butterflies are called volatile and capricious—as if we had no right, in our own way, to follow our more spiritual and finer noses! And to be blamed, too, for imitating, as far as in us lies, the innocent nothing-to-do-ity of angels!)

But, the animated book of Manhattan. Turn we to a plain passage, on which we were just now pondering.

There seems to us a poor economy of the animal spirits in the mode of life of the New-Yorkers. Let us take a single example, for the convenience of our over-worked adjectives and pronouns.

Mr. Splitfig, the eminent wholesale grocer, is at the age of virtue—thirty-five. He rises in the morning at half-past seven, makes so much of his toilet as appears above the tablecloth, and makes his breakfast of the morning paper, a nibble at a roll, and coffee at discretion. He is too newly up to eat—too recently arrived from the spiritual land of dreams, as my adorable friend Lyra would express it. He is grave and quiet. The sobriety of a fifteen hours' fast is upon him—for he has not eaten meat since yesterday at three. Refreshed by sleep, however, and cheerful after his coffee, he draws on his walking seldom-alluded-to, and goes out to be gone till dinner. At eleven, or thereabout, his spirits begin to flag. He would rather not see a friend, except on business, for he hates the trouble of talking. Debts and peccadilloes lie at the bottom of the stomach, and his heart drops down to them for want of a betweeny of beefsteak. He begins to be faintish, but he is principled against lurching or drinking before dinner, and by one o'clock his animal spirits have sunk into his boots, and, from that time till three, he is a dispirited fag, going through with his habitual routine of business, but, of a civil word or a smile as incapable as Caliban. It is while the chambers of his head are thus unlighted and untenanted, however, that the most of his friends and acquaintances see him and judge of his capacity for entertainment. He speaks to fifty people in the course of those two exhausted hours, and speaks sullenly and coldly, and, of these fifty, not one considers that lies over a floating bridge of comestibles which has sunk with an unnatural ebftide. What says Menenius, the rough and wise?—

"The very road into his kindness"

"He had not dined :
The veins unfilled, the blood is cold, and then
We pout upon the morning ; are unapt
To give or to forgive ; but when we have stuffed
These pipes and these conveyances of our blood
With wine and feeding, we have suppler souls
Than in our priest-like fasts."

But, at three, Mr. Splitfig dines—and as he gives them something to stand on, his spirits jump up and look out of his eyes. His tongue feels the moisture at its root, and grows flowery, and the one man who sits opposite to the unctuous grocer at table thinks him the best of fellows.

Splitfig keeps a trotter, and, after dinner, happy and agreeable, he jumps into his wagon, and distributes, along the milestones and hedges of the Bloomingdale road, smiles and good-natured glances, that were much more wisely got up four hours earlier in the day, and sown among his friends for a crop of popularity. To change the similitude, Splitfig makes his day's voyage with a cold boiler, and gets up the steam on arriving at the wharf!

Not so Monsieur Toutavous, the French importer. Toutavous takes a cup of coffee at waking, and on the strength of it, dresses, reads the papers, and writes the two or three business-letters which require the coolest head. He keeps for his own society exclusively the melancholy hour or two of every day, during which "the stomach is apprehensive that the throat is cut"—the communication is so interrupted. Yet as these unsmiling hours are excellent for thought and calculation, he so shapes his business that he can pass them, alone, without inconvenience. He has taken his coffee, observe, but he has not breakfasted. At eleven he goes to Delmonico's on his way to the "shop." A beefsteak and a pint of claret dress his countenance in smiles, and invigorate his fingers for the friendly clasp exacted by courtesy. He gets to his counting-house a little before twelve, enters upon the hard work of the day with a system alert and lively, and impresses everybody whom he sees with the idea that he is born to good fortune, and has the look of it, and is a good fellow, with no distrust of his credit nor of himself. Sensible of Toutavous—is it not?

Pity, we say again, that the personal, physical economies are so little regarded among us. The ladies lack also a little "farseed in their ears," but we would not put them off with the tail of a paragraph. We have, for them, a chapter in lavender; not of our own devising altogether! A superb female Machiavel whom we once knew, who came always to a ball at three in the morning, fresh as a rosebud after a night's sleep, entrancing you with her dewy coolness when everybody else was hot and weary—she, capable of this brilliant absurdity, once discoursed to us on the economies of heart-breaking. We will show you the trick some day. Meantime, salaam!

"As much good stay with thee as go with me!"

The first visitor to the bay of New York, and the writer of the first description on record, was John de Verrazzano, a Florentine, in the service of Francis the First. This bold navigator had been for some time in command of four ships, cruising against the Spaniards. But his little fleet being separated in a storm, Verrazzano determined, with one of them, the Dauphin, to take a voyage in search of new countries. He arrived on the American coast, somewhere near North Carolina, and first proceeded south as far as "the region of palm-trees," probably Florida. He then turned, and proceeded north till he entered a harbor, which he describes thus, in a passage of a letter addressed by him to his royal master:—

"This land is situated in the paralele of Rome, in forty-one degrees and two terces; but somewhat more colde by accidental causes. The month of the haven lieth open to the south, half a league broad; and being entred within it, between the east and the north, it stretcheth twelve leagues, where it wareth broader and broader, and maketh a gulf about twenty leagues in compass, wherein are five small islands, very fruitful and pleasant, full of hie and broad trees, among the which islands any great navie may ride without any feare of tempest or other danger."

In this harbor Verrazzano appears to have remained about fifteen days. He and his men frequently went on shore to obtain supplies and see the country. He says, in another part of his letter: "Sometimes our men stayed two or three daies on a little island neere the ship for divers necessities. We were oftentimes within the land five or six leagues, which we found as pleasant as is possible to declare, very apt for any kind of husbandry, of corne, wine, and ayle. We entered afterward into the woods, which we found so thicke that any army, were it never so great, might have hid itself therein; the trees whereof are oaks, cypress-trees, and other sorts unknown in Europe."

These were probably the first European feet that ever trod on any part of the territory now included in the state of New York. Verrazzano and his crew seem to have had considerable intercourse with the natives, and generally to have been treated well, though by his own account he did not always deserve it. Speaking of an excursion made by his men somewhere on the coast, he says: "They saw only one old woman, with a young maid of eighteen or twenty yeeres old, which, seeing our companie, hid themselves in the grasse for feare. The old woman carried two infants on her shoulders, and the young woman was laden with as many. As soon as they saw us, to quiet them and win their favors, our men gave them victuals to eate, which the old woman received thankfully, but the young woman threw them disdainfully on the ground. They took a child from the old woman to bring into France; and going about to take the young woman, which was very beautiful, and of tall stature, they could not possibly, for the great outcries that she made, bring her to the sea; and especially having great woods to pass thorow, and being far from the ship, we proposed to leave her behind, bearing away the child only."

In a subsequent part of this narrative, Verrazzano presents a very favorable picture, not only of the amenity, but of the discretion of the aborigines: "They came in great companies of their small boats unto the ship, with their faces all bepanthed with divers colors, and bringing their wives with them, whereof they were very jealous; they themselves entering aboard the ship, and staying there a good space, but causing their wives to stay in their boats; and for all the entreatie that we could make, offering to give them divers things, we could never obtaine that they would suffer them to come aboard the ship. And oftentimes one of the two kings coming with his queene, and many gentlemen for their pleasure to see us, they all stayed on shore, two hundred paces from us, sending us a small boat to give us intelligence of their coming; and as soon as they had answer from us they came immediately, and wondered at hearing the cries and noises of the mariners. The queene and her maids stayed in a very light boat at an island a quarter of a league off, while the king abode a long space in our ship, uttering divers conceits with gestures, viewing with great admiration the furniture of the shippe. And sometimes our men staying one or two days on a little island near the ship, he returned with seven or eight of his gentlemen to see what we did; then the king drawing his bow, and running up and down with his gentlemen, made much sport to gratify our men."

The sail-studded bay of New York at this day presents another scene; and one of these same "gentlemen" is now almost as great a curiosity here as was John de Verrazzano, only three centuries ago, to the rightful lords of this fair land and water.

If we are not "qualifying" for the doom of Sodom and Gomorrah, we must look elsewhere for the causes of the accelerated pace at which goes on our national demoralization. How many pegs down we have dropped within three or four years, in political principle, how many in mercantile honor and credit, how many in the demand and consequent quality of literature, and how many in the dignity of the periodical press, are four very pregnant texts for sermons, as well as questions for political economy. But more striking than any of these changes for the worse, seems to us the demoralization of private life—the increase of scenes of bloodshed, of shocking immoralities, of violence toward the unprotected, of calumnies, revenges, sabbath-breakings, and all the abominations common to more corrupt and older countries. When is this unnaturally rapid tide to ebb, and to what is it tending?

In the comparative idleness of Americans at present—the stagnation of business and the food for bad passions, which always lies under misfortune and desolation—we may doubtless find the immediate causes of these evil changes, and in this there lies a hope, that, with the country's reviving prosperity and industry, its morals, public and private, will mend. But there are other and more permanent principles of evil at work among us, which will grow with our growth and strengthen with our strength—as they have grown and strengthened with the progress and prosperity of every country under the sun. In a most philosophical and able letter on the condition of the different countries of Europe, which appeared lately in the National Intelligencer, the writer (President Durbin) remarks upon the gradual diminution of the middle classes in England, and the "widening separation between the rich, who are becoming richer, and the poor, who are becoming poorer." This middle class—which is the population without its extremes of aristocracy and beggary—constitutes the body and strength of England, and when its wealth has been drawn to the aristocracy, and its wants to the beggary of that country, she will be ready for the next stages of national history—revolution and downfall. America, however, has as yet neither extreme to any considerable extent. Our population are almost entirely persons of such means and pursuits as would place them within the pale of the middle class in England. There is no well-defined aristocracy—no inevitable and irremediable beggary. But the tendency is toward these extremes, and in that tendency—irritated and strengthened just now by the peculiar prostration of "the times"—we see the causes of no small portion of the evils we have alluded to. The first step taken toward the formation of an aristocracy is the adoption of its vices, as the first result of inevitable or impending beggary is the contemplation of crime. The refined pursuits of a man born to a certainty of wealth and station, can not be adopted in a moment, nor can suffice for the desires of a man suddenly grown rich. Nor are the higher pleasures of taste and intellect at all satisfying, except after a youth of high culture and ennobled association. The result is, that the corrupted or vacant mind of the fortunate possessor of wealth turns to the pursuit of pleasure, and pleasure in such minds soon degenerates into vice. A virtuous aristocracy, if it ever exist at all, is the slow creation of pride of ancestry, and a well-instilled conviction of the true path of distinction and honor—but meantime the beginners at luxury and power are established as a class of ostentatious and unprincipled members of society, and the license and indulgence they exact is yielded them with exasperation on the part of those they displace and injure. Seduction and intrigue, hushed up, winked at, paid for with money, in European countries, is here resented with the murder of the offender. Public opinion, which, in Europe, under such circumstances, would forgive the offence, and sympathise only with the seducer, takes, in this country, as yet, the other side. To be idle, which was formerly a reproach, is becoming a merit here, as it is in countries where none are gentlemen but the idle. But gambling by night for the means of extravagant idleness takes the place of industry by day, and the heart-burnings, jealousies, and unemployed passions of this class, lead almost certainly to scenes of violence and bloodshed. The presence in our community of a large body of idlers (such as exists in all the countries of Europe), whose whole occupation in life is profligacy, is an evil very fast coming upon this country, and one which should at least be guarded against by a total change in the education and guardianship of women.

If you have never been on the Beacon course at Hoboken, you have never seen the opening lips of the Hudson river to advantage. As if nature was of the same opinion, the long city, with the dot of Governor's island below it, looks like a note of admiration jotted down on the other side. This high table of land in so near neighborhood to New York is a superb natural esplanade, and I marvel much that such unequalled sites for villas can be monopolized by a racecourse. I will spare you the "fine writing" with which the view inspired me while there. It cools too rosy for prose.

I went over in the suite of a choice "Spirit of the Times," to see the great match between saddle and wheels—the Oneida Chief, a pacer in harness, against Lady Suffolk and Beppo, two trotters, under jockeys in stirrups. It was rather a new mode of racing—new to me, at least—and I expected a great crowd, but the spectators were in scores instead of thousands. On the way, and in the stand, I was amused with the physiognomy and phraseology of the persons drawn from the city by the sporting nucleus. There was a sprinkling of nobodies, like myself, of course, and some strangers from the hotels; but the remainder had a peculiarity which marked them as a class, and at which I can only fling a conjecture in the way of a definition. Every sense and faculty about them seemed abandoned to jollity, except the eye. The eye looked cool and unsympathetic. In the heartiest laugh, the lids did not relax. The sharp scrutinizing wrinkle and the brow pressed down, remained immovable while the sides were shaking. I am not sure that the whole expression lay in this; but there was an expression, very decided, about them of a reservation from fun somewhere, and, with all their frolic and nonsense, they looked as cool and ready as a slate and pencil. Sharp boys, I should take them to be, seen singly anywhere.

The horses were breathed a little before the race, and as they went to and fro before the stand, I had a fair look at them. Lady Suffolk has all the shyness of the trio, and she looks more like a narrow escape of beauty than beauty itself. She is a large dappled gray mare, with a tail fit for a pacha's standard, legs not particularly blood-like, stiff walking gait, and falls off behind and slopes under the hamstrings like a corn-crib built to shed rain. Cover her head up (which looks knowing enough for a Wall street broker's), and she would not sell, standing still at a country market, for a hundred dollars. A little study of her structure, however, shows you that she is made for something or other very extraordinary, and when she starts from you with a rider on her back, she goes off like something entirely different from any velocity of leg that you are acquainted with. The speed of two passing steamers going at twenty miles an hour—you on one and a horse on the deck of the other—would give you the same sensation of unnatural go-away-ness. Seen coming, from a little distance, she rocks like a pendulum swinging from the rider's head, and when she goes by at full speed, a more pokerish, awkward, and supernatural gait could scarce be got out of a cross between a steam-paddle and an ostrich. Every time her haunches draw up, she shoots ahead as if she was hit behind with an invisible beetle. Nothing in the way of legs seems to explain it.

The Oneida Chief is not half so fine an animal to look at as his driver, Hiram Woodruff, the great whip of the turf. He is as fine a specimen of the open-air man, born for a field open to all comers, as I have met with in my life. He has a fine frank countenance, a step like a leopard, a bold eye, and a most compact, symmetrical, and elastic frame, fit for a gladiator. In his sulky, he looked as all riders in those ugly contrivances do, like an animal with an axletree through him, and wheels to his hips, but he drove so beautifully as to abate the usual ridicule of the vehicle. The Oneida Chief is a sorrel, and a wonderful pacer, but, as he was beaten, I will say no more about him.

Beppo, the second best horse, is the most comical little animal I have ever seen. His color is like a shabby brown plush, and he looks, at a first glance, as if he might have been a cab-horse, or a baker's horse, or in some other much-abused line, but retaining, withal, a sort of cocked-pistol expression of eye and limb, and a most catgut extension of muscle. His loins are like a greyhound, and every hair on him seems laid in the most economical way to go, and when he does go there is no outlay for any other purpose. A more mere piece of straightforward work than Beppo's action I could never imagine. Whatever balk there was in starting, he was just at the mark, and he neither broke nor bothered, but did it all in round honest trotting, coming up on the last quarter stretch like a whipped-up arrow. As he only lost the first heat by a head, he of course did his mile, as Lady Suffolk did, in two minutes twenty-six seconds—the fastest trotting on record.

"How d'ye do!—how d'ye do!" as greetings, have passed away. Those two never-answered interrogatories have yielded to the equally meaning salutations, "Eh, back!" "Where?" In your autumn trip to the city remember to salute your friends and acquaintances. For some three weeks this has been the vogue, and (grown a gravity with use) people now shake hands over "Eh back!" "Where?" with all the sober earnestness which attended the habitual "how d'ye do?" "how d'ye do?" I give it you by way of early report of the prevailing fashion.

Since I wrote to you I have aired my magnetic circle with a trip into the solitude of the Highlands. "Retiring from the crowd" is an impoverished phrase for the withdrawal of one's ten thousand spiritual feelers from the interlaced contact and influence of four hundred thousand neighbors. We can get used to anything—thanks to the adaptability of our natures—and my four hundred thousandth part of the space, light, air, and locomotion of the island of Manhattan, had grown by habit to be a comfortable allowance; but it was no less a relief to send up my breath to the sky without mixture, and to look about without tangling my retina with the optic nerves of other people. The ordinary accompaniments of departure from town give the fullest effect to the contrast. The pellet of potato, crowded into the quill of a boy's popgun, does not escape with a more sudden relief than the passenger departing by the North river steamer. The crowd grows closer and tighter as you get to the wharf, and the last five minutes before casting off are as close a pressure of flesh, blood, and personal atmosphere, as can well be endured with any prospect of recovered elasticity. Suddenly there is a rush ashore, and you shoot out into the calm and open bay, and dropping into a chair, instantly commence the perusal of a rural shore, gliding stilly athwart your eye like the lines of a pastoral poem:—no people between you and it, no eyes looking at you from the Palisades, no hats on the trees, no bows from the ripples as you pass, no jostle in the fresh air, no greeting, no beggar, no bore. As a sudden release of mind and body from a tight place, I know nothing (short of death at the Five Points) to exceed it.

I was on board "the Swallow," the stillest skimmer of the waters in which I have yet travelled, and I trust the green trees, and indented bays, nooks, and knolls of Hoboken and Westchester, were sensible of the fresh intensity of my admiration, as we glided, dream-like and un-steamer-like, by. I made one or two mundane and gregarious observations, by-the-by, on the voyage, and the principal one was the watchful and delicate attention of the captain of the boat to the comfort of the ladies and children on board, and, apropos of that, the superiority of this class in our country over those of every other. I could wish the foreign travellers among us might take our steamboat captains on the Hudson as specimens of our habits and manners, and, for the three whom I have the pleasure to know (the captains of the Troy, Swallow, and Empire), I am quite sure that no gentleman could desire, for wife or daughter, more courteous and well-bred care than they habitually bestow on the passengers who embark with them. As an instance (which I noticed and think worth recording), Captain McLean chanced to discover, at the moment a lady was going ashore with a child and a nurse at nine o'clock at night, that her destination was on the other side of the river, near a landing where the boats do not regularly touch. As it looked like rain, and she was to cross in a row-boat, he stopped the baggage on the plank, begged her to be seated for a few minutes, and ran "The Swallow" across, landing her almost at her own door, very much to her delight and relief. It should be set down in his honor, and long may devotion to women be, as it certainly is now, a national and peculiar feature of the Americans.

When I stated to you that Mr. Morse would probably be the biographer of Allston, I had for the moment forgotten that the great artist married a sister of Richard Dana, who, by every claim and qualification, is, of course, the proper person to undertake it. I trust it will not be a "cold abstraction." It is true, the personal and familiar character of all men of genius will not bear posthumous unveiling—but Allston's will. He was, in the phraseology of the old dramatists, "a sweet gentleman." God never wove the woof and warp of taste, feeling, and intellect, under a more clear and transparent surface than in the "Paint King" of our country. You read his mind first, in seeing him. His frame was but the net that held it in. Everybody loved him. Everybody did homage to him—as a man no less than as an artist. Mr. Dana would write for his family circle the kind of memoir we want for the world. He lives in an atmosphere of cold, un-cosmopolite, provincial observance, in Boston, and I am afraid his book will smack of the place and climate. I wish he would go to Florence and write it—off, among the artists, at a proper perspective distance, and with his blood warmed up with the climate and his kinsman's far-off praises. The biography of Allston should embrace the history of the first cycle of American art—from the beginning to Allston's death. It is truly a rare chance for a model biography, and Dana has it in him—minus fusion. But he will think "the schoolmaster is abroad," and I will say no more.

If you are not particularly acquainted with us, dear reader, pray consider this last page in the light of a private letter—inviolable if not addressed simply to yourself. We have tried to convey this for some weeks past by caption—as "More Particularly," "Confidentially," "Just you and I," etc., etc.—but with no apparent success. We are evidently read. Our private slip-slop, twaddled under the secrecy of this page en dishabille, comes back to us, commented on with full-dress criticism by the pastoral editors. Now (courage, while we administer a slice of the dictionary!) our idiosyncrasy is a passion for individual proximity. We would fain be familiar—with one at a time. We write and compile fifteen mortal pages, addressed to the universe. We know by education that it is proper to do so. The snail comes out occasionally from his suitable house, and walks in the open globe. But we are a-cold out of our privacy. We want something between us and the promiscuous points of compass. We yearn to be personal and particular—tête-à-tête. And on this sixteenth page we indulge our little weakness. If you do not love us—you that have turned over this leaf—pardon us, but you intrude!

If there be a time for all things, there is a time to cease to be gregarious. To measure age by years is to weigh gems against paving-stones—but there is a point in middle age—(from thirty to fifty, as you wear)—when the card-case should be burnt in solemn holocaust. For acquaintances you have no more time. The remainder of life is little enough for friends, and, between friends, pasteboard is superfluous. We have ripened to that point—wee! In our pyramid of life the base was broad and sympathetic. We spread ourselves as far as we could reach—but with the rise of the pyramid of years the outer edges have dropped away, and the planes have lessened. We are limited to friends, now. Our mind runs friendship-wise. We tu-tu, as the French say. We like to chat familiarly—with the world shut out—indulged and slip-shod.

We have knocked our head against this corner of speculation, while making threescore or more bows of acknowledgment to editors kind and complimentary. Somebody loves us, there is no doubt. We are wished well in our vocation. And that is much in a world where it is so difficult to butter the dry crust of industry. But, with no design to annoy or rebuke us, there is a leaning, in these friendly notices, to find fault with our frivolity. We are too frisky for breakfast reading. "The spirits of the wise sit in the clouds and mock us." And for this we are sorry.

That the following (from the New Bedford Bulletin) was written by a man who loves us, nobody will doubt—yet see the word we have underlined!—

"The New Mirror for last week is an exquisite number. Willis has scattered his gems of humor, wit, and puppyism, all over it, making it odorous and sparkling as a fountain playing rose-water. Willis is the best American prose-writer of a certain class now living. He is as delicious as Tom Moore, and a great deal more decent."

Now, what is "puppyism?" That it is "odorous," we may venture to take upon our friend's authority. But, if "sparkling as a fountain playing rose-water," Heaven bless the puppy-most, still say we! Would you have us graver? Is there not gravity enough in the world that you can forego our little contribution? Have you no funerals, no false friends, no leaden politics, and no notes to pay—that you must come for our gravity to eke you out? Or do you find fault with our dabble in the superfineries? Is that it? Mustn't we mention "patent leather" and "velvet eyes?" Can't we call the mouth of a charming woman a "pink portico with an ivory door"—without offending you? Come, come, you are not quite the anchorite you would label yourself, and, while flowers will bloom, hortus siccus be hanged—say you not so? Let us talk about the things we like. Life is too short for hypocrisy. Try the trick yourself. Write a paragraph or two in our flummery way, and see how trippingly it comes off, and what an uncoiling from your heart it is of the dull serpent of care!

Put this French proverb in your pipe and smoke it—"Ne pouvoir tolérer les faiblesses d'autrui, voilà la faiblesse." If you never thought of that, thank us for a new precept, and slip a copy of it under your friendships. It keeps out moths like camphor.

Not quite one hundred years after Verrazzano's discovery of the bay of New York, during all which period we have no account of its having been visited by a European vessel, Hudson made the capes of Virginia on his third cruise in search of the northwest passage. Standing still on a northward course, he arrived in sight of the Narrows, distinguishing from a great distance the highlands of Neversink, which his mate, Robert Juet, described in the journal he kept as a "very good land to fall with, and a pleasant land to see."

The most interesting peculiarity of our country to a European observer, is the freshness of its early history, and the strong contrast it presents of most of the features of a highly-civilized land, with the youth and recent adventures of a newly-discovered one. The details of these first discoveries are becoming every day more interesting; and that part of the journal of the great navigator which relates to his first view of them is very interesting. The following extracts describe the Narrows as they were two hundred years ago:

"At three of the clock in the afternoon we came to three great rivers. So we stood along to the northmost, thinking to have gone into it, but we found it to have a very shoal barre before it, for we had but ten foot water. Then we cast about to the southward, and found two fathoms, three fathoms, and three and a quarter, till we came to the souther side of them, then we had five or six fathoms, and anchored. So we sent in our boat to sound, and they found no less water than foure, five, six, and seven fathoms, and returned in an hour and a halfe. So we weighed and went in, and rode in five fathoms, ose ground, and saw many salmons, and mullets, and raves, very great.

"The fourth, in the morning, as soone as the day was light, we saw that it was good riding farther up. So we sent our boate to sound, and found that it was a very good harbour; then we weighed and went in with our ship. Then our boat went on land with our net to fish, and caught ten great mullets, of a foot and a half long apeece, and a ray as great as foure men could hale into the ship. So we trimmed our boat, and rode still all day. At night the wind blew hard at the northwest and our anchor came home, and we drove on shore, but took no hurt, thanked bee God, for the ground is soft sand and ose. This day the people of the country came aboard of us, seeming very glad of our comming, and brought greene tobacco, and gave us of it for knives and beads. They go in deere skins loose, well dressed. They have yellow copper. They desire cloathes, and are very civill. They have great store of maise, or Indian wheate, whereof they make good bread. The country is full of great and tall oaks.

"The fifth, in the morning, as soone as the day was light, the wind ceased; so we sent our boate in to sound the bay. Our men went on land there and saw great store of men, women, and children, who gave them tobacco at their coming on land. So they went up into the woods, and saw great store of very goodly oakes, and some currants.

"The sixth, in the morning, was faire weather, and our master sent John Colman with foure other men in our boat over to the north side, to sound the other river" (the Narrows). "They found very good riding for ships, and a narrow river to the westward" (probably what is now called the Kills, or the passage between Bergen Neck and Staten Island), "between two islands. The lands, they told us, were as pleasant, with grasse and flowers, and goodly trees, as they ever had seen, and very sweet smells came from them. So they went in two leagues and saw an open sea, and returned; and as they came backe they were set upon by two canoes, the one having twelve, the other fourteen men. The night came on, and it began to raime, so that their match went out; and they had one man slain in the fight, which was an Englishman, named John Colman, with an arrow shot into his throat, and two more hurt. It grew so dark that they could not find the shippe that night, but laboured to and fro on their oares.

"The seventh was fair, and they returned aboard the ship, and brought our dead man with them, whom we carried on land and buried."

On the eighth, Hudson lay still, to be more sure of the disposition of the natives before venturing farther in. Several came on board, but no disturbance occurred, and on the ninth he got under weigh, passed the Narrows, and proceeded by slow degrees up the river destined to bear his name.

The current of life seems to be too rapid in America to allow time for reflection upon anything which can possibly be deferred. The monuments are left unfinished on our battle-field; the tombs of great men become indistinguishable before marked with a stone; and the sacred places where patriotism has dwelt, are rated by the value of their material, and left to decay. It is difficult to visit Mount Vernon, and feel, from any mark of care or respect visible about it, that America owes anything to the sacred ashes it entombs.

The family tomb at Mount Vernon has once been robbed by a sacrilegious ruffian, whose ignorance alone preserved for us the remains of Washington. It has been proposed to Congress to buy Mount Vernon, and establish a guard over relics so hallowed. Why should not this be done, and a sufficient sum be appropriated to enclose and keep in order the whole estate, improve the execrable road leading to it from Alexandria, and employ persons to conduct strangers over the place?

The vault in which the ashes of Washington repose, is at the distance of, perhaps, thirty rods from the house, immediately upon the bank of the river. A more romantic and picturesque site for a tomb can scarcely be imagined. Between it and the Potomac is a curtain of forest-trees, covering the steep declivity to the water's edge, breaking the glare of the prospect, and yet affording glimpses of the river, where the foliage is thickest. The tomb is surrounded by several large native oaks, which are venerable by their years, and which annually strew the sepulchre with autumnal leaves, furnishing the most appropriate drapery for the place, and giving a still deeper impression to the memento mori. Interspersed among the oaks, and overhanging the tomb, is a copse of red cedar, whose evergreen boughs present a fine contrast to the hoary and leafless branches of the oak; and while the deciduous foliage of the latter indicates the decay of the body, the eternal verdure of the former furnishes a fitting emblem of the immortal spirit. The sacred and symbolic cassia was familiar to Washington, and, perhaps, led to the selection of a spot where the ever-green flourished.

One of the most interesting associations with the tomb of Washington, is Lafayette's visit to it, as related by Levasseur:—

"After a voyage of two hours, the guns of Fort Washington announced that we were approaching the last abode of the father of his country. At this solemn signal, to which the military band accompanying us responded by plaintive strains, we went on deck, and the venerable soil of Mount Vernon was before us. At this view an involuntary and spontaneous movement made us kneel. We landed in boats, and trod upon the ground so often trod by the feet of Washington. A carriage received General Lafayette; and the other visitors silently ascended the precipitous path which conducted to the solitary habitation of Mount Vernon. In re-entering beneath this hospitable roof, which had sheltered him when the reign of terror tore him violently from his country and family, George Lafayette felt his heart sink within him, at no more finding him whose paternal care had softened his misfortunes; while his father sought with emotion for everything which reminded him of the companion of his glorious toils.

"Three nephews of General Washington took Lafayette, his son, and myself, to conduct us to the tomb of their uncle; our numerous companions remained in the house. In a few minutes the cannon, thundering anew, announced that Lafayette rendered homage to the ashes of Washington. Simple and modest as he was during life, the tomb of the citizen hero is scarcely perceived among the sombre cypresses by which it is surrounded. A vault, slightly elevated and dotted over—a wooden door without inscriptions—some withered and green garlands, indicate to the traveller who visits the spot where rest in peace the puissant arms which broke the chains of his country. As we approached, the door was opened. Lafayette descended alone into the vault, and a few minutes after reappeared, with his eyes overflowing with tears. He took his son and me by the hand, and led us into the tomb, where, by a sign, he indicated the coffin. We knelt reverentially, and rising, threw ourselves into the arms of Lafayette, and mingled our tears with his."

There are manifest signs that the summer is here. The ladies who are on their travels, and the ladies who are not, wear alike the toilet of transit—dust-proof dresses and green veils. "Bound for the Springs" is palpably intended to be expressed by every apparition of beauty in Broadway. The gentlemen, in the absence of the more approved targets at which their irresistibilities are aimed, go about in calico coats, ungloved, unwaistcoated, unstrapped, and uncravatted. Hot corn is cried at midnight. Raspberries are treacherous. Green apples and pears grace the tables of the hucksters. The daily papers show signs of the rustication of the leading editors. Hotels crammed, and a pervading odor of the fruity drinks extending a hundred yards from them in every direction. The summer has arrived, I believe—but I feel called upon to admit that count D'Orsay and Lady Blessington have not. Colonel Stone's virtuous horriification at the mention of such improper people by your correspondent has probably driven them into an incognitudo which has cost the count his whiskers, at least. Without them, Niagara itself would not recognise him—brother wonder as he is—and, if in the land of Boz worship at all, they probably pass for a big Kentuckian and his handsome mother. Keep a look out as you travel, however, amis voyageurs!

Kissing has no longer the drawback of wear and tear. I see that Dr. Ellsworth of Hartford has succeeded in restoring a lost upper lip. The paper which describes it says: "Upon the red facing may possibly be detected the point of connexion between the two halves. The lip is really a handsome one—quite equal to the best cures of hare-lip. No one would for a moment suspect that it had travelled from the cheeks to its present location, which it graces as well as the original, except that it has not quite as free and easy a motion, although enough for all common purposes."

Passengers up the Hudson who wish to take the early trains west, embark at present on the forward deck of the "Empire." Those who are not in a hurry take passage in the after cabin, and on the mooring of the boat at Albany, pay their respects to the ex-president at Kinderhook, from the stern taffrail. She is commanded by Captain Roe, who, in the extent of his jurisdiction, ranks with the governor of Rhode Island, and is a potentate to be propitiated in politics. Seriously, this noble steamer is a very great curiosity. The saloon on her promenade deck is nearly three hundred feet long, and, with four or five hundred people on board, she seems to have few passengers. The sight of her engine at work is an imposing affair. Some of the state-rooms above are small drawing-rooms to accommodate parties, and she is furnished and managed with a luxury and tact worth making a trip to see.

I understand it has lately occurred to some gentlemen with open eyes, that anchorage is cheaper than ground-rent—that a ship-of-war is but a spacious hotel upside-down, and that the most desirable site for a summer residence, as to pure air, neighborhood, novelty, and economy, is now occupied by the "Independence" and "North Carolina," the men-of-war just off the Battery. The latter ship being unseaworthy, it is proposed to purchase her of the government for the experiment. It is estimated that she can accommodate comfortably three hundred persons. The immense upper-deck is to be covered with a weather-proof awning, blue and white, in the style of the Alhambra, and given up entirely to dining, dancing, lounging, and the other uses of hotel drawing-rooms. A more magnificent promenade than this immense deck, cleared of guns and lumber fore-and-aft, and surrounded entirely by luxurious sofas, could scarcely be imagined. The kitchens and offices are to occupy the forward part of the second deck, or, if the vessel is crowded, to be transferred to a small tender alongside. The port-holes are to be enlarged to spacious windows, and the two decks below, which are above the water-line, will be entirely occupied by splendid rooms, open to the entire breadth of the bay, and furnished in the oriental and cushioned style, suitable to the luxurious wants of hot weather. Minute-barges will ply to and from the shore, connected with the Waverley line of omnibuses; bath-houses will be anchored just astern; a café and ice-cream shop will be established in the main and mizen-tops (to be reached by a covered staircase); and sofas, for the accommodation of smokers, will be put under a pent-house roof, outside the vessel, in the main-chains. The cockpit and hold will of course unite the uses of a hotel-garret and cellar. It will have the advantage of other hotels, in swinging round with the tide, so that the lodgers on both sides of the ship will see, by turns, from the windows, the entire panorama of the bay. When lightened of her guns, and her upper spars and rigging, it is thought she will float so much higher as to bear piercing for another line of port-hole windows, affording some bachelor's rooms at the water-line, corresponding in price and convenience with the sky-chambers of the Astor. An eccentric individual, I am told, has bargained for a private parlor, to be suspended under the bowsprit, in imitation of the nest of the hanging-bird. Altogether, the scheme seems charming and feasible. The name of the hotel, by-the-way, is to be "Saratoga Afloat;" the waiters are to be dressed in the becoming toggerly of tars; and the keeper of the house is to wear a folded napkin, epaulet fashion, on either shoulder, and to be called invariably "commodore."

This seems to be the age of invention. Several houses in the city are being made rather higher, by raising them ten feet on screws, and building a story under them—a great economy of the loins of hod-carriers.

As a metropolis of wealth and fashion, New York has one great deficiency—that of a driving park. Rome has its Pincian Hill, Florence its Cascine, Paris its Bois de Boulogne, and London its Hyde Park; and most other capitals have places of resort-on-wheels, where fresh air and congenial society may be met in the afternoon hours. Such a place is only not considered indispensable in New York, because it has never been enjoyed. It is, for the rich, the highest of luxuries. The Cascine of Florence, for example, is a park of two miles square, laid out in wooded avenues; and to its winding roads and forest glades resort, every afternoon, the entire equipaged population of the court and city. At sunset, the carriages meet in an open square in the centre, and the "lords and ladies" pass the two hours of the delicious twilight in visiting from vehicle to vehicle, forming parties for the evening, flirting, making acquaintances, talking scandal, and other dainty diversions—breaking up in time to go to the opera or dress for a ball. There is enough room for such a park in the neighborhood of Union square, or on the East or North river; and the importance of such spaces, left open for lungs to a crowded city, has been long inculcated by physicians. I think it possible such an exclusive resort might be at first a little unpopular (remembering that some three years ago a millionaire was stoned for riding through Broadway with a mounted servant in livery behind him), but, as one of the hand-to-mouth class, I do not care how soon the rich get richer and the poor poorer—leaving a comfortable middle class, in which ambition might stop to breathe.

I notice the introduction of the Italian verandah curtains to New York—the sort of striped demi-umbrella, put out from the top of the window with falling side folds, which are so common in Venice and Naples. Two or three shops in Broadway have them, and Cozzens has lately fitted them on to the windows of his ladies' dining-room—and most showy and picturesque luxuries they are.

Howard has chosen, for the decoy of his hotel, an intermittent relay of governors. The immense flag which sweeps the top of the omnibuses in Broadway on the arrival of such functionaries, seems to have no sinecure of it, and his house is, in consequence, continually overrun. He keeps a table suitable to a court hotel, and seems to be the only one of his class who is independent of "travelling seasons."

I observe that the paviers are at work in the upper part of Broadway, removing the wooden pavement, and substituting the broad, flat stones, such as are laid in the streets of Florence. The wooden blocks were certainly in a deplorable condition, but I do not think they have had fair play as an experiment. They were badly laid, and were left to annoy the public long after they should have been repaired.

A periodical journal in Boston gives the name and true history of Tom Thumb, the dwarf now at the Museum. He was christened Charles Stratton. His parents were of the usual size, and he has two sisters of the usual proportions. General Thumb has not grown since he was six months old, and he is now eleven, and twenty-two inches tall. He is perfectly formed, very athletic for his size, and in perfect health and spirits. In mind he remains childish and unchanged, as in body.

You may have noticed in the New York papers, lately, a great abundance of essays upon bathing. Since the Croton facilities, public attention has been turned a good deal that way, and the prices of baths have been universally diminished, while new bathing establishments have been advertised in various parts of the city. The new one lately opened by Stoppani in Broadway, near the Apollo rooms, exceeds in splendor anything we have yet seen in this line. A sumptuous refectory is part of it; and the long, arched passages of bathing-rooms remind one of the Roman establishments in the way of baths. These were, anciently, the centres around which luxuries of every description were clustered; and Stoppani seems to have built this with a view to sumptuous idling and enjoyment.

The most comprehensive view of Niagara is, no doubt, that from the galleries of Clifton house; but it is, at the same time, for a first view, one of the most unfavorable. Clifton house stands nearly opposite the centre of the irregular crescent formed by the Falls; but it is so far back from the line of the arc, that the height and grandeur of the two cataracts, to an eye unacquainted with the scene, are deceptively diminished. After once making the tour of the points of view, however, the distance and elevation of the hotel are allowed for by the eye, and the situation seems most advantageous. This is the only house at Niagara where a traveller, on his second visit, would be content to live.

Clifton house is kept in the best style of hotels in this country; but the usual routine of such places, going on in the very eye of Niagara, weaves in very whimsically with the eternal presence and power of the cataract. We must eat, drink, and sleep, it is true, at Niagara, as elsewhere; and indeed, what with the exhaustion of mind and fatigue of body, we require at the Falls perhaps more than usual of these three "blessed inventions." The leaf that is caught away by the rapids, however, is not more entirely possessed by this wonder of nature, than is the mind and imagination of the traveller; and the arrest of that leaf by the touch of the overhanging tree, or the point of a rock amid the breakers, is scarce more momentary than the interruption to the traveller's enchantment by the circumstances of daily life. He falls asleep with its surging thunders in his ear, and wakes—to wonder, for an instant, if his yesterday's astonishment was a dream. With the succeeding thought, his mind refills, like a mountain channel, whose torrent has been suspended by the frost, and he is overwhelmed with sensations that are almost painful, from the suddenness of their return. He rises and throws up his window, and there it flashes, and thunders, and agonizes—the same almighty miracle of grandeur for ever going on; and he turns and wonders—what the deuce can have become of his stockings! He slips on his dressing-gown and commences his toilet. The glass stands in the window, and with his beard half achieved, he gets a glimpse of the foam-cloud rising majestically over the top of the mahogany frame. Almost persuaded, like Queen Christina at the fountains of St. Peter's, that a spectacle of such splendor is not intended to last, he drops his razor, and with the soap drying unheeded on his chin, he leans on his elbows, and watches the yesty writhe in the abyss, and the solemn pillars of crystal eternally falling, like the fragments of some palace-crested star, descending through interminable space. The white field of the iris forms over the brow of the cataract, exhibits its radiant bow, and sails away in a vanishing cloud of vapor upon the wind; the tortured and convulsed surface of the caldron below shoots out its frothy and seething circles in perpetual torment; the thunders are heaped upon each other, the earth trembles, and—the bell rings for breakfast! A vision of cold rolls, clammy omelets, and tepid tea, succeeds these sublime images, and the traveller completes his toilet. Breakfast over, he resorts to the colonnade, to contemplate untiringly the scene before him, and in the midst of a calculation of the progress of the fall toward Lake Erie—with the perspiration standing on his forehead, while he struggles to conceive the junction of its waters with Lake Ontario—the rocks rent, the hills swept away, forests prostrated, and the islands uprooted in the mighty conflux—some one's child escapes from its nurse, and seizing him by the legs, cries out, "Da-da."

The ennui attendant upon public houses can never be felt at Clifton house. The most common mind finds the spectacle from its balconies a sufficient and untiring occupation. The loneliness of uninhabited parlors, the discord of baby-thrummed pianos, the dreariness of great staircases, long entries, and bar-rooms filled with strangers, are pains and penalties of travel never felt at Niagara. If there is a vacant half-hour to dinner, or if indisposition to sleep create that sickening yearning for society, which sometimes comes upon a stranger in a strange land, like the calenture of a fever—the eternal marvel going on without is more engrossing than friend or conversation, more beguiling from sad thought than the Corso in carnival-time. To lean over the balustrade and watch the flying of the ferry-boat below, with its terrified freight of adventurers, one moment gliding swiftly down the stream in the round of an eddy, the next, lifted up by a boiling wave, as if it were tossed up from the scoop of a giant's hand beneath the water; to gaze hour after hour into the face of the cataract, to trace the rainbows, delight like a child in the shooting spray-clouds, and calculate fruitlessly and endlessly by the force, weight, speed, and change of the tremendous waters—is amusement and occupation enough to draw the mind from anything—to cure madness or create it.

I met Weir, the painter, at West Point, and he was kind enough to give me a look at his just-finished picture for the Rotundo at Washington. It was but a glimpse of five minutes, while I was waiting for the boat, but I have remembered every line of the picture so distinctly since, that I can speak confidently, at least, of its effect and power of possessing the spectator. Let me transcribe for you the historical passage taken for illustration:—

"And the time being come that they must depart, they were accompanied with most of their brethren out of the city to a town called Delft-Haven, where the ship lay ready to receive them. The next day the wind being fair, they went on board, and their friends with them, where truly doleful was the sight of that sad and mournful parting, to hear what sighs and sobs and prayers did sound amongst them, what tears did gush from every eye, and pithy speeches pierced each other's heart, that sundry of the Dutch strangers that stood on the key as spectators could not refrain from tears; yet comfortable and sweet it was to see such lively and true expressions of dear and unfeigned love. But the tide, which stays for no man, calling them away that were thus loath to depart, their reverend pastor falling down on his knees, and they all with him, with watery cheeks commended them with most fervent prayers unto the Lord and his blessing; and then, with mutual embraces and many tears, they took their leave one of another, which proved to be the last leave to many of them. Thus hoisting sail, with a prosperous gale of wind, they came in a short time to Southampton, where they found the bigger ship come from London."

It would be a curious subject of thought to a man unfamiliar with the wardrobe of the imagination, if he would keep this plain and simple passage of history in his mind while he looks at the gorgeous investiture in which it is clad by the genius of the painter—to compare the picture in his mind while he read it with the picture made of it on this canvass. I will not attempt here—indeed I could not attempt, without seeing it again—anything like a criticism on this painting—but may say what I feel while it deepens in my memory, that I have seen no such glorious work of art in this country, and I have not been more filled and wrought upon by any of the great chefs d'œuvre of the masters in Europe. The effect on the mind is that of expanding the capacity to embrace it. Weir has drawn his figures on a scale larger than life, and the immense canvass is filled with groups of the most exquisite naturalness of posture and relation to each other, but at the same time finished with a breadth and strength of effect that looks done with a hand accustomed to minister only to power without limit. The coloring in the two wings of the picture is exceedingly gorgeous, but the centre, around the kneeling pastor, is admirably subdued in middle tints appropriate to the objects they envelope, and the pastor himself, in face, attitude, and costume, is the most masterly embodiment of hallowed piety and devotion which it is possible for poet to conceive. The presence, on board of the vessel, of Mr. and Mrs. Winslow (the new-married people of fortune, who, while travelling for pleasure, fell in with and joined the emigrants for conscience sake), gives the artist the necessary liberty to enrich the costume of his picture, and there are two or three other female figures very splendidly drawn and colored—among them the wife of Miles Standish, whose soldierly form in the foreground is one of the most conspicuous objects. Of the twenty-odd figures in this grand picture, there is not one about which a great deal might not be written, even with my transiently impressed memory of it, but I reserve it for a more detailed description after another visit. Weir has flung his soul upon this work with the complete abandonment of inspiration, and he has wrought out of it, for his country as well as himself, honor imperishable.

I think it is some thirty miles from Albany to Saratoga, and we did it at the respectable leisure of five hours—rather more time than it took formerly on wheels. True, we did not "devour the way" as we used to do, and it was a comfort to arrive without a lining of dust in one's mouth, but I missed the blowing of the horn, the chirrup and crack of the whip with which we used to dash through the sandy hollow of Congress Spring and pull up at Congress Hall and I missed the group in the portico, and the greetings and the green vines, and I missed—alas, for all the misses of the past! The cars stop in the rear of the "United States," and the outstretched arms of that new caravansary, in the shape of two yellow wings extending to the depot, embrace you as you come to the ground. My friends were all there, and Congress Hall was down hill, in fact and in figure of speech, and casting poetry and the past behind me, I rattled to the rising sun and took lodgings with the Marvins. The ex-president was there, with the thirty or forty pounds of flesh that would not be recognised by the presidential chair, and from five to six hundred of his former subjects sat down with him to dine. Mr. Van Buren has stuck to the "United States," till fashion has gone over to him, for he frequented the house when the belles were on the other side of the street. Whether in the dance of politics, the democracy "chasses across," and leave him on the fashionable side, remains to be seen.

I had not been at "The Springs" for some years, and between the changes in the place and the changes in myself, I was, for a while (as the French charmingly express it) desorienté. In the times that were, a gentleman, on arriving at Saratoga, made his submission to one or two ladies in whom was vested the gynocracy of the season—the mother of a belle, or an ex-belle well preserved, or some marvellous old maid, witty and kindly. Through this door, and this only, could the society of the place be reached, and to this authority the last appeal was made in all cases of doubt and difficulty. The beaux and belles conformed and submitted, exchanged hearts and promised hands, and drove and danced, fished and picnicked, in obedience to this administration—Coventry the dreadful alternative. There were fashionable old-bachelor beaux in those days who were the masters of ceremony, and there were belles, upon whom, individually, was concentrated the beauty now distributed in small parcels over the female population of a state. Every girl is tolerably pretty now. Everybody is, to the extent of his natural capacity, a beau. There is no authority higher than every young lady's mamma. Sent to Coventry by one party, you may stay "at court" with another. Flirts are let flirt without snaffle or martingale. Fortunes are guarded only by the parental dragon. Nabobs and aristocrats are received upon their natural advantages without prestige or favor, and everybody knows everybody, particularly if not from the same city. Having been happiest myself under the old régime, this agrarian anarchy somewhat offended me; and the more, perhaps, that among the company at the "United States," naturally secluding herself somewhat from the crowd, is one of the concentrations of the beauty of ten years ago—a most magnificent woman whom that lustrum of time has passed as lightly as a night's sleep.

Still, there is beauty at Saratoga—enough, indeed, for all purposes of dreaming or waking. The ball at the "United States" on Friday evening was exceedingly brilliant, and at the concert of Castellon on Saturday, when the more serious beauties of Union Hall were added to the assembly, the large saloon was thought to be very thickly spangled with loveliness. At this last-named hotel, by the way, they have introduced family prayers at nine o'clock, and at another less-frequented house they give tea with the dinner—little differences which seem to classify the patronage very effectively. This is the great season of Saratoga, more persons being now at its different hotels than were ever recorded in any previous season. I must not omit to mention the charming improvements by Mr. Clark in the gem of a valley above Congress spring (by walks, shrubbery, etc.), nor the elegance of Marvin's grounds and embellishments at the United States—a superb hotel indeed, in all its appointments.

This is "hop-night" at the Astor, and among the crowd of ladies in the house are a few on their return from Saratoga. The beaux tire of "The Springs" sooner than the belles, and in Broadway yesterday I saw a thick sprinkling of the desirables. Indeed, the weather has been temperate enough to make the city agreeable, and the southerners prefer enjoying Niblo's and the comfortable hotels, when the thermometer ranges below ninety. The boats down the river are very full just now. I came down from West Point in the Empire on Thursday, and found her crowded with presentable company; and with the elegance of the saloons and decks, looking very drawing-rooms-like and gay. There is a great deal of gammon in the reasons given for going and for not going to the Springs; and it is the fashion now for those who are not there to ascribe their absence to a horror of the letter-writers, as if any would be mentioned at all by those immortality-bestowing gentry who did not, by flirting and display, show an appetite for notoriety, and in a crowd, too, quite as promiscuous as the reading public! It would surprise a believing Judeus, after listening to the indignation current in the saloon of Saratoga in the evening, on the subject of the penny papers, to see with what eagerness they are read the next morning, and with what manifest pleasure each lady mentioned shows to her admirers the paragraph pecant. That such letters as I refer to are a very great evil no man who respects the delicacy of private life can doubt; but one half of the mischief, at least, lies in the unwomanly passion for notoriety to which they minister.

Those who linger longest at Saratoga are the families of resident New-Yorkers, their return to town being the return to the solitude of a house to themselves. For "mineral waters" read "society in large doses;" and the real object of attraction is as easily found at the "Astor" or the "American" as at Saratoga. The sea air of Rockaway may stand for a tenth of its attractions, and the other nine parts lie in the necessity of some excusable resort in the neighborhood of the city, which shall supply to the New-Yorkers what the hotels (as a sequel to the Springs) are to travelling strangers. From about the twentieth of this month to the first cool weather, Rockaway will be thronged with excellent society, mostly from this city; and there is a nucleus of half a dozen of the most delightful women in any country, summering there regularly; three admirably lively and accomplished ladies of one family the leading constellation. It is a part of the commonplacery of fashionable chat to fret at the crowd, and wish for more suitable privacy; but it is amusing to observe what a difference of opinion there seems to be between the feet and tongue of the fair exclusive. The belle at Saratoga rises at six and walks to Congress spring. The ostensible object is to drink the waters, which she might have in quite as salutary a state by ringing the bell of her apartment. The platform around the spring is crowded with fashionables; and, elbowed and stared at rather freely, and complaining of both very feelingly, she remains in the crowd till breakfast—solitary walks of the most shaded coolness though there be, hard by and accessible. She breakfasts with five hundred persons, and from the table comes to the drawing-room, where she promenades, and is elbowed as before, till eleven. At that hour she goes with a party to the bowling-alleys, where she amuses herself till the dressing-bell for dinner. And after dinner she mingles in the full-dress crowd once more till tea-time (with perhaps the parenthesis of a drive with a party to the lake), and from tea-time till midnight she is in the same crowd, and goes to bed late to get up again early, and so, burning her candle at both ends, finds Saratoga enchanting. But it is not the less "dreadfully crowded," and "horridly mixed."

The music at Saratoga was one of its pleasures to me. The band plays at the spring from six to eight in the morning, and the morning hours (anacronistics to the contrary notwithstanding) are the part of the day when the senses are most acutely sensitive to pleasure. If I am to see a fine picture with the clearest eye, or read a page of poetry with the subtlest appreciation, or listen to the sweet divisions of music with the nicest and most interpreting ear, or hear a deep-found thought of love, friendship, or philosophy, give it me in the early morning of midsummer. The perturbed blood flows evenly, and the perceptions have settled over-night like a roiled well; and (if in temperate health) the heart is softer and more susceptible. To express a plain fact poetically—the marble lid is lifted from the fountain of tears at that hour, and though the waters do not "well forth," they are open to the dropping in of those pearls of attendant angels—love, beauty, and music. Yet, "before breakfast" is said commonly to be the prose of the day.

One hour of music after dinner is made tributary to the smokers. The ladies and the tobacco eschewers are out of its reach in the drawing-room, but the papas and the inveterates bring their chairs out to the grassy area of the "United States," and smoke under the shade, listening to the German band contentedly and contemplatively. And that is a very pleasant hour; and taken advantage of by those who, like myself, find comfort in the ellipses of conversation.

As to living at Saratoga, no reasonable person would expect a comfortable dinner, sitting down with five or six hundred persons. The meats get cold in the spreading. But, to those who are drinking the waters, any check upon the appetite is not unsalutary, and, for the gourmet, the Lake House, and one or two other resorts in the neighborhood, offer game and fish dinners in compensatory perfection. I went over to Barhydt's dark lake, the scene of the loves of the lustrum gone by, and found it looking neglected and forsaken. The old Dutchman is dead, and his quiet successors look out with repelling surprise upon the gay and intruding visitors. It has ceased to be frequented.

I saw at the engraver's yesterday a portrait of Halleck, engraved for Graham's Magazine, which exceeds anything I have before seen, as a worthy and truthful representation of a poet. It is to be published in the September number, I believe, and is one of the well-conceived series of portraits in progress of publication in that magazine. The keen, joyous, analytical gusto which give such a "saucy Robert" to Halleck's poetry is admirably conveyed in this picture, and a more faithful likeness was never drawn. The original is by Inman.

Broadway in August is like a pocket-full of change with the gold and silver picked out of it; and like the disrespectful finger thrust by its owner into its scarce diminished bulk, Mr. Stopintown, the loungeer, contemptuously threads the crowd, of which he knows the less precious and residual quality. But let us try again—for this beginning is too Jeremy-Taylor-ous.

Have you ever started at Niblo's, dear reader, and, with your eyes particularly open, walked down the "shilling side" of Broadway to the Park? You must have done this, and with speculation in your eyes too, before you can detect, on the fashionable side of Broadway in August, a certain class of promenaders visible there in no other month, by gas or daylight. Now it occurs to us, that, in the spiritual geography of this shop-and-show land, we can very possibly give you a lesson.

Few people live more in the eye of the world than those who are in transition from poverty to riches, bound upward. None are so invisible as those who are going over the same road, downward. The eye, in the city, acquires a habit of selecting what it shall see. Glimpse, the porter (to put it figuratively), sits in the outer vestibule of sight, and passes his judgment on all comers before they are admitted to the presence of consciousness. Prosperity has a color of its own, and a coat with a needy pocket in its skirt is as invisible as the sick heart it is buttoned over. You walk Broadway from the Battery to Bond street (on the golden side), and you remark every flippery-flirt and boy-beau, and could recel upon oath their respective riband and waistcoat; yet a man of genius has gone by, with a thought in his brain new from God, but under a hat set distrustfully on, and you would swear in a witness-box that he never crossed your eye. Visible is an arbitrary word in large cities.

But it is a devilish truth that in proportion as the poverty-stricken become invisible, their consciousness of being seen becomes painfully sensitive. They feel pointed at with the finger when they are as totally unobserved as the driver of an omnibus. The prosperous and gay, too—the very persons who are blindest to their presence—seem to them their most vigilant and insulting observers. And as there is a side of the street proper to the rich and the happy, the poor and wretched walk on the other. The great haunt of the distressed—the Alsatia of poverty and crime—the lair of the outcast of hope and pity—borders Broadway on the east. In their recoil from the abyss they hang over—turning back in terror from the fiendish abandonment of the Five Points, the last platform between despair and death—the unhappy come to that limit of Broadway and look across. And up and down, between Prince street and Chamber, they walk, with a shunning gait, and shoulders shrinking at your look as from a blow, and watch the happy on the other side—wretched men of all degrees of desperation, from the first downward step to the last.

Oh, you should walk there, now and then! You will walk there—perhaps you have, with unconscious selection, already—when in want of money. With the same clothes you wore when you had enough—with a cravat as saucily expensive—gloved and booted comme il faut—you will instinctively take the other side of the street if out of pocket—if a five-dollar bill, that is to say—unconsidered rag not long before—covers now as much void as the zodiac! Oh, most comparative five-dollar bill!

But the faces on the "shilling side" of Broadway! If you want a heart-ache, to be succeeded by content with your lot and a prayer to God, cross over and look at one or two. The eyelid unrelaxed—the mouth shut up within, and the lips bloodless with the compression of the tongue matted to the teeth—the livid pits beneath the eyes, and the veins blood-shot round the pupil—the rigid neck—the jaw set up with desperate endurance—the contracted nostril, and the complexion set and dead. And this is the countenance of only poverty—only the agony of one man wanting a little of what another has too much of—of which the church, building for the God of mercy at the head of Wall street, has millions more than it can spend without ingenuity of extravagance! Are you and I parts of a world like this, dear reader!

But in August the gay and prosperous go off, and the golden-side of Broadway is left to the mechanical and the stranger. Of these the shabby and unhappy have no dread, and they come over and walk, with only their despair, in the haunts they once frequented. You will see them in Broadway now—your attention once directed to them—and if it be on Saturday, preach who will on Sunday, you will have profited the day before by a better sermon.

In looking down on the valley of Wyoming, made memorable by savage barbarity and famous by the poet's wand of enchantment, it is natural to indulge in resentful feeling toward the sanguinary race whose atrocities make up its page in story. It is a pity, however, that they, too, had not a poet and a partial chronicler. Leaving entirely out of view the ten thousand wrongs done by the white man to the Indian, in the corruption, robbery, and rapid extinction of his race, there are personal atrocities, on our own records exercised toward that ill-fated people, which, in impartial history hereafter, will redeem them from all charge except that of irresistible retaliation. The brief story of the famous Cornstalk, sachem of the Shawanees, and king of the northern confederacy, is sermon enough on this text.

The northwestern corner of Virginia, and that part of Pennsylvania contiguous, on the south, was the scene of some of the bloodiest events of Indian warfare. Distinguished over all other red men of this region, was Cornstalk. He was equally a terror to the men of his own tribe (whom he did not hesitate to hew down with his tomahawk if they showed any cowardice in fight), and a formidable opponent to our troops, from his military talents and personal daring. He was, at the same time, more than all the other chiefs of the confederacy, a friend to the whites; and, energetic as he was when once engaged in battle, never took up arms willingly against them. After the bloody contest at Point Pleasant, in which Cornstalk had displayed his generalship and bravery, to the admiration of his foes, he came in to the camp of Lord Dunmore, to make negotiations for peace. Colonel Wilson, one of the staff, thus describes his oratory: "When he arose, he was nowise confused or daunted, but spoke in a distinct and audible voice, without stammering or repetition, and with peculiar emphasis. His looks, while addressing Dunmore, were truly grand and majestic, yet graceful and attractive. I have heard many celebrated orators, but never one whose powers of delivery surpassed those of Cornstalk on this occasion."

In the spring of 1777, it was known that an extensive coalition was forming among the tribes, and that it only waited the consent and powerful aid of the Shawanees, to commence war upon the whites. At this critical time, Cornstalk, accompanied by Red Hawk, came on a friendly visit to the fort at Point Pleasant, communicated the intentions of the tribes, and expressed his sorrow that the tide set so strongly against the colonists, that he must go with it in spite of all his endeavors.

Upon receiving this information, given by the noble savage in the spirit of a generous enemy, the commander of the garrison seized upon Cornstalk and his companion as hostages for the peaceful conduct of his nation, and set about availing himself of the advantage he had gained by his suggestions. During his captivity, Cornstalk held frequent conversations with the officers, and took pleasure in describing to them the geography of the west, then little known. One afternoon, while he was engaged in drawing on the floor a map of the Missouri territory, its water-courses and mountains, a halloo was heard from the forest, which he recognised as the voice of his son Ellinpsico, a young warrior, whose courage and address were almost as celebrated as his own. Ellinpsico entered the fort, and embraced his father most affectionately, having been uneasy at his long absence, and come hither in search of him.

The day after his arrival, a soldier went out from the fort on a hunting excursion, and was shot by Indians. His infuriated companions instantly resolved to sacrifice Cornstalk and his son. They charged upon Ellinpsico that the offenders were in his company, but he declared that he had come alone, and with the sole object of seeking his father. When the soldiers came within hearing, the young warrior appeared agitated. Cornstalk encouraged him to meet his fate composedly, and said to him, "My son, the Great Spirit has sent you here that we may die together!" He turned to meet his murderers the next instant, and receiving seven bullets in his body, expired without a groan.

When Cornstalk had fallen, Ellinpsico continued still and passive, not even raising himself from his seat. He met death in that position with the utmost calmness. "The other Indian," says the chronicle, "was murdered piecemeal, and with all those circumstances of cruelty with which the savage wreaks his vengeance on his enemy."

The day before his death, Cornstalk had been present at a council of the officers, and had spoken to them on the subject of the war, with his own peculiar eloquence. In the course of his remarks, he expressed something like a presentiment of his fate. "When I was young," he said, "and went out to war, I often thought each would be my last adventure, and I should return no more. I still lived. Now I am in the midst of you, and, if you choose, you may kill me. I can die but once. It is alike to me whether now or hereafter!"

His atrocious murder was dearly expiated. The Shawanees, the most warlike tribe of the west, became thenceforward the most deadly and implacable foes to the white man.

Nine o'clock—an August morning—and every breath out of doors like a bird's life pressed into a minute! The breast of the earth naked to the sun—the air in a trance—the river breathless with the beauty of the sky it mirrors—and at such an hour to see the ghost of a mended pen and a stubborn resolution! Out upon the art of writing! Is there no honest wood-chopper, no dog, no squirrel, no anything out of doors, that will change lives with me! Down, school-boy heart! and come hither, since thou must, pen, ink, and paper!—stationary, indeed!

Close the shutters now, and bring candles! If I am to sit at this table till noon, I will have it night. Slip-sers, Thomas! And then shut the stable-door; my horse neighs; lock up the saddle and lose the key! And, Thomas! lend old Peter my boat, and break the fishing-rod, and scare away the birds from the window. Has a skylark possessed my soul or no—that I so hate the roof over my head this radiant morning.

Play to me ere I begin! Music is creative! What a benefactor to the world is John Chickering! How exquisitely balanced are those octaves, and how gloriously (with that touch) the rich instrument revels through the music! The builder of these caves of harmony has a poet's vocation. What is poetry but the vehicle of man's enthusiasm—the element in which float fancy and feeling—the suggestive awakener of intellect—the soother of care and pain! He who writes a poem that is read and loved by a thousand hearths, links himself with an angel's round of delight and sympathy; and the builder of a thousand harmonious instruments follows in the same bright orbit of influence. It has been said that "he who can not find happiness can not find an easy-chair." For easy-chair I read one of the evenly-balanced, rich, true, rounded and incomparable instruments of John Chickering. I have erected mine into a household god!

Play me those "Hope Waltzes" again. They come off like Ariel's spiriting. But to bewitch the heels and stir the brain the "Flower Waltzes" against the world! I have made out their language by daily listening to them, and if I can not divine the composer's thought when they were born, I can tell what they express, as I can what all music expresses that I love and hear often. It is the difference between good and bad music, that one is an articulate thought, and the other mere jingle and gibberish. Among the "coming events" that "cast their shadows before," is, I think, a musical era, in which the intellectual qualities of harmony in sounds will be studied and understood. For one of the most powerful levers on the human heart, singly or in mass, music has been strangely undervalued, and its professors and masters have been as strangely stigmatized as an idle and unintellectual class of people. A revolution has begun in church music, and in Boston (by the efforts of one educated and enthusiastic man, Mr. Mason) the church choirs have become as effective and eloquent as the sermon. The perfection to which Chickering has brought the structure of that universal instrument, the piano; this musical reform in Boston; the introduction of singing into the systems of education for children, and last (not least surprising), the adoption of music as a political engine, and its powerful operation, are "signs of the times" which would warrant a musical man of genius in creating a new liberal profession—the adaptation of expression to sound, and the marriage of emotion to music. Moore understands this mystery, and when in Spain (I once heard him say) wrote several of his most pathetic songs to the gayest airs of the peasantry. We have tried rewording old songs with some effect, and it is like bringing notes to their right mind and making them talk sense. There is a delicious thing by Topliff—"Consider the lilies how they grow"—which makes one feel as if the whole Bible should be chanted; and the "Six Songs from Scripture," by Moore, are very beautiful. But admirably as Moore's words are always married to his music, there is one song of his set to an air of Bellini's, which seems to me the masterpiece of sense linked to corresponding harmony. I can not at this moment name the opera from which the air is taken, nor the volume of Moore which contains the poetry. It commences

"Is it not sweet to think, hereafter,
When the spirit leaves this sphere," and is published in a book called "Kingsley's Choir." It is a song to "lap you in Elysium."

From Memnon to Helicon is but to "jump Jim Crow." Who is writing poetry? Nobody in England, I think, but Mrs. Norton, and out of her sorrows this beautiful woman is beginning to weave herself an immortality. The allusion to her mother in one of her late fugitive pieces, and the frequent mention of her children, are touched in the very deepest truth of nature as well as in the finest skill of the poet. It was necessary for the world that this fine genius should be "tried by fire." With her remarkable beauty, naturally gay spirits, and unequalled powers of fascination, Mrs. Norton, had the course of her life and love run smooth, would never have sounded those sorrowful depths of her heart from which wells out the bitterness so sweet in song. Happy—we should have heard but of her beauty. Wronged, persecuted, and robbed of her children and her good name—we build her an altar in our hearts as the most gifted poetess of her time, and posterity will perpetuate the worship. Is this compensation or no?

By that blast upon the farmer's dinner-horn, twelve o'clock! Avaunt, quill! "sweat of my brow!" In how many shapes comes the curse of the fall upon us! This horn, which calls in my farmer to repose from his curse in his chair, releases me from mine to let me amuse myself with his labor. My curse is worked out indoors—his in the field. The literal "sweat of the brow" is my greatest happiness, and his heavy fulfilment of the anathema. Light sits his curse, however, to my thinking, who bears it out of doors! The yearning for physical action; impatience of confinement, dislike of the cobweb niceties of life, seem to me feelings which grow into passions with increasing years. Will no one invent a daguerreotype for the mind, that our thoughts may record themselves—letting us walk where we list? The pencil is to be done away with—why not the pen?

Weir, the painter, is moving his glorious picture to Boston, for exhibition. It will be opened to visitors there by the first of September. It is to be exhibited, afterward, at the National Academy in New York—the first home of the pilgrims having, very properly, the honor of the first sight of it. Weir will steep himself in his countrymen's hearts, as his picture shows them how honestly, as well as with what splendor of genius, he has executed their commission. I understand that Vanderlyn's picture is very fine. There are several persons employed in filling up his design, but Mr. Vanderlyn's own pencil is to harmonize and finish it. Mr. Morse has given up his palette and brushes, to devote himself to his electro-galvanic telegraph, which is now being laid down. The visit of Inman, the painter, to England, is partly an errand for the study of costume and data required for his picture for the rotunda.

There seems to be a lull in literature, which I hope is the precursor of a storm on the subject of copyright. No new books of any description since the "Last of the Barons." The "Change for American Notes" is not by Miss Sedgwick, and I presume that the editor of the Enquirer, who must be acquainted, as well as anybody, with her propriety "thrice bolted o'er," had not looked into the free-and-easy pages of the book when he pronounced her the authoress. There is some dispute over julep-straws about the authorship of "Philip in Search of a Wife." It is

"by a Gentleman Butterfly," and is a sequel to "Kate in Search of a Husband," by Lady Chrysalis. But public rumor, which was foiled in striving to identify the lady chrysalis with the brightest of the callow divinities of Broadway, has covered the wings of the gentleman butterfly with the same attractive petticoat. Having no eyesight to spare, I wait for an Appleton edition before reading the book. I think that the two or three tricks practised upon title-pages not long ago, have materially hurt the credit of those respectable old truth-tellers, and at the same time have dampened the interest in new publications.

TO MISS VIOLET MABY, AT SARATOGA.

ASTOR HOUSE, August, 1843.

Start fair, my sweet Violet! This letter will lie on your table when you arrive at Saratoga, and it is intended to prepare you for that critical campaign. You must know the ammunition with which you go into the field. I have seen service, as you know, and, from my retirement (on half-pay), can both devise strategy and reconnoitre the enemy's weakness, with discretion. Set your glass before you on the table, and let us hold a frank council of war.

You never were called beautiful, as you know; and at home you have not been a belle—but that is no impediment. You are to be beautiful, now, or at least to produce the result of beauty, which is the same thing; and of course you are to be a belle—the belle, if I mistake not, of the season. Look in your mirror, for a moment, and refresh your memory with the wherewithal.

You observe that your mouth has blunt corners—which, properly managed, is a most effective feature. Your complexion is rather darkly pale, your forehead is a shade lower than is thought desirable, your lips are full, sweet, and indolent, and your eyes are not remarkable unless when well handled. The lids have a beauty, however, which a sculptor would understand, and the duskiess around them may intensify, exceedingly, one particular expression. Your figure is admirably perfect, but in this country, and particularly among the men you are to control, this large portion of female beauty is neither studied nor valued. Your hair is too profuse to be dressed quite fashionably, but it is a beauty not to be lost, so it must be coiffed a l'abandon—a very taking style to a man once brought to the point of studying you.

There are two phases in your character, Violet—earnestness and repose. The latter shows your features to the most advantage, besides being a most captivating quality in itself. I would use it altogether for the first week. Gayety will never do. A laugh on a face like yours is fatal. It spreads, into unmeaning platitudes, the little wells in the corners of your mouth (the blunt corners I spoke of above), and it makes your eyes smaller—which they can not well bear. Your teeth are minion and white, it is true, but they show charmingly when you speak, and are excellent, as reserved artillery, to follow an introduction. Save your mirth till the game is won, my dear Violet!

Of course you will not appear at breakfast the first morning after your arrival. The mental atmosphere of the unaired hours is too cold and questioning for a first appearance. So is the hungry half-hour till the soup is removed. Go down late to dinner. Till after the first glass of wine, the heart of man is a shut book—opened then for entries, and accessible till shut again by sleep. You need no table-lesson. You eat elegantly, and, with that swan's-neck wrist, curving and ivory-fair, your every movement is ammunition well-bestowed. But there may, or may not, be a victim on the other side of the table.

After dinner is the champ de bataille! The men are gallant, the ladies melted out, impulses a-top, the key of conversation soprano, and everybody gay and trivial. So be not you. It is not your style. Seat yourself where you will have a little space for a foreground, lean your light elbow on your left wrist, and support your cheek languidly in the hollow of your gloved thumb and forefinger. Excuse the particularity, but try the attitude as you sit, now. Pretty—is it not?

Look only out of the tops of your eyes! If women's glances were really the palpable shafts the poets paint them, the effective ones would cut through the eyebrows. Stupid ones slide over the under lid. Try this! How earnest the glance with the head bent downward!—how silly the eyes with the chin salient! And move your eye indolently, my charming Violet! It traverses the frisky gayety-woof of the hour with a pretty thread of contrast that looks like superiority. Men have a natural contempt for themselves when in high spirits, and repose comes over them like a star left in heaven after the turn of a rocket.

Nothing is prettier in woman than a leaning head! Bow without removing the supporting hand from your cheek when a man is introduced to you; smile tranquilly, and look steadfastly in his eyes and hear what he has to say. Lucky for you—it is his dévoir to commence conversation! And in whatever tone he speaks, pitch your reply a note lower! Unutterably sweet is the contralto tone of woman, and the voices of two persons, conversing, are like the plummets of their hearts—the deeper from the deeper—so felt, and so yielded. If you think it worth your while to harmonize with his tone afterward, either in argument or tenderness, the compliment is only less subtle than overpowering.

There is a great deal of promenading at Saratoga, and natural instinct will teach you most of its over-comingnesses; but I will venture a suggestion or two. If you are bent on damage to your man, lay your wrist forward to his, and let your hand drop over it, when you take his arm. No mortal eye would think it particular, nor would he—but there is a kind of unconscious affectionateness about it which is electric. Of course you would not resort to manifest pressure, or leaning heavily, except you were carrying on the war a Pourfrance. Walk with your head a little drooped. If you wish to walk more slowly, tell him so, but don't hang back. It is enchanting to have a woman "head you off," as the sailors say, as if she were trying to wind around you—and it has the charm, too, of not looking particular!

As to conversation, the trick is born with woman. If her person is admired to begin with, this is the least of her troubles. But though you are sweet subjects, and men like to hear you talk about yourselves, there is a sweeter subject, which they like better than you—themselves. And lean away from merriment, Violet! No man ever began to love, or made any progress in loving, while a woman was laughing. There is a confidingness in subdued tones and sad topics which sinks through the upper-crust of a man like a stone through the thin ice of a well. And if he is a man of natural sentiment or feeling, though a worldling himself, the less worldliness in you, the better. Piety, in those who are to belong to us, is a spell that, in any but mythological days, would have superseded the sirens.

I believe that is all, Violet. At least it is all I need harp upon, to you. Dress, you understand to a miracle. I see, by the way, that they are wearing the nair now, like the chains on the shoulder of a hussar—three or four heavy curls swung from the temples to be back-knot. And that will be pretty for you, as your jaw is not Napoleonesque, and looks better for partial hiding. Ruin your father, if necessary, in gloves and shoes. Primroses should not be fresher. And whatever scarfs are made for, wear nothing to break the curves from ear-tip to shoulder—the sculpture lines of beauty in woman. Keep calm. Blood out of place is abominable. And last, not least, for Heaven's sake don't fall in love! If you do, my precepts go for nothing, and your belleship is forgotten by all but "the remainder biscuit."

Your affectionate uncle, CINNA BEVERLEY.

The above curious letter was left in the dressing-table drawer of No. —, United States Hotel. It was not generally known that the young lady who had occupied the room before a certain respectable spinster (who handed us the letter, taking the responsibility of its publication as a warning), eloped after the third day of her belleship—as was to be expected. The result of such pestilent advice is its own proper moral.

Next to eating, drinking, loving, and money-making, the greatest desire of human beings seems to be to discover the lining of each other's brains; and the great difference between authors and other people seems mainly to consist in the faculty of turning out this lining to the view. But in this same lining there are many plaits, wrinkles, and corners, which even authors scarce think it worth their while to expand, but which, if accidentally developed, create an interest, either by their correspondence with other people's wrinkles, or by their intrinsic peculiarity.

Let us see if we can give a sketchy idea of the rise and progress of literary celebrity in London; or, in other words, the climbing into society, and obtaining of notice by men who have a calling to literature. Sterne's method of generalizing, by taking a single instance, is a very good one, and we will touch here and there upon the history of an individual whom we know, and who, after achieving several rounds of the ladder of society, is still, we believe, slowly making his way upward—or downward. Let us call him Snooks, if you please, for we can not give his real name, and still speak as freely as we wish to do of his difficulties in mounting. Snooks was a Manchester boy of good birth, brought up to business—his position at home about equal to that of a merchant's son in New York. He began writing verses for the country papers, and at last succeeded in getting an article into the London New Monthly, and with this encouragement came up to town to follow literature for a livelihood. With a moderate stipend from his father, he lived a very quiet life for a couple of years, finding it rather difficult to give away his productions, and quite impossible to sell them. There was no opening at the same time through which he could even make an attempt to get a footing in desirable society. In the third year he became proof-reader to one of the publishers, and being called upon to write anticipatory puffs of works he had examined in manuscript, he came under the notice of the proprietor of one of the weeklies, and by a lucky chance was soon after employed as sub-editor. This was his first available foothold. It was his business, of course, to review new books, and, as a "teller" in the bank of fame, he was a personage of some delegated importance. His first agreeable surprise was the receipt of a parcel in scented paper, containing the virgin effusions of a right honorable lady, who, in a little note, with her compliments to Mr. Snooks (for she had inquired the name of her probable critic through a literary friend), begged a notice of her little book, and a call from Mr. Snooks when he should have committed his criticisms to paper. Snooks was a man of very indifferent personables, his hair of an unmitigated red, and his voice of a very hair-splitting treble; but he had a violent taste for dress, and a born passion for countesses; and he wrote most unexceptionable poetry, that would pass for anybody's in the world, it was so utterly free from any peculiarity. This last quality made him an excellent verse-tinker, and he was the man of all others best suited to solder over the cracks and chasms of right honorable poetry. He wrote a most commendatory criticism of her ladyship's book, quoting some passages, with here and there an emendation of his own, and called at the noble mansion with the critique in his pocket. By this bridge of well-born vanity, paying the humiliating toll of insincere praise, he crossed the repelling barrier of aristocratic life, and entered it as the necessary incumbrance in her ladyship's literary fame. Her ladyship was "at home" on Thursday evenings, and Snooks became the invariable first comer and last goer-away; but his happiness on these Thursday evenings could only be called happiness when it was "reconnitred from the distance of Manchester. He went always in an irreproachable waistcoat, fresh gloves, and varnished shoes, but his social performances for the evening consisted in his first bow to her ladyship, and her ladyship's "How d'y'e do, Mr. Snooks?" After this exciting conversation, he became immediately interested in some of the bijoux upon the table, striding off from that to look at a picture in the corner, or to procure the shelter of a bust upon a pedestal, behind which he could securely observe the people, so remarkably unconscious of his presence. Possibly, toward the latter part of the evening, a dandy would level his glass at him and wonder how the devil he amused himself, or some purblind dowerer would mistake him for the footman, and ask him for a glass of water; but these were his nearest approaches to an intimacy with the set in which he visited. After a couple of years of intercourse with the nobility on this footing, he becomes acquainted with one or two other noble authors at the same price, frequents their parties in the same way, and having unequivocal evidence (in notes of invitation) that he visits at the West End, he now finds a downward door open to society in Russell square. By dint of talking authentically of my lady this, and my lord the other, he obtains a vogue at the East End which he could only get by having come down from a higher sphere, and through this vestibule of aristocratic contempt he descends to the highest society in which he can ever be familiar. Mr. Snooks has written a novel in three volumes, and considers himself fully established as one of the notabilities of London; but a fish out of water is happy in comparison with Snooks when in the society of the friends he talks most about, and if he were to die tomorrow, these very "friends" would with difficulty remember anything but his red head, and the exemplary patience with which he submitted to his own society.

The fact is, that the position of a mere literary man in England, in any circle above that to which he is born, is that of a jackall. He is invited for what he contributes to the entertainment of the aristocratic lions and lionesses who feed him. He has neither power nor privilege in their sphere. He dare not introduce a friend, except as another jackall, and it would be for very extraordinary reasons that he would ever name at the tables where he is most intimate, his father or mother, wife, sister, or brother. The footman, who sometimes comes to him with a note or book, knows the difference between him and the other guests of his master, and by an unpunishable difference of manner, makes the distinction in his service. The abandon which they feel in his presence, he never feels in theirs; and we doubt whether Thomas Moore himself, the pet of the English aristocracy for forty years, ever forgot, in their company, that he was in the presence of his superiors, and an object of condescension.

Now we have many people in this country, Americans born, who are monarchists, and who make no scruple in private conversation of wishing for a defined aristocracy, and other infrangible distinctions between the different classes of society. In the picture they draw, however, they themselves figure as the aristocrats; and we must take the liberty, for the moment, of putting them "below the salt," and setting forth a few of their annoyances. Take the best-received Americans in London—yourself, for example, Mr. Reader! You have no fixed rank, and therefore you have nothing to keep you down, and can rise to any position in the gift of your noble entertainer. As a foreigner, you circulate freely (as many well-introduced Americans do) through all the porcelain penetrals of the West End. You are invited to dine, we will say, with his grace, the Duke of Devonshire. There are ten or twelve guests, all noble except yourself; and when you look round upon the five other gentlemen, it is possible that, without vanity, you may come to the conclusion, that in dress, address, spirit, and natural gifts, you are at least the equal of those around you. Dinner is late in being announced, and meantime, as you know all the ladies, and are particularly acquainted with the youngest and prettiest, you sit down by the latter, and promise yourself the pleasure of giving her an arm when the doors are thrown open, and sitting by her at dinner. The butler makes his appearance at last, and the lady willingly takes your arm—when in steps my Lord Flummery, who is a terrible "spoon," but undoubtedly "my lord" takes the lady from you, and makes his way to the dinner-table. Your first thought is to follow and secure a place on the other side of her, but still another couple or two are to take precedence, and you are left at last to walk in alone, and take the seat that is left—perhaps between two men who have a lady on the other side. Pleasant—isn't it?

Again. You are strolling in Regent street or the park with an Englishman, whose acquaintance you made on your travels. He is a man of fortune, and as independent in his character as any man in England. On the continent he struck you as particularly high-minded and free from prejudice. You are chatting with him very intimately, when a young nobleman, not remarkable for anything but his nobility, slips his arm into your friend's and joins the promenade. From that moment your friend gives you about as much of his attention as he does to his walking-stick, lets your questions go unanswered, let them be never so clever, and enjoys with the highest zest the most remote spoonysities of my lord. You, perhaps, as a stranger, visit in my lord's circle of society, and your friend does not; but he would as soon think of picking my lord's pocket as of introducing you to him, and, if you begin to think you are Monsieur de Trop, and say "good morning," your friend, who never parted from you before without making an engagement to see you again, gives you a nod without turning his head from his lordship, and very dryly echoes your "good morning." And this, we repeat, the most independent man in England will do, for he is brought up to fear God and honor a lord, and it is bred in his bone and brain.

We could give a thousand similar instances, but the reader can easily imagine them. The life of a commoner in England is one of inevitable and daily eclipse and mortification—nothing but the force of early habits and education making it tolerable to the Englishman himself, and nothing at all making it in any way endurable to a republican of any pride or spirit. You naturally say, "Why not associate with the middle classes, and let the aristocracy go to the devil?" but individually sending people to the devil is of no use, and the middle classes value yourself and each other only as your introduction to them is aristocratic, or as their friends are approvable by an aristocratic eye. There is no class free from this humiliating weakness. The notice of a lord will at any time take the wind out of your sails when a lady is in the case; your tailor will leave you half-measured to run to my lord's cab in the street; your doctor will neglect your fever for my lord's cold; your friend will breakfast with my lord, though engaged particularly to you; and the out-goings and in-comings, the sayings and doings, the stupidities, impudencies, manners, greetings, and condescensions of lords and ladies, usurp the conversation in all places, and to the interruption or exclusion of the most grave or personal topics.

Understand us, we grudge no respect to dignities or authorities. Even to wealth as power, we are willing to yield the wall. But we say again, that a republican spirit must rebel against homage to anything human with which it never can compete, and in this lies the only distinction (we fervently hope) which will ever hedge in an American aristocracy. Let who will get to windward of us by superior sailing—the richer, the handsomer, the cleverer, the stronger, the more beloved and gifted—there was fair play at the start, and we will pay deference and duty with the promptest. But no lords and ladies, Mr. President, if you love us.

I am very sorry to record a good piece of news for the coachmakers:—that the ladies are beginning to get superfine about riding in omnibuses. The omnibus convenience has been upon an excellent footing for the last few years, used, indeed, with a freedom and propriety peculiar to this country, and somewhat characteristic of its deference to the sex. From the longitudinal shape of New York, it is easy to go anywhere by omnibus, at any moment, and even if a carriage could be kept for a shilling a day, the trouble and delay attending a private equipage, would induce many to give them up, and spend their shilling in the "Broadway lines." The gentility of the custom, too, has induced the proprietors to embellish and enlarge their vehicles, and for sixpence you may ride two or three miles in a very elegant conveyance, and mostly with very elegant people. Of late, however, it has become a habit with an improper class of persons to ride backward and forward, instead of walking Broadway, and propriety has very naturally taken a fright. I am very much afraid, from the symptoms, that omnibuses will become in New York, what they are in England and Paris—useful only to the un-ornamental classes of society. If so, it will be another step (among many I have noticed lately) toward separating the rich from the middle classes by barriers of expense. With an errand, or an acquaintance two miles off, a lady must ride, at some cost, as a habit, if omnibuses are tabooed.

I understand, by inquiry, that there are one hundred and fifty omnibuses plying in New York city. The receipts amount to about eight dollars per diem for each one, and the expense wear and tear, &c., subtract five from this sum, leaving a profit of three dollars a day on each vehicle. Yet some of them go a course of three miles for the invariable sixpence. There are certain parts of the day when it is difficult to get a place in an omnibus—wishing to ride up Broadway, for instance, at the dinner hour or at dusk. There are several drawn by four horses, which contain twenty odd persons. One named for Forrest, the tragedian, with "Edwin Forrest" splendidly emblazoned on the body, is particularly magnificent. I saw one last night for the first time on three wheels—with two rows of seats, like two omnibuses put lengthwise together. The change from hackney-coaches to cabs is very unsatisfactory to passenger as well as horse. The old New York jarseys were the best in the world, with the offset of the most abominable imposition in the known world, in the charges of drivers. Cabs were introduced to remedy this; and now one horse draws the load of two, and reduces the owner's expenses one half, while the imposition is in no way lessened. There are laws, but as ninety-nine persons in a hundred would rather be fleeced than prosecute or bully, the extortion goes on very swimmingly.

I was honored yesterday by being called in to a private view of the fall fashion of hats, lying at present perdu in tissue paper, and not to be visible to the promiscuous eye till the first of September. I ventured modestly to suggest an improvement, but was told, with the solemnity of conviction, that the hatters had decided upon the fashion, and the blocks were cut, and the hats made, and there was no appeal. It is rather a lower crown than has been worn—slightly bell, brim a thought wider, and very much arched underneath. The English hat that comes over now is very small, and narrow brimmed, and the Parisian is shaped like an inverted cone, truncated at the base. Of course we have a right to a fashion of our own, but a hat is, more than any article of dress, a matter of whimsey, and any inexorable style, without reference to particular physiognomy, seems to me somewhat in the line of the bed of Procrustes. I recollect hearing the remark made abroad, that Americans could always be known by their unmitigated newness of hat. Certain it is, that the hatters in this country are a richer class, and many pegs higher in tradesman dignity, than those of France or England—tant mieux, of course. Apropos—in some slight research yesterday for material to refresh the thread bareness of my outer man, I looked in at one or two of the crack shops, and was quite taken by surprise with the splendor and variety of masculine toggeries. The waistcoat patterns, the scarfs, the pantaloons stuffs, and dressing-gowns, are sumptuous beyond all modern precedent. A man must have a gentleman's means, now, to allow carte blanche to his tailor. I was about to turn aside some rich stuffs, as being, I was sorry to say, quite beyond my style and condition, when the tailor forestalled me, by the assurance that by the next packet, he should receive something much more splendid and worthy my attention! As I have remarked once or twice before, those who live on literary profits will soon find themselves stranded on the middle class—the rich ebbling from their reach in one direction, and the poor in the other. I have an aversion to the clerk's salt-and-pepper, but I should be content with any other outward mark of my means and belongings.

We had a very melo-dramatic out-of-doors exhibition the other evening, in the illumination of the Bowl-green fountain. An illuminated waterfall is a very phantom-like affair, and the eight gassy-burners, set round the rim of the basin in green hoods, looked as much like demons, popping their heads above water to gaze at the white spirit, as would have been at all necessary for diabolical pantomime. The fountain grows upon the public liking, I think, and certainly, when lighted by red and blue fires (which is part of the Friday evening show) it is a magnificent object. The private fountains in the court-yards of the hotels are very handsome. Bunker, in the rear of his well-kept and most comfortable mansion, has a fine jet under the noble old trees; and Cozzens has opened an ornamental fountain in the rear of the American—great luxuries, both, to the respective hotels. I am told, by the way, that the Croton water does not keep at sea.

The literary arena is now unoccupied, and it could be wished that some of our own knights out of practice would don their armor for a tilt—that Wetmore would come away from his crockery, and Halleck from his leger, Bryant from his scissors and politics, and Sprague from his cerberus post at the Hades of Discount—and give us some poetry. Another sea or forest novel by Cooper would be most welcome now, or a volume of prose by Longfellow, and these two, I think, as the only American authors not regularly harnessed in the car of Mammon, should have store laid away for such exigencies of famine. Kendall's Recollections of the chain round his neck in Mexico, and Brantz Myer's, of his gold coat and court experience at the same place and time, will come out pretty nearly in the same week, and of most excellent quality. Placide, who has a scribbli-phobia on his own account, has offered his "Life and Times" to a friend, to be delivered verbally over woodcock and sherry, and several of the first chapters are uncorked and digested. Mr. Richard Willis, younger brother of one of the editors of the New Mirror, is residing at Frankfurt, in Germany, and preparing a book on the land of beer and the domestic virtues. Mrs. Ellet's masculine pen is nearly idle. Simms, the novelist, is in New York, residing with his literary friend Lawson, but not coquetting with the publishers to our knowledge. Morris will not "die and leave the world no copy," as he has half a dozen songs about being married to music—the banns shortly to be published. I do not hear that Hoffman is doing anything except the looking after his bread and butter. Mrs. Embury is editing "The Ladies' Companion," and the authoress of "The Sinless Child" editing "The Rover," and Mrs. Stephens editing "The Ladies' World;" and these are three ladies worthy the binding and gilding of less ephemeral volumes. Neal and Snow edit "The Brother Jonathan," Neal living at Portland, and snow being "on the ground." Witty and racy "Mrs. Mary Clavers" is about returning to "the settlements" from her seclusion in Michigan—an event to be rejoiced over like the return of the Lost Pleiad. She is an accomplished linguist, and with her pure, classic, and flowing style, she might occupy, here, the position of Mary Howitt or Mrs. Austin in England—gaining all the honors of authorship by eminence in translation.

I understand a great enthusiasm is about to make itself manifest on the subject of the STATE MONUMENT to WASHINGTON. The association is now incorporated by the legislature, and the design, as it stands formed at present, is one of unequalled magnificence, worthy (and no more than worthy) of the subject. Four hundred and twenty-five feet is the proposed height; and this, one of the New York papers states, will make it the highest building in the world—not quite correctly, as the pyramid of Cheops is six hundred feet high. To realize this prodigious elevation, however, one must remember that the steeple of the new Trinity church, which is to be the tallest in this country, will only reach to two hundred and seventy-five feet. It is not to be merely a monument, but an immense public building, containing halls, libraries, and other appropriate apartments. The shape is to be a pentagon, and the style a florid Gothic. Union square is named as the site; but the immense size of the base, I should suppose, would require an area of much greater extent—and it would be a pity, besides, to break up the salutary fountain and open park, already ornamental enough, in that part of the city. The placing of this noble monument on the central elevation now occupied by the Tabernacle, and the opening of a new square, extending back to the Bowery and the Five Points, would, in the first place, turn that festering sink into lungs for this crowded metropolis, and in the next place centralize, in the neighborhood of the City Hall, the prominent public buildings. This great monument is to be built by subscriptions of one dollar each. Fifty thousand dollars were collected some time since, and are now at interest; and there is a sum of one hundred thousand dollars in the treasury at Washington, which it is hoped will be given to this. The object is one which every American must feel interested in; and there is no citizen, I presume, who would not give his dollar toward it. Let it be, if Mr. Dickens chooses so to call it, a "dollar" monument to Washington—showing that, devoted to dollars as we are (and yet not more than Englishmen to pounds, shillings, and pence), our dollar-patriotism can raise to the first patriot of history, the grandest monument of modern times.

The respectable and zealous spinster who sent us for publication, as a salutary warning, the very worldly and trappy epistle, addressed to Miss Violet Maby, at Saratoga, and published on a previous page, has laid her fingers on another specimen of the same gentleman's correspondence, which we give, without comment or correction, as follows:—

ASTOR HOUSE, August 10, 1843.

MY DEAR WIDOW: For the wear and tear of your bright eyes in writing me a letter you are duly credited. That for a real half-hour, as long as any ordinary half-hour, such well-contrived illuminations should have concentrated their mortal using on me only, is equal, I am well aware, to a private audience of any two stars in the firmament—eyelashes and petticoats (if not thrown in) turning the comparison a little in your favor. Thanks—of course—piled high as the porphyry pyramid of Papanla!

And you want "a pattern for a chemisette." Let me tell you, my dear widow, you have had a narrow escape. Had you ungardedly written to your milliner for an article so obsolete—but I'll not harrow up your feelings. Suffice it, that that once-privileged article has passed over, with decayed empires, to history—an aristocracy of muslin too intoxicated to last. "Fuit!"

The truth is, shams are tottering. The linen cuff which was a shallow representation of the edge of a linen sleeve, and the linen collar or embroidered chemisette, which as faintly imagined forth the spotless upper portion of the same investiture, are now bona-fide continuations of a garment, "though lost to sight to memory dear!" The plait on the throat and wrist is scrupulously of the same fineness, and simply emerges from the neck and sleeve of the dress without turning over.

The hem of the skirt is beyond my province of observation, but as the plaited edge would be pretty (spread over the instep when sitting), the unity is probably preserved.

Appropos of instep—the new discovery of a steel spring in the shoe to arch the hollow of the foot, has directed attention to the curves of those bewitching locomotives, and heels are coming into fashion. This somewhat improves the shapeliness of the pastern, lifts the sex a half inch nearer heaven—more out of reach than ever, of course. Adieu in time—should you lose sight of me!

And now—(for I believe you may trust "The Lady's Book"—for the remainder of the chronicle of fashion)—how comes on, oh, charming widow, the little property I have in your empire of alabaster? Shall I recall the title-deed to your recollection? Did you not, on a summer's night, having the full possession of your senses, lay a rose-leaf wetted with dew on your left temple? Did you not, without mental reservation, scratch it round with a thorn of the same rose, and then and there convey to me the territory so bounded, to have and to hold for my natural life, to be guarded, at your peril, from trespass or damage? Did you not, at the same place and time, with blood taken from your pricked finger, write me out, to this effect, a rosy conveyance, of which, if needful, I can send you, in red ink, a paler copy? Of course I do not ask for information. You know you did. And you know you had for it a consideration—of such immortality as was in my power to bestow:—

"Where press this hour those fairy feet?" &c.

You married—and with so prying a neighbor as your remainder's husband, I did not very frequently visit my little property. You had the stewardship over it, and I presume that you respected, and made others respect, the rights of the proprietor. I never heard that your husband was seen invading the premises. I have every reason to believe that he was uniformly directed to plant his tulips elsewhere than in my small garden. It was to me a slumbering investment—and the interest, I must be permitted to advise you, has accumulated upon it!

And now that my prying neighbor is dead, and the property in the opposite temple and the remainder of the demesne, has reverted to the original proprietor, I may be permitted to propose myself as an occupant of my own territory, pro tem., with liberty to pluck fruit from the opposite garden as long as it remains untenanted. Take care how you warn me off. That peach upon your cheek would make a thief of a better man.

You disdain news, of course. China is taken by the English, and the Down-Town-Bard has recovered his appetite for champagne, and writes regularly for the New Mirror. The Queen's Guards have done coming over; the town dull; and bonnets (I forgot to mention) are now worn precipitated over the nose at an angle of forty-five degrees.

Adieu, my dear widow. Command me till you lose your beauty. Yours at present,

CINNA BEVERLEY.

CINNA BEVERLEY, ESQ., TO ALEXIS VON PHUHL.
ASTOR HOUSE, Sept. 1, 1843.

MY DEAR NEPH-LING: I congratulate you on the attainment of your degree as "Master of Arts." In other words, I wish the sin of the Faculty well repented of, in having endorsed upon parchment such a barefaced fabrication. Put the document in your pocket, and come away! There will be no occasion to air it before doomsday, probably, and fortunately for you, it will then revert to the Faculty. Quiescat adhuc—as I used to say of my tailor's bills till they came through a lawyer.

And now, what is to become of you? I do not mean as to what your grandmother calls you "temporal welfare." You were born to gold-dust like a butterfly's wing. Ten thousand a year will ooze into your palm like insensible perspiration—(principally from investments in the "Life and Trust"). But your style, my dear boy—your idiosyncrasy of broad-cloth and beaver, satin and patent-leather—your outer type—your atmosphere—your cut! Oh, Alexis!

But let us look this momentous matter coolly in the face.

America has now arrived at that era of civilized aggrandizement when it is worth a gentleman's while to tie his cravat for the national meridian. We can afford to wish St. James street "bon voyage" in its decline from empire. We dress better than Great Britain. Ilum fuit. The last appeal of the universe, as to male toggery, lies in the approval of forty eyes lucent beneath twenty bonnets in Broadway. In the decision of twenty belles or thereabout, native in New York, resides, at this present crisis, the eidolon of the beau supreme. Hommage à la mode Manhattanesque!

But, to the sanctum of fashion there is no thoroughfare. Three persons, arriving at it by the same road, send it flying like "Loretto's chapel through the air." Every man his own guide thither, and his path trackless as a bird's alley to his nest! I can but give you some loose data for guidance, and pray that "by an instinct you have" you may take a "bee-line" of your own.

Of course you know that during the imitative era just past, there have been two styles of men's dress—the Londonish and the Parisian—pretty equally popular, I should say. The London man dresses loose above, the Paris man loose below—tight hips and baggy coat in St. James street—baggy trousers and pinched coat on the Boulevard. The Englishman puts on his cravat with summary energy and a short tie—the Frenchman rejoices in a voluptuous waterfall of satin; and each, more particularly in this matter of neckcloth, abhors the other. John Bull shows his shirt-collar till death—Monsieur sinks it with the same pertinacity. English extravagance, fine linen—French extravagance, primrose kids.

Something is due, of course, to the settled principles of art. By the laws of sculpture, the Frenchman is wrong—the beauty of the male figure consisting in the breadth of the shoulders and the narrowness of the hips; and this formation shows blood and breeding, moreover, as to have small hips, a man's progenitors must not have carried burdens. So—for me—trousers snug to the barrel, and coat scant of skirt, but prodigal above. Decide for yourself, notwithstanding. There is a certain je ne sais quoi in bagginess of continuation—especially on a tall man. It only don't suit my style!

And, as to cravat, I have the same weak leaning toward Bond street. The throat looks polticed in those heavy voluminousnesses. Black diminishes the apparent size, too, and the more short-bosom visible, the broader the apparent chest. It depends on the stuff, somewhat. Very rich billows of flowered satin look ruinous—and that the ladies love. But in every other particular, if you will wear these eclipsers of linen, you must be as lavendered as a lily at dawn—compensatory, as it were! And if you show your collar, for Heaven's sake let it follow the curve of your jawbone, and not run athwart it like a rocket aimed at the corner of your eyebrow! I am sensitive as to this last hint. The reform was my own.

One caution—never be persuaded that there is such a thing as a fashion of hat! Believe me, the thing is impossible! Employ an artist. George Flagg has a good eye for a gentleman's belongings, and he'll make a drawing of you with reference to a hat. No hat is endurable that will not look well in a picture. Ponder the brim. Study how the front curve cuts the line of the eyebrow. Regulate it by the expression of face common to you when dawdling. See if you require lengthening or crowding down—physiognomically, I mean. Low crowns are monstrous vindictive. Bell crowns are dressy—white hats rowdy. And, once fixed in your taste by artistic principles, be pretty constant through life to that hat. Have it reproduced (rigidly without consultation with your hatter), and give it a shower-bath before wearing. Unmitigated new hat is truly frightful. Orlando Fish takes your idea cleverly, touching a tile of your own.

As to the Castaly of coats, I am driven to believe that the true font is at Philadelphia. One marvelous coat after another arrived at Saratoga while I was there, and to my astonished research as to their origin, and there was but one reply—"Carpenter." What may be the address of this Carpenter of coats, I know not yet. But I shall know, and soon—for he builds to a miracle. Trousers, as you know, are sent home in the rough, and adapted by perseverance. They are a complex mystery, on the whole. Few makers know more than a part in the science of cutting them, and you must supply the rest by clear expounding and pertinacious experiment. The trade is trying, and should be expiatory of crime in the "sufferer."

There is but one simple idea in boots—patent-leather and straight on the inside. But, by-the-way, to jump abruptly to the other extremity, how do you wear your hair? For Cupid's and the Grace's sake, don't be English in that! Short hair on a young man looks to me madhousey. Ugh! Straight or curly, leave it long enough to make a bootlace for a lady! And see that it looks threadbare by slight fingers—for if you should chance to be beloved, there will be fingers unemployed but for that little endearment. So at least I conjecture—bald myself, and of course, not experienced authority.

But, whatever you decide, don't step into the street rashly! Keep yourself "on private view" for a few days after you are made up, and call in discreet judges for the benefit of criticism—an artist or two among them for the general effects. First impressions are irrevocable.

Adieu, my boy! Caution!—and ponder on Balzac's dictum: "Les femmes aiment les fats, parceque les fats sont les seuls hommes qui eussent soin d'eux-mêmes."

Your affectionate uncle,

CINNA BEVERLEY.

P. S. A short cane—say as long as your arm—is rather knowing, now. Nobody carries a long stick, except to poke at snakes in the country.

MOORE AND BARRY CORNWALL.

Well—how does Moore write a song?

In the twilight of a September evening he strolls through the park to dine with the marquiss. As he draws on his white gloves, he sees the evening star looking at him steadily through the long vista of the avenue, and he construes its punctual dispensation of light into a reproach for having, himself a star, passed a day of poetic idleness. "Damme," soliloquizes the little fat planet, "this will never do! Here have I hammered the whole morning at a worthless idea, that, with the mere prospect of a dinner, shows as trumpery as a 'penny fairing.' Labor wasted! And at my time of life, too! Faith!—it's dining at home these two days with nobody to drink with me! It's eyewater I want! Don't trouble yourself to sit up for me, brother Hesper! I shall see clearer when I come back!

'Bad are the rhymes
That scorn old wine,'

as my friend Barry sings. Poetry? hum! Claret? Prithee, call it claret!"

And Moore is mistaken! He draws his inspiration, it is true, with the stem of a glass between his thumb and finger, but the wine is the least stimulus to his brain. He talks and is listened to admiringly, and that is his Castaly. He sits next to Lady Fanny at dinner, who thinks him "an adorable little love," and he employs the first two courses in making her in love with herself, i. e., blowing everything she says up to the red heat of poetry. Moore can do this, for the most stupid things on earth are, after all, the beginnings of ideas, and every fool is susceptible of the flattery of seeing the words go straight from his lips to the "highest heaven of invention." And Lady Fanny is not a fool, but a quick and appreciative woman, and to almost everything she says, the poet's trump is a germ of poetry. "Ah!" says Lady Fanny with a sigh, "this will be a memorable dinner—not to you, but to me; for you see pretty women every day, but I seldom see Tom Moore!" The poet looks into Lady Fanny's eyes and makes no immediate answer. Presently she asks, with a delicious look of simplicity, "Are you as agreeable to everybody, Mr. Moore?"—"There is but one Lady Fanny," replies the poet; "or, to use your own beautiful simile, 'The moon sees many brooks, but the brook sees but one moon!'" (Mem. jot that down.) And so is treasured up one idea for the morrow, and when the marchioness rises, and the ladies follow her to the drawing-room, Moore finds himself sandwiched between a couple of whig lords, and opposite a past or future premier—an audience of cultivation, talent, scholarship, and appreciation; and as the fresh pitcher of claret is passed round, all regards radiate to the Anacreon of the world, and with that suction of expectation, let alone Tom Moore. Even our "Secretary of the Navy and National Songster" would "turn out his lining"—such as it is. And Moore is delightful, and with his "As you say, my lord!" he gives birth to a constellation of bright things, no one of which is dismissed with the claret. Every one at the table, except Moore, is subject to the hour—to its enthusiasm, its enjoyment—but the hour is to Moore a precious slave. So is the wine. It works for him! It brings him money from Longman! It plays his trumpet in the reviews! It is his filter among the ladies! Well may he sing its praises! Of all the poets, Moore is probably the only one who is thus master of his wine. The glorious abandon with which we fancy him, a brimming glass in his hand, singing "Fly not yet!" exists only in the fancy. He keeps a cool head and coins his couviality; and to revert to my former figure, they who wish to know what Moore's electricity amounts to without the convivial friction, may read his History of Ireland. Not a sparkle in it, from the landing of the Phenicians to the battle of Vinegar Hill! He wrote that as other people write—with nothing left from the day before but the habit of labor—and the travel of a collapsed balloon on a man's back, is not more unlike the same thing, inflated and soaring, than Tom Moore, historian, and Tom Moore, bard!

Somewhere in the small hours the poet walks home, and sitting down soberly in his little library, he puts on paper the half-score scintillations that collision, in one shape or another, has struck into the tinder of his fancy. If read from this paper, the world would probably think little of their prospect of ever becoming poetry. But the mysterious part is done—the life is breathed into the chrysalis—and the clothing of these naked fancies with winged words, Mr. Moore knows very well can be done in very uninspired moods by patient industry. Most people have very little idea what that industry is—how deeply language is ransacked, how often turned over, how untiringly rejected and recalled with some new combination, how resolutely sacrificed when only tolerable enough to pass, how left untouched day after day in the hope of a fresh impulse after repose. The vexation of a Chinese puzzle is slight, probably, to that which Moore has expended on some of his most natural and flowing single verses. The exquisite nicety of his ear, though it eventually gives his poetry its honeyed fluidity, gives him no quicker choice of words, nor does more, in any way, than pass inexorable judgment on what his industry brings forward. Those who think a song dashed off like an invitation to dinner, would be edified by the progressive phases of a "Moore's Melody." Taken with all its re-writings, emendations, &c., I doubt whether, in his most industrious seclusion, Moore averages a couplet a day. Yet this persevering, resolute, unconquerable patience of labor is the secret of his fame. Take the best thing he ever wrote, and translate its sentiment and similitudes into plain prose, and do the thing by a song of any second-rate imitator of Moore, one abstract would read as well as the other. Yet Moore's song is immortal, and the other ephemeral as a paragraph in a newspaper, and the difference consists in a patient elaboration of language and harmony, and in that only. And even thus short, seems the space between the ephemeron and the immortal. But it is wider than they think, oh, glorious Tom Moore!

And how does Barry Cornwall write?

I answer, from the efflux of his soul! Poetry is not labor to him. He works at law—he plays, relaxes, luxuriates in poetry. Mr. Proctor has at no moment of his life, probably, after finishing a poetic effusion, designed ever to write another line. No more than the sedate man, who, walking on the edge of a playground, sees a ball coming directly toward him, and seized suddenly with a boyish impulse, jumps aside and sends it whizzing back, as he has not done for twenty years, with his cane—no more than that unconscious schoolboy of fourscore (thank God there are many such live coals under the ashes) thinks he shall play again at ball. Proctor is a prosperous barrister, drawing a large income from his profession. He married the daughter of Basil Montague (well known as the accomplished scholar, and the friend of Coleridge, Lamb, and that bright constellation of spirits), and with a family of children of whom, the world knows, he is passionately fond, he leads a more domestic life, or, rather, a life more within himself and his own, than any author, present or past, with whose habits I am conversant. He has drawn his own portrait, however, in outline, and as far as it goes, nothing could be truer. In an epistle to his friend Charles Lamb, he says:—

"Seated beside this Sherris wine,
And near to books and shapes divine,
Which poets and the painters past
Have wrought in line that eye shall last,— E'en I, with Shakspeare's self beside me,
And one whose tender talk can guide me
Through fears and pains and troublous themes,
Whose smile doth fall upon my dreams
Like sunshine on a stormy sea, *****

Proctor slights the world's love for his wife and books, and, as might be expected, the world only prizes him the more with its caresses. He is now and then seen in the choicest circles of London, where, though love and attention mark most flatteringly the rare pleasure of his presence, he plays a retired and silent part, and steals early away. His library is his Paradise. His enjoyment of literature should be mentioned as often in his biography as the "feeding among the lilies" in the Songs of Solomon. He forgets himself, he forgets the world in his favorite authors, and that, I fancy, was the golden link in his friendship with Lamb. Surrounded by exquisite specimens of art (he has a fine taste, and is much beloved by artists), a choice book in his hand, his wife beside him, and the world shut out, Barry is in the meridian of his true orbit. Oh, then, a more loving and refined spirit is not breathing beneath the stars! He reads and muses; and as something in the page stirs some distant association, suggests some brighter image than its own, he half leans over to the table, and scrawls it in unstudied but inspired verse. He thinks no more of it. You might have it to light your cigar. But there sits by his side one who knows its value, and it is treasured. Here, for instance, in the volume I have spoken of before, are some forty pages of "fragments"—thrown in to eke out the volume of his songs. I am sure, that when he was making up his book, perhaps expressing a fear that there would not be pages enough for the publisher's design, these fragments were produced from their secret hiding-place to his great surprise. The quotations I have made were all from this portion of his volume, and, as I said before, they are worthy of Shakspeare. There is no mark of labor in them. I do not believe there was an erasure in the entire manuscript. They bear all the marks of a sudden, unstudied impulse, immediately and unhesitatingly expressed. Here are several fragments. How evident it is that they were suggested directly by his reading:—

"She was a princess—but she fell; and now
Her shame goes blushing through a line of kings."

Sometimes a deep thought crossed
My fancy, like the sullen bat that flies
Athwart the melancholy moon at eve.

Let not thy tale tell but of stormy sorrows!
She—who was late a maid, but now doth lie
In Hymen's bosom, like a rose grown pale,
A sad, sweet wedded wife—why is she left
Out of the story? Are good deeds—great grieves,
That live but ne'er complain—naught? What are tears?
Remorse?—deceit? at best weak water drops
Which wash out the bloom of sorrow.

Is she dead?

Why so shall I be—ere these autumn blasts
Have blown on the beard of winter. Is she dead?
Aye, she is dead—quite dead! The wild sea kissed her
With its cold, white lips, and then—put her to sleep:
She has a saud pillow, and a water sheet,
And never turns her head, or knows 'tis morning!

Mark, when he died, his tombs, his epitaphs!
Men did not pluck the ostrich for his sake,
Nor dyed 't in sable. No black steeds were there,
Caparisoned in wo; no hired crowds;
No hearse, wherein the crumbling clay (imprisoned
Like ammunition in a tumbrel) rolled
Rattling along the street, and silenced grief;
No arch whereon the bloody laurel hung;
No stone; no gilded verse;—poor common shows!
But tears and tearful words, and sighs as deep
As sorrow is—these were his epitaphs!
Thus—(fitted graven)—he lieth now, inurned
In hearts that loved him, on whose tender sides
Are graven his many virtues. When they perish,
He's lost!—and so't should be. The poet's name
And hero's—on the brazen book of Time,
Are writ in sunbeams, by Fame's loving hand;
But none record the household virtues there.
These better sleep (when all dear friends are fled)
In endless and serene oblivion.

The lighthouse near Caldwell's Landing is seen to great effect by the passenger in the evening boat from New York to Newburgh. Leaving the city at five in the summer afternoon, she makes the intervening forty miles between that hour and twilight; and while the last tints of the sunset are still in the sky, the stars just beginning to twinkle through the glow of the west, the bright light of this lofty beacon rises up over the prow of the boat, shining apparently on the very face of the new-starred heaven. As he approaches, across the smooth and still purpled mirror of the silent river is drawn a long and slender line of light, broken at the foot of the beacon by the wild shrubbery of the rock on which it stands; and as he rounds the point, and passes it, the light brightens and looks clearer against the darker sky of the east, while the same cheering line of reflection follows him on his way, and is lost to sight as he disappears among the mountains.

The waters of the river at this point were the scene of the brief and tragic drama enacted so fatally to poor André. Four or five miles below stands Smith's house, where he had his principal interview with Arnold, and where the latter communicated to him his plans for the delivery of West Point into the hands of the English, and gave him the fatal papers which proved his ruin.

At Smith's house Mrs. Arnold passed a night on her way to join her husband at West Point, soon after he had taken command. The sufferings of this lady have excited the sympathy of the world, as the first paroxysms of her distress moved the kind but firm heart of Washington. There seems to have arisen a doubt, however, whether her long and well-known correspondence with André had not so far undermined her patriotism, that she was rather inclined to further than impede the treason of Arnold; and consequently could have suffered but little after Washington generously made every arrangement for her to follow him. In the "Life of Aaron Burr," lately published, are some statements which seem authentic on the subject. It is well known that Washington found Mrs. Arnold apparently frantic with distress at the communication her husband had made to her the moment before his flight. Lafayette, and the other officers in the suite of the commander-in-chief, were alive with the most poignant sympathy; and a passport was given her by Washington, with which she immediately left West Point to join Arnold in New York. On her way she stopped at the house of Mrs. Prevost, the wife of a British officer, who subsequently married Colonel Burr. Here "the frantic scenes of West Point were renewed," says the narrative of Burr's biographer, "and continued so long as strangers were present. As soon as she and Mrs. Prevost were left alone, however, Mrs. Arnold became tranquillized, and assured Mrs. Prevost that she was heartily sick of the theatrics she was exhibiting. She stated that she had corresponded with the British commander; that she was disgusted with the American cause, and those who had the management of public affairs; and that, through great persuasion and unceasing perseverance, she had ultimately brought the general into an arrangement to surrender West Point to the British. Mrs. Arnold was a gay, accomplished, artful, and extravagant woman. There is no doubt, therefore, that, for the purpose of acquiring the means of gratifying her vanity, she contributed greatly to the utter ruin of her husband, and thus doomed to everlasting infamy and disgrace all the fame he had acquired as a gallant soldier, at the sacrifice of his blood."

It is not easy to pass and repass the now peaceful and beautiful waters of this part of the Hudson, without recalling to mind the scenes and actors in the great drama of the Revolution, which they not long ago bore on their bosom. The busy mind fancies the armed guard-boats, slowly pulling along the shore; the light pinnace of the Vulture plying to and fro on its errands of conspiracy; and not the least vivid picture to the imagination, is the boat containing the accomplished, the gallant André, and his guard, on his way to his death. It is probable that he first admitted to his own mind the possibility of a fatal result, while passing this very spot. A late biographer of Arnold gives the particulars of a conversation between André and Major Talmadge, the officer who had him in custody, and who brought him from West Point down the river to Tappan, the place of his subsequent execution.

"Before we reached the Clove" (a landing just below the beacon), "Major Andre became very inquisitive to know my opinion as to the result of his capture.

When I could no longer evade his importunity, I remarked to him as follows; 'I had a much-loved class-mate in Yale college, by the name of Hale, who entered the army in 1775. Immediately after the battle of Long Island, Washington wanted information respecting the strength of the enemy. Hale tendered his services, went over to Brooklyn, and was taken, just as he was passing the outpost of the enemy on his return.' Said I, with emphasis, 'Do you remember the sequel of this story?'—'Yes,' said André, 'he was hanged as a spy. But you surely do not consider his case and mine alike?' I replied, 'Yes, precisely similar; and similar will be your fate.' He endeavored to answer my remarks, but it was manifest he was more troubled in spirit than I had ever seen him before."

Scaccia's "Preceptor for the Pianoforte," just published by Christman, of this city, is a curious and valuable work. Mr. Scaccia is a thorough musician, and he has compiled the edition before us with much labor and a clear understanding of the beautiful science of which it treats. Mr. S. is also the author of a valuable scientific work, entitled "An Introduction to the Art of Singing," which is universally popular among the profession.

The Messrs. Appleton have sent us a volume of delicious poetry, entitled the "Wife of Leon" and other metrical effusions, by two sisters of the west. We know nothing of these delightful authors beyond their writings; but that they are gifted, true-hearted, and accomplished girls, is apparent in every line of their beautiful productions. The west has cause to be proud of these sweet "sisters," and so has the country, to whose literary stores the volume before us is a graceful and valuable contribution. If this is the authors' first appearance in print, it is the most favorable one we have ever witnessed in our whole editorial career, and we shall place the book in our library, on the same shelf with the works of Mrs. Hemans, to be referred to frequently in hours stolen from severer duties. The Messrs. Appleton—ever deserve the thanks of the public for the elegant edition of the poems before us.

("The first true merit to defend—

His praise is lost who waits till all commend—")

I saw two very distinguished gentlemen sitting vis-à-vis at the Astor house table a day or two since—striking exceptions, both, to the physique of the climates from which they severally come. The Hon. Mr. Choate, of Massachusetts, was one, with his pale but intellectual countenance, and Judge Wayne was the other, as glowing a specimen of rosy health and vigor as ever came from the more florescent nurture of the north. It is painful to see the precious accumulation of a great mind's treasure intrusted to so fragile a casket as ill-health, and the contrary is proportionably agreeable. Judge Wayne is at present at West Point.

It is a pretty literal fulfilment of the penalty of Adam's transgression to do more than breathe to-day, and I have chopped down and chopped up many a tree of twice my age with half the "sweat of the brow" brought out by the harnessing of this first sentence to grammar. A gentleman is walking up Broadway, fanning himself, as I look out of the window. The omnibus horses drip. What an Eden would come about again (for me, at least) if this penitential sweat would trickle itself into these inky traceries without the medium of brain and finger-work! One would be almost content to become a black man to facilitate the miracle.

Three successive boys have gone under my window, whistling, "Dance, boatman, dance!" The air is one that sticks in the popular memory, and, like some other of these negro melodies, it is probably susceptible of transmutation into a gem of music. I have recorded somewhere else a remark Moore once made in my presence, that one of the most pathetic of his songs stole its air from a merry ballad of Spain, representing a girl complaining of the wind's blowing her petticoats about, and the change in its character was effected by only playing it slower. No song was ever more popular in this country than "On the lake where drooped the willow," which was a transfer of the negro song "As I was a gwyin down Shinbone alley." Horn, who adapted it to a pathetic song by Morris, took his hint from the pathos with which a black boy at Natchez sang one of the songs peculiar to his race and region. "The Northern Refrain," another very popular song by Morris and Horn, is based upon the carol of the sweeps in New York city. Mr. Horn says that "God save the King" was taken from an air sung about the streets of London, and that "Di tanti palpiti" was suggested to Rossini by hearing a fish-woman sing it in the market while attending her stall. "The Marseillaise" had an origin equally obscure. The first attempt to dislocate these airs from their ludicrous words creates a smile, of course, but it is surprising how quickly the better clothing of music throws its long-worn beggar-rag into forgetfulness. Horn relates in one of his prefaces, that when Mrs. Horn commenced singing before an audience, "Long time ago," with a serious air, there was a general smile; but when the song was ended she left her auditors with tears in their eyes. There is no end to tracing back to their origin airs that are afloat among a people, and if Moore's melodies are built upon "Irish airs," without going back to Milesian imagination, these negro melodies may be called American, without giving credit to Guinea or Timbuctoo. I should think it worth a composer's while to travel leisurely in the south, and bring away all the melodies that inhabit the banjo of the slave, and better still worth Morris's while to devote his singular tact and delicacy of taste and ear to the clothing them with appropriate poetry. He has been so successful in the attempts he has already made, that the warrant is good.

A German gentleman, residing at the Astor house, has translated for me an account of a visit to Frederika Bremer, by the Countess Von Hahn-Hahn, and a few of its more personal particulars will not be uninteresting. The countess is a celebrated person in the fashionable world, and has just published her travels in Sweden. She found Miss Bremer at a small country estate near Stockholm, where she resides with her mother and a younger sister. She says: "I had formed some idea about her person from her books. I figured to myself a quiet, serious person, with some humoristic touches. I found her indeed thus in reality, with an addition of an extraordinary degree of sweetness in all her bearing."—"I was offered a promenade. I preferred to remain in the house, though passionately fond of nature, open air, walking. All the attraction for me was within—everything so pleasant, so comfortable! I could comprehend how 'Home' here could be made so attractive. I desired Miss Frederika to show me her own room. It was arranged with the greatest simplicity—almost a cell. It would not do for me at all. Besides, it was a corner-room, with windows on two sides, consequently a double supply of light. There were three square tables, covered with books, papers, and writing-materials; a sofa in a severe style (I mean one that coolly and merely invites you to sit down without loiling, which is my favorite position). On the walls there were several pictures. 'This is a genuine Teniers, but I know you will not like it,' she said, laughing, pointing to a beautiful little picture of a countryman filling his pipe. I answered honestly, 'no!' and in general I found that I said 'no' when she said 'yes.' Such a difference of opinion is only disagreeable when you have a dislike to a person. I tried to persuade her to make a voyage to Italy. We would go together. But she would not. She does not like travelling. She thinks that one may soon become overpowered, carried away, get confused—and what to do with all these foreign impressions! I said, 'You will soon conquer them—that is just the pleasantest thing, I think.' She still took a lively interest in all I told her of foreign countries, what I had seen, and what I had written about them. I was naturally well-pleased at this. Our conversation was carried on in French and German. She expressed herself with great simplicity and decision. She has beautiful, thinking eyes; a clear, firm, I may almost say, a solid forehead, under which the strongly-delineated eyebrows move very much when she speaks. This becomes her very much, particularly when an idea labors to shape itself into words. She has a light and small figure, and was dressed in black silk. In the parlor there were two large bookcases. Miss Bremer paints beautifully in miniature, and she has a collection of heads, done by herself, to which was added mine. I generally get sleepy when sitting to artists; therefore I do not like to have my picture taken, as it hurts my vanity that all my portraits look so immensely sheepish! This time, however, the sitting went better off, for the Countess Rosen was singing the whole time, with her fine voice, some beautiful Swedish songs."

By this extract the Countess Hahn-Hahn herself seems a nice, natural creature enough.

I have been pleased to find that I rather under than over-colored my slight description of Mr. Weir's picture for the rotunda. The Bostonians have received it with a full measure of enthusiasm; and Mr. Weir has himself returned to West Point, laden not merely with bountiful commendations, but with employment for years in commissions for pictures. He will, probably, realize a small fortune from the exhibition, alone, of his great painting in the different cities; and altogether, this is the best exemplification that has occurred in my time of the policy (to say no more) of a faithful discharge of a commission, which, because intrusted literally to conscience and honor, may be slighted with impunity. Mr. Weir, I understand, has not yet drawn the price of his picture from the treasury, intending to lay it by as an investment for his children, unconscious, probably, how much they will value the father's glory invested in the picture. On it the painter has flung his soul prostrate; and there is a circumstance connected with its working upon his mind while painting it, which we do not feel quite at liberty to mention here, but which will be a thread of the purest gold to weave into the mingled woof of his posthumous biography. By the first of October, I understand, we are to have a view of the "Embarkation" in New York.

I was among the liquesced victims of the buffalo-hunt at Hoboken, and gathered little to compensate me for "larding the lean earth" of the Messrs. Stevens, except a strong impression of the peculiar good-nature of a republican crowd. As our down-laden ferry-boat reached the shore, another one, heavily overfreighted, was starting to return. Some one on our wheelhouse inquired in a stentorian voice, "How did you like it?" and was answered by the five hundred disappointed and roasted dupes with a general shout of good-natured laughter. The Courier estimates the crowd at twenty or thirty thousand, and certainly the whole Jersey side was black with people, all feeling humbugged and laughing merrily. I thought I would ride up to the ground to see the embroidery of so many moving figures on the green meadows, and this was a fine sight. The lasso-rider, in a fantastical costume, was galloping hard after his shadow, and tossing his long rope into the air; and one of the buffaloes was quietly munching a hollyhock in the small enclosure of an Irish cabin on the roadside. The rest of the herd, I was told, had made their escape to the woods, offering the proprietor a real hunt for a sham. The morning papers give accounts of some serious accidents during the day.

The copyright club is organized with a most active and efficient secretary in Mr. Mathews, and there has been a general summoning of aid and counsel. Bryant, the high-priest of American poetry, is very properly chosen president. In addition to the fact which I mentioned in my last as one that should be "kept before the people," viz., that the increase of price on new publications would be very trifling and go to the author—in addition to this, I say, another should be mentioned. The worthless edition that is bought for a shilling, and read with straining eyes from its bad print, is perused and thrown away. Would it not be as well to subscribe to a reading-club, and get the book well-printed for less money, and return it at the end of the week? The hint is worth considering—and this is the way that reading is mauaged cheaply in England.

Macready is to be here in October, and will be accompanied by Miss Phillips (formerly of the National), and Mr. Ryder—a unicorn team of his own breaking. They both know the leader's paces. Conti Damoreau follows later—but there is nothing very spicy on record with regard to this prima donna; and the popular telescope of expectation is fixed exclusively on the charming Mrs. Nesbitt. Before I have had time to be bribed by my share of the spell of this enchantress, I may as well give you an honest inventory of her attractions and professional merits. She is, in primis, a widow; that is to say, if she be not married within a year or two, as is said, to the famous Mr. Feargus O'Conner, keeping her previous name for theatrical clat. Mr. Nesbitt was a dashing guardsman (son of Lady Nesbitt, well known in the gay world), who broke his neck driving tandem, and left his widow the idol of the dandies. She is rather above the middle size, with blue eyes, meant to pass for black, black hair, Greek nose, upper lip half scornful, half playful, and a mouth made by none of the Graces' journey-men. This last article is indeed delicious, as seen from any part of the theatre, though, like Madame George Sands, the owner smokes! But her charm lies mainly in "the way she has with her." Nobody that sees her cares whether she plays well or ill. She ministers at another door. Hang your head—she plays to your heart! And it is one of her ways to play very unevenly; and when she thinks you have pouted long enough at her carelessness, to burst suddenly upon you with a bewitching rally, and "bring the house down," as they alarmingly phrase it. A great actress she probably is not—an enchanting woman she certainly is. It is to be hoped that she will bring over the pieces that have been written expressly for her, as her every peculiarity of look, tone, and gesture, has been most accurately measured and fitted by the dramatic tailors of London.

The world looks disagreeable to us to-day. We are "under the weather;" and, for to-day at least (and it is odd how rare the wish is), we may say, we wish ourselves fairly above the weather—that is, in heaven; in heaven, where there are no Saturdays, and of course, no expectations of New Mirrors.

For you forgive the dinner's not forthcoming, if the cook be ill. And your washerwoman has her little indulgences—hand scalded, or child sick. And you forego your drive if your horse be ailing or off his feed. What have we done, we should be pleased to know, to be treated less kindly than the other three of your quadruple necessities? We should like very much to drop our head into our hand, and mope. But you wouldn't like it.

No—you want us to chatter. You say as the child says, when the story is done: "Tell us some more." And if we must, we must! But we're sick and savage, and we'll rake up something that we can gnaw as we tell it—some old resentment or other—and if we don't feel better after it, we'll go to bed.

One of the morning papers, a week ago or more, told a fib about us. In an article on American authors, it is said that we (one of "we") made more money by our writings than any other American author, and were fast growing rich! And out of that, a Boston paper picks the reason that we "write so jauntily!" As if a man were not always gayer as his pockets were lighter, and as if our good humor were drawn with a check—bankable!

Now we are not willing to submit to the odium of prosperity. That we have made some thousands of unnameables by two or three weeks' work, as this writer asserts, we freely own—but it was not in this country. We have sold, for a large price, in England, books for which we tried in vain to find a publisher in America. We can not now find a publisher in America who will give us anything for a work, though we have been looking for one these three years; and we never found but one publisher who would give us, for half-a-dozen works in a lump, money worth shutting thumb and finger upon; and he gave it in notes, payable by ourselves—after the little privilege of a discount. We don't complain of this—oh no! The worth of a thing is, no doubt, what it will bring. But we are not going to be lifted between human envy and the sun, and be hated for throwing a shadow when we have no substance! Not "we!"

That three meals a day come punctually round to us, we consider no more a marvel than the arrangements for the keeping in motion of any other "heavenly body." For that much we have safely trusted hitherto, and we shall trust hereafter the crank, whatever it may be, that turns our mortal orrery. We are fed, and we don't care who envies us for it—for we think we do work enough to earn it—but the possession, at any time, for any considerable portion of an hour, of one unspoken dollar, we indignantly deny! We are poor enough (either of us "we") to please the most fastidious, on the contrary. And so, fellow-paupers, take us back to your affections!

But we have hopes (as who has not?) of living to be "rich and envied!" We shall be less loved. That is the tariff, and we are busy laying up love to pay it. But we should like to know how it feels to be rich, and whether for more love, one ever sighs to be poor again! Please Heaven, we will know, some day—if the Mirror keep prospering.

TWO SISTERS OF THE WEST.—I have done, almost unawares, within the last twenty-four hours, what I would not willingly have undertaken to do, viz., the reading of two hundred and fifty pages of new poetry. It was a book which came to my hand in the livery of a début—cream-colored binding, most daintily lettered—and when I opened it my anticipations extended very little beyond the pleasure of rubbing my thumb and finger on the seductive smoothness of the cover. It is entitled, "The Wife of Leon, and other Poems, by Two Sisters of the West," written, as the preface states, to "while away time and gratify a taste for poetry," and published "to gratify a parent to whom they could refuse nothing." With much of the book I think you would be delighted. It seems to me a careless exercise of very uncommon powers—a kind of loitering into dream-land with no particular errand, and here and there plucking a phantom forth to the light as would be done by a concentrated mind gone thither with disciplined determination for the purpose. I speak, of course, now only of the purely imaginative parts of the book. The affections are, with women, no phantoms, and can scarcely be written upon, except well, by any woman of talent; and in this book the touches of feeling are exquisitely true and well expressed. But in verse, which is here and there very incompact and wordy, you will find some bold conceptions, partially done justice to, which show in these sisters a very unusual walk of fancy. A piece called the "Death of the Master Spirit," seems to me particularly strong and unsuggested. And in some lines beginning—

"Never, as I have loved thee, Shalt thou be loved again," there is a most refreshing novelty and meaningness. On the whole, I look upon this as rather a memorable advent in poetry-world, and I hope we shall soon find out who the "Sisters" are.

Percival has put forth a new volume, after a very long silence as a poet. If poetry were nothing but an exercise of imagination, Percival would doubtless be the first of American poets. In the art of poetry, probably he is—the art, I mean, as exemplified in this very volume, in which there are no less than "one hundred and fifty modifications of stanza." But Percival's poetry is singularly deficient in the very mundane quality flesh and blood. His veins seem filled with ether, and his Pegasus uses his wings always, his legs never. I mention it less as a fault than a peculiarity, for there may be a school of this quality of poetry, and perfect in its way—but it is a peculiarity which accounts fully for the inadequate effect it has produced. Nothing of Percival's is popularly known, except one or two pieces, which will live for ever by the very flesh and blood pathos which he has touched by chance, and which he probably thinks beneath him. The poem beginning,

"He comes not. I have watched the moon go down," the mournful plaint of a deserted wife, is one of these, and a most exquisite effusion of feeling. But here is his idea of the harness with which a poet must go into the arena, in a passage of his preface to his new book:—

—"An art [poetry] which requires the mastery of the riches and niceties of a language; a full knowledge of the science of versification, not only in its own peculiar principles of rhythm and melody, but in its relations to elocution and music, with that delicate natural perception and that facile execution which render the composition of verse hardly less easy than that of prose; a deep and quick insight into the nature of man, in all his varied faculties, intellectual and emotive; a clear and full perception of the power and beauty of nature, and of all its various harmonies with our own thoughts and feelings; and, to gain a high rank in the present age, wide and exact attainments in literature and art in general. Nor is the possession of such faculties and attainments all that is necessary; but such a sustained and self-collected state of mind as gives one the mastery of his genius, and at the same time presents to him the ideal as an immediate reality, not as a remote conception."

Now, acknowledged, as Percival must be, to possess these high requirements, I have no doubt that the book I have spoken of above will be more read than his own—though, probably, the alarm with which "The Two Sisters" would have looked on this formidable statement of requisites for poetry, presented to them before they had so unconsciously achieved the task, would have quite equalled the surprise of the gentleman who found that he had all his life been talking grammar without learning it. Percival's is a great mind, however, wonderfully stored with learning, and his poetry is a rich treat to the scholar and the purely imaginative reader.

THE PUBLIC FOUNTAINS.—The largest audiences we see in the city, assemble on the advertised nights of the illumination of the Bowling Green fountain. The lower part of the city is rendered completely impassable by the packed assemblages. With the aid of the many-colored fires burned around it, it is certainly a splendid fountain; but it would be beautiful by day, and alone, as well as much more beautiful by night, if the same volume of water sprang from some ornamental structure instead of a huge heap of rocks. In all countries but this, an artist would have been employed to make a design for so costly and public a fountain—a man whom peculiar genius and study had qualified for the task. But the designer of this is an engineer, and the designer of the Park fountain, if it had one, was probably a well-digger or a mason. By the way, as the Park is the most frequented part of the city, and much used by persons wishing to get out of the street for a moment's conversation, the plan of the fountain of Lerna, at Corinth, would be a good one. It was encircled by a beautiful portico, under which were seats for the public to sit upon during the extreme heats of summer, to enjoy the cool air from the falling waters. The Park jet would be superb seen between the marble columns of a portico like this, and the seats would be certainly a great luxury, situated as the Park is. For want of an original idea of our own for a smaller fountain, Michael Angelo's conception were a good one to copy—a sturdy woman wringing a bundle of clothes, whence the water issues that supplies the basin.

FIRST NIGHT OF THE SEASON.—The all-a-gogery of the city on the reopening of the Park theatre, drew me in from the country, contrary to my Monday's wont, and as I am bound to ride to your eye on the top wave of the morning talk, I must jot you down the memorabilia of the first night. The wooden Shakspeare, by the way, has been hoisted to its niche in the façade of the house, and shows well among the very composite order of the new architectural embellishments. A traveller, aiming simply at the graphic, would probably describe our principal theatre as one long shed put on top of another, with a figure of Shakspeare standing in the door of the uppermost. The new paint makes it all right, however. I can not think Mr. Simpson farmed out Mr. Wallack to the best advantage, for the first night of the new embellishments would have filled the house without Wallack. And very sufficient attraction it were too—for the interior is most tasteful and elegant; except that the seats in the boxes are calculated for dwarfs and children, and the grown-up people sit between the knees of the person behind. I see no objection that can be made to the interior of the house. The new drop curtain is admirably painted, and represents Shakspeare and two or three of the muses, tributary to the glory of Macready, who sits with a volume in his hand, the most dignified and conspicuous figure of the group. The design, I understand, is taken from a piece of plate presented to the actor in England, and the use it is put to in the Park fairly out-Barnums Barnum. The house was crammed, and the band opened with "Hail Columbia"—(immense applause)—followed by "Yankee Doodle"—(immense applause). The gas was let on—(immense applause)—the curtain was drawn up, and discovered Mrs. Sloman (disinterred after many years of respected histrionic sepulture) in the character of Elvira—(immense applause). Somebody came on as Valverde—(immense applause). Mr. Barry came on as Pizarro—(immense applause). Mrs. Hunt came on looking very handsome—(immense applause). The curtain dropped on the first act and rose again—(two immense applauses). Mr. Wallack came on as Rolla—(immense applause). The high-priest of the Sun sung his hymn—(immense applause)—and so the play went on, and, wherever the actors left pauses, there were immense applauses. And all the actors and supernumeraries got as much applause as Mr. Wallack. All charmingly levelling and republican. It was quite evident, indeed, that the pleasure and interest in the new lining and reopening of the house was, by much, the predominant sentiment of the evening, and, as I said before, Simpson might well have shelved Wallack till he was more wanted. There were quite enough of his special admirers present to have "brought the house down," it is true; but it was "down" all the time, and nothing but an outbreak of pipes and French horns could have emphasized the acclamations any where in the course of the play. And if Wallack's attraction depended at all on opportuneness, the majority of his fashionable friends are out of the city. So that, altogether, we shall hardly have a fair test of his success till his second engagement, after Macready. Meantime, he is barred from all the parts in which the latter is to appear ("Benedict," among others, in which Wallack is far better than Macready), and driven into the melodrame and farce, in which his versatility makes him almost as "good a card." His "Rolla" was superbly played, and in "Dick Dasha!" it is well known he is unsurpassed. A plan was struck out by a clever friend of mine, in conversation, of combining the management of a New York and London theatre, and of transferring the "gettings-up" in the way of dresses and the more extensive stage properties. The splendors of costume and scenery with which Macready has represented plays within the last year or two in England, could never be produced here except by some such transfer, and the communication by steam is now so rapid and punctual, that it might be done with economy and convenience. By some such combination we may stand a chance of renewing the splendors of theatres in Rome in Nero's time, though, I fear, the perfuming of the lobbies with "Sicilian saffron," and the leading of wine and water all over the house, by pipes concealed within the walls, are luxuries gone irrevocably over Lethe's wharf.

We wish some of our friends knew how much easier it is to go to the ship-chandler for a cable than to find a new cobweb in a much-swept upper-story. "Waste time upon trifles," quotha! We do waste time upon them, indeed, if they are not more acceptable to our readers than twice the bulk of disinterested "information." We thought this was settled long ago, and that the "cap and bells" in which we industriously labor at folly were considered a part of our working livery—the least enviable and the most meritorious. Few things are easier or more stupid than to be wise—on paper. Nothing is easier, and few tasks sooner done, than to cram, on any subject, and astonish the world with "reading"—astonish without delighting it, that is to say. Give us nothing to do but to be wise, oh, "approved good masters," and we have leisure enough at once for some additional vocation—clerk in a bank, or principal in a female seminary—(the two trustworthy offices, we beg leave to record, which have been thought suitable to our abilities). Why, there is information enough on any conceivable subject, and all within ten minutes walk of where we sit and write, to stupify Minerva; and it is as easy to unshelve, pick out, and embroider it upon an editorial, as it is to buy grapes at Bininger's. It is a very great mistake to suppose that anybody but a donkey makes a packhorse of his memory, carrying about the rubbish intended only for a storehouse of reference. Let who likes

"break his fast
With Aristotle, dine with Tully, take
His watering with the Muses, sup with Livy,
Then walk a turn or two in Via Lactea,
And after six hours' conference with the stars
Sleep with old Erra Pater;"

we do not believe he would sell to the newsboys—which is our noble ambition. So, if you please (or if you don't please), most worthy critic, we shall go on "wasting our time upon trifles." And, by way of a Parthian fling, let us toss under your nose what Addison says on this subject: "Notwithstanding pedants of a pretended depth and solidity are apt to decry the writings of a polite author as flash and froth, they all of them show, upon occasion, that they would spare no pains to arrive at the character of those whom they seem to despise." And (Parthian arrow No. 2) what that esteemed model Lord Foppington says: "To mind the inside of a book is to entertain one's self with the forced product of another man's brain. Now I think a man of quality and breeding may be much amused with the natural sprouts of his own." And if that is not a brace of quotations pungent and apt, we know as little about quoting as our rebukers aver.

But we have been more specifically snubbed by a morning paper, and we must say a word specifically in reply—for the notice, done by no means in an unfriendly spirit, was wind in our sail, for which we are grateful, now and always. The writer objects to our mentioning the nearest thing to woman—apropos, as the allusion was, of a late change in the fashion of it. He calls this frivolous! We are not prepared to go the philosopher's length, that "there is no such thing as a trifle in the world"—but we put it point blank to issue, in any man's judgment, if this be a trifle! Now we are called an unread ignoramus, but we have read Ovid and Juvenal, and we well remember blushing over the epithet "linen-wearing," applied frequently to the high-priests in the Egyptian ceremonies—no poor precedent for the like of us, let us modestly say, and the worthier the precedent the more you disparage us. Sacred from the earliest ages was held "cloth of flax," and sacred in any deferential mind is, to this day, the mention of linen. But, history and precedent apart, how have we become so consecrated, that anything, the least, which appertains to woman, is too "frivolous" to be wrapt up in our rhetoric? The particular aim of the peccant allusion was to diffuse the knowledge of a new embellishment for the sex—to give our poor aid to a worthier clothing of beauty, which, after religion, is quite the divinest vouchsafe from our Maker. If this be a trifle, show us your importances! It is no trifle to devote half a column of a newspaper to a new dahlia—no trifle to bring to bear a fine-art criticism on a satin skirt in a painting—no trifle to write for months about the jet of a fountain. Yet what are these and a thousand similar topics—what in worthiness and elevation—even to the outlined shadow of a woman, if (as it can not) that sweet shadow could be improved? No! no!—We are not to be driven from our many-years' worship by such unconsidered taking of exceptions. We write not, besides, to please any critic—(male). The New Mirror shall be masculine enough, but all-tributary to the ladies—God bless them! We are their slave—bound to bring to their use and knowledge all that can please, and especially all that can embellish them. We are here

"To answer their best pleasure; be't to fly,
To swim, to dive into the fire, to ride
On the curled clouds;"

and "if any man take exception, let him turn the buckle of his girdle."

Saunders, the excellent miniature-painter, went home in the Great Western. He was in this country about three years, and, though his prices were much higher than any of our own painters, he had full occupation from first to last. His delicious miniatures (some of which you will have seen at Washington) are scattered through our principal cities, and the "fleeing show" of some beauty and much worth and talent is preserved in them. He is a very observing man, and he made a remark that interested me. He said that the motive for sitting for a picture in this country was almost always affection—in England it was almost always pride. Though among his sitters were a few of the loveliest women he had ever seen, the majority were invalids, or old persons who might soon die, or persons about going on far journeys—those, in short, who were loved and might soon be lost. In England, the subject of a miniature is usually good-looking. It is a young girl the year she comes out, or a beautiful child before his curls are shorn to send him to a public school, or a young man, in his first uniform after entering the army. Pride appears somewhere in the reason for the doing of the picture. And Mr. Saunders's remark confirms a previous impression of my own—that personal beauty is vastly more valued in countries over the water.

Some years since, Mr. Saunders was appointed miniature-painter to the king of Hanover, and resided some time at the royal palace, painting the different members of the family. I met him subsequently in Italy (ten years ago), where several noble ladies of England were sitting to him. His success in this country should be a stimulus to our own artists, for he has proved that, spite of the depression of the times, there is patronage enough for the high degrees of art. He thought very highly, by-the-way, of Mr. Hite, the miniature-painter, of this city, who is doubtless the legitimate heir to his mantle.

Apròpos of high prices for the arts, Mr. Catherwood has opened a subscription, which appeals only to the rich and liberal; and he is very likely to succeed in his enterprise, I think. His splendid drawings in sepia of the ruins of Central America are to be engraved of the size of the originals, and the price of one copy is to be a hundred dollars. I saw one subscription-paper with several names upon it. But a book of drawings by Catherwood at a hundred dollars, and a novel of Bulwer's at a shilling, and both successful, leave at least a wide field of betweenity.

Catherwood is an unsurpassed artist in his line, and I trust we shall show our appreciation of his genius while he honors us by residing among us.

The city is somewhat closer packed by the addition to its contents of Thomas Thumb, jun., Esq., who has returned from the south in time to escape the "fell moscheto." He occupies the American Museum as before. Mr. Barnum, who is unsurpassed for felicity of trap, has hit upon an amusing mode of drawing attention to Mr. Thumb, and giving a "realizing sense" of his diminutive proportions. On a pole outside the Museum is placed a well-appointed mansion, two feet square, with "T. Thumb, jun." on the brass-plate of the door. A pair of leather breeches, about the size of a double opera-glass, hang outside to dry; a pair of white-topboots of the same proportions on another nail, and Mr. T.'s hat and coat on another. The fun lies in all these articles being well-worn. They are a little shabby indeed; and, in the boots, the leather is represented as worn a little red by the straps of his trousers! Whoever got them up is an artist. Fit as Tommy is to be a "tiger" to Queen Mab, his boots and breeches would require stretching.

There is no end to the rivalry of hotels. Cozzens, of the "American," is making the attractive show of Broadway tributary to his house. The former smoking-room and reading-room on the corner of the second story are being converted into a superb ladies' parlor, with a charming look-out over the park and the new fountain; while the ground floor, formerly a tailor's shop, is to be devoted to the loungers who wish to sit in their chairs and see Broadway without the trouble of walking. As a hotel, from which to see what is going on to the best advantage, the "American" will now be the best in the city; and, as mine host is famous for his table, he may soon gather his "plum."

I see by the report of a late trial that an editor, in the eyes of a counsellor-at-law, is considered "a mechanic who carries on a newspaper"—the plea being that a man in this condition of life should be taxed with but small alimony for a divorced wife. It would be convenient to some of the tribe to come down to this classification, though most editors will probably resist it, as ambitious boys sometimes object to being let into a show for half-price. I wish the counsellor had defined the luxuries proper to gentlemen that are not proper for "mechanics."

The races between the "Empire" and the other boats on the Hudson occupy the city talk. I trust they will have done their uttermost before anybody I am very fond of has occasion to embark in them—for I presume it is like the proving of guns. If the boilers stand this, they will stand anything. The Empire beats, but not by so much as was anticipated. She is unmatched for comfort and beauty, however, and a trip to Albany in her, a month hence, will be a treat worth looking forward to. She runs as a day-boat hereafter.

One of the papers announces Count D'Orsay as already arrived in New York. It is a mistake; and so, I believe, is the announcement that he is coming at all. He resisted strong inducements to come out in the suite of his intimate friend, Lord Durham (late governor of Canada), and if he had ever contemplated a visit to America, he would have availed himself of that opportunity.

Brough, the vocalist, had a concert recently of renaissance, well-attended and rapturously applauded. He sung better than ever. Mr. Frank Brown assisted him—a very promising young singer, who is about trying his musical fortune in Italy. He has a handsome person and good talents, as well as an excellent quality of voice, and will be heard of favorably hereafter, I have little doubt.

Previous to the last six months, New York has only been to me a place of transit, and for the benefit of transitory travellers, it is perhaps worth while to mention what I have missed till I became a resident. Like the new Sunday-school pupil who was surprised with the sight of "A," of which he had often heard, though he had never seen it before, I am quite full of raptures about Hoboken—new to me till a day or two since. Its extent, beauty, and particularly its nearness to Broadway, were all surprises. With the exception of the ferry, it lies at the foot of Barclay street, which you know runs down from the Astor, and if the proprietors of that hotel chose to advertise the proximity of the "Elysian fields" as an attraction to their establishment, the only objection would lie in the dread of alarming the apoplectic. The stile over which you step into these grounds is at the ferry-landing, and you are immediately under the shade of avenues leading to covert and winding walks, and to a park which covers the beautiful promontory of Hoboken, and which can not be surpassed in the world for union of glade and distant view. Who keeps these walks so smooth and trim, who laid them out and gave them to the public, and who lives in the enviable residence adjoining them, I do not know. But the New-Yorkers may be satisfied that they have at their service, and close at hand, grounds which equal those of any nobleman in England. On week-days they seem little frequented, too; though on Sundays, I am told, the avenues are thronged.

I observed a new fashion in ladies' boots, which would take, I should think, among the Orientals. The Arabs, as you know, judge of aristocracy by the test of a hollow under the instep—that if water will run under the naked foot when standing on marble, the ancestors of the owner could not have borne burdens. Mr. Dick, ladies' bootmaker in Broadway, inserts a steel spring into the sole to keep it snug under the instep, supporting the foot very comfortably in walking, and adding very much to its beauty. The amalgamationists will probably oppose the fashion, as the negro foot is entirely excluded from its advantages.

I think there was what is commonly called "an opening" for a fashionable summer-theatre up town. Gayety in private circles ceases very much by the first of May; strangers, travelling for pleasure, and inclined to bestow themselves for the evenings in the resorts of "silk attire," begin to arrive; few leave the city for touring till August, and the great majority of the better classes do not leave it at all except for country-seats in the neighborhood, or for short periods; the other theatres are shut; and the patrician complexion given to a place by inducements like the foregoing, is the best trap for what the manager would call "miscellaneous patronage;" or, to express it by a maxim of theatrical economy, white gloves in the first circle will insure dirty hands in the third.

Mr. Niblo has cleverly stepped into this opening. His pretty theatre is newly done up in gilding and blue maroon" (an ill-omened stuff for theatrical lining); it is brilliantly lighted; the scenery is peculiar and new, and he begins with addressing his entertainment solely to those who have either aired their manners with travel, or "fed of the dainties that are bred in a book." The French company might as well deliver themselves in pantomime as sing in French to most of the ordinary frequenters of our theatres, but the boxes understand; and it is worth the gallery's time and money to have a three hours' perusal of the unbonneted attractions of the boxes—the opera aside.

An "Admirable Crichton" of music, equally wonderful on the piano-forte and the violin, has appeared among us, in the person of Mr. Wm. Vincent Wallace, Director of the Dublin Anacreontic Society. Those who have heard Paganini and Thalberg, pronounce decidedly that he is unsurpassed even by those hitherto unequalled maestros! He performs upon the piano a grand introduction and variations on the theme of the Cracovienne, composed by himself. The instrument becomes a full orchestra, under his hands, which seems multiplied into a dozen; while, in the rapid passages, his fingers are invisible as the spokes of a locomotive-wheel in full career. He has no left hand, but two right ones, equally independent of each other. The brilliancy and power of his execution set off admirably the delicate moreaux of melody interspersed, and all unite to produce an effect before unknown to us. But his performance on the violin surpasses, if possible, that upon the piano. He executes on this the Carnival of Venice, and the Witches' Dance of Benevento, and several other difficult compositions, as originally performed by Paganini, and never before heard in this country; and the effect is most startling and thrilling. In his hands, the violin does more than speak—it sings, shrieks, supplicates, reproaches, dies, revives, and realizes the fancy of Balzac, that a soul is imprisoned within it. With his bow he scatters a bright shower of melody through the air, and rasps diamond-sparkles from the strings. Our language may seem extravagant, but it falls far short of the reality. Musicians are in raptures with the fulness and purity of his tones, the decision and accuracy of his stopping, his left-handed pizzicato, and his double notes on the fourth string. We rejoice that such an artist bears an English name, and proves that wonderful musical genius is not confined to foreign nations.

At the London Opera, no gentleman is admitted who is not in full dress. Ladies go there jewelled, decolletées, and unbonneted of course. It is a dress-place.

Ladies must have a place to "dress."

The New York ladies have ceased to dress gayly in the street.

Private parties are not a sufficient vent for the passion of dress among ladies.

Now, Mr. Niblo, do you see your way?

The above is a literal copy of a memorandum we made for an article, while sitting out the expectant half hour before the rising of the curtain, a night or two ago, at the French Opera. We pitch it at you head foremost, dear reader, because you are sometimes willing to take us in the lump, or seriatim, as it is convenient for us to deliver ourselves—but more particularly because the printer is clamorous for copy, and, hurried or not hurried, copied we like to be.

But, to our text. A dress-opera is happily entitled upon us by the change of the sumptuary character of Broadway. Ladies now (and very likely we are telling our country-friends a bit of news) are under the necessity of having two bonnets. There must be a plain straw with a green veil, to soften down and properize any appearance in the street, on foot and unattended. There must be a dress-bonnet for morning calls, matinées, breakfast-parties, wedding-visits, and, generally, for all daylight departures from home, on errands of ceremony or pleasure. This dress-bonnet requires other concomitants in keeping—lace, feathers, flowers—whatever is required for a full parure. And a full parure requires a carriage, of course. And a carriage requires a fortune. And as all this is the fashion, nobody can be fashionable who is not rich. And so comes in the dynasty of the aristocracy of money!

Now we like all this—offensive as it seems, at the first blush, to a republican eye. Part the extremes—widen the distance between wealth and poverty—and you make room for a middle class, which is not yet recognised in our country—everybody who is not absolutely poor, striving to seem absolutely rich. Of this middle class, literary men are a natural part and parcel. So are many of the worthiest and most intelligent people of this country—people who are now occupying a station in life like Mohammed's coffin, neither on the earth of poverty nor in the heaven of riches, and in sad lack of a resting-place between. Once recognise that station in society—once make it respectable to set aside certain extravagances in dress and living as not proper for a condition in life which is still far above poverty—and you set at ease thousands of families that are now subjected to endless uncertainties and mortifications. It requires, now, both judgment and vigilance for many ladies not to dress far above their condition in life—yet what more distasteful than to have seen the husband in his place of business, careworn and distressed, and the next minute to meet his wife in Broadway, dressed out of all keeping with his gains, and of course with no sympathy for his troubles! We believe that, in fact, the ladies are of our way of thinking in this matter. It is uncomfortable for pride to be always "treading water," as the swimmers say. Better sink, and sink, and sink, till you come to your true level—anybody will say.

Of course we follow nature, however, and of course we except beauty from all homely precepts and economies. The peacock and the butterfly pay no penalty that we know of for their extra-furnishings from the shop of Rainbow & Co. Their business on earth is to delight the eye; and that, we religiously believe, is the errand of human beauty as well. No! Let there be no "condition in life" for beautiful women! Nature's princesses they are by the instinctive consent of human nature; and the homage we can not but pay, let us be bold enough to acknowledge. As to beauty's being, "when unadorned, adorned the most," it is true of nothing but a statue. In real life, we think flowers and gems are the natural belongings and ornaments of personal loveliness. All beauty should be so furnished—even if ugliness be compelled to "service dure" to procure them.

But to return to the opera. Ladies should be reminded that nothing adds more to the cheerfulness of the scene, and its consequent attraction, than light and bright colors. A dark dress has no business at the opera, though indeed the dress itself may be anything, so that the bust and head, which are alone seen, are dressed gayly. No bonnets, and least of all, veils! Let us have a dress place of amusement. Let there be a resort in the long and vacant hours after business, where we can seem to enter a brighter chamber of this dingy world, and be compelled (we men) to dress ourselves, and feel in a more holiday and liberal atmosphere.

In the window of a Broadway shop we noticed, the other day, a China dinner-set, otherwise magnificent, but deformed by a representation on each plate of "The great fire in New York." Thus, on every festive occasion, the guests would have their gayety damped by the suggestion of that scene of loss, danger, and suffering. Such bad taste is too frequent. It would be equally easy to impress devices calculated to arouse cheerful and enlivening associations; but, as a people, we are too careless of such matters. Trifles in themselves they may be; but such little items of enjoyment—such grains of pleasure—make up in time quite a mountain of happiness.

THEODORE HOOK.—Good dinners will not make a man immortal. The prince of diners-out is dead. It would seem as if "good living" meant long living too—for who ever thought Theodore Hook could die!—"a fellow of infinite jest, of most excellent fancy." "Where be your gibes now? your gambols? your songs? your flashes of merriment that were wont to set the table in a roar? Not one now, to mock your own grinning!" We have carried out the quotation somewhat with a feeling of bitterness—not against the dead, but for him. We could have begun the passage with Hamlet—"Alas, poor Yorick!—I knew him, Horatio!" Everybody knew Theodore Hook, who has been "summered and wintered" in London, and we knew him as others did, with that far-reaching and half-pitying admiration which is given to a wit of all work—a joker never out of harness—a "funny man" by profession, as the children thought Mathews. We have seen Theodore Hook make excellent hits, and we have seen him make desperate failures—many failures to one hit, indeed. But so it must be, as every one knows who has thought twice on wit as a "good continuer."

Hook was the editor of the "John Bull" newspaper, and his portrait would have served for its imprint. He was the personification of John Bull, as the French fancy him, and as he is represented on the stage. Above the middle height, he looked short, from being corpulent and short-necked. His person was "stocky" altogether—thick legs, high chest, short arms, and bluff, rubicund, and rather defying features. We have not heard of what he died; but, we presume, of apoplexy, for he looked of that habit, and lived in a way to produce and feed it. Over his brows, however, there seemed to be a region, like the sun above clouds on a mountain-side, brighter than that below. His forehead was ample and white, his head smoothly bald, and, if the observer had seen but that portion of Theodore Hook, he would have formed of him a far higher opinion than in following him downward. To that tablet of intellect his works of imagination, we believe, never did justice. His novels are third-rate, while his native powers were first-rate, and against those two unattained steps on the ladder of immortality, Hook's poor offset was his very mortal celebrity as a table-wit—the diner-out, par excellence, of his day.

We believe in omens. In the days of Charlemagne large possessions were transferred, not with wax and paper, but with a ring. A ring has been given us by a well-wishing stranger, and we here signify our belief that, in it is transferred to us the prosperity of the former proprietor—dead two thousand years ago at the very least, but undeniably a most prosperous gentleman. Let us look a little at the evidence.

It is generally supposed, we believe, that the mummies preserved to this day are, in all human probabity, from two to three thousand years old. Some time before the advent of our Savior, Egypt had become a Roman province, and the more costly usages of the Egyptians had been done away—the embalming of the bodies of the rich and great being among the most costly. Those which have defied time and corruption, through two thousand years, of course were such as were embalmed with the most cost and care, and the poor, the antiquarians tell us, were merely dried by salt and laid away in the catacombs. The rings and other ornaments of the mummied great were wrapped up with them.

The ring that was given us three days ago is of silver, holding a stone covered with Arabic characters, and was taken from the finger of a mummy, bought at a great price for exhibition, and partly opened. It is of rude work, and if Egypt's jewellers did their best upon it, we can but say that our friend Tenney, of Broadway, was only born too late to astonish the Pharaohs. We have not yet found an Arabic scholar to decipher it, but, if we had not known it to be Arabic (or Coptic), we should have said it was a device of three stars, a wrench, and two streaks of lightning—very properly expressive of our three selves (the editors and publisher), our manner of work, and the way the Mirror is to go. And, on the whole, we shall let it rest at that—without further translation.

We are not sure that, if the former proprietor of this silver ring could wake, he would think his finger-ornament handed down in the same line of life. The classifications of society under the Ptolemies would have put us down low (priests, soldiers, shepherds, swineherds, mechanics, interpreters, and fishermen—the literary profession being the last but one), yet, after all, there is a resemblance between us, and I am happy to say (no offence to the mummy) that it is not in our personal appearance! It was necessary, to embalm this gentleman, that his brains should first be extracted through his nostrils. We trust to be embalmed by letting ours ooze from our fingers' ends—and, on the whole, we may say, we prefer our way of doing it. But that is all. We see no other resemblance. The Egyptian was circumcised. He was gloomy and superstitious. He increased his poultry by artificially hatching eggs. The husband had the charge of the domestic concerns; the wife of buying and selling, and all affairs that were not of a domestic character. He hated songs and dances. He was a stranger to gayety, and he drank nothing stronger than barley-beer. We trust that it is no vanity on our part to congratulate his ring on converseance for the future with a more pleasant state of things—aristocratic comparisons apart.

Prosperous the Mirror is to be—thanks to the liberal giver of the ring that foreshadows it! But (to "out with a secret") we should feel easier if the envious would begin to manifest their displeasure. We have a dread of "the primrose way to the everlasting bonfire," and should feel safer in a thornier path than we tread now. This pushing all of one side makes us fancy we topple. We would try our friends at opposition. Feathers that go down with one wind mount with a counter-current. We "cotton" to old King Osymandyas, who caused to be graven on his Colossus: "I am King Osymandyas—if any man will know my greatness let him destroy one of my works." And of that jolly old monarch, the first owner of our ring was possibly a subject—conjunctive omen of our road to prosperity.

BEARDS IN NEW YORK.—It is odd how a fashion creeps from one country to another, unaware. Has it occurred to you that a bearded nation we have become within the last year or two—imitating La Jeune France in that and other accompanying particulars?

My attention was called to it yesterday by a friend just returned from a long residence in Europe. He was expressing very emphatically his annoyance at the loss of his mustache. On coming in sight of land he had gone below and sacrificed it, as a thing "most tolerable and not to be endured," among the sober friends to whom he was returning; when lo! on landing—every second man in a full suit of beard! His mustache and imperial chance to be very becoming to him, and his mortification, at being compelled to put them again into nascent stubble, was unbounded.

Two schools of dress have prevailed in France for the last six or seven years—the classic and the romantic; the former with the Brutus head, short hair and apparel of severe simplicity, and the other with flowing locks, fanciful beard, and great sumptuousness of cravat and waistcoat. The "romantic" is the only one which has "come over," and it prevails at present in New York, with (to use the popular phrase) "a perfect looseness." Almost every man below forty has tried his beard on, and most of the young men about town show their fancy in something beyond the mere toothbrush-whisker of the military. The latter, by-the-way, is the only beard "let out" by the London men whom the packets bring over, and in England the synonyme is rigorous between "mustache" and "adventurer." It seems to me, however, that the principles of taste which should affect the fashion of a beard are but little regarded among us, and I rather wonder that some ambitious barber has not set himself up as an authority—to decide their shape by private consultation, according to feature and complexion. Perhaps I may feed a want of the era by putting down what I have gathered on the subject of beards by reading and travel.

In a country where all the hair which nature has planted on the face is permitted to grow, a shaved man certainly looks very silly. After a short passage from Asia Minor to Malta, the clean-shaved English officers struck me as a very denuded and inexpressive-looking race, though much more athletic and handsome than the Orientals I had left. The beards of old men, particularly, are great embellishments, covering as they do, the mouth, which most shows age and weakness, by loss of teeth and feebleness of muscle. When the mouth is covered, the whole expression of the face is concentrated in the eyes, and it is surprising how much the eyes gain in character and brilliancy by a full mustache. A luxuriant and silky beard on a young and clear skin is certainly very beautiful, though, according to medical observation, the faculties are much better matured when the beard comes late. In bearded countries, the character is very much judged of by the beard. There is an old Irish proverb which says:—

"Trust not that man, although he were your brother, Whose hair's one color and his beard another."

In irritable persons, the beard grows thin and dry. In those of milder temper it is thick and slightly curling. The beard is affected very sensibly by the nature of a man's nourishment; and this explains why they know an aristocrat in the East by the luxuriance of this appendage—poor food deteriorating its quality. Diplomats should always wear the mustache, as it is much easier to control the expression of the eye than of the mouth—useful to card-players and stock-brokers, for the same reason. Shaving among the ancients was a mark of mourning—though at the era when beards were out of fashion, they were let grow, by those who had lost friends. When a man's mouth is beautiful and expressive, the beard which covers it is a disadvantage, and we may guess that Scipio Africanus (the first Roman who shaved every day) wore on his lips the tenderness and magnanimity which he displayed toward the bride of the captive Allucius. The first shaving barber was one Ticinius Mænas, who came from Sicily to Rome about three hundred years before Christ, and then commenced an era of smooth chins, interrupted, for a short while only, by the emperor Adrian, who wore his beard to conceal warts on his chin. With most nations the beard has been considered an ornament. Moses commanded the Jews not to shave, and the ancient Germans, and the Asiatics of a later day, have considered no insult so mortal as the cutting off of one man's beard by another. In France, shaving came into fashion during the reigns of Louis XIII. and XIV., both of these monarchs having ascended the throne when beardless, and their subjects imitating them, of course. And as France gave the law of fashion to all Europe, the sacrifice of part of the beard grew to be common, though it is only since the beginning of the last century that the shaving of the whole beard became universal.

I have noticed, in New York, that men, who had formerly no pretensions to good looks, have become very handsome by the wearing of mustache and imperial, and I have seen handsome men disfigured by adopting the same fashion. The effect of a mustache and full beard is to make the face more masculine, graver, and coarser, and this is, of course, an improvement to one whose features are over-delicate, or whose expression is too frivolous. On a dapper man, it is quite out of place, and he should wear a clipped whisker, if any beard at all. The beard, I think, gives a middle-aged look, and makes a man of twenty look older, and a man of forty younger. The ladies like a beard—naturally thinking faces effeminate which are as smooth as their own, and not objecting to the distinctions which nature has made between the sexes. When the beard is but partially worn, some artistic knowledge should be called in, as a short face may be made longer, and a broad face narrower, a gay face graver, and an undecided chin put in domino. But of all abominations in this way, I think, the goat's beard, growing under the chin only, is the most brutal and disgusting, though just now, in New York, rather the prevailing fashion. The mistake in taste is very common, of continuing to wear a high shirt collar and cravat, with a beard on the cheek and throat—the beauty of a curling beard depending very much on its freedom and natural adaptation to the mould of the face. There are more people than Beatrice, of course, who are willing to let a man's beard be "of the color that God pleases," but there are others who have aversions to red beards and yellow, and there is great trade in cirages and gums for the improvement of color and texture. Most of the beards you meet in Broadway glitter in the sun like steel filings. Altogether, I think the fashion of wearing the beard a desirable one, and I particularly wish it would prevail among old men. A bearded senate would make a wiser and more reverend show in congress, and anything which conceals the decrepitude of age and moves respect (as beards certainly do, both), is most desirable.

MACREADY'S FIRST NIGHT.—Macready had a full, not an overflowing house, to witness his debut last night, and there were more of his own profession among the audience than I ever before saw together—(partly, perhaps, from curiosity to hear the "readings" of Shakspeare which the drop curtain represents Macready as giving to the Muses). The play was Macbeth, and Mr. Ryder, who accompanies Mr. Macready, came on first as Macduff, and was very warmly received—applauded, indeed, throughout the play, as his playing deserved. He is a very correct actor, and a "fine figure of a man." Macready's appearance brought the house "down" of course. He went at his interview with the witches most artistically, and the witches did their bedevillments more artistically than we have seen them done before, and so of all the trick and machinery of the play—for Macready is master of "stage business," and the scenery and supernumeraries had been effectually cleared of cobwebs. The play went on—with a beautiful procession of effects, particularly by Macready in his exits and entrances, his salutations and surprises—and to the theatre-going people present it was an exhibition of drama-panorama curiously managed, and all as clean and neat as machinery—and just as moving. The attention was close, but the applause grew less and less. I never saw so cold a house. The most stormy and passionate outbreaks of Macbeth's mingled ambition and remorse were received like the catastrophes in a puppet-show—with an unexcited smile of surprise. Each "point" the actor made was looked at like the wheel of a clock shown piecemeal. There was no passion in the audience, no illusion, no general interest in the progress of the story of the play—in short, no feeling.

My own sensations during the evening were those of pain and annoyance. Mr. Macready is so accomplished an artificer in his profession—everything he does is so admirably "studied up"— that a cold reception of so much pains seems most ungracious. When he came in and knelt to the king—when he entered Duncan's chamber to murder him—when he received the first suggestions of crime from Lady Macbeth—I could have shouted myself hoarse with admiration of the artist—it was all done so differently from another man, and so skilfully in a high and finished conception of the character. Every step he took on the stage was a separate study. Every look, gesture, movement, was consummate. As pantomime it would have been absolutely faultless. Yet, strange to say, he walks the stage like a transparent man—showing all his anatomy. He wants clothing with natural flesh and blood. His voice wants nature. It sounds like the breaking of crockery in a dry well. He feels no passion and he moves none. What a pity that scholarship, study, labor, patience, and taste, should fall short, in their result, of the most unlabored off-throwing of genius!

ITALIAN OPERA.—I saw only the first act of "Lucia de Lammermoor," and found little to admire except the performance of the orchestra. Signor Antognini certainly did not come up to his reputation as a tenor, and he is the great star of the company. He is a curious-looking man to play the lover. The muscles of his face pull, every one, upon his nostrils, like "taut halliards," and with eyebrows pointing fiercely at the bridge of his nose, and the mouth like an angry dash of a pen under an emphasized word, he looks as Mephistophilis as one of Retzsch's drawings. Madame Majocchi, the prima donna, is a fat woman with a fat voice. She has a good contralto footing in her throat, but her soprano notes are painfully tiptoe, and you are glad when she is comfortably at the bottom of her cadenza. The company appears pretty well drilled, but they want a prima donna, and if they could find a prima donna in want of them (Castellan, for instance) we might have good opera. They say that Antognini's voice is only grass-grown from neglect, and that he would do brilliantly after a little practice. Considering the certain fortune that waits upon a fine tenor, it is surprising that there should continue to be so few aspirants for the honors of the Rubini; for it can not be that there are only half a dozen (if so many) of human voices possessing his capabilities of tone and cultivation. There is probably "full many a" postillion of Lonjumeau "born to" "waste his sweetness on the desert air," and it would be a good speculation to look them up and buy a life-interest in their thoracic capabilities.

DR. HOWE.—It will be a curious piece of news to you that our countryman, Dr. Howe (lately married and gone abroad) has been stopped on the borders of Prussia by a cabinet order, and of course is shut out from so much of the Rhine as lies (if my geography serves me) between Coblenz and Cologne. This special edict on the part of a king with a standing army of two hundred thousand men is no small compliment to Dr. Howe's consequence; but perhaps it would interest you to be made acquainted with the cetera intus.

About ten years ago I had the honor (and as such I shall always treasure the memory) of sharing Dr. Howe's lodgings at Paris for some months. He was then employed in learning that system of instruction for the blind upon which he has since grafted improvements that have made him a separate fame among philanthropists. Philanthropy seems to be his engrossing and only mission in life, however; for, though giving the most of his day to the objects of his special errand, he found time to make himself the most servicable man in France to the cause of Poland. The disasters of Warsaw had filled Paris with destitute refugees, and distinguished men who had shared in that desperate battle were literally houseless in the streets. Our common breakfast-room was thronged with these unfortunate patriots, and, with noble liberality, Dr. Howe kept open table for all who came to him—many of them, to my knowledge, getting no food elsewhere, and, among others, Lelewel, the distinguished poet and patriot, coming in one morning to ask a breakfast, as I well recollect, after having slept out a winter's night in the street. Lafayette was at that time at the head of the Polish committee, and Fenimore Cooper (whose generosity to the Poles should be chronicled, as well as the devotion of his time and talents to the cause) shared with Dr. Howe the counsel and most efficient agency of the benevolent old man. At this time a sum of money was raised to be sent, with some important and secret despatches, to the Poles who had fled into Prussia, and Dr. Howe offered to be the bearer. I went with him to the Mesagerie and saw him off in the diligence, very little suspecting the dangerous character of his errand. He arrived at Berlin, and, after passing the evening abroad, returned to his hotel, and found a couple of gens-d'armes in his room. They informed him that he must accompany them to the police. The doctor understood his position in a moment. By a sudden effort he succeeded in pitching both the soldiers out of the room and closing the door, for it was all-important that he should gain time to destroy papers that he had about him. The gens-d'armes commenced a parley with him through the bolted door, which resulted in a compact that he should be let alone till morning, on condition of his agreeing to go with them peaceably at daylight—they keeping sentry outside. He had no light, but he passed the night in tearing into the smallest possible fragments the important papers, and soaking them in water. Among his papers, however, were two or three letters from Lafayette to himself which he wished to preserve, and after examining the room he secreted these in the hollow of a plaster cast of the king which chanced to be there, and so saved them; for, though the minute fragments were picked out and put together again (as he subsequently discovered), he wrote to a friend at Berlin, six months after, who went to the hotel and found the secreted letters safe in the plaster king's keeping!

At dawn Dr. Howe opened his door, and was marched immediately to prison. By chance, on the evening of his arrival, he had met an American in the entry of the hotel, who had recognised him, and the next day came to call. From the mysterious manner in which the people of the house denied all knowledge of what had become of him, this gentleman suspected an arrest, and wrote to Mr. Rives, our then minister to France, stating his suspicion. Mr. Rives immediately demanded him of the Prussian government, and was assured, in reply, that they knew nothing of the person in question. Mr. Rives applied a second time. Dr. Howe had now been six weeks in solitary confinement, and at the end of this period he was taken out in silence and put into a carriage with closed windows. They drove off, and it was his own terrible belief for the first day that he was on his way to Siberia. By the light through the covering of the carriage, however, he discovered that he was going westward.

The sudden transition from close confinement to the raw air, threw him into a fever, and on the third day of his silent journey he begged to be allowed to stop and consult a physician. They refused. On the next morning, while changing horses, a physician was brought to the carriage-door, who, after seeing the prisoner, wrote a certificate that he was able to proceed, and they again drove on. That day they crossed a corner of the Hanoverian dominions, and, while stopping for a moment in a village, Dr. Howe saw the red coats of some officers, and by a bold attempt escaped from his guards and threw himself on their protection. They quietly restored him to the Prussians, and the carriage drove on once more—his guard finally setting him down at Metz, on the borders of Prussia, with orders never to enter again the Prussian dominions. At present he is at Baden-Baden, and Mr. Everett is engaged in a negotiation, through the Prussian minister at London (Chevalier Bunsen), for the revocation of the cabinet order, and permission for a simple citizen of the United States to show his bride the Rhine! Mr. Greene, our consul at Rome, who is now in New York, informs me that Dr. Howe is also on the black list of the king of Naples—of course as a general champion of liberty.

Dr. Howe's first reputation, as is well known, was made as a Philhellene in the Greek revolution. He left this country entirely without means, having just completed his studies in surgery, and worked his passage to Greece. He entered the service as surgeon, and soon gained the highest promotion—serving part of the time on board the armed steamer commanded by Hastings—the only fault found with him being (as a Hanoverian comrade of his told me at Paris) that he would be in the fight, and was only a surgeon when the battle was over. His whole career in Greece was one of gallant acts of bravery, generosity, and self-sacrifice, as represented by his companions there—and if he could ever be made to overcome the unwillingness with which he speaks of himself, his history of personal adventure would, without doubt, be one of the most curiously-interesting narratives in the world. Dr. Howe's slight person, delicate and beautiful features, and soft voice, would give one the impression that he was more at home in his patient labor of winding light through the labyrinth of the sense-imprisoned Laura Bridgman; but a more fiery spirit, and one more reluctant to submit to the details of quiet life, does not exist, and the most trying service he has ever done in the cause of philanthropy, I sincerely believe, is this discipline of his tumultuous energies to the patient teaching of the blind. He is still a young man—not yet forty, I believe. I could not trust my admiration and affection to say more of his character than the giving of this simple statement of facts.

The New York American, after quoting from what the editor calls "the agreeably gossiping New York correspondent of the National Intelligencer," remarks that "this correspondence is not, to be sure, very reliable for matters of fact"—which is very like disparaging a hasty pudding for not being a rump-steak. This style of criticising things by telling what they are not, suits the "American" in the two respects, that it is both easy and oracular. But I should prefer to be tried rather by what I undertake to do, which is certainly not to send you simply "matters of fact." To wait for the winnowing of error and exaggeration from truth, would be to send you a correspondence as stale as some of the columns in which I am found fault with. I profess nothing of the kind. I send you the novelty and gossip of the hour, and you, and all others (except those who are "nothing if not critical," and must find a fault) take it as they take what they hear in their day's walk—as material for conversation and speculation, which may be mere rumor, may be truth. I am happy to amuse a New York editor, but I do not write for one so near my sources of information. I write with only such of your subscribers in my eye as are not resident in New York—who want a gay daguerreotype of the floating news and chit-chat of the hour, such as they would have gathered by observation and conversation, if they had passed in New York the day on which I write. Loose as is all this ministry to the love of news, however, I will lay any bet which I could have the conscience to take from that editor, that, comparing paragraph by paragraph with his own paper, for twenty columns, I will find more misstatements in his than in my own—though you would think by his criticism that he never committed an error in his life.

And apropos of my sins of correspondence, I find that propriety begins to require that all words signifying exhilarating drinks must henceforth be decently disembowelled—that cobblers must be written c—s, and juplans j—s, slings s—s, and punches p—s. I have had three letters and one poetic appeal addressed to me, remonstrative against my shameless mention of these iniquitous beverages in so exemplary a paper as the Intelligencer. I consider this an exponent of the leading enthusiasm of the era, and willingly give way. One of my rebukers attacked me more particularly for what he considered a slighting allusion to the coming of Father Mathew to America. To this, in intention at least, I plead not guilty. I revere the character of that great reformer, and I consider his mission sacred and salutary. My submission shall be more emphatic, if necessary.

Macready draws well, and the town is fully occupied in discussing why he only astonishes and never moves the feelings of his audience. He is a most accomplished player, and in these days, when theatrical criticism can neither help nor harm an actor, he can pursue the even tenor of his style with little interruption.

Longfellow, a poet who combines genius and workmanlike finish, is in New York, under the care of Elliot, the oculist. I trust he will keep an undamaged pair of eyes, though the loss of sight would turn a great deal of new light inward upon his mind—as it did upon Milton's—and be a gain to the glory of his country.

I am ministered to while writing to-day by the most deliciously-tempered autumn air that ever intoxicated the heart of a ripening grape. I only lament that the distinct pleasure I feel in every pore and fibre will not be channelled into the nib of my pen and flow to you in rhetoric. The wind is a little northerly, however, and it may bring you a sample.

TO THE LADIES.—We have nothing to write about this morning, ladies!—quite nothing. We presume you know that the crocus yellow and the blue of your own eyes are the fashionable colors; that Middleton cuts his slippers low behind for such ladies as know what is becoming to the foot; that the late strain after economy is yielding to a rebound of extravagance (consequently, this winter you can wear nothing too gorgeously sumptuous); that ruinous bracelets are utterly indispensable to wrists with a swan's neck in them, and that the New Mirror (pardon us!) is of the fashionable crocus teint without, and as "blue" within as is bearable by the copyrighted and intoxicating benightedness of beauty. If you had sent for us to your boudoir and ordered our memory spread out upon a silk cushion, we could tell you no more.

If you are interested at all in us—we are having, this morning, our little private mope, with no possible flight of fancy beyond the ends of our fingers. We have been sitting here two hours making caryatides to hold up some spilt ink on our blotting-paper—(rather nicely drawn, one of them, and looks like a Greek girl we saw at Egina). Then we have had a revery on political economy—musing, that is to say, whether we should wear a ring on our right hand (which belongs to the working-classes) or on the left, which is purely an ornamental idler, born but to be gloved and kept gentlemanly. Now, what do you think on that subject? Here is this most virtuous and attached right hand of ours, an exemplary and indefatigable provider for himself and the other members of our family, who has never failed to bring bread to our mouths since we placed our dependance on him, and why should he not be ornamented and made trim and respectable, first and foremost. He is not defiled by his work. He is clean when he is washed. He is made on the same model as the idle dangler opposite, and though he could do very well without that same Mr. Sinister Digits, there would be no "living" for Mr. Sinister Digits without him! Most meritorious worky! Put the ring on his forefinger!

Um! it does not look so well on that hand! There is a dingy groove on the inside of the second finger (which you would not remark, perhaps, but for the conspicuousness of the jewel)—a nasty soil of an ill-effaced ink-spot, made by a quill. Faith! it calls attention to "the shop," and would do so in good company! He must work in gloves if he is to be observed! And the ring is not so becomingly carried as by that other plumper and more taper gentleman, whose joints, with less dexterity, look supple, and, truth to own, more suitable!

No—no! "Take back the ring!" The bee works hard enough to have his pick of wings, but he would only be cumbered with the butterfly's. Indulgence for ever to the ornaments! Money to the ladies whether you have it or no! Credit to the dandies! And, befitting brown bread and plain blessings for the labor-stained right hands of society—our own among the worky-most and least complaining!

We have been ring-mad since the mummy's ring (mentioned on a previous page) was slipped upon our finger, and we have pulled out from our store of relics a huge emerald (in whose light is locked up a history) and it was of the wearing of it that we mused in this morning's mope of idleness. The world is set in a solid emerald, says the Mohammedan—"the emerald stone Sakhal, the agitations of whose light cause earthquakes." We would make a pilgrimage (if our "travels" would sell) to see the great "mother of emeralds" worshipped by the Peruvians in the valley of Manta—big as a gourd and luminous at dusk midnight (or so they say). Excuse us, when we meet you, if we proffer our left hand for courtesy, for, on the forefinger of that sits our agitated emerald—the right hand kept, unrewarded by your touch, to serve you only. Adieu—till they are dead who are to die (one a minute) ere another Saturday—for, at the close of our overflows into your cup, this sad thought runs over! And if, in the midst of our trifling, Providence ministers such thoughts to us, they can scarce be unreasonable, passed on, in the same company, to you.

Mrs. FLIMSON.—Few women had more gifts than Mrs. Flimson. She was born of clever parents, and was ladylike and good-looking. Her education was that of a female Crichton, careful and universal; and while she had more than a smattering of most languages and sciences, she was up to any flight of fashion, and down to every secret of notable housewifery. She piqued herself, indeed, most upon her plain accomplishments (thinking, perhaps, that her more uncommon ones would speak for themselves); and it was a greater triumph, to her apprehension, that she could direct the country butcher to the sweet-bread in slaughtering his veal, and show a country-girl how to seed it to table with the proper complexion of a riz de veau, than that she could entertain any manner of foreigner in his own language, and see order in the stars and diamonds in backlogs. Like most female prodigies, whose friends expect them to be matched as well as praised, Mrs. Flimson lost the pick of the market, and married a man very much her inferior. The pis aller, Mr. Flimson, was a person of excellent family (after the fashion of a hill of potatoes—the best part of it under ground), and possessed of a moderate income. Near the meridian sun of a metropolis, so small a star would of course be extinguished; and as it was necessary to Mrs. Flimson's existence that she should be the cynosure of something, she induced her husband to remove to the sparser field of a distant country-town, where, with her diplomatic abilities, she hoped to build him up into a member of congress. And here shone forth the genius of Mrs. Flimson. To make herself perfectly au fait of country habits, usages, prejudices, and opinions, was but the work of a month or two of stealthy observation. At the end of this short period, she had mastered a manner of rustic frankness (to be put on at will); she had learned the secret of all rural economies; she had found out what degree of gentility would inspire respect without offending, or exciting envy, and she had made a near estimate of the influence, consequence, and worth-trouble-ness of every family within visiting distance.

With this ammunition, Mrs. Flimson opened the campaign. She joined all the sewing-circles of the village, refusing steadily the invidious honor of manager, pattern-cutter, and treasurer; she selected one or two talkative objects for her charity, and was studiously secret in her manner of conveying her benefactions. She talked with farmers, quoting Mr. Flimson for her facts. She discoursed with the parson, quoting Mr. Flimson for her theology. She was intelligent and witty, and distributed plentiful scraps of information, always quoting Mr. Flimson. She managed the farm and the household, and kept all the accounts—Mr. Flimson was so overwhelmed with other business! She talked politics, admitting that she was less of a republican than Mr. Flimson. She produced excellent plans for charitable associations, town improvements, and the education of children—all the result of Mr. Flimson's hours of relaxation.

She was—and was only—Mr. Flimson's humble vicergerent and poor representative. And everything would seem so much better devised if he could have expressed it in person!

But Mr. Flimson was never nominated for congress, and Mrs. Flimson was very well understood from the first by her country neighbors. There was a flaw in the high polish of her education—an error inseparable from too much consciousness of porcelain in this crockery world. To raise themselves sufficiently above the common level, the family of Mrs. Flimson habitually underrated vulgar human nature, and the accomplished daughter, good at everything else, never knew where to find it. She thinks herself in a cloud, floating far out of the reach of those around her, when they are reading her at arm's length like a book. She calculates her condescension for "forty fathom deep," when the object of it sits beside her. She comes down graciously to people's capacity, and her simplicity is set down for trap. And still wondering that Mr. Flimson is allowed by his country to remain in obscurity, and that stupid rustics will not fuse and be moulded by her well-studied congenialities, she begins to turn her attention to things more on her own level, and on Sundays looks like a saint distressed to be out of heaven. But for that one thread of contempt woven into the woof of her education, Mrs. Flimson might have shone as a star in the world where she glimmers like a taper.

I think that a walk in New York to-day, if you had been absent a year, would impress you very strongly with the outbreak of showiness in costume. Whatever spirit it is that presides over the fashions we take so implicitly from France, he (this spirit of woof and color) has well suited the last and newest invoice to a moment of reaction from economy. Or (what may better define the present era, perhaps) the moment after prosperity has almost universally changed hands. The stuffs in the shop-windows of Broadway are of a splendor that would scarce be ventured upon (in the street at least) by the severity of last year's aristocratic taste; but the eruption has spread from the shop-windows over the sidewalk, and the ladies are verily rainbow clad! The prevailing colors are yellow and blue; the most of the dresses put all the prismatic colors under contribution, and the wearers would make Chinese figures for Gobelin tapestry. It would be a fine speculation in upholstery, indeed, to buy the cast-off dresses of this period, and lay them up to sell for window-curtains to the next generation. But the ladies have it by no means to themselves. They are only bolder and more consistent in their "bravery of suits." The waistcoats and cravats have taken a long stride into splendor, leaving the coats and trousers in their accustomed sobriety of hue. Jennings's great emporium, opposite the Park, might furnish the knights and courtiers for a new "field of cloth of gold," so effulgent are the velvets and satins; though the bold youths who have ventured to put forth into Broadway with their glittering waistcoats look like butterflies half-born, the dull broadcloth worm still adhering. For one, I should like the age of gauds and such matters to come round again, for I do not see why the lords of nature should leave all the ornament to the birds and flowers, and servants in livery; but let it be consistent, and entire, and when it is that, it will be time to compound a gentleman of "a man, a sword, and an equipage," and to settle the sixty degrees of precedence which are established in the court of England. But as this will not all be in my time, I think I shall not venture on the more luminous stratum, to say the least, of Jennings's waistcoats. The Americanism of the matter is the much more violent array of these gorgeous stuffs in Chatham street and the Bowery. The small tailors' shops in these Alsatian quarters are quite in a glow with the display of cravats and waistcoats, and their catering for the taste of their customers is, of course, careful and well-considered. The age is, perhaps, for ever gone by, when a privileged class could monopolize finery of garb; and, of all the civilized nations, it were least possible in ours. I have seen already a dozen at least of cheap-booted apprentices wearing velvet waistcoats which, a few years ago, would have delighted D'Orsay. This last lustrum of our history, by-the-way, corresponds somewhat, as to sumptuary matters, with the year 1759, and after, of French history. The nine months' ministry of Silhouette (whose immortality rests on the accident of giving his name to profiles) was a temporary suspension of French extravagance, somewhat similar to ours of the last year or two, during which coats were worn without folds, snuff-boxes made of plain wood, and painting portraits were discarded for outlines in profile; every fashion, in short, giving way to extreme parsimony. This period was succeeded, as our economical days seem promising to be, by a powerful reflux of the suspended extravagance. The parallel must end here, thank Heaven!

Brooklyn is as much a part of New York, for all purposes of residence and communication, as "the Borough" is of London. The steam ferry-boats cross the half-mile between it and New York every five minutes; and in less time than it usually takes to thread the press of vehicles on London Bridge, the elegant equipages of the wealthy cross to Long Island for the afternoon drive; morning visits are interchanged between the residents in both places—and, indeed, the East river is now hardly more of a separation than the same distance in a street. Brooklyn is the shire-town of King's county, and is second in population only to New York. It has become the fashion for businessmen of New York to build and live on the fine and healthy heights above the river, where they are nearer their business, and much better situated than in the outskirts of this city itself. Brooklyn is built on the summit and sides of an elevation springing directly from the bank of the river, and commanding some of the finest views in America. The prospect embraces a large part of East river, crowded with shipping, and tracked by an endless variety of steamers, flying through the channel in quick succession; of the city of New York, extending, as far as the eye can see, in closely-piled masses of architecture; of the Hudson, and the shore of Jersey, beyond; of the bay and its bright islands; and of a considerable part of Long and Staten islands, and the Highlands of Neversink.

This is "sodgering week," ladies, and the general has gone to the wars. Provided there be no Banquo to sit in his leather-bottomed chair, I am quite alone, and of course, immeasurably more than usual at your service. Walk in, and make no ceremony—that is to say, draw your foot under you, and sit on your heel. Leave the general's chair unoccupied, if you please. It will remind us that "we" are out, and that I am at home. Sit on that ream of paper, and let's be private and personal.

A little scandal would be appetizing, this cloudy morning. Suppose we put the general on the gridiron and "do him brown!" Poets are so much better for toasting!—(reason why: the first lyre was made by the toasting of the sun—the tortoise-shell, found by Hermes on the Nile, drawn tight by the contracted tendons—or "so they say"). His health in a glass of Elsinore cherry! And now, general, come over the coals!

What has he to do (a poor various author, tucked away in the "appendix" of the "Poetry of America")—I say, what has he to do with a lodging in the brain and memory of every man, and in the heart and music-making of every woman in the country! What has a "various author" to do with as much popularity as a baker's dozen of the big-bugs with their biographies. What business has a "various author" to get his own price for every scrap of a song, and be the only poet-father in the country whose poetical daughters are run after to be married to music! There is more of him abroad "by heart," than of anybody else! He is more quoted, more sung, more trotted, more parodied, more plucked at on his pedestal, than anybody else! He uses his brevet as if he were full poet! If it weren't for the "damnable iteration" of a cockatoo critic or two, the world would never suspect—never—that Morris is not a song-writer—the song-writer—and the most sung and the best one of all the "Poets and Poetry of America." And, la!—to be sure!—what a mistaken world we live in—that never knows what it likes till it is told in a book!

It is something to be universal, as a poet—something to get that far—it must be confessed. The worth of a thing is (partly, at least) what it will bring—particularly in the way of a long-winded popularity. There is some bedevilment or other about Morris's poetry that makes it stick in people's minds, and answer people's want, in the way of an expression of their poetical feelings—something that music jumps to, and women remember and love him for—something that satisfies the nine hundred and ninety-nine, and displeases the nil admirari thousandth.

Let's try this varlet of a popularity-thief—you judge and jury, and I the aggrieved plaintiff—one of the robbed. Hand me up that big book, on the floor by you, and let's see the law. He's a lyric poet if there's any truth in the definition of that commodity:—

"Lyric poetry is that species of poetry by which the poet directly expresses his emotions. It is necessary that the feeling represented should be itself poetical, and not only worthy to be preserved, but accompanied by a variety of ideas, beauty of imagery, and a musical flow of language. One distinct feeling should predominate, giving tone to the whole; the feeling must be worthy of the subject which caused it, corresponding to the same both in degree and kind, and must be so exhibited as to give a living picture of the poet's mind; while at the same time, what is merely individual and accidental must be excluded, so that the poet shall be truly the representative of his race, and awaken the sympathy of all. But this requires genius of a high order."

Quash the suit and turn the plaintiff out of court!—there never was a more literal inventory of goods than this of the peculiarities of Morris's poetry! Lyrist he is, if that describe lyric poetry, and he has come honestly by his popularity, and the world is right, that said so before the trial. Court's adjourned.

We have sat down once or twice to criticise Weir's picture of the Embarkation—but a criticism of it would be but a recapitulation of its beauties, and as these are quite apparent, and everybody will see the picture, we think it not worth while. We have already described the feeling with which it is seen for the first time, and as we have seen it a dozen times with the same glow, and as that description has been quoted, as just, by many of the critics who have since seen the picture, we can well stop where we are—recording only the present thronging to the exhibition-room in New York, and the universal delight the picture gives to the public. Weir may well be a proud and happy man.

We should be very happy to polish "M.'s" verses, but as we have seldom seen a penknife that was sharp after it was sharpened, so we never saw verses that were good after being bettered—by anybody but the original maker. Beside, it is not our vocation to mend poets—though we might make one—Heaven help us!

A "friend who knew us when a boy" (as if anything but the crust of us be adult-erated), wishes us to "write something for posterity." Tut!—posterity is welcome to all we write—though, if posterity will pay us, or if anybody will "down with the dust," as posterity's "paying-teller," we will write something which posterity can publish as "entirely original." For the present we do not hold with the Apotactitæ, that "property, wine, meat, and matrimony, are things to be renounced"—and though the three last seem to be the only ones to which our destiny has a free copyhold, we are digging away at prose and poetry, and would peddle pins or pottery to compass the other.

One of the most curious and amusing resorts for a man of taste, idle in New York, is the ANTIQUARIAN BOOK-SHOP* of Bartlett & Welford, under the Astor. The catalogue of rare and valuable books for sale at this repository, numbers nearly four thousand, and most of these are such works as are found only in choice libraries, or in the possession of scholars. Far from being interesting to antiquarians exclusively, the curiosities of this choice shop would amuse the most general reader, and a lounge at the well-stocked counter of B. & W. is no indifferent relief to the fatiguing idleness of a man stranded on the beach of a hotel between the far-apart tides of breakfast and dinner. Most courteous bibliopoles are these two gentlemen, by-the-way, and happy to gratify the curiosity of visitors.

Villanous editions, villanous cheap, are the fruits of our present law of copyright, and if we had an American language all to ourselves, we should have no such thing as beauty in a book. Fortunately, England has the same brick from Babel, and we can corrupt, mutilate, defile, and misprint works of genius, and still import, from our more liberal and appreciative fatherland, a purer and worthier copy. Still it seems to me surprising, that, of the publishers who have grown rich with pirating in this country, no one has felt inclined to distinguish himself by a school of fine editions.† One would think that the example of Aldus, who made himself as famous as the authors he printed, would be stuff for emulation; and there are some men, probably, even among publishers, who agree with Charles Edwards, that "it is the devil to be growing old as a person of no peculiarity." Aldus's press lasted eminent for near a hundred years, and it is recorded in history that his ink was excellent, his types beautiful, his paper invariably strong and white, and above all, that his press was next to infallible for correctness. Celebrity among BOOKBINDERS probably sprung from this renown of a printer, and in England there were famous names in this trade also. Roger Payne received from twenty to thirty guineas for binding a single volume, and he is much better remembered than any lord-mayor of his time. There has been a mania in bookbinding, however, and the world is too poetical for such matters now. Jeffrey, a London bookseller, had Fox's History bound in fox-skin; and an eccentric bibliomaniast named (descriptively) ASKEW, had a book bound in a human skin. In the library at Königsberg there are twenty books bound in silver. Very far short of all this, however, there is in this country an unreachd point of excellence in binding, and great opening for an ambitious bookbinder to distinguish himself. Sat Verbum sapienti.

Rarity in books is such a difficult thing to define, that a taste for it easily degenerates into absurdity. The mania is very common, but there is a mania for books according to their rare value to read, and a mania for books valuable by accidental circumstances—such as coming from a particular press, being made of singular materials, having once belonged to a celebrated library, or being the only ones of their kind. In Italy they used to print valuable books on blue paper; in France on rose-colored paper, and in Germany on yellow or green; and copies of these are much sought after now. Bibliomaniacs value those printed on large paper with wide margin. In the advertisement of rare books, you often see the phrase, "a tall copy." Longman had a single copy printed of "Strutt's Dictionary of Engravers," illustrated and embellished at the cost of ten thousand dollars! The copy sold, I do not know to what book-madman—but his name should be linked in history to that of the priest in Spain, who murdered three men to get possession of their libraries!

By a turn of fortune not worth describing, Mr. Goggins, a shipchandler, became suddenly a millionaire. His half-score of grown-up children spread themselves at once to their new dimensions, and after a preliminary flourish at home, the whole family embarked for foreign travel. They remained but a fortnight in England—none in that land walking often invisible. Germany seemed to the shipchandler a "rubbishy" country, and Italy "very small beer," and, after a short residence in Paris, that gay capital was pronounced the Paradise of money's worth, and there the Gogginses took up their abode. To the apprehension of most of their acquaintance, Mr. Goggins was now in a speedy and fair way to return to his blocks and oakum, poorer for his fortune. No stint seemed put upon the extravagance of sons or daughters, and in dress and equipage their separate displays and establishments became the marvel of Paris. In Goggins himself there was for awhile no great change of exterior. His constitutional hardness of character seemed in no way disturbed or embellished by the splendors he controlled. He gave way to usages and etiquette with patient facility, bowed through the receptions at his first parties with imperturbable propriety, and was voted stolid and wooden by the gay world flaunting at his expense.

In the second year of his Parisian life, however, Goggins took the reins gradually into his own hands. He dismissed his sharp French butler, who had made hitherto all the household bargains, and, promoting to the servile part of his office an inferior domestic, dull and zealous, he took the accounts into his own hands, and exacted, of all the tradespeople he patronized, schedules of their wares in English, and their bills made equally comprehensible. Pocketing thus the butler's perquisite, he reduced the charges of that department one half, beside considerably improving the quality of the articles purchased. Rejecting, * Store, a warehouse. Shop, a place for sale of wares. We call shops "stores" in this country, and it is well to record these Panglossiana as they occur.

† Ticknor, of Boston, expends a praiseworthy carefulness on the correctness and beauty of his reprints, and should be excepted from the disparagement of American booksellers. But every press should have a scholar attached to it, and an artist within reach.

then, the intermediate offices of lease-agents and hommes d'affaires, he advertised in Galigani, in good plain English, for the most luxurious house in a certain fashionable quarter, conducted the bargain by a correspondence in English, and finally procured it at a large abatement, at least, from prices paid by millionaires. He advertised in the same way for proposals to furnish his house on the most sumptuous scale, and in the prevailing fashion, and by dint of sitting quietly in his office and compelling everything to reach him through the medium of English manuscript, he created a palace fit for an emperor, by fair competition among the tradesmen and upholsterers, and at a cost by no means ruinous. He advertised in the same way for a competent man of taste to oversee the embellishments in progress, and, when complete, the "Hotel Goggins" was quite the best thing of its kind in Paris, and was looked upon as the "folly" of the ruined lessee. With this groundwork for display, Mr. Goggins turned his attention to the ways and means of balls and dinners, concerts and breakfast, and having acquired a name for large expenditure, he profited considerably by the emulation of cooks and purveyors for the material, and privately made use of the savoir faire of a reduced count or two who, for a "trifling consideration," willingly undertook the manner of the entertainments. He applied the same sagacious system of commissariat to the supplying of the multifarious wants of his children, economizing at the same time that he enhanced the luxury of their indulgences, and the Gogginses soon began to excite other feelings than contempt. Their equipages (the production of the united taste of ruined spendthrifts) outshone the most sumptuous of the embassies; their balls were of unexceptionable magnificence, their dinners more recherché than profuse. How they should come by their elegance was a mystery that did not lessen their consequence, and so the Gogginses mounted to the difficult eminence of Parisian fashion—the plain business-tact of a shipchandler their mysterious stepping-stone.

Perhaps we should give more credit to this faculty in Goggins. It is possibly not far removed from the genius of a great financier or eminent state-treasurer. It is the power of coming directly at values and ridding them of their "riders"—of getting for less, what others, from want of penetration, get for more. I am inclined to think Goggins would have been quite as successful in any other field of calculation, and one instance of a very different application of his reasoning powers would go to favor the belief.

While in Italy, he employed a celebrated but improvident artist to paint a picture, the subject of which was a certain event of rather an humble character, in which he had been an actor. The picture was to be finished at a certain time, and at the urgent plea of the artist, the money was advanced. The time expired and the picture was not sent home, and the forfeited bond of the artist was accordingly put in suit. The delinquent, who had not thought twice of the subject, addressed one or two notes of remonstrance to his summary employer, and receiving no reply, and the law crowding very closely upon his heels, he called upon Goggins and appealed, among other arguments, to the difference in their circumstances, and the indulgent pity due from rich to poor.

"Where do you dine to day?" asked Goggins.

"To-day—let me see—Monday—I dine with Lady —."

(The artist, as Goggins knew, was a favorite in the best Society in Florence.)

"And where did you dine yesterday?"

"Yesterday—hum—yesterday I dined with Sir George —. No! I breakfasted with Sir George, and dined with the grand chamberlain. Excuse me! I have so many engagements—"

"Ah!—and you are never at a loss for a dinner or a breakfast!"

The artist smiled. "No!"

"Are you well lodged?"

"Yes—on the Arno."

"And well clad, I see."

(The painter was rather a dandy, withal.)

"Well, sir!" said Goggins, folding up his arms, and looking sterner than before, "you have, as far as I can understand it, every luxury and comfort which a fortune could procure you, and none of the care and trouble of a fortune, and you enjoy these advantages by a claim which is not liable to bankruptcy, nor to be squandered, nor burnt—without the slightest anxiety, in short."

The artist assented.

"So far, there is no important difference in our worldly condition, except that I have this anxiety and trouble, and am liable to these very casualties."

Goggins paused, and the painter nodded again.

"And now, sir, over and above this, what would you take to exchange with me the esteem in which we are severally held—you to become the rich, uneducated, and plain Simon Goggins, and I to possess your genius, your elevated tastes, and the praise and fame which these procure you?"

The artist turned uneasily on his heels.

"No, sir!" continued Goggins, "you are not a man to be pitied, and least of all by me. And I don't pity you, sir. And what's more, you shall paint that picture, sir, or go to prison. Good morning, sir!"

And the result was a painting, finished in three days, and one of the master-pieces of that accomplished painter, for he embodied, in the figure and face of Goggins, the character which he had struck out so unexpectedly—retaining the millionaire's friendship and patronage, though never again venturing to trifle with his engagements.

Music seems to be the passion of the hour in New-York. Wallack had a house that would hardly pay expenses last night—even the Ravels have somewhat fallen off as they were going off—while Damoreau, Wallace, and the "Hutchinson family," draw well. The latter are four children of a New Hampshire patriarch—(four out of fifteen, as they say in an autobiographical medley which they sing)—and having been born with a singular natural talent for music, they are turning it to account in a musical tour. There are three brothers under twenty years of age, and a very young sister. Their voices are good (particularly the girl's, who is about fourteen), and they confine themselves to simple melody, such as would suit the least practised ear, while it can not fail, from the truth and expression with which they sing, to please the most fastidious. Their concerts are exceedingly enjoyable.

Mrs. Sutton, well known everywhere as a most charming singer, is about to perform a short engagement as a prima donna to the Italian company at Niblo's. I wish the success of the experiment might bring Castellan and Cinti Damoreau upon the stage. The latter, by the way, is the daughter of a French door-porter, and might easily have been "the grave of her deserving," but for her perseverance and ambition. Maroncelli is preparing a memoir of her, under her own direction.

There is a particular season of the year (this is it) when, as most people know, the law forbids the killing and vending of certain game—the zest of illegality, of course, giving great flavor to the birds, and, of course, more than nullifying the law. Not the least in connexion with this remark—I was very much astonished a day or two since, dining with a friend at a neighboring hotel, to find fairly printed in the bill of fare, "Second Course—Roast Owls." On the succeeding day, at another table, I was startled with the enrolment of a dish called "Just Try Me"—which, on experiment, I found to be a bird—(with an egg-shaped breast, and a very long bill thrust through it)—decently laid on its back, and covered with a pork apron! The latter name seemed very much to the point, and explained the bird's errand. The former I was puzzled with—but knowing the landlord of that hotel to be very much ultra crepidam, I was induced to look into ornithology for his meaning. I find that the peculiarity of the owl is "an external toe which can be turned behind at pleasure"—symbolical of the perverted beak of the woodcock (as well as the making of false tracks to evade the law), and serving in the same manner to prepare an orifice for the sauce of lemon-juice and cayenne. When this man cozens, you see, he cozens with edifying knowledge and discretion.

Appleton is publishing a very neat and handsome edition of valuable religious books. Among them is the Disce Vivere of Sutton, prebend of Westminster, in 1626—one of the choicest specimens of rich and pregnant English that I have lately seen. Two sentences from his preface will give you an idea of his style, in which every word seems to drive a nail:—

"If to live were for no other but to draw in and to breathe out the soft air, as the wise man speaketh, a needless labor were it, good Christian reader, to lay down any instructions to the world of 'learning to live;' for this is done naturally, both of men and beasts, without any teaching or learning.

"If to live were no other but to cast about for the favor and riches of the world, as some men are wont to call it, the way to live, then would it soon follow, the greater Machiavellians, the better liver. Somewhat more than is required to live Christianly than so, and that all shall one day find, than either drawing in and breathing out the soft air, or the plotting to compass the pleasures and profits of the world."

A cold-water procession is going under my window at this moment, in a very propitious shower of rain. From my elevated look-out, the long line of umbrellas, two and two, gives the street the dress look of a fashionable Taglioni coat, with two rows of big buttons down the middle. I noticed yesterday, by the way, a most stalwart and gallant-looking company of firemen, in an undress military uniform, marching out for exercise at the target. Everything about them was all right, except that their guests of honor were placed before instead of behind—making of it a prisoner's guard instead of a military escort.

I see criticised, in one or two papers, a poem which was sent to me some time since as "printed, not published," called "Donna Florida," by Mr. Simms, the author of Southern Passages, &c. It is in the stanza, and intended as an imitation of "Don Juan." The author says, in his preface, that he fancied "he might imitate the grace and exceeding felicity of expression in that unhappy performance—its playfulness, and possibly its wit—without falling into its licentiousness of utterance and malignity of mood. How he has succeeded in this object, it would not be becoming in him to inquire." One of the easiest things fancied possible, and one of the most difficult to do, is an imitation of the qualities of that same poem of Don Juan—and Mr. Simms, who has talent enough when he stumbles on his right vein, has made a woful mistake as to his capabilities for this. Two extracts will show his idea of the slap-dash-ery vein:—

"One moment grows she most abruptly willing,
The next—she slaps the chaps that think of billing."

And, speaking of woman again:—

"Ev'n from his weakness and abandonment
Had woman her first being. Thus hath grown
Her power of evil since;—still unthrust
Hath she explored his weakness and o'erthrown;
And, in the use of arts incontinent,
No longer pacified by one poor vein,
She grapples the whole man, brawn, beef, and muscle,
Helped by the same old snake, that flings him in the tussle."

We should have disclaimed, in giving the portrait of the most ornate man of modern times, all approbation of dandyism—(as yet)—on this side the water. Dandyism, in the abstract, we delight in, glorify, and rejoice over. But it has its scenery and its attainments. A dandy, in place, is the foreground to a picture—the forward star of a troop untelescoped by the vulgar—the embroidered flower on the veil before a life of mystery. His superior elegance is like the gold edge of a cloud unfathomable; or (to come to earth) like the soldier's uniform—tinsel but for its association with force and glory. What were the dandies of the firmament, for example—(comets)—without those uninterpretable tails!

But—to alight in Broadway.

A dandy indigenous to New York has no background—no untelescoped associations or connexions—no power and glory—and no uninterpretable tail. He is like a docked comet. He is like Tom Fool in a uniform bought at the pawnbroker's. He is a label on an empty bottle. Count D'Orsay drives by you in the park, and a long ancestry of titled soldiers and courtiers, and a present life of impenetrable scenery and luxury untold, arise up for background to his cab and tiger. Mr. James Jessamy drives by you in Broadway, and you know at what trade his glory was manufactured, and you know "what he does of an evening," and you know his "mechanical rogues" of relations, the tailor who made him, the hatter who thatched him, and the baker who sold him gingerbread when a boy. You admire, or envy, D'Orsay, as you happen to be constituted—but you laugh, you scarce know why, at Mr. Jessamy. The latter, perhaps, has the better right to his toggery and turn-out; but still you laugh!

Very far short of dandyism, however, lies the point of dressing judiciously—dressing, that is to say, so as to make the most of your personal advantages. The favor of women is of course the first of lifetime ambitions, and the dear tyrants have a weakness for the exterior. "Tu as du remarquer," says Balzac; "si toutefois tu es capable d'observer un fait moral, que la femme aime le fat. Sais tu pourquoi la femme aime le fat? Mon ami! les faits sont les seuls hommes qui aient soin d'eux mêmes!" And there are ladies, even on this plain side of the water, who adore a dandy, and of course there are cases where the dread laugh (mentioned at the close of the preceding paragraph) must be braved to aid a particular magnetism. If your dandy be a sensible man, and past the moulting age, depend upon it he is ticketed for some two eyes only, and can afford, for a consideration he has, to let "the spirits of the wise sit in the clouds," &c. Had Count D'Orsay been born in Common-Council-dom and gone home, sometimes by the Waverley line, sometimes by the Knickerbocker, he never would have been a dandy—(except, at least, for a motive paramount to ridicule)—though, with his superb person, he could hardly have dressed cleanly without being called a fop by the shallow. D'Orsay is a man of sense, and knows too much to open the public oyster with his private razor. So don't come to America, dear D'Orsay! Stay among your belongings—your

"Tapestries of India; Tyrian canopies;
Heroic bronzes; pictures half divine—
Apelles' pencil; statues that the Greek
Has wrought to living beauty; amethyst urns
And onyx encased with the Persian rose;
Couches of mother-pearl, and tortoise-shell;
Crystalline mirrors; tables in which gems
Make the mosaic; cups of argenteo
Thick with immortal sculptures."

Stay where

"Your meat shall all come in, in Indian shells—
Dishes of agate, set in gold, and studded
With emeralds, sapphires, hyacinths, and rubies;
Your foot-boy shall eat pheasants, calvered salmon,
Knots, godwits, lampreys. And yourself shall have
The beards of barbels served instead of salads,
Oiled mushrooms and the swelling unctuous paps
Of a fat pregnant sow newly cut off,
Dressed with an exquisite and poignant sauce."

Yet, if you should take the whim to come over the water, count, I need scarce suggest to your good sense that you had best come with a consignment of buttons from Brummagem!

A gentleman in Saco has taken upon himself some pains and postage to ask "our" two portraits served up in two plates. We don't think the public would stand it. That bold man, Mr. Graham, is to show an outline of one of us in his February number, and then anybody can have us, tale and all, for two shillings—a cheap article, we must say! But we are surprised to get this petition from Saco! We "come from" close-by there, and it strikes us our likeness would go east with the welcome of coals to Newcastle. Doubtless there are more like us in the same soil. We remember hanging over a bridge in Saco half one moonlight night (somewhere in our fourteenth year), and if rivers have any memory or gratitude for admiration, our likeness will be found in the water where we left it.

We wish our contributors would do us the favor to baptize their own bantlings. Their delegation of godfatherhood costs us sometimes a five minutes' thought over a proofsheet while the press is waiting, and time is "tin." But, by the way, be particular in naming your articles! Old Burton, in his Anatomy of Melancholy, gives, by way of satire, what we think an excellent rule ("experto crede Roberto"), and we will lend it you for your uses: "It is a kind of policy in these days to prefix a fantastical title to a book which is to be sold; for, as larks come down to a day-net, many vain readers will stand gazing like silly passengers at an antic picture in a painter's shop, that will not look at a judicious piece."

I observe, looking from my window, that the Park theatre hangs out a large American flag with a tricolor banner appended to each of the two lower corners (looking altogether very much like a pair of oriental trousers), symbolical, probably, of the two arrivals from France which made yesterday memorable. The more interesting of these twin events, of course, was General Bertrand's advent by the Boston boat at seven; but the one which excited the more interest was the opening of the winter fashions at "Madame Lawson's, in Park place," at eight. The latter ceremonial had been duly heralded for some days previous by notes addressed to the leaders of fashion, and (as far as can be known) the secrets of the Graces' unopened cases had been impartially and unexceptionably kept. Having "a friend at court," I had been for some days invited to witness the effulguration, but was privately advised that there would be a rush, and that six in the morning would not be too early to take a stand upon the steps of the grand milliner in Park place. Some unfinished business in dream-land obliged me to waive to the sun the privilege of rising first, however, and to my misfortune I did not arrive at Park place till the premices de la mode had been ravished by the most intrepid first-comers. The street was lined with carriages, and the house was thronged. On the staircase we met two or three ladies descending, flushed with excitement, and murmuring millinery; and on arriving at the landing on the second floor, the sharp soprano of the hum within betrayed how even the sweetest instruments may outrun modulation, played on with a crescendo troppo furioso. The two saloons of the second floor were crowded with the ladies of fashion, and the walls lined all around with a single shelf covered with snowy damask, on which stood the white rods supporting the (as yet) brainless, though already fashionable bonnets. And (begging pardon of Greenwich and William streets) they were unapproachably exquisite! There were some forced marriages of colors among them—some juxtapositions Heaven would not have ventured upon in bird-millinery—but the results were happy. The bonnets are small, and would probably divide, for the nose, a perpendicular rain-drop; and the shape of the front edge would be defined by the shadow on the wall of an egg truncated at the smaller end—the choice of colors riotously uncontrollable. Feathers, ruinous feathers, are absolutely indispensable. No fashion this winter in a bonnet without feathers—dyed feathers harmonious with the satin. The plush bonnets were the first seized on. Drab satin with very gay fineries, was the color most complimented. The prices varied from twenty-two dollars to fifty. It was very charming to see so many pretty women trying on so many pretty bonnets, and I feared that the two or three venturesome gentlemen present might be seized upon as intruders upon vestal mysteries; but, thanks to the "vestalitis maxima," Miss Lawson, we escaped with credit.

I have seen General Bertrand several times. He is of a very noble presence, though, like Napoleon, below the middle height. His features express honesty, firmness, and rapid intelligence—the latter expression aided by eyes of unusual brilliancy. His hair is quite white. He is a man of few words, very collected, but withal very courteous. These, at least, are my impressions of him.

It is curious to remark, how the burning of our fingers with Dickens makes us hold back from the fire of enthusiastic receptions. If the general had been ante instead of post-Dickens, he would have been overwhelmed with popular acclamation. As it is, the dues of honor are only paid à rigueur. One or two brigades of artillery are ordered out to-morrow to escort the general on his rounds to visit the objects of curiosity, and the different staffs accompany him to the theatre in the evening. This morning he is visiting the fair of the Institute. The beautiful company of the Life Guards made him a guest of honor at their dinner last evening. Mr. Stetson, of the Astor (who gave the dinner on his appointment as an officer in the corps), complimented General Bertrand very felicitously in his speech, and the applause was rapturous. Stetson is naturally an "orator, as Brutus is," and has acquitted himself on several such occasions with great credit.

I visited, the other evening, the beautiful rooms of the Mercantile Library Association, and was exceedingly interested in the history of its foundation and progress. An advertisement expressing "a call for a meeting of clerks" was the first germ. The paper containing this was preserved and presented to the association by William Wood, of Canandaigua, a very zealous benefactor of the institute. It has at present a library of nearly twenty thousand volumes, and it has four thousand members. The late report of the librarian shows that eight times the number of volumes is annually taken from the library—an activity of use for a library almost unparalleled. It is, without doubt, one of the most useful institutions of the country, and donations to it of books or money would be admirably well bestowed.

Dr. Lardner has grown very much on the public esteem in his last visit to New York. His clear, simple, graphic talent, making abstruse science easy and comprehensible, has never been equalled by another lecturer.

Much honor and glory to the Boston publishers for the beauty of their editions, and the credit (not small) which that brings to this country. The most exquisite edition of the exquisite songs of inspired Barry Cornwall, published by Ticknor, should be between every four walls where resides the relish for poetry or taste in a book. It is a gem of poetry set in a gem of printing, and most fit for a loving man's gift to a sensible woman.

I find that "doctors differ" about Macready; and the graphic and gay correspondent of the Providence Journal, more particularly, gives as his great excellence, that you forget the man in the character he plays—just what I do not think. Heaven, it seems to me, has done so little, and Macready so much, in making himself the actor he is, that he deserves infinite credit, and, as a piece of mechanism, his playing is a fine thing to me, though more curious than over-coming. Young Wheatley has turned over quite a golden leaf of opinion with his personation of Ulric, a very fine part in Byron's play of Werner.

I saw yesterday, among the daguerreotypes of Chilton & Edwards, a most perfect one of Dr. Linn, whose death was mentioned in a late paper. The value of these things struck me forcibly—for to any one who had ever seen the fine countenance of Dr. Linn, this is a perfect remembrancer. They color them skilfully now, and the gentlemen I speak of particularly (Chilton & Edwards, who are to have a room in the Capitol this winter), are daily making improvements in the art. Some witty man corrupts the word into derogatory-types, but they are derogatory no longer.

We are likely to know something of Mexico between the three authors who are about publishing books on the subject, and the charming book of Madame Calderon. Mr. Prescott's Mexico will of course be a classic. Brantz Mayer and Kendall are up to their elbows in proof-sheets—both producing works on Mexico, and both excellent writers.

I never saw, in New York, an audience of better quality, for so large a quantity, than was assembled to welcome the perfected Cinti. I presume there were few "ears polite" anywhere else. At a dollar the pair (long and short alike), Madame must have delighted these fastidious organs to the amount of five thousand francs, to be diminished only by the expense of room-light and accompaniment—a transmutation of "evening wind," that throws Bryant's coinage of that commodity quite into the shade.

Mr. Timm (as is wise and usual) played the audience into tune with an overture, and then the screen gave up its prima donna—Madame Cinti Damoreau in pink satin—three large roses on her breast—the dress, air, and graces of 'leens, the composure, plentitude, and, alas! the parenthesized smile of 'ties. Madame Cinti has been a good animal resemblance of the beautiful Mrs. Norton. The general mould of the face, and the low forehead, the dark hair, and the unfathomable dark eyes, are like in each to the other.

With a trepidation which lasted only through the first bar, she commenced the aria of "Fatal Goffredo" (from Donizette's opera of Torquato Tasso), and sang it to the breathless delight of the audience. No such finished music has ever been breathed before upon American air, I am persuaded. With not a fourth of the power and volume of Castellan, and none of the passion-lava of Malibran, she reaches a finer fibre of the ear than either. The quality of her voice is exceedingly sweet, and the mingled liquidness and truth of her chromatics could never have been exceeded. The ladder of harmony seemed built a round or two nearer to heaven by her delicious music.

Madame Damoreau, in the beginning of her career, was hissed from the French stage for singing false—a lesson in study and perseverance which I wish could be laid softly into the memory of Castellan. The latter wonderfully-organized creature, with anything like the same skill, would be the world's queen of song. The New Orleans people, by-the-way, who are Parisians in their nice appreciation of operatic talent, consider Castellan a remarkable actress; and so great was the enthusiasm for her there, that the necessary sum to engage her was made up by private subscription. It is several thousand pities, at least, that, in the first capital of the country, there is not operatic enthusiasm enough to bring this dormant genius upon the stage.

Monsieur Artot, who accompanies Madame Damoreau in her tour, alternated performances with her. He is a very gentlemanly-looking young man, with a figure that would make a very good case for his own violin—a very long neck and a very small waist—and he plays with execution enough for all practical purposes, but with taste unsurpassed. Wallace knows several heavens of the violin to which Monsieur Artot has not yet ascended, but the latter knows enough to give all the pleasure which that instrument can give to ordinary listeners. The audience applauded Monsieur Artot very long and loudly. I think, by-the-way, that a series of musical contentions between Wallace and Castellan "on the first part," and Artot and Cinti "on the second," would be a most charming and exciting tournament.

Madame Damoreau had the good sense not to desire a musical contention with a performance on the paving-stones by cabs and omnibuses, and the street in front of Washington Hall was coated with tan.

There seems to be a kind of appendix-dawn of literature in Italy. Prescott's Ferdinand and Isabella is about being published at Florence in the Italian translation. Sparks's Life of Washington, translated by a young Neapolitan, is also nearly ready. A society has been formed at Florence, called Societa Editrice Fiorentina, for the publication of translations of the best foreign works, including those of American literature. The Marquis Gino Capponi, one of the most prominent names in Florentine history, has put our country under obligation by his enthusiasm for our literature, and his aid to the publication of the works I have just mentioned. He is himself a remarkable scholar. Our consul at Rome, Mr. George Greene, has had a large agency in the same cause. Mr. Greene, by-the-way, has devoted a labor of some years to a history of Italy, which is still in progress. He, as is known very well, is a credit to the talent and scholarship of our country. The Marquis Capponi has furnished Mr. Prescott with materials for his history of Philip II.

Weir's picture of the "Embarcation" is now exhibiting to throngs of admirers at the Society Library. Its wonderful ingenuity and beauty of grouping, and the variety and individuality of the faces of the pilgrim company, are the excellences most dwelt upon. I really must venture to record an opinion expressed of this picture by Inman—who (as the artist of a rival-panel in the Rotunda, and hindered in his work by ill-health and other obstacles) is in a position to speak invidiously, if he were capable of envy. Inman was asked what he thought of it. "It is a glorious picture," he replied, "and its faults, if it has them, are comparatively so trifling, that it would be ungenerous to mention them." And if that speech did not come from a noble heart, I have read of such things with slender profit to my judgment.

DEAR READER: A volume of poems goes from us in an extra of the Mirror this week, which leaves us with a feeling—we scarce know how to phrase it—a feeling of tinidity and dread—like a parent's apprehensiveness, giving his child into the hands of a stranger. It is not Pliny's "quam sit magnum dare aliquid in manus hominum," nor is it, what the habitual avoidance of grave themes looks like, sometimes—a preference

"to let the serious part of life go by
Like the neglected sand."

We are used to buttering curiosity with the ooze of our brains—careful more to be paid than praised—and we have a cellar, as well as many stories, in our giddy thought-house; and it is from this cave of privacy that we have, with reluctance, and consentings far between, drawn treasures of early feeling and impression, now bound and offered to you for the first time in one bundle. Oh, from the different stories of the mind—from the settled depths, and from the effervescent and giddy surface—how different looks the world!—of what different stuff and worth the link that binds us to it! In looking abroad from one window of the soul, we see sympathy, goodness, truth, desire for us and our secrets, that we may be more loved; from another, we see suspicion, coldness, mockery, and ill-will—the evil spirits of the world—lying in wait for us. At one instant—the spirits down, and the heart calm and trusting—we tear out the golden leaf nearest the well of life, and pass it forth to be read and wept over. At another, we bar shutter and blind upon prying malice, turn key carefully on all below, and, mounting to the summit, look abroad and jest at the very treasures we have concealed—wondering at our folly in even confessing to a heartless world that we had secrets, and would share them. We are not always alike. The world does not seem always the same. We believe it is all good sometimes. We believe sometimes, that it is but a place accursed, given to devils and their human scholars. Sometimes we are all kindness—sometimes aching only for an antagonist, and an arena without barrier or law. And oh what a Procrustes's bed is human opinion—trying a man's actions and words, in whatever mood committed and said, by the same standard of rigor! How often must the angels hovering over us reverse the sentence of the judge—how oftener still the rebuke of the old maid and the Pharisee.

But—a martingale on moralizing!

Yours affectionately, DOUBLEYOU.

P. S. These poems, dear reader (if you are one of those who "can not spare the luxury of believing

That all things beautiful are what they seem")—

these poems, we may venture to say to you, are chickens of ours that still come home to roost. They have not been turned out to come back to a locked door and a strange face at the postern. We still put such eggs under our hen of reverie. We cherish the breed—but privately—privately! Take these, and come to us for more.

Mr. "Newbegin" must excuse us. We like grammar even in a pun. His night-ride in the omnibus is pretty fair, but it wont do to jolt pronouns out of place. That

"Dark as winter was the flow
Of I, sir, rolling rapidly," would shock our friend Wright into a new edition of "Exercises."

There is but one good couplet in "Tiskins's" communication:—

"His whiskers were like night, coal-black,
His hair like morn, coal-red"—

but his rhythm grounds at the overslaugh. He must throw over his ballast of consonants, before his metre-craft will swim buoyant enough to pass.

One of the Sunday critics (we hope he "got to press" soon enough to have leisure for confession) sneers at "one of us" for "quoting nothing" of Morris's in our critique of his songs. As if it were necessary in a periodical where Morris makes, of everything he writes, a Corinthian capital for a column! Truly the public are not likely to die in ignorance of songs which stand on every piano-rack in the country, and are sung in every concert-room and theatre, and are being endlessly copied. Besides, we believe we can tell "what manner of thing is your crocodile," without bringing the monster bodily in. How the folks find fault with us! We shall really have to proclaim ourselves an "object," and

"boast of nothing else
But that we are a journeyman to grief!"

or, better still, we shall be driven to get up a crusade against the whip-poor-willises, and "bring up those that shall try what mettle there is in orange-tawny."

To the kind old lady who "knit us a pair of stockings after reading some poetry" of ours, but "was afraid to send them, and gave them to a beggar," we must say, in the words of the old ballad,

"Twere better give a thing,
A sign of love, unto a mighty person or a king,
Than to a rude or barbrous swain, but bad or basely born,
For gently takes the gentleman what oft the clown will scorn."

So, thanks for the good will, dear madam, and pray knit us a pair of mittens against we make our fortune and turn farmer.

"Aunt Charity" wishes us to write an article on the "love of the intellect, and the possibility of a tender affection for the old." We will tell you a little story out of an old book: "It is reported of Magdalen, queen of France, that walking forth, an evening, with her ladies, she spied Monsieur Alanus, one of the king's chaplains, an old hard-favored man, fast asleep in a bower, and kissed him sweetly. When the ladies laughed at her for it, she replied that it was not his person she did embrace, but, with a Platonic love, the divine beauty of his soul."

The up-town door-plates and bell-handles are shining once more, and open shutters, clean windows, and parted curtains, acknowledge, at last, the reluctant truth, that the fashionables have returned from travel, and are open to pasteboard and personal call. The ice has been broken with a "jam," echoed by one musical soirée, and now—vogue la galère till the ice melts again! There is a talk that this is to be more an intellectual winter than the last—more recitations, more tableaux vivants, more conversazioni, more finding and producing of new lions in the lamb-kingdom of poetry. There is also a murmur—a "shadow cast before"—of the "coming out" of a very extraordinary beauty, whose name and educational cocoon are wrapt in profound mystery. As the rumor started about a week since, and as "pretty moths" are but twenty days in their chrysalis, we may expect the emergence of her bright wings to light in about a fortnight. She is said to be moulded after the (supposed) lost type of the seven belles of Philadelphia, whose culmination occurred under the autocracy of Jackson—eyes furnished by Juno, mouth by Hebe, and teeth and feet by the smaller fairies. No corresponding Hyperion that I can hear of.

There is great fluttering and dismay among the Bowery girls and the less alert followers of the fashions. The remarkable splendor of the "spring goods," and the really beautiful and becoming style of the new fabrics, left no doubt in most minds that these were to be "the mode." The autumn pin-moneys of all the moderately "established" ladies and their daughters "went the way of all" earnings accordingly, and Broadway grew as splendid as a tulip-bed, bright as the bazar of Smyrna. The exclusives were at their invisible period meanwhile, but, from their carriages, they probably saw "what was worn." Down dropped the mercury of the mode-ometer to extreme simplicity! The few ladies who appeared, crossing the pavement from their equipages to the shops, were dressed in quiet silks, costly and neat, and the nameless and the "unnamed," at the same moment, seemed to flaunt by in the choicest and gayest of the new patterns. Studied simplicity, out of doors at least, is high fashion now, and those who can not afford to convert their new purchases into chair-covers and bed-curtains, are left stranded, as it were, on a petrified rainbow.

Ten thousand copies of the "Mysteries of Paris" have been poured into our caldron of morals by a single press in this city, and probably fifty thousand will be circulated altogether. It is a very exciting book, and at this moment making a great noise. The translators are busily at work on other saleables of French literature, and there will soon be little left unknown of the arcana of vice. Eugene Sue, the author of the "Mysteries of Paris," is a connoisseur of pleasure; and when I saw him, ten years ago, was an elegant voluptuary of the first water. He was just then creeping through the crust of the Chaussée d'Antin into the more exclusive sphere of the Fau-bourg St. Germain—fat, good-looking, and thirty-two. He is, by this time, "sloped" from his meridian, and apparently turning his experiences into commodity. I observe that he borrows my name for a wicked Florida planter, who misuses a lady of color—a reproach which I trust will not stick to "us."

The publishers hang back from American fictions now-a-days, possibly finding the attention of the reading-public occupied with the more highly-spiced productions of the class just alluded to, and it is impossible to induce them to give anything for—hardly, indeed to look at—an indigenous manuscript. Accident threw into my hands, a few days ago, a novel which had lain for some time unread in a publisher's drawer, and after reading a few chapters I became convinced that it was far above the average of modern English novels, and every way worthy of publication. It was entitled "The Domine's Daughter," by Adam Mundiver, Esq., and would have lain forgotten and unexamined till doomsday, but for a friendly Orpheus who made it his Eurydice and went to Lethe after it. Such a book should surely represent money in a country where literature is acknowledged.

I very seldom can find it in my backbone to sit out a five-act play, but I saw Macready's "Richelieu," and I have seen Forrest's, throughout. Forrest began rather ineffectively, probably disturbed by the defence he was obliged to make against an aspersion, before the play commenced. He soon warmed into it, however, and, to my thinking, played the character far better than Macready. The details—the imitation of decrepitude—the posturing and walking the stage—were better done by Macready; but the passion of the play, the expression, the transfusion of actor to character, the illusion, the effect—these were all vastly better achieved by Forrest. A line drawn across the tops of Macready's "points" would leave Forrest below in all matters of detail, but it would only cut the base of the latter's pyramids of passion. Forrest runs sometimes into the melo-dramatic, seduced by the "way it takes," but he has fine genius, and if he played only to audiences of "good discretion," he would (or could) satisfy the most fastidious.

Wallack's friends, myself among the number, have been annoyed at the many contrestemps which have conspired to make his latter engagement at the Park so unsatisfactory. In genteel comedy, of which he is the master-player now on the stage, he was unable to do anything, from the lack of materials in that stock-company for a cast; and, indeed, he played always at the disadvantage of the one free horse in a slow team. Mr. and Mrs. Brougham (both first-rate players of high comedy, and the latter a very beautiful and effective woman, into the bargain) might have been engaged at the Park for the winter with great ease, and then we might have seen (what is the most agreeable kind of theatricals) comedies well cast and played. I hope there will be some combination among the actors to give us a "go," with a wheel with more than one spoke in it, and then we might have Wallack as he should be—a dramatic gem in proper setting.

I am not sure that I shall be able to make out a letter this morning, or, if I do, it will be in spite of an accompaniment of military music. My friend General Morris has his battalions in arms for review, and my pen "marks time," as if its forked nib were under the General's orders—and as, perhaps, it should be, coming from a very military bird, whose father's feathers have seen service under him).

Apropos of procession, by-the-way, I have had a moderate laugh at the effect of a typographical blunder in Dr. Julius's German edition of his travels in this country. The doctor is giving an account of an abolition procession in Cincinnati, and he records in English the inscriptions on the banners. One, he says, had the reproachful and pathetic sentiment: "Although our skins are black our souls are white." For "skins" read skins.

The sultan of the Comoro islands has addressed a letter to a gentleman in Wall street, a translation of which by a very accomplished and self-taught linguist (Mr. Cotheal), may be amusing to your readers. The Comoro isles, as you know, lie in the Indian ocean, off the north end of Madagascar, and are inhabited by a very friendly race of Mohammedan Arabs. The king resides in Johanna, the largest of the islands, and (in London slang) he is a slap-up old trader, getting ivory and gold-dust from Madagascar, and swapping these and his cows, pigs, and poultry, for Lowell factory-stuffs, or any other freight of American vessels. He writes a very worshipful letter:—

"To the American city of New York: For the beloved sheikh Aaron H. Palmer, No. 49 Wall street. May Allah be his guide! Amen! Badooh!

"By the grace of the Most High:

"To the dearest, the most glorious, the most generous sheikh Aaron H. Palmer, the honored, the exalted, the magnificent, the contented. May Allah, the Most High, be his guide! Amen!

"Now, after offering thee honor and protection from the Henzoanee city (Johanna) and its inhabitants, this is what I tell thee. Thy noble letter arrived and we read it. Thy friend understood its contents. May Allah reward thee well! Thou sayest in thy letter that thou desirest selling and buying in our land, and that thou wishest friendship with us. Thou art welcome. We thank thee, and accept thy offer. Thou didst tell us that we should advise thee of anything that we should need from thee. Again we thank thee, and inform thee that thou mayest send to us a person on thy part that shall dwell in the Henzoanee country. In order that thy business may be complete, a shop of the merchants, and everything that there is in the country, shall be made ready, on our part, if it please God. Whatever shall be wanted in these regions shall be paid for on delivery.

"I and all my Henzoanee tribes request that thou unite us with the American tribes in friendship and good-fellowship, like as we are united with the English, and we will serve you all as we serve them. Now, we have conceived here a great desire for the American tribes. Tell them to send us their letters, or a man-of-war-ship* on their part, and we will bind ourselves by a binding treaty. Now, the thing we need and want from thee are sealed letters of advice for our assurance; and in order that thou mayest know that this letter is from us, we stamp it with our seal. We request that thou send us all kinds of linen goods and cottons, both white, and brown, and fine stripes, and all kinds of woollen cloths; and ten bedsteads and sixty chairs; all kinds of glass; lamps, large and small, and some for placing on the table; and fine silk handkerchiefs. This is what we tell thee. Now salutation and prosperity be with thee forever!

"Dated the 10th of the month of Dool Heggeh, 1252 (corresponding to about the 16th of March, 1837).

"From thy friend the sooltan the sublime, son of the sooltan, Abd-Allah the sublime, Shirazy."

* It is refreshing to know that there is an island where "letters" and a "man-of-war-ship" are convertible equivalents.

As a long lesson of civilization, I have advised my friend Palmer, "the magnificent, the contented," to send out to his friend, the sultan of the Comoros, a youth accomplished in compounding the following drinks (copied from the bill of fare of a new restaurant in Boston):—

"Plain mint-julep, fancy do., mixed do., peach do., orange do., pineapple do., claret do., capped do., strawberry do., arrack do., racehorse do. Sherry-cobbler, rochelle do., arrack do., peach do., claret do., Tip-and-Ty, fiscal agent, veto, I. O. U., Tippe-Na-Pecco, moral suasion, vox-populi, ne-plus-ultra, Shambro, pig-and-whistle, citronella jam, egg-nog, Sargent, silver-top, poor-man's punch, arrack-punch, iced punch, spiced punch, epicure's punch, milk-punch, peach-punch, Jewett's fancy, deacon, exchange, stone-wall, Virginia fancy, Knickerbocker, smasher, floater, sifter, soda-punch, soda, mead, mulled wines of all descriptions."

After this array of compounds, I think the vexed question of the ingredients of Falstaff's sack must sink into insignificance. I understand that a shop is opened in the Strand, London, for the sale of these potations—one instance, at least, of a vice of civilization going eastward. We must wear it for our feather—since our drinks are the only feature of our country for which Dickens gives us unqualified praise.

The "life-preserving coffin," lately exhibited at the fair of the Institute, is so constructed as to fly open with the least stir of the occupant, and made as comfortable within as if intended for a temporary lodging. The proprietor recommends (which, indeed, it would be useless without) a corresponding facility of exit from the vault, and arrangements for privacy, light, and fresh air—in short, all that would be agreeable to the revenant on first waking. Not being, myself, a person wholly incapable of changing my mind, I felt, for the first time in my life, some little alarm as to the frequency of trance or suspended animation, and seeing a coffin-shop near Niblo's, I ventured to call on the proprietor (Mr. D—), a most respectable undertaker and make a few inquiries. Mr. D. buries from one to three persons a day, averaging from six to eight hundred annually. He has never been called upon to inter the same gentleman twice, in a professional practice of many years. He has seen a great number of coffins reopened, and never a sign of the person's having moved, except by sliding in bringing down stairs. I mentioned to him an instance that came to my own knowledge, of a young lady, who was found turned upon her face—disinterred the day after her burial, to be shown to a relative. But even this, he thought, was the result of rude handling of the coffin. Mr. D. seemed incredulous as to any modern instance of burial alive. He had spent much time and money, however, in experiments to keep people dead. He thought that in an exhausted receiver, made of an iron cylinder, to resist the pressure of the air, the body could be kept unchanged for fifty years, and that, immersed in spirits and enclosed in lead, the face would be recognisable after twenty years. (The process seems both undesirable and contradictory, by-the-way, for the posthumous drowning of a man makes his death sure, and he is kept in spirits to prevent his vegetating—as he would naturally after decay.)

Incidentally, Mr. D. informed me that a respectable funeral in New York costs from two hundred to eight hundred dollars, being rather more expensively done in New York and Boston than in any other city except New Orleans (where they say a man may afford to live who can not afford to die). In Philadelphia they make the coffin with a sloping roof, which, he remarked, is inconvenient for packing in vaults, though it seems accommodated to the one epitaph of the Romans—sit illi terra levis. They line their coffins more expensively in Philadelphia than elsewhere—with satin or velvet instead of flannel—and bury the dead in silk stockings and white gloves. We have not yet arrived at the ceremony of hired mourners, as in England, nor of plumes to the hearse and horses.

Notwithstanding the incredulity of my friend the undertaker, however, asphyxia, or a suspension of life, with all the appearance of death, is certified to in many instances, and carefully provided for in some countries. In Frankfort, Germany, the dead man is laid in a well-aired room, and his hand fastened for three days to a bell-pull. The Romans cut off one of the fingers before burning the corpse, or otherwise bestowing it out of sight. The Egyptians made sure by embalming, and other nations by frequent washing and anointing. Medical books say we should wait at least three days in winter and two in summer, before interring the dead. It has been suggested that there should be a public officer who should carefully examine the body and give a certificate, without which the burial should be illegal.

The embellishment of burial-grounds is one of the most beautiful and commendable features of our time and country. There always seemed to me far too much horror connected with the common idea of death and burial. The Moravians make flower-gardens of their graveyards, and inscribe upon the stone at the head of the buried man the "day he came hither and the day he went home"—his birthday and time of death. This is clothing with the proper aspect an event which is only an unlinking of a chain, no part of which can decay—the spirit to return to its fountain and the body to be reproduced in other forms of life—and it is a curious thing that most Christians represent death as a frightful skeleton, while the Greeks, who had no happiness in their hereafter, painted him as a sleeping child or a beautiful youth. Death in the East was formerly attributed to the attachment of a particular deity, who took his favorite to a better world; to the love of Aurora, if the death happened in the morning; of Selene, if it happened at night; of the water-nymphs, if drowned; of Jupiter, if killed by lightning. The caverns where the martyrs were laid were called "chambers of repose." And this, surely, is the better impression to give of death to those whose minds are forming. Query—whether a society for the purpose of embellishing cemeteries and brightening all the common surroundings of death and burial would not be worthy the attention of some philanthropic enthusiast? The solemnities connected with a future life need not make the gate to it always so dreadful; and, for one, I should be content to put the separation of soul and body on a level with the unlinking of a friendship or a change of opinion—erecting a cenotaph for either of the three changes, as the Pythagoreans did to the memory of those who left their sect. But this is more an essay than an epistle.

A beautiful printed copy of a "Translation of ten cantos of Dante's Inferno," has been sent me. The translator is Mr. Parsons, of Boston. It is done with a great deal of scholarship and labor, and an uncommon felicity of language—all of which, expended on an original poem, might, with his talent, have produced something as good as his translation, though not as good as Dante's Inferno. It strikes me that any transfer of a work of genius from one language to another—professing more than a simple rendering of the meaning and yet giving a deteriorated copy—is a loss of time and an injury to the original author. Mr. Parsons has done his translation in double rhyme, depriving Dante of the beauty of the terza rima, and at the same time weakening the literalness of the translation by the fetters of rhyme, and this seems to me ill-advised. There is no medium, I think, between a translation of absolute fidelity, and a refusal and recasting of the subject-matter by a genius almost equal to the original author; and, after the comparative failure of Byron at this, Mr. Parsons might hesitate. I hope he will try something of his own.

A gentleman in New Jersey has sent us some "Lines on the death of a young lady," and they express very natural feelings; but with neither novelty nor force enough to entitle them to print. He should be aware, that while grief is new, the most commonplace expression of it seems forcible to the sufferer. The ear to which has the gladness in itself, as the wounded heart has in its wound the eloquence of an old monotone of grief. If he is disposed to sooth his sorrow by an exercise of the imagination, however, he should brood upon such pictures as Shelley draws in the Witch of Atlas :—

"The pine-boughs sing Old songs with new gladness,"

"For, on the night that they were buried, she Restored the embalmer's ruining, and shook
The light out of the funeral lamps to be
A mimic day within that deathly nook.
And there the body lay, age after age,
Mute, breathing, beating, warm, and undecaying,
Like one asleep in a green hermitage,
With gentle dreams upon its eyelids playing."

"T.," a Virginian, has one good touch in his "Reminiscence."

"That fascinating, lustrous eye
Which lighted up a shady spot," that is to say, if he meant to express the beauty of a bright eye set in a dusky eyelid—a thing we exceedingly admire. But the remainder is of a quality inferior to what he sent us before, and we "put on the break," rather than let him go down hill.

"A friend" wishes us to "do our part" toward putting down the abuses and perversions of criticism. La! man! you can't reform the age! Besides, criticism has killed itself by overdoing the matter. Who judges of a book by a criticism upon it! The best way is to keep overdoing it—to knock down the bull the way he is going, not to keep him on his legs by ineffectual opposition. Nobody is hurt by criticism now—nobody mended. And what Utopia could make it better? Coleridge was over-sensitive on the subject, though he laments the degradation of authors very eloquently. "In times of old," he says, "books were as religious oracles; as literature advanced, they next became venerable preceptors; they then descended to the rank of instructive friends; and, as their numbers increased, they sunk still lower to that of entertaining companions; and, at present, they seem degraded into culprits, who hold up their hands at the bar of every self-elected judge who chooses to write from humor or interest, enmity or arrogance."

That our leaf

"By some o'erhasty angel was misplaced
In Fate's eternal volume,"

we have long known and often lamented. There was a good horse-jockey spoiled, in the making a poet of us, and we took to the swing of an axe like a tadpole to swimming. But we were not aware that we were appreciated. Some man, who sees through our poetic visor, writes thus to the "Ohio Statesman":—

"The Rev. Mr. Maffit is in town, exhorting sinners to repentance. N. P. Willis has taken up his quarters at the Astor house for the winter, I suppose. I think Willis would do better in the backwoods than at the Astor, for he is a stout, able-bodied man, and could maul his hundred rails a day like a knife. I have no notion of these overgrown, lazy fellows, laying around the flash hotels, idling away their precious time."

First correcting this gentleman's facts and cacology (as we do not "lay" either eggs or wagers, and are not "overgrown," being six feet high to a hair)—we entirely agree with him as to our original destination. We are a crack chopster, and for several winters have fulfilled our destiny with delight—chopping an avenue through some woods that we thought belonged to us (which avenue we finished, for somebody else, before we discovered our mistake), and never so happy as when up to the knees in snow, and letting it into the hickories with a woodman's emphasis and discretion! No steam-boiler ever rejoiced in its escape-valve, no hawser in the captain's "let go!" as we have done in swinging our heart round and banging it into a tree—for the axe was but a vicar and a vent! "Woodman, spare that tree!" was the bitterest veto ever laid upon our pleasures.

But we didn't make money at it. We saved almost three shillings a day (as to a "penny saved" being "equal to a penny got," we scorn the improbability), and the principal profit was the willingness it gave us to sit still in our chair and scribble. No! we loved our axe with a passion. We feared it might somehow turn out to be a sinful indulgence, it was so tempting and pleasurable—but alas! we make more with a quill—and while that is the case, the "correspondent of the Ohio Statesman" must pity, not blame, our exile from the woods to the Astor. Set us up—give us a clean deed of Glenmary and its woods, a horse and saddle, and our old axe—and never boy watched the darkening of his beard with the delight with which we shall see thicken again the vanished calluses in our palm! Fie on a life with neither resistance nor antagonism—with close air, pent lungs, arms aching, and muscles manacled and numb! Horses to break and trees to chop down are Paradise to it—we chance to know—but our axe is rusty and our quill is busy. Invicem cedunt dolor et voluptas.

Might buy this for a lie!")

Drums are beating in the Park, and the time and finery of the industrial classes, who form the industrious "forces" of New York, are under contribution to glorify the killer of Tecumseh. Of those who see the show, probably few will turn over a thought which the ghost of the old warrior would not consider complimentary to himself, and so perhaps it is one of those cases in which two birds are killed with one stone—as the drum, covered with Zisca's skin, both incited to battle and commemorated Zisca. Tecumseh, though a brigadier-general in the British service, should figure as an honored American ghost, and doubtless will be so appropriated in poetry, especially should there be written a poem on moral courage, of which his running away in his first fight, and being indomitable ever after, shows, I think, a very natural and striking example. There is another poetical feature in his history—his being persuaded, against his will, to marry a beautiful girl, after mature age, and making so good a husband. Altogether he is a fine hero for an epic, and a great deal more glorious for not surviving to engage in a political campaign.

One of the most approvable novelties that I have seen of late is a library of six volumes, upon Needlework. It is a set of miniature hand-books for the use of schools and families, most neatly printed and illustrated, and letting the reader into all the mysteries of "baby-linen, plain and fancy needlework, embroidery, knitting, netting, and tatting, millinery, and dress-making," and all very cheap and portable. Redfield, of Clinton Hall, is the publisher, and the admirers of the notable in woman-worth should be the purchasers.

Mr. Riker has issued the first of his series of annuals called "The Opal," of which Mr. Willis is to be the editor. The present volume, which contains some fine gems of literature, and is beautifully illustrated by Chapman, was prepared by Mr. Griswold, though contributed to and prefaced by the editor subsequently employed for the series. The character of the work is religious, and the preface states truly, that "the mirth and the playful elegancies of poetry and descriptive writing are as truly within the paths of religious reading as anything else which shows the fulness and variety of the provision made for our happiness when at peace with ourselves. Nothing gay, if innocent (the preface continues), is out of place in an annual intended to be used as a tribute of affection by the good; and in this annual, hereafter, that view will be kept before the eye. Its contents will be opal-hued—reflecting all the bright lights and colors which the prodigality of God's open hand has poured upon the pathway of life."

Edward S. Gould, one of the most distinguished of the merchant-author class so honorable to our country, has put forth an abridgment of "Alison's History of Europe." In a terse and strongly-written preface, he gives a résumé of the whole work, with a pungent criticism on its faults and injustices, showing that he (Gould) has not done his work "like a horse in a barn," but with a proper spirit and with a clear insight. Of Alison's chapter on the American war he says, very justly, that "it is destined to a most unenviable notoriety as a tissue of misrepresentation. As it has no legitimate connexion with the history of Europe, it is a gratuitous libel on the people and institutions of the United States, and as it could not be admitted into an American book without alterations contradictory to the title-page of this volume, it has been wholly omitted." Mr. Gould is the son of the eminent jurist, Judge Gould, of Connecticut, and is happy in having the energy (in addition to his business pursuits) to turn to account his fine natural powers and good education. He is one of the best of our translators, also, and the author of the new and humorous work, "The Sleep-Rider in the omnibus."

A great deal of fun, and as much genius and private worth, have just left the city in the person of Harry Placide, bound to New Orleans for a winter engagement. The people of the cis-Atlantic Paris are to be congratulated with all emphasis thereupon. It is equal to a day's allowance of sunshine to see him play at night. He knows humor, from elegant high comedy to irresistible farce—from a hair-line delineation of the ridiculous to a charcoal sketch—and fails in nothing he undertakes. With the exception of Farren, who is only his equal, Placide is unrivalled on the English or American stage. I wish him well, and well back again. God bless him!

I see copied into the "Literary Gazette and Quarterly Advertiser" an article on "Macaulay's Miscellanies," which appeared some time since in a Boston periodical, and struck me at the time as somewhat remarkable. A lecture on the habits and characters of literary men, which was quoted from in the Boston papers, has also attracted great attention by its brilliancy and originality of view, and both these are by a very young business-man in Boston, Mr. E. P. Whipple. His mind is of the cast and calibre of the writers for the English magazines of ten years ago, and I consider him a mine to be worked with great profit by the proprietors of the reviews. His kind is rare.

I see that Jules Janin "fobs off" another annual upon us under the name of "The American in Paris." It is written in his sparkling vein, and translated, as sparkle always is translated, with a loss. The truth is, that an American gentleman of New York fell into Janin's company in Paris, and showed him some notes he had made of his Parisian amusements; that the idea struck the great feuilletoniste of making this small diary the cover for a more detailed description of Paris than would otherwise seem "knowing," and the first having taken and sold, the second of a series has now appeared. Between Eugene Sue's real "Mysteries of Paris," and Janin's presentable drawing-room pictures of it, we may get a very fair idea of the gay capital. Janin's preface is written with the intention of being believed. He says: "Our American appears before you once more. Last year, at the same period, he described to you, in the best way he could, Parisian life during the brilliant months of winter. He had then arrived at the great city at the very moment when the closing days of autumn were disappearing beneath the yellow leaves. A traveller without affectation, he asked nothing more than to take his part in the sweet joys, lively emotions, and noisy pleasures of this world of the powerful and the rich; he endured as well as he could the intoxications and the delirium of the masked ball—the thousand cross-fires of Parisian conversation—the paradoxes, the slanders, and even the innocent calumnies that he saw around him—he entered into all; he wished to see everything, and he fulfilled his wish. Not that he advanced very far into the mysteries of the good city; but he stood, as one may say, on the edge of the wood, and thence he threw his curious and attentive look upon those gay and quickly-changing lights and shades. For a fellow-countryman of Franklin, our Yankee is certainly somewhat of an acute observer. What he did not see he guessed; not sometimes without a certain discrimination and pertinence. That which we specially admire in him, and which will not displease the reader, is a great fund of benevolence, a happy good-humor which has nothing affected about it, and an indiscribable entraîn and rapture, which the greater part of the time keeps the reader awake. This is all that we can say in his favor, for we are not of the number of those tiresome editors who are always saying, 'Come and see a masterpiece; come and salute a great man; the great man and the masterpiece were both invented by me.' We hope never to fall into this enthusiasm, which is very unbecoming in him who is its object. All our duty as editor we have faithfully fulfilled, and now it is for the book to defend itself. If by chance it is a good book, depend upon it the public will receive it with favor. All our ambition is, that after having thoroughly admired the embellishments of Lami, you will read a few of those pages in which the translator has endeavored to reproduce somewhat of the grace, the vivacity, and the interest of the original book." I have made a long extract from the preface, but I thought it would amuse you to see how the celebrated critic can talk about himself, with a transparent mask over his face.

A club bowling-alley has been established in Broadway, near Franklin street, most luxurious in all its appointments—carpets, ottomans, dressing-rooms, &c. The families subscribing are of the most fashionable cliques, and no male foot is suffered to enter this gynæceian gymnasium—the pins being set up by girls, and the attendance exclusively feminine. The luxuries remaining to our sex, up to the present time, are fencing and boxing—the usurpation of which is probably under consideration. The fashion, you would suppose, would scarcely gain by masculinifying, but the ladies are wearing broadcloth cloaks—for a beginning. There is another article of male attire which they have long been said to wear occasionally, but I am incredulous. Seeing would be believing.

Mr. Kendall, the popular and adventurous editor of the Picayune, has been "Lucy-Long"-ing it somewhat over his eagerly-expected book on Mexico, but has lately discovered that his celebrity would stand any halt in the trumpeting. He purchased recently a copy of Captain Marryat's new book, "Monsieur Violet," to go to bed with of a rainy afternoon, and had the pleasure of lying on his back and reading his own adventures amplified in the best style by the author of Peter Simple. Kendall's letters in the Picayune were, of course, the basis of the extended and illustrated work he has in press, and this basis, Captain Marryat (who is a subscriber to the Picayune) has taken bodily, and thereupon built his romance with but a small outlay of his own clapboards and shingles. An action of replevin for half the price of the captain's copyright would "lie," I should think—at least in the court of equity. Mr. Kendall, I had nearly forgotten to say, is spoken ill of in one portion of the captain's book, and his rejoinder has appeared in the Courier.

I have been looking through the new publication called "Etiquette, by Count D'Orsay." That D'Orsay revised the book and lent it his name "for a consideration," I think very possible, but there is, to my thinking, internal evidence in its style that he did not write it. There is an acquaintance with vulgarity, and a facility of "hitting it on the raw," which could only have been acquired by a conversance of fellowship with vulgar people, and D'Orsay knows as much of such matters as the thistle-down while afloat knows of the mud it floats over. Besides, the vulgarities are dwelt upon with a kind of unction totally foreign to D'Orsay's nature. He is a most kindly, as well as delicate and fastidious man, and his mind would instinctively avoid the knowledge of such matters, let alone the qualifying himself to describe them graphically. From one or two little anecdotes told in the book, I trace its authority to a Mr. Abraham Hayward, a frequenter of many different strata of London society, and probably the best judge in England of what is "genteel," by knowing better than anybody in England what is vulgar. It is undoubtedly an invaluable book, and circulated in one of these mammoth editions at the shilling price, it will prepare Americans of all classes, if they sin against good manners at all, to sin with knowledge—taking away at least the ridicule of the matter.

Dear pastoral-minded, centrifugally-bent, and moderately-well-off Reader, I address you "with all the honors," to be quite sure that my letter be not misapplied. We, the parties in this correspondence, are neither rich nor poor—as they express it elegantly in the mother-country, "neither nob nor snob." I would tell the critics had not the trick of calling the having one's own way "affectation;" else would I (simple though I am), coin for my own use, since the language is deficient in them, some of those epithets, descriptive of a class, which are at the same time so crisp, definite, and expressive. For instance: were I to address a letter to a young man of a certain style (a very prevalent style indeed), and wish to convey from the first word my appreciation of the character at which I aimed, I should be compelled to use the following circumlocution: My dear universally-benevolent—i. e.—spending-all-the-money-you-can-get-and-making-love-to-all-the-women-you-see, young man. Now, the French have a gracious and modest dissyllable for all this. The word expansif expresses it all. How much briefer, and more courteous, in the case just supposed, could I commence in English with, My dear expansive! Again: in English we should say, Oh, you-all-things-to-all-men—who-say-you-have-no-prejudices—but-are-understood-by-your-friends-to-mean-no-principles! but in German they phrase it, quite short, Oh, many-sided! Understand me not as leaning at all to Carlyle's system of personification and word-linking. Two and three are five is better than Two and Three died when Five was born, though this is but a moderate illustration of Carlyism. I would introduce no new epithet that is not the essence of a phrase, no new-linked words that are not the chord of a circumlocutory arc.

Touching my trade:—

In the matter of pen-craft, I confess to a miserly disposition, yearly increasing. It is natural, I suppose, to tuck up close the skirts of those habits in which we run for our lives (or livings), and it is not inconsistent, I would fain hope, with prodigality of other belongings. In my college days, ere I discovered that a bore in my brains would produce any better metal than brass (bored since for "tin"), I had a most spendthrift passion for correspondence. Now—paid duly for my blotted sheet—I think with penitential avarice of the words I have run through!

People are apt to fancy it is a natural amusement—laborum dulce lenimen—for an author to write letters, epitaphs, &c. But there are two animals at least, who might differ from that opinion—the author, and the baker's horse, out on a Sunday's excursion, in the baker's pleasure-wagon. The truth is, that the tax on authors, in this particular, is a disease in the literary system, and since it is not likely to be cured while the human race want autographs, epitaphs, epithalamia, and opinions on MSS., the solace seems to lie in the expediency of fat Jack—we should "turn the disease into commodity." If every third epitaph in the graveyards of this country be not by the author of —, &c., &c., all I can say is, there must be a very considerable number of gravestones; and I am only sorry that I did not take out copyrights from the start, and serve injunctions on plagiarizing stonecutters. Here is a letter now from a gentleman in Arkansas (whose grammar, by the way, is not very pellucid), informing me that his wife is dead, and giving me an inventory of her virtues; and I am requested to write the lady's epitaph, and send it on in time for the expectant marble. Of course I am extremely sorry the lady is dead, and since she was "such a pagoda of perfection," as Mrs. Ramsbottom would say, very sorry I had not the pleasure of her acquaintance; but my "head" is not "waters" (nor am I teetotaler enough to wish it were), and I can not weep for all the nice women who die, though grieved to think this particular style of person should diminish. Ours is a most romantic nation, for it would seem that there are few who do not think their private sorrows worthy of poetry, and the distinction between meum and tuum (as to authors) having long ago been broken down by our copyright robberies, the time and brains of poets are considered common property. People, accustomed to call for poetry when they want it, look upon the poet, quoad hoc, as they do upon the town-pump, and would be as much surprised at a charge for poetry as for water. Possibly it is one of the features of a new country. I have lived in a neighborhood where the stopping of a man who should be taking what fruit he wanted from your garden, or what fuel he wanted from your woods, would surprise him as much as stopping his nostrils with corks, till he was off your premises; and with fruit and fuel, perhaps, time and brains may assume a value. At present (it may as well be recorded among the statistics of the country), poets, lumber, and watermelons, are among the "inalienable rights of freemen."

One of the lesser evils of this appetite for sympathy in rhyme, is the very natural forgetfulness of a man absorbed in grief, touching the trifle of postage. Reading a death in the newspaper affects me, now, like seeing myself charged with eighteen and three quarters cents at the grocer's. If I were writing from the "palace of truth," to one of my "bereaved husbands," I should still stoutly assure him of my sympathy, having lost one and sixpence by the same melancholy event. My bill of mortality (postage, they call it) would frank me for boiled oysters at Florence's, the year round, and, begging pardon of the survivors (not the oyster-shells), I should like it in that shape quite as well.

Hereafter, I shall make an effort to transfer the cipher to the other side of the unit. If called upon to mourn (in black and white) for people I never before heard of, I propose to send my effusion as "commodity," to the first "enterprising publisher" who pays. Honor bright as to by-gones—let them be by-gones! Indeed, they are mostly too personal to interest the public, one of the most felicitous of my elegies turning (by request) on the deceased's "fascinating and love-inspiring lisps." But in all composed, after this date, I shall contrive so to generalize on the virtues and accomplishments commemorated, that the eulogy will apply promiscuously to all overrated relatives—of course, forming, for a literary magazine, an attraction which comes home to everybody's business and bosom. I may premise, by the way, that my advertisement to this effect would be addressed only to mourners of my own sex, and that ladies, as is hardly necessary to mention, are supplied with epitaphs on their husbands, without publicity or charge; though it is a curious fact that my customers, in the epitaph line, have hitherto been widowers only! Whether widows choose usually some other vehicle for the expression of their grief, preferring that it should be recorded on tablets less durable than marble (pardon me! more durable!) I have no data for deciding. I merely contribute this fact also to statistics.

"Pray, how does that face deserve framing and glazing!" asked a visiter, to-day. The question had been asked before. It is a copy from a head in some old picture—one of a series of studies from the ancient masters, lithographed in France. It represents a peasant of the campagna, and certainly, in Broadway, she would pass for a coarse woman, and not beautiful for a coarse one. I have been brought to think the head coarse and plain, however, by being often called on to defend it. I did not think so when I bought it in a print-shop in London. I do not now, unless under catechism.

To me, the whole climate of Italy is expressed in the face of that Contadina. It is a large, cubical-edged, massy style of feature, which, born in Scotland, would have been singularly harsh and inflexible. There is no refinement in it now, and, to be sure, little mobility or thought—but it is a face in which there is no resistance. That is its peculiarity. The heavy eyelid droops in indolent animal repose. The lips are drowsily sweet. The nostrils seem never to have been distended nor contracted. The muscles of the lips and cheeks have never tingled nor parched. It is a face on which a harsh wind never blew. If the woman be forty, those features have been forty years sleeping in balm—enjoying only—resisting, enduring, never. No one could look on it and fancy it had ever suffered or been uncomfortable, or dreaded wind or sun, summer or winter. A picture of St. Peter's—a mosaic of Pæstum—a print of Vesuvius or the Campanile—none of the common souvenirs of travel would be to me half so redolent of Italy.

By special favor I got a sight, while in Boston, of Crawford's statue of Orpheus, not yet open for public exhibition. As I stated in a former letter, the Athenæum has, most appreciatively, erected a new building expressly for this work of art, and nothing remains to be done but the finishing of the walls of the interior. It is a lofty room, and the statue is placed on a pedestal of masonry (rather oddly I thought) in the corner. It was, unfortunately, badly packed at Florence, and when taken from the box, in Boston, the legs were found to be both broken off. Mr. Dexter, a young sculptor of singular mechanical dexterity, as well as promising genius (the author of the admirable bust of Dickens), was employed to restore it, and has done it wonderfully. It requires close examination to perceive the fracture, and the discoloration might easily be taken, even then, for stains in the marble, so evidently are the statuary lines preserved as the artist designed them.

The statue is of the size of life—nude, with the exception of a short mantle, and sandals upon the feet. Orpheus is represented as just emerging from hell, and passing Cerberus, whom he has put to sleep with his music. The three-headed dog is "nid, nid, nodding" with his three heads, and either has two tails (which was not down in my mythology) or his unicaud is carefully combed away, madonna-wise, into two parts. The figure is bent over, like a man emerging from a cavern, and the right hand is held over the eyes as if to protect them from the sudden blaze of daylight, while the mantle is lifted from the back by the current of air rushing in, leaving the body and limbs, by this natural and poetical contrivance, nude for sculpture. The face of Orpheus, like the action and feeling of the limbs, expresses intent, but soft and subdued earnestness. It is an exquisitely beautiful youth, on the verge of manhood—slight, graceful, and bloomingly filled out; and I thought the body one of the most life-like and perfect representations of nature I had ever seen in marble. I presume the artist intended to represent Orpheus at the moment before he sends his wife back to hell by looking prematurely after her. (Query—moral?) He holds the lyre, with which he has just charmed the infernals, upon his left hip, and the eager action, expressing the instant preceding the completion of a desperate undertaking, is finely conceived, and breathed into sculpture. The only objection I could make to the statue was one that is simply a difference of conception, and, to his own, the artist is quite entitled. I expected a less effeminate person and countenance. Orpheus was an "old married man," and a reformer and lawgiver before Eurydice's fatal flirtation with Aristæus; and his character, both in fact and fable, in tradition and in Virgil's verse, was one of the most masculine and self-denying energy. He was a Grahamite, too (the only man of that age who would not eat flesh and eggs), and was finally torn in pieces by the women because he was an incorrigible widower—both which evince rather harsh qualities, and are not expressed in the Cupidon figure of Crawford's Orpheus. I am glad I have such trouble to find a fault, however, and I rejoice in the work altogether, as a most triumphant effort of American genius.

I saw another fine piece of art in Boston—Harding's full-length portrait of Governor Seward. It carries conviction, at a first glance, that it is true to the life, and, indeed, a finer piece of work than the head can not be found in the portrait-painting of this country. It is breathing with character and individuality, and an absolute likeness, besides being faultless in color. The figure is correctly done, no doubt, but Jupiter himself in black coat and trousers would be unpicturesque, and Harding has done his possible, redeeming the horrors of modern costume a little by an ingenious and graceful disposition of the cloak. Beside this picture stood the most capital portrait of the country, I think—Harding's Allston. This "other self" of the departed poet-artist is about to be engraved in the best style of the art, I am happy to hear.

Speaking of Allston, I was told in Boston that his funeral was by torch-light, after nine in the evening, and one of the most impressive and befitting ceremonies ever witnessed. He was laid on the bier, simply wrapt in his shroud and covered with a pall, and was borne on men's shoulders to the tomb, and there confined. These differences from ordinary burial were of his own directing some time before death. The wish to be excepted from the commonplace horrors of burial would be very natural to a mind like Allston's.

The lecturing system, which the Evening Post thinks is dying by surfeit in New York, is in full vigor in Boston, and it was thought that Macready would have made more money at it than by theatricals. I think myself that lecturers should be rather differently chosen, and that the object should be rather to come amusingly at the anatomy of society, than to hear the preaching-and-water of which the lectures are now delivered. Why not specify the subjects and choose the lecturer accordingly. If Sprague the cashier would lecture on the pathos of discount and the anxieties of investment; if the head-clerk in a retail dry-goods shop would unfold the inveiglements used for cheapening and getting credit (life across the counter, that is to say); if a fireman would give us the pros and cons of excitement and combination, esprit de corps, and what stimulant there would be in putting out fires for charity were other stimulants to fail; if any intelligent business-man or mechanic would lecture simply on the threads of society and common life which he lives by pulling—why, then, it seems to me, lectures would be entertaining, and in no danger of being thinly attended. The greatest mysteries of life are the common linings of common brains, and since people are tired of the "turning out to the sun" of the satin and velvet of refinement and education, it would be well to come to the plainer stuffs without ceremony. A lecturer hired to pick each trade and profession of its mysteries, by diligent inquiry, and to embody these mysteries in presentable elocution, might do a thriving business.

I was talking of pictures just now. A Boston merchant told me that he had made a considerable speculation lately by sending fifty "copies of the old masters" (imported Italian pictures) to California! He chanced to be passing a shop where they were to be put up at auction, and bought the lot, fifty paintings, at ten dollars each, frame and all. They sold to the Californikers at a great profit. But the original faith in the speculation is the miracle of the business.

The influenza is raging in Boston, everybody talking thick through the nose. I never saw such universality of grippe. The air in New York is as pitiless and penetrating as a search-warrant, but it seems to have the wholesomeness of the "Etesian breezes," and a bad cold I started with from Boston left me somewhere in the Sound, for I arrived without it. Perhaps, like Eurydice, it turned back at Hellgate.

The pulse of Broadway is accelerated to fever-beat. There is good sleighing in the white margins of that long page of black-letter, and the astonished coal and smoke at weathercock level is doubtless agitated violently with the change from the contralto monotone of wheels to the "frightful tintamarre" of bell-metal. Sidewalks wet and slippery.

A very short absence from a great city unhinges one's metropolitan habitude, and on returning, one looks at the placards on the walls as one does at the features of a long-absent friend, doubtful of what degree of change these superficial lines may be the exponents. None but your diurnal cit reads playbills with indifference and incredulity! The writing on the walls just now is, more than usual, flowery in its promises of amusement, and though "promising is the very air o' the time," and "performance is ever the duller for his act," I wanted last night a Mephistophilian ubiquity—the temptations were so many. Niblo's equestrian pageants are glowingly advertised, and said to be very splendid. New dancing-girls at the Chatham—new fun at Mitchell's Olympic—concerts in all directions—lectures more than plenty—fortune-tellers and jugglers, dwarfs and fat children, new oyster palaces, and all manner of balls, bewilder the eye of the street passenger with their rhetoric of placard.

Macready was playing Werner at the Park last night, and I looked in for a few moments. The house was about half full. As I entered he was commencing the long passage of reproach to Ulric, which he utters throughout at the tip-toe agony scream. A smart friction of the tympanum of the ear with a nutmeg-grater would be an emollient in comparison. Why should this accomplished actor aggravate his defects so painfully! That pipe of his would have been a disqualification for any viva-voce vocation to the mind of a less persevering man, but it seems to me that its dissonance might be abated by the degree of discipline he is willing to practise on other capabilities. He was well supported, by the way, by Miss Cushman. Mrs. Sloman has given place to this lady and returned to the shades of the past generation. Her Orpheus, Mr. Simpson, will not go after her again, it is to be hoped.

A sudden impulse, as I came out of the theatre, led me to the discovery of a new milliners'-land in New York, the existence of which, "minion of the lamps" as I have been, I had not suspected. I jumped into an omnibus that was passing, with a mere curiosity to see how far into the orient the brilliant shops of East Broadway extended. We passed by the terra cognita of Catharine street and Chatham, and their picturesque sellers of chestnuts by torch-light, and kept up the well-lighted avenue of the Bowery, when (to my momentary disappointment) the omnibus turned suddenly to the right, down Grand street. As the brilliancy of the lamps and shop-windows did not diminish, however, I kept my seat, and, to my surprise, rode on through a new Broadway which seemed to me interminable. I got out at last to walk back and look at it more leisurely. The shops on the south side were nearly all those of milliners and fancy-article dealers, differing from those of Greenwich street, on the other side of the city, in being smaller, brighter-colored in the array of goods (as if ministering to a gaudier taste), and more in the style of street stalls, such as are common in small Italian towns. There was another primitive peculiarity in the apparent custom in that region, for the whole family to wait behind the counter. In one very crowded and low-raftered shop, the sign of which was "Cheap Jemmy," the mother and half a dozen stout daughters were all busy waiting on customers, while a child in arms was dandled by a little girl sitting by the stove. Everything about the shop was of the strictest school of the thrifty primitive. Seeing a pretty and intelligent-looking milliner with her hands crossed over the glass case on her counter, a few doors from "Cheap Jemmy," I went in and bought a pair of gloves, for the sake of asking a question or two. She said rents were much cheaper in Grand street than in the other shopping streets of the city, and goods proportionably cheaper. The colored people do their shopping principally there. She was not acquainted at all in Grand street. When she wanted to go out she got into an omnibus and went down town. Altogether, the Grand street shops are unlike the other parts of the city—gayer and more picturesque—and life seems to be centralized and crowded together there, as if it were a suburb across a river. I must give you some notion of the geography of this quarter. Imagine Manhattan to be a man-with-a-hat-on (Union square the hat), lying on his back, with Castle Garden for a bunion on his great toe, Broadway would be his spine and intestinal canal, Chelsea and Greenwich his right arm, Grand street his outstretched left arm, the Tabernacle and Tombs, City Hall and Park, his rotund corporation, spleen, liver, &c. In ancient times the resemblance would have been seized upon at once for a deification.

A chef d'œuvre of daguerreotype is in preparation. The senate-chamber is to be engraved after photographs in the best style of Apollo, Chilton, and Edwards! These gentlemen (the god of light not the least enterprising and efficient of the three) have in preparation a magnificent engraving of the senators in appropriate positions, after the manner of some of the finest English prints. This is a bold and beautiful undertaking, and from the known skill and enterprise of these gentlemen, will doubtless be successfully accomplished. Whether an adequate recompense can be realized in this country remains to be seen. Most of the miniatures for this engraving were obtained at the daguerreotype gallery of these gentlemen, and theirs is an art particularly suited to the transfer of the strong lineaments of senatorial faces. The engraving will be a curiosity. A celebrated artist is to be employed for the grouping.

Late last night, the Norwegian, Olé Bull (pronounced Olay Bull), did the magnanimous, and yielded the use of one of the world's entire evenings to his rival, Vieux-temps, whose concert comes off, therefore, as announced, this evening. I shall go to hear him, and will tell you all I can fathom in what I hear.

I do not believe that the heaven of cognoscenti, which "leavens the whole lump" into rapture with these performers, amounts to more than three people in an audience of three thousand, and I think that even those three would be puzzled to distinguish between Wallace, Olé Bull, and Vieux-temps, if they played the same pieces behind a screen. (I do not mention Artot, because he plays to the heart exclusively.)

Nobody with nerves can sit out a concert, it is true, without having the keys of tears occasionally swept over, as a child, thrumming a piano, will occasionally produce a sweet or mournful combination of sounds by accident. But because our eyes are once or twice moistened, and because we occasionally feel that the corner of the veil is twitched which separates us from the chainless articulation we ache after, it is no sign that we at all comprehend the drift of the player's meaning, or see into the world of complex harmony whither he gropes but confusedly himself. I have not heard the violin of Olé Bull, but I have talked with him for an hour or two, and I think he is one of the most inspired creatures (and I should have thought so if I had met him as a savage in the woods) whose conversation I have ever listened to. He talks a braided language of French, Italian, and English, plucking expression to himself with a clutch: and though he moulds every idea with a powerful originality, he evidently does not give birth to more than a fraction of what is writhing in his brain. If there were a volcano missing in Norway, I should fancy we had encountered it on its travels—the crater not provided for in its human metempsychosis. Probably Olé Bull finds his violin a much more copious vent than language, for his imprisoned lava—but to coin that lava into language as he pours it out in tangled chromaties, would be to comprehend his music, and that, I say again, is not done by more than three in three thousand, if done at ALL! I told him I should like to hear him play à l'improvista, after he had seen Niagara, and upon that he gave me a description of wild Norwegian scenery, describing how he had tried to utter in music the effect it had produced upon him—gave it me with a “fine phrensy,” that pulled hard (and I should like to know the philosophy of that) upon the roots of my hair. There is something weird and supernatural about the man.

Mechanical dexterity on the violin has as much to do with music, I believe, as drawing a bank-check has to do with credit at the bank—a very necessary part of the matter, but owing its value entirely to what has gone before. Music is mind expressed in one of the half-dozen languages we possess—and as capable of logic and transfer into words, as painting or poetry, or expression of feature and gesture. Olé Bull, when playing, has (or ought to have) an explainable argument in his mind, and the bridge wanting between him and his audience is a translation of his musical argument into language—given before or after the performance. This he could easily do. At present, it is, to the audience, like a most eloquent oration in an unknown tongue—comprehensible only to the orator.

I have elsewhere mentioned, that while at Vienna, I saw a self-educated philosopher at the institute, who was discovering the link between music and geometry. He took a pane of glass and covered it sparsely with dry sand, and then, by drawing a particular note upon the edge with a fiddle-bow, he drove the sand by the vibration into a well-defined circle, or triangle, or square—whichever we chose of half-a-dozen geometrical figures. I have looked ever since, to hear of an advancement in this phase of daugerotype. Once reduced to a grammar, music would be as articulate as oratory, and we should be able to distinguish its sense from its gibberish.

In person, Olé Bull is a massive, gladiator-like creature, rather uncouth, passionately impulsive in his manners, and with a confused face, which only becomes legible with extreme animation. Wide-awake, he is often handsome—fast-asleep, he is doubtless as plain as a Norwegian boulder-stone. If he ever work his musical logic up to his musical impulse and execution, he will hang the first lamp in the darkest chamber of human comprehension.

I have two more steps to announce to you in the advance of the gynocracy. There is a gymnasium in the upper part of Broadway, where the LADIES don the Turkish costume, and ARE TAUGHT SPARRING and CLIMBING in jackets and loose trousers. Greatcoats with a snug fit to the back are superseding cloaks for ladies' out-of-door wear. “Merciful heavings!” as Dick Swiveller would say.

I have been looking over a file of English papers, published at Canton, China, in which I find that the interpreter to the French consulate has obtained a copy of the famous Chinese dictionary, which is an encyclopedia of the history, sciences, arts, habits, and usages of the Chinese, composed at the commencement of the eighteenth century by order of the emperor Ram-hi. A very small number of these was printed, for the emperor and principal functionaries of the empire only. It is to be reprinted immediately, with a French and English translation. Mr. Cushing goes there in a good time for finding the material he will want for researches, literary and political.

It is curious how much may be born of “a scrape” between catgut and horsehair! We have had two nights of violin-phrensy, and applause, for a trick with a fiddle-bow, that would have embalmed the heart of Demosthenes within him. The beau monde has given a fair hearing to the rival ebullions, and, by acclamation, at least, Olé Bull has it. As it is the rage, and, as even sages take interest in rages, perhaps I had better “make a clean breast,” and tell you all I know about it—albeit, like barley-water, if the fever were cured, it would be unpalatable slop.

The conversation of the town, of course, is largely embroidered with the concernings of these fiddle-monsters, and news, as you know, is stripped, like corn, of much of its picturesque outer husk and silken lining before it is ground into paragraph-cakes sent to be devoured at a distance. Olé Bull is not simply Olé Bull, but a star with four satellites—his grim keeper, his handsome secretary, his messenger, and his lacquey. The door of his parlor at the Astor is beset, antechamber-fashion, from morning till night, with orchestra-people, people from the music-shops, and all the tribe who get fat upon the droppings of enthusiasm. What he says is made into anecdotes, and wherever he goes follows the digito monstrari. There is an aristocracy of catgut, however, and Artot and Vieux-temps look upon Olé Bull as the house of lords look upon O'Connell, and greet him as the rocks do the rising tide. Artot has been a king's page, and Vieux-temps is, I believe, a chevalier décoré, and both of them have the porcelain air. The French population of New York make a “white-and-red-rose” business of it; and it was remarked last night that there was not a Frenchman to be seen at Olé Bull's concert. Artot is quite a minion of popularity with the fashionables—his expressive eyes and sentimental elegance probably the raison pourquoi.

Vieux-temps's first concert on Monday night was a very stylish jam. He is a small, pony-built man, with gold rings in his ears, and a face of genteel ugliness, but touchingly lugubrious in its expression. With his violin at his shoulder, he has the air of a husband undergoing the nocturnal penance of walking the room with “the child”—and performing it, too, with unaffected pity. He plays with the purest and cold est perfection of art, and is doubtless more learned on the violin than either of the rival performers, but there is a vitreous clearness and precision in his notes that would make them more germane to the humor of before breakfast than to the warm abandon of vespertide. His sister travels with him (a pretty blonde, very unlike him), and accompanies him on the piano.

Olé Bull's concert was deferred till last evening, and the immense capacity of the Tabernacle was filled to suffocation. He appeared after the usual appetiser of an overture, and was received with a tumult. Verily, he is made for a "tribune of the people!" The angel who "makes men politic" never moulded a creature more native to the central plane of popularity. A splendid animal—herculean and graceful—a faculty of looking, at the same time, overpowered and self-possessed—an unlimited suavity full of reserve—calm lips and wild eyes—cool dexterity and desperate abandonment to his theme—he would have done as well at anything else as at music. He is what Mrs. Ramsbottom would call a "natural pagoda."

It is presumptuous in a layman of the religion of music to attempt a critical distinction between these two or three first violinists of the world. Anybody can see differences in their playing, but only a musician can define the degrees in which they differ. Olé Bull's violin seems to have been made where horses and cats were of a wilder breed. He gets out of it a peculiar quality of note, not at first quite satisfactory to the ear, but approaching articulate language as it departs from the glassy melody drawn from the instrument by others. I have no doubt that, to himself, the instrument is as good as articulate. He expects it to talk intelligibly to others; and it would, possibly, to those who knew music and heard him often. I proposed to him in conversation, what I think would test the expression of his music very fairly—the transfer of Collins's Ode on the Passions to the violin. The audience could then follow him, as they do an opera by a translated libretto.

Wallace is about to enter the field against the violinists, many of the musical people here being quite persuaded that he plays as well as any of them. He is certainly the greatest pianist we ever had in America, and he is really embarrassed between the two instruments—the very highest degree of excellence requiring complete devotion to one only. He and Olé Bull met one evening at the duke of Devonshire's in London, but without hearing each other play, and they have run together, here, like drops of water—similar in quality and degree of genius, as well as in impulsive and poetical disposition. They met in Bull's room an evening or two since and played duets on the piano and violin, solos, &c., till morning. Wallace likes New York so well that he has determined to make it his residence, publishing his exquisite musical compositions here, &c. He is a great accession to the musical world, as he is a large essential drop added to the soul resident in this great mass of human life. I offer him one man's welcome.

I understand the piano rage is the next thing to come off, and that Lizst and Thalberg are positively coming over. Taking musical accomplishment in such large slices as we do, our vast country is likely to become the main body-corporate of the music of the world. It pays better than any other field of musical enterprise now.

you are by so much nearer to a new youth beyond—and better and brighter, as well as beyond. There is no instinct of regret for the past. Spite of Death brought nearer, and the shroud unfolded to receive us—spite of Decrepitude and Neglect and Pain rising up like phantoms in the way—we are happy to grow old. The soul rejoices. New-year! New-year! Death closer, but something the soul years after coming at his heels! Who, upon impulse, would retard time! Who would—instinct only consulted—go back! Eternal progress is the thirst of life, as it is of the whole eternity of which life is a part. The world says so by acclamation. The old year's death is the festival of universal instinct. Visit your friends! Brighten the links between you! Forgive slights, neglects, injuries! Go laughing through the gate of the new year!

The Hebrew Benevolent Society had a very brilliant dinner on Thursday, I understand, and drew a large contribution for its excellent objects from the present possessors of the "divining-rod"—the violinists. Olé Bull, whose heart is as prodigal as his genius, and who gives money to street-beggars by the handful, gave a hundred dollars, and Vieux-temps and Wallace agreed to combine in a charity-concert. The other contributions, I understand, were correspondingly liberal.

One of the essays, the most ad rem that I have lately seen, is an address on the "Prevention of Pauperism," by a relative of the late Dr. Channing. The preface has a certain bold resignation about it which is very idiosyncratic. Mr. Channing says that he was desired to read a discourse before a society for the prevention of pauperism, and agreed to try to do so—but he did not know to what he had pledged himself. He then defines very philosophically what he found, upon reflection, was to be his task, and goes on to say:—

"I went to work. That which might, in the reading, be endured forty minutes, grew to twice that allotted time, or more; and when the day came for the anniversary, I found I could not read the half I had set down. The auditory was very small; and the few, at first, were less before the forty minutes were up. The contribution-boxes came to the church-altar with little weight of metal, and few bills—say about twenty-seven dollars and twenty-three cents, all told. Thus was my work accounted little and paid harmoniously. But some, a very few, have asked me to print my writing. From so small a company a large request could hardly come. I have done what those few friends have asked me to."

The address is very philosophic, though tinctured with peculiar views of the social system. The leading propositions, which are very eloquently illustrated, are worthy the room they will take in these columns, if it were only as a skeleton map of the subject carefully laid out, and available for the guidance of inquirers:—

"1st. That every social institution, or custom, which separates man from man—which produces distinct classes in the community, having distinct privileges—which is daily occupied to build higher and stronger the partition-walls between men—such institution, or custom, I say, produces and continues poverty.

"2d. That the political institutions of society, or their administration, frequently become causes of the extremest and widest national poverty.

"3d. That the spirit of party, so widely and deeply cherished as it is by society, does, by its exclusiveness,

HAPPY NEW-YEAR!—Shake hands! Exchange congratulations! Be merry! Be happy! ANOTHER YEAR IS GONE! It is poetry to regret the past—only poetry. Rejoice that the incumbrance of another year is thrust behind—that another gate onward is flung open—that though this youth is passing or past, its selfishness, and its intolerance, minister directly to the production and continuance of poverty.

"4th. That such employment of capital by society, as in its products ministers only to the most debasing habits, does directly produce and continue crime and poverty.

"5th. The sudden reduction of wages, extended to large numbers, is not only directly injurious to wide interests, but produces pauperism.

"6th. That in a country like ours, in which the law of entail does not exist to make property a permanent possession in families, a system of education which has regard only to simple mental culture, and which leaves the physical powers uncultivated—in which manual labor, a practical knowledge of farming, or the mechanic arts, forms no part—I say that such a system of early education favors the production of pauperism."

Apropos of beggars—the system of ingenious beggary, so curiously described in Grant's "Great Metropolis," is beginning to be tried on in New York. There is one young lady (of very correct habits, I believe, in point of fact) who makes a living by means that wear a somewhat questionable complexion, out of "distinguished strangers." A member of congress, or a diplomatist in transit, for example, receives a note, the day after his arrival is advertised, in a handwriting of singular beauty. In the most graceful language, and with the daintiest use of French phrases, he is informed that a young lady who has long watched his career with the deepest interest—who has a feeling for him which is a mystery to herself—who met him accidentally in a place she will recall to his memory, should she be so fortunate as to see him again—who is an unhappy creature of impulse, all too fondly tender for this harsh world and its constructions—would like to see him on a certain sidewalk between eight and nine. By holding his hand across his left breast, he will be accosted at that time and place. The ladylikeness and good taste of the note, so different from the usual tentatives of that description, breed a second thought of curiosity, and the victim is punctual. After a turn or two on the appointed sidewalk, he encounters a tall young lady, deeply veiled, who addresses him by name, takes his arm, and discourses to him at first on his own ambitious history, contriving to say the true and flattering thing, for which she has duly informed herself. She skilfully evades his attempts to make her talk of things more particular, and regretting feelingly that she can only see him on the sidewalk, appeals to his "well-known generosity" for ten dollars to keep her and her dear mother from being turned out of doors. She takes it with tremulous pathos, demands of his honor that he will not follow her, and slips round the corner to meet another "distinguished stranger" with whom she has appointed an interview fifteen minutes later in the next street! I was in a company of strangers at a hotel not long ago, when one of these dainty notes was produced, and it so happened that every man present had one in his pocket from the same hand! Among the party there were four appointments proposed by the same lady, to come off on the four sides of a certain square, for that evening! She is probably doing a good business.

There has been a certain most eligible shop, with a most impracticable rent (3 Astor house, rent $1,000), for a long time vacant. Yesterday the broad doors were thrown open, and an effulgent placard announced it as the depot of the Columbian Magazine. The new periodical lay upon the counter in a most Chapman-esque cover, lettered gorgeously in vermilion and azure, with a device of Columbus on his pedestal,

John Inman, editor, in the blue of the scroll, and Israel Post, publisher, in the vermilion of the supporting tablet. (This arrangement is wrong, if there be any meaning in colors, for the ingredients of vermilion are sulphur and quicksilver—stuff of better prophecy for an editor than a publisher.) I understand that the foundations of this new magazine are thirty thousand dollars deep, and as there is great store of experience in both publisher and editor, it is likely to crowd Graham and Godey—though it will require almost an "avatar of Vishnu" to crush those giants of monthly literature. We are to see whether magazine-popularity is like the oil from the glass tomb of Belus—which, once exhausted, never could be refilled.

The history of the monthlies, for the last few years, forms a chapter by itself of American progress. It is but a very short time since the "dollar-a-page" of the North American Review was magnificent pay, and considered quite sufficient for articles by Edward Everett! The old New York Mirror paid five hundred dollars a year for the original "Pencilings by the Way"—the republication of which has paid the author five thousand. Nathaniel Greene, of the Boston Statesman, was the only man I could hear of, in 1827, who paid regularly for poetry, and I have heard that Percival was kept from starving in New York by selling his splendid poem on the plague for five dollars! I lost some of the intermediate steps of literary valuation, but I think the burst on author-land of Graham's and Godey's liberal prices was like a sunrise without a dawn. They commenced at once paying their principal contributors at the rate of twelve dollars a page—nearly three times the amount paid by English magazines to the best writers, and paying it, too, on the receipt of the manuscript, and not, as in London, on the publication of the article. We owe to these two gentlemen the bringing out of a host of periodical talent, which, but for their generous and prompt pay, would have remained dormant, or employed in other channels; and they should be recorded as the true and liberal pioneers of progress in this branch of literature. They have done very much the same thing with regard to engraving and the encouragement of the arts, and I believe the effect they have produced on the refinement of the country has been worthy of note—their beautiful books having been sent into its remotest corners by their unprecedented circulation.

The prices paid now to acceptable magazine-writers are very high, though the number of writers has increased so much that there are thousands who can get no article accepted. There are so many people, too, who, like the Ancient Mariner, are under the dire compulsion to tell their tale—paid or not paid—that any periodical, with a good furbisher and mender, may fill its pages, for nothing, with very excellent reading. A well-known editor once told me that he could make a very good living by the sums people were willing to pay to see themselves in print. The cacoethes scribendi would doubtless support—does doubtless support—a good many periodicals.

Olé Bull played to another crammed audience at the Park last night, but the angel or demon imprisoned in this violin was not tractable. If it had been his first appearance, he would have made a losing trip to America. There was a tone in the applause which showed very clearly that his music was turned back at the inner vestibule of the ear. He will probably redeem himself to-night at the Tabernacle—his closing concert.

I hear great complaints that the canvass-back ducks are not of as good flavor as usual this year. Will you tell us the pourquoi—or whether it is that the wild-celery is not in perfection this season? My own experience goes the other way—for such delicious ducks, so deliciously dressed, I never saw, as lately at "Guy's Monument house," in Baltimore. He is a fit cook for Apicius, it is true, and perhaps his sauce deceived me. But the canvass-back is part of our national honor, and the causes of falling off should be looked after.

I am delighted to see that our great comedian, Harry Placide, is up to the lips in success and popularity in New Orleans. God bless those southern people—they know a good thing when they see it! The theatres there are a kind of last appeal—confirming just appreciation, and reversing very often the cold injustice of the north. Wallack is gone there now, and he will come away with warm pockets. Burton, the comedian, is also in migration—a man of genius with his pen, and a most attractive actor. I wish we could have a good rollicking season of good acting at the Park, and go in deep for old-fashioned close criticism.

I sent you a paragraph yesterday which I am anxious to overtake with another—though the paragraph-chase, especially if the pursuer be a correction of an error, is much more desperate than the shadow's hope of overtaking the substance. Olé Bull, to my thinking (corroborated since by the opinions of some musical people), played without his inspiration the last night he played at the Park, and so I stated. At the Tabernacle on Tuesday night, his violin-fiend (or angel) was at home, and so completely did he search every chamber of my sense of musical delight, and so triumphantly drive out all unbelief, and fill me with passionate admiration and wonder at his skill and power, that I feel a certain compunctious reproach for ever having qualified my homage. One of his themes was a rhapsody of religious music, composed by himself, and, without irreverence, it seemed to me that St. John, in the Apocalyptic vision, could scarcely have been within the compass of music more rapt and unearthly. More than four thousand people held their breath in ravished ecstasy with this performance, and the only drawback to my own rapture was the conviction that, transparent and articulate as was the meaning of every note, to translate it into language the poet must first be himself translated—to the sphere and capabilities of an angel. You will think that I, too, am "a bit by the dipsas"—but I, at least, gave up my soul to this Olé Bull madness with some reluctance. Genius-like, the Norse magician is journalier, as the French say; but I pray that when he shall play at Washington he may "give a rise" to the embodied intellect of the capital which will show them a heaven above politics.

The Hibernia has brought me a gossiping letter or two from England; and, by way of letting you down softly from the balloon-flight of the paragraph foregoing, I will quote you a passage from the clever hand of our friend S—, the artist, now resident in London, and fully employed in transferring aristocratic beauty to ivory. Buckwheat and molasses, it should be premised, are undiscovered luxuries to the Londoners, and it is pleasant and apposite, at this particular season, when these friandises are in conjunctive culmination, to see how they loom in the traveller's memory. Says our friend:—

"So you have taken up your abode at the Astor. You have done well. There are many good things at the Astor; above all, the buckwheats; and I can fancy you at this moment, while I am breaking my fast upon a flabby 'French roll' (so called because no bread of the kind was ever seen in France), with a pile of them smoking before you, and pouring over them, with a liberal hand, copious libations of that exquisite, delicate, transparent molasses which the Astor alone provides, and which has always reminded me of the wine of the veiled prophet—

'No juice of earth is here,
But the pure treacle of that upper sphere
Whose rills o'er ruby beds and topaz flow,
Catching the gem's bright color as they go.'"

A letter from a literary friend in London informs me that Lady Blessington is suffering from a lethargy from which she finds it next to impossible to arouse herself for literary labor. The society she lives in draws very exhaustingly upon her powers of attention, and she has been all her life one of those who "crowd a year's life into a day." My friend adds:—

"You had some expectation of seeing D'Orsay in America, but he never had any intention of going out. He has been a prisoner for the last two years in Lady Blessington's house, at Kensington. There is an acre or two of garden, as you know, in the rear, shut in with a wall high enough to keep out creditors, and here D'Orsay takes his exercise on horseback. He devotes himself entirely to painting, making portraits of his friends and receiving money for them—in short, making a profession of it. Every Saturday night, at twelve o'clock, precisely, his cab is at the door, and he drives to his club, and on Sundays he is to be seen in the park, driving with Lady Blessington and her two exquisitely beautiful nieces (the Misses Power)—taking care to be home again, like Cinderella, before twelve o'clock at night. Not long ago, a meeting of his friends took place, and an effort was made to relieve him. They subscribed twenty thousand pounds, which would have given his creditors four shillings in the pound. The proposal was made, and the creditors refused to accept. The subscription was consequently abandoned."

There is an article afloat upon the raft of fugitive literature ("a stick of timber among the flood" (—) trash," as they say on the Susquehanna) which is worth hauling ashore and preserving—Parke Godwin's Essay on Shelley, in the Democratic Review. It comes from a mind of the finest powers of analysis and the warmest glow of poetical appreciation, and if we had in our country the class of well-patronized sober magazines which they have in England, this writer's pen and Whipple's would be the two best worth paying in the country, for that kind of article.

Ticknor & Co. have republished a volume of devotional poetry by Dr. Bowring, called Matins and Vespers. It is pure, even, moderately-inspired, and scholar-like poetry—of the best quality for family reading. The doctor's pursuits are all on a lofty level—philanthropy, patriotism, emancipation, and religion—and if his other faculties (all of which are of more than respectable calibre) were as largely developed as his veneration, he would be the moral Washington of his era. The last time I saw him he was in a great rage with a certain Yankee, who, upon very cool acquaintance, had drawn at sight upon his hospitality, by having himself and his baggage set down in the doctor's entry, and sending in the servant to borrow money to pay his coach-fare from Liverpool! With the exception of this private-life "repudiator," however, he is a great admirer of America and Americans.

The Langleys have got up a most presentable and elegant edition of the poems of Eliza Cook—the most fireside and home-like of modern poets. There is a great deal in this volume that will touch the "business and bosoms" of the many. Mrs. Osgood (herself a poetess of the affections, and wanting nothing but a little earth in her mixture) gives a sketch of Miss Cook in the preface, which is as good as a personal introduction.

When the "last page" morning arrives, dear reader, we, for the first time in the week, pull the "stop politic" in our many-keyed organ of livelihood-making, and muse a little on expediency while the ink dries upon our pen. This morning—this particular morning—we chance to have "belayed," as the sailors say, "a loose halliard" in our rigging, and in casting an eye "a-low and aloft," to see how it draws upon the canvass, we have determined to alter a little our trim and ballast. You are our passenger, dear reader, and our object is to make the voyage agreeable to you, and the query is, therefore, how much you would be interested in these same details of trim, ballast, and rigging. Our coffee stands untasted (for we write and breakfast, as an idle man breakfasts and dawdles, all along through the up-hill of the morning), and our omelet must cool while we amputate one horn of this dilemma.

We have never explained (have we?) that as an artist needs a "lay-figure" whereon to adjust drapery and prepare effects, an editor in the fancy line (our line) requires a personification, from the mouth of which he may speak with the definite identity of an individual. There are a thousand little whims and scraps of opinion kicking about the floor of commonplace, which, like bits of cloth and riband, might be pinned on to a drapery with effect, though worthless if simply presented to you in a bundle. A periodical needs to be an individual—with a physiognomy that is called up to the mind of the subscriber, and imagined as speaking, while he reads. An apple given to you by a friend at table is not like an apple taken from the shelf of a huckster. An article on the leading topic of the day, in a paper you are not accustomed to, is not read as the same article would be in your favorite periodical. The friend's choice alters the taste and value of the apple, as the individual editor's selection or approbation gives weight and value to the article. The more you are acquainted with your editor—even though, in that acquaintance, you find out his faults—the more interest you feel in his weekly visit, and the more curiosity you feel in what he offers you to read. What made the fortune of Blackwood but "Christopher North's" splendid egotism! A magazine without a distinct physiognomy visible through the type of every page, has no more hold on its circulation than an orchard on the eaters of apple-tarts. And if the making of this physiognomy visible be egotism, then is egotism in an apothecary's sign, or in the maker's name in your boot-leg.

There is, of course, a nice line to be drawn between the saying that of editorial self which every reader would like to know, and the incurring the deserved charge of egotism; and it was by that line exactly that we were trying to navigate in the dilemma with which we started. Should we—or should we not—bother the reader's brain with what was bothering ourselves? To a limited and bearable degree, then, we will.

We determined to live by periodical literature, and we came to New York prepared, of course, to unship the wings of our Pegasus and let him trot—if trotting is "the go"—quite sure that if he is worth keeping, his legs are as sound as his feathers. It is one thing to be "willing to come to the scratch," however, and another thing to find out definitely where the scratch is. We were prepared to turn owl and armadillo—to be indefatigable in our cage, and abroad only by night—to live on one meal a day—to be editor, proof-reader, foreman, and publisher, and as many other things as we could get out of life, limb, and twenty-four hours—prepared for any toil and self-denial—in short, to quash debt and keep up the Mirror. Excellent virtue entirely thrown away! The Mirror rose as easy as the moon, went on its way rejoicing, and is now out of the reach of kites, rockets, and steeples! Which way lay—then—the dragons to vanquish? This brings us to the head and front of our dilemma. Personal slander is the only obstacle in American literature.

SO BE IT! We do not complain of it. We have not the presumption to be above our country. America demands of her literary children that they should submit to calumny—demands it in the most emphatic of all voices, by her support of the presses which inflict it. We agree. We can not make shoes, though to that trade there is no such penalty. We should throw away our apprenticeship, if we attempted to live, now, by any but the one trade whose household gods are outlawed. We honor our country. We will live by American literature, with its American drawback. We can suffer as much as another man. We are no coward. We will step into the arena, and let the country, that looks on, decide upon the weapons and terms of combat. Yet still there is a dilemma.

We have tried for fifteen years the silent system—the living down slanders, as the watchman wakes down the stars that rise again in twelve hours. The only exception to our rule occurred in England, where an English pen assumed a few American misstatements—and being "among the Romans," we did as they do in such cases—got the necessary retraction through the "law of honor." Lately, as perhaps the reader knows, we have taken a fancy to see whether there was any difference between public opinion and the law, as to the protection of literary men against slander. The author of a particular set of slanders we chanced to light upon for the experiment, is, we understand, a clergyman and an abolitionist, and, though we have literally proved that he published seven or eight direct lies against our private character, we are condemned by many of the press for what they call "Coopering an editor," and one paper in Philadelphia attacks our defence of our own character as a shallow piece of ostentation, got up for effect! We humbly ask which is most agreeable to the public? Do they like it submitted to silently, or do they prefer it defended, by dragging our private life with all its details into the street? We will accommodate them—for we must live in the country we were born in, and live by literature!

One of the most beautiful sights I have lately seen was the SPREAD for the New England dinner in the large dining-room of the Astor. It would have given, even to a "picked man of countries," a heightened standard of sumptuousness in banquet—in fact (and republicans may as well know it), royal entertainments in Europe beat it by nothing but the intrinsic value of the table service. Galleries were erected for ladies behind the columns at either end of the hall, and "all went merry as a marriage bell."

It struck me that the "old Plymouth rock" was a little too much hammered upon, and, indeed, I thought, during the dinner, that the fragment of it (which was set upon the table) had better be used for the weight and countenance it could give to objects worthy of the pilgrim spirit, than as an anvil for self-glorification.

There are interests constantly arising of a philanthropic character general enough for all parties to partake in, and to the sluggish movement of which the steam of local patriotism might worthily be applied. Without the bugbear of a contribution at the time, a fine orator and philanthropist like Horace Mann might have been invited by the committee to delight and instruct the picked audience with eloquence on one of his apostolic schemes of benevolence. As it was, the predominance of one political party made it a whig dinner, instead of a New England dinner. Admiring Mr. Webster as I do, and willing as I am to do more to see the other remaining Titan of our country (Mr. Clay) in the presidential chair than for any other object not personal to myself, I wished that he had replied to the "common-school" toast instead of the one he selected, and kept to the spirit of New England exclusively in the determination of his "thunder." Mr. Bellows took up this just-mentioned topic, and compared the red school-houses (more graphically than felicitously) to an eruption on the face of New England! He is a great pulpit orator, but a man who is accustomed to steer by the sober rudder of a pen runs adrift in trusting himself to extemporaneous impulse. The best-judged and most nicely-turned speech of the evening, I thought, was by Mr. Colden—and quite the most applauded.

The overflow of the city's fountain of curiosity pours just now into the fancy-stores and curiosity-shops—the stockings of Santaclaus gaping wide for "gratifications." The new bazar, with the negroes in cocked hats for "sticks in waiting," is thronged like a levee, and, truly, the variety of new nonsenses is marvellous and bewildering. Tiffany's carries the palm, and you would think, to walk around that museum of elegancies, that the fine arts had turned their whole force and ingenuity into the invention of trifles. It would be curious to trace back the genius that invents these things to its home and condition in life.

One of the new books that will most interest you and the members of congress is "Simcoe's Military Journal; a history of the operations of a partisan corps called the Queen's Rangers, commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Simcoe, during the war of the Revolution, illustrated by engraved plans of action," &c. Bartlett & Welford, the great bibliologists of New York, found a copy of the work in their researches in foreign libraries, and Mr. Bartlett, who is a scholar, thus prefaces the American republication:—

"The military journal of Lieutenant-Colonel Simcoe, now first published, was privately printed by the author in 1787 for distribution among a few of his personal friends. The production has hitherto, it would seem, entirely escaped the attention of those who are curious in the history of our revolutionary war. As a record of some interesting particulars and local occurrences of that memorable struggle, and as a well-written documentary illustration of the times and the circumstances of the American rebellion, it deserves circulation and favor. The fortunate procurement of a copy of the work in London enables the publishers to present it in an edition securing its preservation, and facilitating a general knowledge of its contents. A memoir of so much of the author's life as is not exhibited in his journal, it is thought, will interest the reader and increase the permanent value of the volume. Accordingly, such a memoir has been prepared from available and authentic materials, and, by the way of introduction, may serve to fill out the history of the commander of the Queen's Rangers, presenting also a few facts concerning the corps, not otherwise appearing. Not to extend that portion of the publication too far, however, various relevant quotations from different sources, interesting essentially and expletive in their character, are thrown into the appendix, in addition to what the journalist has given in that form himself."

There is a very well-conducted paper in New York called the "Mirror of Fashion," the avowed object of which is to furnish plates and descriptions of gentlemen's fashions in dress—this feature taking the place, in a sheet of general interest, which politics or religion take in others. One sentence of the advertisement runs thus:—

"I shall strive my utmost to make the Mirror of Fashion reflect all the important changes in styles of dress, whether in cut, color, or make, that may from month to month be adopted in this metropolis, always eschewing the freaks and follies of foreign fancy. I shall, as I ever have done, recommend only that which is strictly consonant with American feelings and predilections."

The motto of the paper, very properly, is taken from Carlyle's, "Sartor Resartus." Thus, in the one pregnant subject of clothes, rightly understood, is included all that men have thought, dreamed, done, or been; the whole external universe, and what it holds, is but clothing; and the essence of all science lies in the philosophy of clothes. There is evidently a man of reading and talent at the head of this paper, and the subject touches men's "business and bosom" so closely and widely that it may well be considered a quatrième état, and have its organ to represent it.

If May be the season for "the raging calenture of love," this is the calenture of the social affections—the fever-crisis of the year, when the heat that is in the system comes to the surface. Most quiet men go to a ball or two in the holidays—dance a quadrille or two to show the old year that they are not of its party in going out—pay a compliment or two more flowery than their wont; in short, put on the outer seeming which would befit them in a Utopia. I have tried on, like others, for the last week or two, this holiday humor; and, though I shall be accused of "keeping a sharp eye to business," I must jot down for you a thought or two that has occurred to me, critical and comparative, or the present condition of New York society.

It strikes me that there is no provision in the gay society of New York for people of middle age. A man between thirty-five and forty is invited to a large party. He goes too early if he arrives before eleven. He finds the two principal rooms stripped of carpets and of most of the sitting-down furniture, and the reception-room entirely lined with the mammas and chaperons of the young ladies on the floor. However he might be a "dancing man" in Europe, where people dance till their knees fail them, he knows that in this haste-to-grow-old country it would be commented harshly upon, especially if he has a wife, for whom it is expected his overflow of spirits should be reserved. As he don't dance, he would like to converse. The old ladies talk of nothing but their daughters, and the daughters, if not dancing, think it would repel a probable partner to seem much occupied in conversation. He looks around for a sofa and a lady who don't dance. Sofa there is none, and in a chair in the corner perhaps there is one lady who is neither young nor old—rara avis! He approaches her, and, well nigh jammed against the wall, undertakes a conversation not audible (he standing and she sitting) unless kept up at a scream. After a half hour of this, the lady, if she be discreet, remembers that "it looks particular" to be engrossed more than half an hour by one gentleman, and looks or says so. The middle-aged man slides along the wall, gets back into the crowded reception-room, talks a little to the chaperons, comes back and looks on at the waltz, and so passes the three hours till supper—on his legs. The ladies take an hour to sup, and, about three o'clock, he gets a corner for some oysters and champagne, and between that and four o'clock gets home to bed. He is a business man and rises at eight, and by three o'clock the next day he looks and feels as a man naturally would who had burnt his candle at both ends—for nothing!

It is not wonderful that there are no conveniences for conversation in society, for there really is no conversation to provide for. The want would create the supply. It is one of the most peculiar of our country's features that conversation is not cultivated as a pleasure. When American women leave off dancing they think they have done with society till they reappear to bring out their daughters. All the agreeableness of their middle life—the most attractive and delightful portion of like too, perhaps—is expended on an appreciative husband who wants and uses it all! Not at all as a disparagement to this state of things, perhaps you will allow me to mention a case, that may be somewhat parallel, which has turned up in my zoological reading: "These little insects (the coccus, of the family galinsecta) are remarkable for many peculiarities in their habits and conformation. The males have long large wings! The females have no wings, but at a certain period of their life attach themselves to the plant or tree which they inhabit, and remain thereon immovable during the rest of their existence. As soon as the eggs are produced, they pass immediately under the female parent, whose body becomes their stationary covering and guard. By degrees her body dries up and flattens, and forms a sort of a shell, and, when life is quite extinct, the young insects leave their hiding-place." Whether society has not some claim on them—whether their minds would not be kept from narrowing by conversation with agreeable men—whether the one exclusive errand of the loveliest portion of humanity is to rear children, are questions which in this country may be handled very gingerly—at least in print. I may be permitted to go on and say "how they do in Spain," however.

A middle-aged man in London may or may not be a dancer. There is no comment either way—but he must be something—dancer or good conversationalist, or he is dropped as "lumbering up the party." Few men can afford to be seen by the mistress of the house to be unamused and unamusing. A cultivated man, then, who don't dance, gets an hour or two of pleasant society in the early part of the evening at the opera. If there is a small party afterward he prefers it to a ball; but if he goes to the ball he finds that the pleasantest people there are the married women. They do not sit together without room for a gentleman between them, but every lady is bodily approachable, and with a little management he can get a comfortable seat beside any one whom he may know and prefer. If he find her interesting, and talk to her the whole evening, there is no scandal, unless there are other corroborating circumstances; indeed, the openness of the attention would rather discredit any unfavorable comment. If there is a new lion present, or any attraction peculiar to one person, a small circle is formed in a corner, or a group stand around and let the conversation be managed by the persons most interested, like listening to music. You could seldom go to a party in London without hearing something worth telling to a person not there, and society (not the newspapers) has the first use and enjoyment of all news and novelties of every description. Newspapers are stale to a man actively conversant in the best society of London. People collect news, and see sights, and invent theories, and study and think—to have material for being brilliant in society, and for no other purpose. A habitué of the best houses grows well-informed by absorption only—if he keep his ears open. And this entire stage of society is wanting in New York.

An intelligent gentleman remarked lately upon the absurdity of copying English hours for gayety, without copying the compensating English hours for repose. It is the aim of aristocracy to have such habits as to distinguish aristocrats from the working-classes, and lords and ladies please themselves with going home to sleep when the clowns are getting up to toil. "Until we can afford to lie abed like a lord, till noon, we are fools to lose the clown's slumber, and a fashionable lady would deserve well of her country who would tacitly acknowledge her husband to be a man of business, by giving her party at hours when he and his merchant-friends could attend without loss of needful sleep. Who would not be glad to go to a ball at seven instead of eleven? This change, and the introduction of comforts and accommodations for conversible wall-flowers, would, in my opinion, improve even the charming circles of grown-up children who now constitute New York society.

I see no very marked differences in the dress or usages of the ball-room. Rather more waltzing and less quadrilling, if anything—but still "marvellous few" tolerable waltzers. Could most of the waltzing men in New York "see themselves as others see them," they would practise the difficult ease of this accomplishment elsewhere for a while. The lower classes of Germans have balls in their peculiar haunts which it would be good practice to attend.

HOW TO MAKE A PARADISE IN THE COUNTRY.—The back of the winter is broke, dear reader, and it is down-hill to spring. Those who have not our brick and mortar destiny, are chatting, over their evening table, of gardens and fruit-trees, crops and embellishments, and longing the snow off their lawns and fields, and the frost out of their furrows. We have been passing a leisure (not an idle) hour in reading our friend Downing's elegant and tempting book on rural architecture—a book which, with others by the same scholarlike and tasteful pen, we commend to your possession—and it brings to our mind a long letter we wrote during our last year's residence on the Susquehanna, on the subject of economical and comestable paradise-making in the country. For a change—let us turn over for you this leaf of our common-sense book. Thus runs the body of it:—

Landscape-gardening is a pleasant subject to expand into an imaginative article, and I am not surprised that men, sitting amid hot editorials in a city (the month of July), find a certain facility in creating woods and walks, planting hedges and building conservatories. So may the brain be refreshed, I well know, even with the smell of printing-ink in the nostrils. But landscape-gardening, as within the reach of the small farmer people, is quite another thing, and to be managed (as brain-gardening need not be, to be sure) with economy and moderation. Tell us in the quarterlies, if you will, what a man may do with a thousand acres and plenty of money; but we will endeavor to show what may be done with fifty acres and a spare hour in the evening—by the tasteful farmer, or the tradesman retired on small means. These own their fifty acres (more or less), up to the sky and down to the bottom of their "diggings," and as nature lets the tree grow and the flower expand for a man, without reference to his account at the bank, they have it in their power to embellish, and most commonly, they have also the inclination. Beginners, however, at this as at most other things, are at the mercy of injudicious counsel, and few books can be more expensively misapplied than the treatises on landscape-gardening.

The most intense and sincere lovers of the country are citizens who have fled to rural life in middle age, and old travellers who are weary, heart and foot, and long for shelter and rest. Both these classes of men are ornamental in their tastes—the first because the country is his passion, heightened by abstinence; and the latter because he remembers the secluded and sweet spots he has crossed in travel, and yearns for something that resembles them, of his own. To begin at the beginning, I will suppose such a man as either of these in search of land to purchase and build upon. His means are moderate.

Leaving the climate and productiveness of soil out of the question, the main things to find united are shade, water, and inequality of surface. With these three features given by nature, any spot may be made beautiful, and at very little cost; and, fortunately for purchasers in this country, most land is valued and sold with little or no reference to these or other capabilities for embellishment. Water, in a country so laced with rivers, is easily found. Yet there are hints worth giving, perhaps, obvious as they seem, even in the selection of water. A small and rapid river is preferable to a large river or lake. The Hudson, for instance, is too broad to bridge, and beautiful as the sites are upon its banks, the residents have but one egress and one drive—the country behind them. If they could cross to the other side, and radiate in every direction in their evening drives, the villas on that noble river would be trebled in value. One soon tires of riding up and down one bank of a river, and without a taste for boating, the beautiful expanse of water soon becomes an irksome barrier. Very much the same remark is true of the borders of lakes, with the additional objection, that there is no variety to the view. A small, bright stream, such as hundreds of nameless ones in these beautiful northern states, spanned by bridges, at every half mile, followed always by the roads which naturally seek the level, and winding into picturesque surprises, appearing and disappearing, continually, is, in itself, an ever-renewing poem, crowded with changeable pictures, and every day tempting you to follow or trace back its bright current. Small rivers, again, insure to a degree the other two requisites—shade and inequality of surface—the interval being proportionately narrow, and backed by slopes and alluvial soil, usually producing the various nut and maple trees, which, for their fruit and sap, have been spared by the inexorable axes of the first settlers. If there is any land in the country, the price of which is raised from the supposed desirableness of the site, it is upon the lakes and larger rivers, leaving the smaller rivers, fortunately, still within the scale of the people's means.

One more word as to the selection of a spot. The rivers in the United States, more than those of older countries, are variable in their quantity of water. The banks of many of the most picturesque, present, at the season of the year when we most wish it otherwise (in the sultry heats of August and September), bared rocks or beds of ooze, while the stream runs sluggishly and uninvitingly between. Those which are fed principally by springs, however, are less liable to the effects of drought than those which are the outlets of large bodies of water; and indeed, there is great difference in rivers in this respect, depending on the degree in which their courses are shaded, and other causes. It will be safest, consequently, to select a site in August, when the water is at the lowest, preferring, of course, a bold and high bank as a protection against freshets and flood-wood. The remotest chance of a war with water, damming against wash and flood, fills an old settler with economical alarm.

It was doubtless a "small chore" for the deluge to heave up a mound or slope a bank, but with one spade at a dollar a day, the moving of earth is a discouraging job, and in selecting a place to live it is well to be apprized what diggings may become necessary, and how your hay and water, wood, visitors, and lumber generally, are to come and go. A man's first fancy is commonly to build on a hill; but as he lives on, year after year, he would like his house lower and lower, till, if the fairies had done it for him at each succeeding wish, he would trouble them at last to dig his cellar at the bottom. It is hard mounting a hill daily, with tired horses, and it is dangerous driving down with full-bellied ones from the stable-door, and your friends deduct from the pleasure of seeing you, the inconvenience of ascending and descending. The view, for which you build high, you soon discover is not daily bread, but an occasional treat, more worth, as well as better liked for the walk to get it, and (you have selected your site, of course, with a southern exposure) a good stiff hill at your back, nine months in the year, saves several degrees of the thermometer, and sundry chimney-tops, barn-roofs, and other furniture peripatetic in a tempest. Then your hill-road washes with the rains, and needs continual mending, and the dweller on the hill needs one more horse and two more oxen than the dweller in the valley. One thing more. There rises a night-mist (never unwholesome from running water), which protects fruit-trees from frost to a certain level above the river, at certain critical seasons, and so end the reasons for building low.

I am supposing all along, dear reader, that you have had no experience of country-life, but that, sick of a number in a brick block, or (if a traveller) weary of "the perpetual flow of people," you want a patch of the globe's surface to yourself, and room enough to scream, let off champagne-corks, or throw stones, without disturbance to your neighbor. The intense yearning for this degree of liberty has led some seekers after the pastoral rather farther into the wilderness than was necessary; and while writing on the subject of a selection of rural sites, it is worth while, perhaps, to specify the desirable degree of neighborhood.

In your own person, probably, you do not combine blacksmith, carpenter, tinman, grocer, apothecary, wet-nurse, dry-nurse, washerwoman, and doctor. Shoes and clothes can wait your convenience for mending; but the little necessities supplied by the above list of vocations are rather imperative, and they can only be ministered to in any degree of comfortable perfection, by a village of at least a thousand inhabitants. Two or three miles is far enough to send your horse to be shod, and far enough to send for doctor or washerwoman, and half the distance would be better, if there were no prospect of the extension of the village limits. But the common diameter of idle boys' rambles is a mile out of the village, and to be just beyond that is very necessary, if you care for your plums and apples. The church-bell should be within hearing, and it is mellowed deliciously by a mile or two of hill and dale, and your wife will probably belong to a "sewing-circle," to which it is very much for her health to walk, especially if the horse is wanted for ploughing. This suggests to me another point which I had nearly overlooked.

The farmer pretends to no "gentility;" I may be permitted to say, therefore, that neighbors are a luxury, both expensive and inconvenient. The necessity you feel for society, of course, will modify very much the just-stated considerations on the subject of vicinage. He who has lived only in towns, or passed his life (as travellers do) only as a receiver of hospitality, is little aware of the difference between a country and city call, or between receiving a visit and paying one. In town, "not at home," in any of its shapes, is a great preserver of personal liberty, and gives no offence. In the country you are "at home," will-you, nill-you. As a stranger paying a visit, you choose the time most convenient to yourself, and abridge the call at pleasure. In your own house, the visitor may find you at a very inconvenient hour, stay a very inconvenient time, and as you have no liberty to deny yourself at your country door, it may (or may not, I say, according to your taste) be a considerable evil. This point should be well settled, however, before you determine your distance from a closely-settled neighborhood, for many a man would rather send his horse two miles farther to be shod than live within the convenience of "sociable neighbors." A resident in a city, by-the-way (and it is a point which should be kept in mind by the retiring metropolitan) has, properly speaking, no neighbors. He has friends, chosen or made by similarity of pursuit, congeniality of taste, or accident, which might have been left unimproved. His literal neighbors he knows by name—if they keep a brass plate, but they are contented to know as little of him, and the acquaintance ends, without offence, in the perusal of the name and number on the door. In the city you pick your friends. In the country you "take them in the lump."

True, country neighbors are almost always desirable acquaintances—simple in their habits, and pure in their morals and conversation. But this letter is addressed to men retiring from the world, who look forward to the undisturbed enjoyment of trees and fields, who expect life to be filled up with the enjoyment of dew at morn, shade at noon, and the glory of sunset and starlight, and who consider the complete repose of the articulating organs, and release from oppressive and unmeaning social observances, as the fruition of Paradise. To men who have experience or philosophy enough to have reduced life to this, I should recommend a distance of five miles from any village or any family with grown-up daughters. In my character of dollar, I may be forgiven for remarking, also, that this degree of seclusion doubles an income (by enabling a man to live on half of it), and so, freeing the mind from the care of self, removes the very gravest of the obstacles to happiness. I refer to no saving which infringes on comfort. The housekeeper who caters for her own family in an unvisited seclusion, and the housekeeper who provides for her family with an eye to the possible or probable interruption of acquaintances not friends, live at very different rates; and the latter adds one dish to the bounty of the table, perhaps, but two to its vanity. Still more in the comfort and expensiveness of dress. The natural and most blissful costume of man in summer, all told, is shirt, slippers, and pantaloons. The compulsory articles of coat, suspenders, waistcoat, and cravat (gloves would be ridiculous), are a tribute paid to the chance of visitors, as is also, probably, some dollars' difference in the quality of the hat.

I say nothing of the comfort of a bad hat (one you can sit upon, or water your horse from, or bide the storm in, without remorse), nor of the luxury of having half a dozen, which you do when they are cheap, and so saving the mental burthen of retaining the geography of an article so easily mislaid. A man is a slave to anything on his person he is afraid to spoil—a slave (if he is not rich, as we are not, dear reader!) to any costly habiliment whatever. The trees nod no less graciously (it is a pleasure to be able to say), because one's trousers are of a rational volume over the portion most tried by a sedentary man, nor because one's hat is of an equivocal shape—having served as a non-conductor between a wet log and its proprietor; but ladies do—especially country ladies; and even if they did not, there is enough of the leaven of youth, even in philosophers, to make them unwilling to appear to positive disadvantage, and unless you are quite at your ease as to even the ridiculous shabbiness of your outer man, there is no liberty—no economical liberty, I mean—in rural life. Do not mislead yourself, dear reader! I am perfectly aware that a Spanish sombrero, a pair of large French trousers plaited over the hips, a well made English shoe, and a handsome checked shirt, form as easy a costume for the country as philosopher could desire. But I write for men who must attain the same comfort in a shirt of a perfectly independent description, trousers, oftenest, that have seen service as tights, and show a fresher dye in the seams, a hat, price twenty-five cents (by the dozen), and shoes of a remediless capriciousness of outline.

I acknowledge that such a costume is a liberty with daylight, which should only be taken within one's own fence, and that it is a misfortune to be surprised in it by a stranger, even there. But I wish to impress upon those to whom this letter is addressed, the obligations of country neighborhood as to dress and table, and the expediency of securing the degree of liberty which may be desired, by a barrier of distance. Sociable country neighbors, as I said before, are a luxury, but they are certainly an expensive one. Judging by data within my reach, I should say that a man who could live for fifteen hundred dollars a year, within a mile of a sociable village, could have the same personal comforts at ten miles distance for half the money. He numbers, say fifteen families, in his acquaintance, and of course pays at the rate of fifty dollars a family for their gratification. Now it is a question whether you would not rather have the money in board fence or Berkshire hogs. You may like society, and yet not like it at such a high price. Or (but this would lead me to another subject) you may prefer society in a lump; and with a house full of friends in the months of June and July, live in contemplative and economical solitude the remainder of the year. And this latter plan I take the liberty to recommend more particularly, to students and authors.

"Touching 'grounds.'" The first impulses of taste are dangerous to follow, no less from their blindness to unforeseen combinations, than from their expensiveness. In placing your house as far from the public road as possible (and a considerable distance from dust and intrusion, seems at first a sine qua non) you entail upon yourself a very costly appendage in the shape of a private road, which of course must be nicely gravelled and nicely kept. A walk or drive, within your gate, which is not hard and free from weeds, is as objectionable as an untidy white dress upon a lady, and as she would be better clad in russet, your road were better covered with grass. I may as well say that a hundred yards of gravel-walk, properly "scored," weeded, and rolled, will cost five dollars a month—a man's labor reckoned at the present usage. Now no person for whom this letter is written can afford to keep more than one man servant for "chores." A hundred yards of gravel-walk, therefore, employing half his time, you can easily calculate the distribution of the remainder, upon the flower-garden, kitchen-garden, wood-shed, stable, and piggery. (The female "help" should milk, if I died for it!) My own opinion is, that fifty yards from the road is far enough, and twenty a more prudent distance, though, in the latter case, an impervious screen of shrubbery along your outer fence is indispensable.

The matter of gravel-walks embraces several points of rural comfort, and, to do without them, you must have no young ladies in your acquaintance, and, especially, no young gentlemen from the cities. It may not have occurred to you in your sidewalk life, that the dew falls in the country with tolerable regularity; and that, from sundown to ten in the forenoon, you are as much insulated in a cottage surrounded with high grass, as on a rock surrounded with forty fathom water—shod à la mode, I mean. People talk of being "pent up in a city" with perhaps twenty miles of flagged sidewalk extending from their doorstep! They are apt to draw a contrast, favorable to the liberty of cities, however, if they come thinly shod to the country, and must either wade in the grass or stumble through the ruts of a dusty road. If you wish to see bodies acted on by an "exhausted receiver" (giving out their "airs" of course), shut up your young city friends in a country cottage, by the compulsion of wet grass and muddy highways. Better gravel your whole farm, you say. But having reduced you to this point of horror, you are prepared to listen without contempt, while I suggest two humble succedanea.

First: On receiving intimation of a probable visit from a city friend, write by return of post for the size of her foot (or his). Provide immediately a pair of India-rubber shoes of the corresponding number, and on the morning after your friend's arrival, be ready with them at the first horrified withdrawal of the damp foot from the grass. Your shoes may cost you a dollar a pair, but if your visitors are not more than ten or twelve in the season, it is a saving of fifty per cent., at least in gravelling and weeding.

Or, Second: Enclose the two or three acres immediately about your house with a ring fence, and pasture within it a small flock of sheep. They are clean and picturesque (your dog should be taught to keep them from the doors and porticoes), and by feeding down the grass to a continual greensward, they give the dew a chance to dry off early and enlarge your cottage "liberties" to the extent of their browsings.

I may as well add, by the way, that a walk with the sod simply taken off, is, in this climate, dry enough, except for an hour or two after a heavy rain; and besides the original saving in gravel, it is kept clean with a quarter of the trouble. A weed imbedded in stones is a much more obstinate customer than a score of them sliced from the smooth ground. At any rate, out with them! A neglected walk indicates that worst of country diseases, a mind grown slovenly and slip-slop! Your house may go unpainted, and your dress (with one exception) submit to the course of events—but be scrupulous in the whiteness of your linen, tenacious of the neatness of your gravel-walks; and, while these points hold, you are at a redeemable remove from the lapse (fatally prone and easy), into barbarianism and misanthropy.

Before I enter upon the cultivation of grounds, let me lay before the reader my favorite idea of a cottage—not a cottage ornée but a cottage insoucieuse, if I may coin a phrase. In the valley of Sweet Waters, on the banks of the Barbyzes, there stands a small pleasure palace of the sultan, which looks as if it was dropped into the green lap of nature, like a jewel-case on a birth-day, with neither preparation on the part of the bestower, nor disturbance on the part of the receiver. From the balcony's foot on every side extends an unbroken sod to the horizon. Gigantic trees shadow the grass here and there, and an enormous marble vase, carved in imitation of a sea-shell, turns the silver Barbyzes in a curious cascade over its lip; but else, it is all Nature's lap, with its bumble resting in velvet—no gardens, no fences, no walls, no shrubberies—a beautiful valley with the sky resting on its rim, and nothing in it save one fairy palace. The simplicity of the thing enchanted me, and, in all my yearnings after rural seclusion, this vision of old travel has, more or less, colored my fancy. You see what I mean, with half an eye. Gardens are beautiful, shrubberies ornamental, summer-houses and alleys, and gravelled paths, all delightful—but they are, each and all, taxes—heavy taxes on mind, time, and "dollar." Perhaps you like them. Perhaps you want the occupation. But some men, of small means, like a contemplative idleness in the country. Some men's time never hangs heavily under a tree. Some men like to lock their doors (or to be at liberty to do so), and be gone for a month, without dread of gardens plundered, flowers trod down, shrubs browsed off by cattle. Some men like nothing out of doors but that which can take care of itself—the side of a house or a forest-tree, or an old horse in a pasture. These men, too, like that which is beautiful, and for such I draw this picture of the cottage insoucieuse. What more simply elegant than a pretty structure in the lap of a green dell! What more convenient! What so economical! Sheep (we may "return to muttons") are cheaper "help" than men, and if they do not keep your greensward so brightly mown, they crop it faithfully and turn the crop to better account. The only rule of perfect independence in the country is to make no "improvement" which requires more attention than the making. So—you are at liberty to take your wife to the springs. So—you can join a coterie at Niagara at a letter's warning. So—you can spend a winter in Italy without leaving half your income to servants who keep house at home. So—you can sleep without dread of hail-storms on your grapes or green-houses, without blunderbuss for depredators of fruit, without distress at slugs, cut-worms, drought, or breachy cattle. Nature is prodigal of flowers, grapes are cheaper bought than raised, fruit idem, butter idem (though you mayn't think so), and as for amusement—the man who can not find it between driving, fishing, shooting, strolling, and reading (to say nothing of less selfish pleasures), has no business in the country. He should go back to town.

We have a pleasant and welcome correspondent who signs himself "N. P. Willis," and we have a treasured and admired friend known to the world as Richard H. Dana—and they are two different persons. We must beg our friend of the three disembodied initials to give way to the embodied three of the poet, though, as we well know, the three first letters of a man's name may be as momentous to him as the three legs to the "moving tripods" seen in the Indian temples by Apollonius. His miracle may be in them! We ourselves have been un-phoenixed of late (we thought there was but one of our kind!) by the discovery that there was another N. P. Willis—(not a quill-pincher, we are pleased to understand).

"Florian" wishes us to "draw the portrait of a man fitted by nature to be an editor." A model editor would be very difficult to describe, but among other things, he should answer to the description given in the sporting books of the dunghill cock: "The best cocks should be close hitters, deadly heelers, steady fighters, good mouthers, and come to every point."

The poem sent us without a signature, "on a lady with a sweet breath," implies rather too close quarters for print. Poetry for these days must be at arms' length. The new epithet "pimento breath" ought not to be lost, however—quite the spiciest new word that has lately been rolled under our tongue. It never occurred to us before that there was one word to express cinnamon, nutmegs, and cloves. We wish we could manufacture more of these single triplicates. Does our nameless correspondent know, by the way, that bad breath in Prussia is good ground for divorce? We recommend him to write a parody on "Knowst thou the land," &c.

The Boston papers are glorifying (as was to be expected) the new volume of poems by Russell Lowell. We wish for a sight of it, for we are his self-elected trumpeter, and haste to know the key for a new blast. By the way, we have taken the liberty (as the immortality he is bound for is a long race) to drop the eumbrance of James from his musical name, and hereafter we shall economize breath, type, and harmony, by calling him RUSSELL LOWELL.

An editor is not supposed (as the world and subscribers to newspapers know) to require or possess the luxury of sleep. We sleep with one eye open—we scorn to deny. We see all that is going on about us, daylight or dark, and Washington being the fountain of law, order, and information, we duly give the alarm—like the geese who saved the capitol. Our readers have, from week to week, read our lucubrations in this wise, and here are some more of them. We send them forth as daguerreotypes of the present—sent as records of matters as they fly. We think they are worth preserving bodily—and we so preserve them.

The first day of '44 came in like a specimen number of a magazine, and the open doors of New York had at least one unexpected visitor in a veritable October sun. The day was mild enough to make overcoats uncomfortable in walking—the pavement was dry and summery—and all the male world seemed abroad. The household gods of Manhattan were probably unanimous in their happiness—as all the ladies were “at home,” and all the ladies’ lords were bound to be “out.” This morning the weather is still softer—October, possibly, like other popular persons, not finding one day to suffice for its visits.

I have a headache on the top of my pen, and can not venture any further description of new-year’s day than the above facts, though yesterday I thought I could make you a tip-top gossip letter out of the day’s hilarities. The hosts of the Astor wound up the excitement for their guests by a superb dinner at candlelight, with champagne and sweetmeats “à discretion,” and altogether, I think January one must be marked with a white stone.

You have read, of course, and loved (much more, of course) Leigh Hunt’s poem of The Rimini. Ticknor & Co., of Boston, have republished it in one of their beautiful boudoir editions, and along with it, in the same neat volume, the half dozen other poems, most famed, of Hunt’s prolific pen. The story (of the lady who married one brother and loved the other) is told with a sort of entire newness of style and language, as if it were the one admirable work of a natural but unpractised poet, and it sticks to the memory after it is read like Moore’s rose-scent to the vase. Leigh Hunt is a born poet, but one of the most unhappy citizens of the world that the world holds. With all the mental capabilities (the wit, the delicacy, the imagination, and the desire) to be the carpet-poet of aristocracy that Moore is, he has a most wo-begone person, and a most marvellous lack of tact and reliability. He never can stay acquainted with the only people who, by refinement and talent, are alone capable of making friendship comfortable to him; and he has quarrelled with most other of his great contemporaries, as he did with Byron. And, by the way, he is dead—by epigram! Moore’s felicitously-witty verses on Hunt’s Life of Byron killed him quite out of contemporary respect. The ludicrous image of the puppy-dog desecrating the body of the dead lion follows him into every drawing-room and walks behind him in every street. He will never recover from that epigram. Indeed, he has never been like himself since it was written. It is the most signal extinction of a great genius by ridicule that I know of on record—more enduring, from the fact that the English, among their other conservative peculiarities, have none of our marvellous alacrity at public forgetting. Had Leigh Hunt been born with a little thicker skin, somewhat a cooler head, and the inestimable power of catching the snowballs of ridicule in his bosom, and keeping them there till they could be thrown back hardened into ice, he might have been something between Fonblanque and Moore, Thiers and Janin, and equal at least to either of these powerful “penditti.” As it is, he is uncomfortably poor, and more uncomfortably un-complacent. With two lines, very Leigh-Huntish, I cut my paragraph short. He is describing Apollo’s revelry while resolving upon the Feast of the Poets:—

“‘I think,’ said the god, recollecting (and then
He fell twiddling a sunbeam as I would a pen),”

A very superb book of drawings is being subscribed for in New York—“Forty Atmospheric Views of American Scenery,” from water-color drawings by George Harvey. The engravings are to be in aquatint, and to be beautifully and artistically colored, so as closely to resemble the original designs. The views consist of different atmospheric effects at different times of day, beginning at daybreak and ending at midnight—each view a complete landscape, and the subjects emblematic of the progress of civilization, from the log-cabin to the highest achievement in architecture. Mr. Harvey is one of the leading artists of the new water-color school, and this will probably be the most superb work of its kind ever published. A letter from Washington Allston to Mr. Harvey says:—

“I am unwilling that you should leave Boston without knowing how much I have been gratified by your beautiful drawings of American scenery. To me it appears that you have not only been successful in giving the character of our scenery, but remarkably happy in clothing it with an American atmosphere, which you have expressed with great truth and variety.”

By the thermometer, the winter has commenced this day, the 5th of January. People pass under my window with their backs shrugged up to their bump of philoprogenitiveness, and even the coats of the hard-working omnibus horses “stare”—as the jockeys say. I wish the physiologists would explain why horses’ coats do not lie closer when it is cold, and why men, with the same sensation, raise their arms instinctively from their sides. Cats and dogs seem to economize their bodily heat better—lying down when cold in such an attitude as to expose as little surface to the air as possible.

Our thoughts are entirely occupied this morning with two poets. It must be a pleasant book that we take for company the first hour after waking, and to-day, with his new volume of poems open on our dressing-table, we dressed and read LOWELL. Thence he went with us to a tête-à-tête breakfast (for we chanced, else, to be breakfasting alone), and we were reading him with a cup of coffee in one hand and his book in the other, when the letters came in from the post—and one letter was from a poet new-plumaged, of whom we had never heard, and who had probably never heard of himself (as a poet), but still indubita-bly a poet—albeit “an apprentice-boy in a printing office” in a small village in Pennsylvania. We read his timid letter and two sweet pieces of poetry enclosed within it, marked the poetry “good” for the Mirror, and then reverted to our breakfast and book. But, so early in the morning, a little reading is enough for a brainful of thought, and from pondering on Lowell’s “Shepherd King of Admetus,” we fell to thinking over the probable position and destiny of these two poets.

Lowell is the best-launched poet of his time, and the defect of his poetry is an advantage to his go-along-ery. He is stern and strong enough to “take the wall” of Envy and Misfortune, but not yielding and soft enough to bend to the unconscious and impulsive abandonments of love. Love with him is sound sense, not beautiful madness. He is too bold and abstract for the “levia affectuum vestigia Gracilesque sensus lineas;”

and, if he knows, he has a contempt for, the “quibus

Vehantur alis blanduli Cupidines.”

The way Lowell handles the word love makes one start like seeing Rolla pick up Cora’s baby with one hand. The fact is, he is a strong-minded, tough-sinewed, defying poet, fit to be a martyr to opinion or a partisan soldier, and if his love be not an excellent lamp not yet lighted (which is possible), he has never experienced its first timidity, nor is he likely to know its ultimate phrensy and prodigality. He has drawn his own portrait, however, in a “Sonnet written on his Twenty-fourth Birthday,” and let us read his character from it:—

“Now have I quite passed by that cloudy If
That darkened the wild hope of boyish days,
When first I launched my slender-sided skiff
Upon the wide sea’s dim, unsounded ways;
Now doth Love’s sun my soul with splendor fill,
And hope hath struggled upward unto Power;
Soft Wish is hardened into sinewy Will,
And longing unto certainty doth tower;
The love of beauty knoweth no despair:
My heart would break if—”

What should you think would naturally follow this “if,” dear reader? He is twenty-four—in the full tide of blood and youth, and “Love’s sun has filled his soul with splendor.” In building up a climax of his feelings at this impetuous and passionate age, what should you fancy would rush up to crown it like flame to a volcano? What would his “heart break” for at passionate twenty-four?

“if” I should dare to doubt
That from the wrong, which makes its dragon’s lair
Here on the Earth, fair Truth shall wander out
Teaching mankind that Freedom’s held in fee
Only by those who labor to set free.”

In another poem on “Love,” he describes “true love” as “A love that doth not kneel for what it seeks,

But faces Truth and Beauty as their peer,
Showing its worthiness of noble thoughts
By clear sense of inward nobleness:
A love that in its object findeth not
All grace and beauty, and enough to satisfy
Its thirst of blessing, but, in all of good
Found there, it sees but heaven-granted types
Of good and beauty in the soul of man,
And traces in the simplest heart that beats
A family-likeness to its chosen one
That claims of it the rights of brotherhood.”

This is a cold description of “true love,” and it is not half so warm as the “love” which Lowell exhibits in his preface, for his friend William Page. Compare the above description, in poetry, of true love for a woman, with the following confession, in prose, of love for a man:—

“My dear friend: The love between us, which can now look back upon happy years of still enlarging confidence, and forward with a sure trust in its own prophecy of yet deeper and tenderer sympathies, as long as life shall remain to us, stands in no need, I am well aware, of so poor a voucher as an Epistle Dedicatory. True, it is one of love’s chiefest charms that it must still take special pains to be superfluous in seeking out ways to declare itself—but for these it demands no publicity and wishes no acknowledgment. But the admiration which one soul feels for another loses half its worth, if it slip any opportunity of making itself heard and felt,” etc.

Lowell is one kind of poet, and it is the worst manner of criticism to tell what a poet is not, except more clearly to define what he is. Though his sexual heart never swims in his inkstand, he is warm enough in his enthusiasm for all generous sentiments, and both daring and delicate enough in his powers of imagination. Truth, good sense, and fancy, were seldom more evenly braided together than in his poem of “The Heritage,” and Rosaline (though it never could have been conceived by a man who had passionately loved) is the very finest cobweb of fancy. Nobody could help loving the truth, honesty, fearlessness, and energy, stamped on all his poetry, and, as we said before, he has the “vim” to carve out for himself any destiny he pleases. He has determined to live by literature, but we do not believe he will long remain a poet only. He will wish to take the world by the beard in some closer clutch than poetry gives room for, and his good judgment as to the weight of heavy English words, will try itself before long on more serious matter than sonnets. At least, that is what we think while admiring him over our breakfast.

As to the other poet, Bayard Taylor, we had a great deal to say to him—sympathy, encouragement, promise of watchfulness over his fame, etc., etc. But he will need no special kindness yet awhile. Love is plenty for new-found poets. Many people love little chickens who are insensible to the merits of cocks and hens, and we reserve our friendship till he is matured and envied. Meantime, if he wants our opinion that he is a poet, and can be, with toil and study—immortal—he has it. His poetry is already worthy of long preserving—apprentice-boy though he be.

I had quite a summery trip to Philadelphia on the second day of the new year, sitting at the open window of the railcar and snuffing the fragrance of the soft, sun-warmed fields with as good comfort as I ever found in April. But for the rudeness and incivility of all the underlings employed upon the line (and I am too old a traveller, and was in too sunny a humor, to find fault unnecessarily), I should have given the clerk of happiness credit for five hours “bankable” satisfaction. It tells ill for the manners of the “Directors of the Philadelphia and New York Railroad Line,” that their servants are habitually insolent and profane—servants being usually what their masters look on without reproof.

Philadelphia makes an impression of great order, comfort, and elegance, upon a stranger, and there is no city in the country where I like better to “loiter by the way.” Not feeling very “gregarious” the day I was there, and having heard much mention of Sanderson’s restaurant—(moreover, having found a new book at Lea & Blanchard’s, a look into which promised excellent dinner-company)—I left my hotel and dined à la Française—I and my new book. I never had a more capital dinner in France than this impromptu one at Sanderson’s, and I wish the book had been American as well as the dinner—for the glory it is to the country that produced it. It was to me much more enchanting and captivating than a novel, yet the subject was, "The Education of Mothers, or the Civilization of Mankind"—a subject you would naturally expect to find treated with somewhat trite morality. This work, however (which gained the prize offered by the French Academy), is written with complete novelty and freshness, and—to define it in a way that every thinking man will comprehend—it is a most delightfully suggestive book—full of thoughts and sentences that make you stop and close the volume till you have fed awhile on what they convey to you. If this book were properly presented to the appreciation of the public, it would circulate widely on the two levels of amusement and instruction, and be as delightful in one field as it would be eminently useful in the other. I commend it to every one who is in want of enjoyable reading. The motto, by-the-way, is that true sentiment from Rousseau: "Les hommes seront toujours ce qu'il plaira aux femmes. Si vous voulez qu'ils deviennent grands et vertueux, apprenez aux femmes ce que c'est que grandeur et vertu."

The New Mirror has published No. 3 of what a morning paper calls "aristocratic shilling literature," an extra containing "The Lady Jane, and other Humorous Poems," by N. P. Willis. The Lady Jane is a daguerreotype sketch of the London literary society in which Moore, Bulwer, D'Israeli, Proctor, and others of that class habitually live, and it is, at least, done with the utmost labor time of the author. Byron, in a manner, monopolized the Don Juan stanza (in which this poem is written), and no one could now attempt the stanza, however different the story and style of thought, without being criticised inevitably as an imitator. Still, it is the only stanza susceptible, to any high degree, of mingled pathos and humor, philosophy and fun, and it is likely to be used for such purposes until the monopoly is lost sight of—a hundred years hence. There is a great deal in "The Lady Jane" which is truer and newer than most sketches of society published in books of travel—a great deal that could only be told in such a poem, or in the rattle of familiar gossip.

I met just now, in the corridor of the Astor, Captain Chadwick, of the London packet-ship Wellington, just arrived in twenty-two days from England. At this season of the year, and up-hill (as the sailors call it, westerly winds always predominating on the Atlantic), this is a remarkable passage, and could only have been made by a fine ship, well sailed. I have made two remarkably short passages across the water with Captain Chadwick, and a more agreeable companion, or a better "skipper," I believe, never tightened a halliard. He is one of those happy men famous for "good luck," which commonly means, "taking good care." This is the ship on board of which the duke of Wellington made a speech (at a breakfast given to him by the captain) very complimentary to America and Americans.

There is a considerable outbreak lately in the way of equipages in New York. Several four-horse vehicles have made their appearance, driven by the young men who own them. I have noticed also a new curricie in beautiful taste (driven with a steel bar over the horses' backs), and a tilbury with two servants in livery, one on the seat with his master, and another on horseback, following as an outrider. We are to have a masked ball this evening, and a steeple-chase is to come off on the twentieth (Viscount Bertrand one of the riders, and each competitor entering a thousand-dollar stake for the winner). I shall be at the ball, not at the steeple-chase—for a horse must have iron legs to run over frozen ploughed fields, and a man must have less use for his life than I, who would risk a fall upon a surface like broken stones. The viscount has won several steeple-chases in England, and has had some rough riding after the Arabs in Algiers—so I would bet on him, unless there happened to be a fox-hunting Irishman among the competitors. There are six riders, I understand, and one of them will win six thousand dollars, of course, and probably six horses will be ruined, and one or two necks broken. Fortunately, there is a superfluity of horses and young men.

The story goes that "there is a skeleton in every man's closet," and there is, of course (in a country as independent as ours is of les prestiges), a phantom following every man who is conspicuous, and pointing at his drawback. The drawback to any elaborate novelty of luxury is at once read legibly in Broadway. Seeing a new and very costly equipage in England, you merely know that the owner had money enough to buy it. The contrivance of it, the fitting of the harness, the matching and breaking in of the horses, are matters attended to by those who make these details their profession. The turn-out is brought perfect to the owner's door, and he pays, simply, money for it. In this country, on the contrary, the purchaser and driver of such a vehicle pays for it money, contrivance, constant thought, and almost his entire attention. The classes are yet wanting who purvey for luxuries out of the ordinary course. There is no head-groom whose business it is to save his master from all thought and trouble as to his turn-out. The New York "Glaucus" must go every day for a month to the coachmaker's, to superintend the finishing of his new "drag." He must hurry his breakfast to go to the stable to look after his irresponsible grooms. He spends hours at the harness-maker's. He racks his thought to contrive compact working-room for his wheelers, and get the right pull on his leaders. He becomes learned in harness-blackening and wheel-grease, horse-shoes and horse-physic, and, in short, entirely occupies what philosophers are pleased to call "an immortal mind" in the one matter of a vehicle to drive. (He could be conveyed, of course, the same distance each day in an omnibus for sixpence—but he does not believe the old satire of "aliquis in omnibus, nihil in singulis." Quite the contrary!) A man who is not content, in this country, to be provided for with the masses, and like the masses, becomes his own provider—like a man who, to have a coat different from other people, should make it himself, and, of course, be little except an amateur tailor. We shall have these supplementary links of society in time. There will be, doubtless, the class of thought-savers. But, until then, the same amount of thought that would serve a constituency in Congress, will be employed in keeping a "slap-up turn-out," and rich young men will at least have the credit of choosing between stable knowledge and legislative ambition.

I had thought that the revenue which foreign theatres derive from selling to young men, at large prices, keys for the season to the behind-scenes, and the society of the goddesses of the ballet while off the stage, was not yet discovered in this country. The following paragraph, from the True Sun, would seem to show that the courtisanes are visited for their society, at least, and might be made "to pay :—"

"Among the cases which are set down for trial next term, is one which will lift the curtain which conceals the affairs of a certain cheap theatre in this city, and give the public a bird's-eye view of what has been recently going on behind the scenes. The developments, if not prevented by an amicable arrangement, will be rich and rare—showing the procedure by which a luminary of the law has run out of his orbit, displacing, in his new and erratic course, a luminary of literature!"

The fine writing of this paragraph, by-the-way, is rather piquant.

The belle of the Olympic, pretty Miss Taylor, could scarce have a better advertisement for attraction than a paragraph which announces that she "has been robbed of six hundred dollars worth of jewelry," and that "MANY heavy articles of plate, rich dresses, &c., were LEFT UNDISTURBED!" I am inclined to think that this is a covert puff from Mitchell's genius—for he is a genius, and quite capable of knowing that everybody will go to have a look at an actress who had "six hundred dollars' worth of jewelry and many heavy articles of plate left undisturbed!" People, like pictures, are made to "stand out" by a well-contrived background! Ah, you bright fellow, Mitchell!

The event ahead which has the most rose-colored promise, just now, is the ANNUAL BALL of the CITY GUARD—to be given at Niblo's on the twenty-fourth. Niblo's finely-proportioned hall has been, for some time, undergoing a transformation into a model of the ancient Alhambra for the purpose, and Smith, the excellent scene-painter of the Park, and a troop of decorators and upholsterers under his direction, are doing all that taste and money can do to conjure up a scene of enchantment "for one night only." The supper is to make the gods hungry and envious on Olympus—so sumptuous, they say, are the preparations. The City Guard, as you may know, is what the English army-men call the "crack corps" of New York. The probability is, that its members represent more spirit, style, and character, than belong to any other combination of young men in the state. They have a great deal of fashion, as well as esprit du corps, and, what with their superb uniform, upish carriage, superior discipline, and high-spirited union of purpose, they constitute a power of no little weight and consideration. Their ball will probably be the most showy festivity of the season.

The masked ball which comes off to-night is, I am told, got up by a party of literary ladies, to promote ease in conversation! I can hardly fancy anything more easy than the "freedoms of the press," and, I am told, most of the gentlemen of the press are invited, myself among the number. A man is a block, of course, who is not open to improvement.

I went to the masked ball without any very clear idea of who were its purposers, or what were its purposes. I found to my surprise that it was the celebration of the opening of the LADIES' CLUB in the upper part of Broadway. A fine house has been taken and furnished, and the reading-room goes immediately into operation, I understand. Like the frolic they gave (in some country of which I have read and desire to know more) to the nuns before taking the irrevocable veil, the carpets were taken up and music and men introduced to make the gynocastic seclusion hereafter more marked and positive.

Being "an early man," I stayed but an hour, listening to the band and looking on; but I saw beauty there which might make one almost envy the newspapers that are to be perused by a "club" of such, and a general air enjoué more lovely than literary. The masks were few, and the fun of them was quite destroyed by the fact that every one seemed to know who they were. Indeed, the pleasure of reputable masking lies in the momentary breaking down of barriers that in this country do not exist—in giving low degree and high degree a chance to converse freely, that is to say—and till we have unapproachable lords and princes, and ladies weary of the thin upper air of exclusiveness, masquerading will be dull work to us. At present the mask makes rather than removes an obstacle to intercourse. Anybody who is there in a mask, would be just as glad to see you tête-à-tête by daylight, the next morning in her parlor, as to chat with you through pasteboard and black crape. Most of the ladies at this literary ball were in fancy dresses, however, and doubtless with their pastoral attractions displayed to the best advantage; and this part of it was commendable. If women knew what was attractive, I think they would make every ball a "fancy ball." "Medora" jackets and "Sultana" trousers are choses entraînantes.

I think you would agree with me, after reading it, that BRANTZ MAYER's work on Mexico, recently published, is as agreeably spiced with wit, humor, and other pleasant metal pimento, as any book of travels written within new-book memory. I have run through it within a day or two with some suspense, as well as great amusement—for so racy and sketchy a power of description should be in the corps of professed, not amateur authors. His descriptions of the outer features of Mexican life, of Mexican character, Mexican women, beggars, priests, and gamblers, are admirably spirited and entertaining. There is also a good deal of statistical matter industriously and carefully got together, and the publisher has done justice to it all in the printing and getting up. There will be elaborate reviews of it elsewhere; but meantime I express my pleasurable surprise and admiration in a paragraph—commending it for the purchase of readers.

The fourth extra of the New Mirror has appeared, embodying Morris's popular songs and melodies, which have heretofore only been published with music, or in a very expensive embellished edition of his works. The hundred thousand lovers of married poetry (music the wife, or husband, I don't know which) will be glad to get these "winged words" in a lump for a shilling. Morris's popularity will send this extra to every corner of the land.

The betting upon the riders in the proposed hurdle-race (not steeple-chase, as I mentioned before) goes on vigorously. I rather doubt, however, whether it will ultimately come off. There was a steeple-chase got up on Long Island, last year, in which an Irishman and an Englishman, whose fames had followed them, as great hunters, were the competitors, and after getting over two fences by pushing them down with their horses' breasts, they got imprisoned in a clover-lot, from which they were extricated with great difficulty by the owner's letting down the bars and leading the horses over! There is a compact, jockey-built American among the competitors, who has great skill as a horseman, and should there be snow on the ground, his light weight and superior practice will win the race for him without a doubt. The Viscount Bertrand, though doubtless the boldest of riders, is over six feet high, and a heavy man.

THE STATISTICS OF PUFFING.—We have been induced lately to look a little into the meum and tuum of puffing—partly from having been untruly (qu. prematurely?) accused of “receiving consideration for the same,” but more to see whether the consideration were worth the having, in case conscience (“John Tetzel, vender of indulgences,” being dead) could be brought to countenance it. We pique ourselves on looking things in the face, and having and allowing as few concealments as possible—so, first, for a clean breast on the subject—say up to January 1, 1844.

We are not particular, as “Mrs. Grundy” knows, as to the subject we write upon, nor the harness in which we are put to work, nor the style, rhythm, or rhyme, we are called upon to write in. We go altogether for metallic magnetism. It is our duty (on our way to Heaven) to try for a “plum”—in other words, to be “diligent in business.” We write what in our judgment is best calculated to sell. But, in the course of this policy, it falls in our way to speak of things to eat, and things to wear—very capable topics, both, as to piquancy and interest. We have had occasion to describe glowingly FLORENCE’S crustaceous cave, and the ice-cream ALHAMBRA, and to pronounce CARPENTER the ne plus ultra of coat-builders, and JENNINGS’S the emporium of “bang-up” toggery, and for these and similar serviceable “first-rate notices,” we have, in no shape,* received “consideration.” The gentlemen who have said so (“the hawks” who would “pick out hawks’ een”) will please make an early meal of their little fictions.

As to literary puffs, we would as soon sell our tears for lemon-drops, as to defile one of God’s truthful adjectives with a price for the using it. We never asked for a literary puff in our life, nor made interest for it in any shape, nor would we sell one for the great emerald Sakhrul. But if we love a man (as we do many, thank God, whom we are called upon to criticise), we pick out the gold that is inlaid in his book, and leave to his enemies to find the brass and tinsel. And if that’s not fair, we don’t very much care—for we scorn to be impartial.

But let us hop off this high horse, and come down to the trade part of it once more.

In England, all influences that aid business are priced and paid. The puffs of new books in the newspapers are invariably sent, ready-written, by the publishers, and paid for at a much higher price than avowed advertisements. The continued effect of this abuse of the public ear is based upon the phlegmatic dulness of perception in the English public, and their consequent chronic humbuggability. It could never “answer” in our country after being once fairly exposed. It is, to a certain degree, practised, however—as is pay for concert-puffing, music-puffing, theatrical-puffing, etc.

Having confessed that we are willing to admit an entering wedge of iniquity in this line—in other words, that we are willing to know whether it be honest to serve a man and contemplate his thanks in lucre—let us “run the line,” as the surveyors say, and see how our new territory of tribute may be virtuously bounded.

Authors have “the freedom” of us, of course. They are welcome to all we can do for them—if they publish on their own account. Actors, singers, and painters, are “chartered libertines” for whom we have a weakness; and, besides, we can not feed on the wages of pleasure-makers. All other pursuits, trades, professions, we are half inclined to admit, will be at liberty to make us such acknowledgments as they choose for any furtherance to their merchandise (in bales or brains) which may come legitimately in our way. We shall, in any case, preserve the value of our commendation by keeping it honest, and we shall never commend any farther than is entertaining and readable—but there is a choice between subjects to write about, and a preference as to giving attention to things about town, and it is for this choice and preference that we may make up our mind to be susceptible of corruption. We write this in the cool of the morning. We don’t know what we shall think in the more impulsive hours. Meantime—send it to the printer, and see what the governor says of it in the proof-sheet.

A few gentlemen (Mr. Philip Hone apparently the mover of the project) have combined to raise a subscription for the purchase of Clevenger’s statue of a North American Indian. The circular addresses the business-men of the city, and the statue, if purchased, will be presented to the Mercantile Library Association. Three thousand dollars is the sum fixed upon, five hundred of which are to be appropriated to the immediate relief of Mrs. Clevenger and her children. It would strike, perhaps, even some of the subscribers to this fund with surprise to tell them that the statue they are to purchase is possibly still lying unquarried in the mountains of Carrara. Clevenger is dead, but his genius stands pointing its finger to a rude block of marble, in which lies, unseen, a complete and immortal statue, waiting only for the chisel of mechanical workmen to remove the rough stone that encumbers it. That finger is seen and obeyed three thousand miles away (by the committee with Mr. Philip Hone at its head), and the reluctant money will be forthcoming and on its way to Italy in a month, and the statue will be found and finished, imported, and exhibited at Clinton Hall! (Plain matter-of-fact, all this, and yet it sounds very like poetry!) I was told by Thorwaldsen, when at Rome, that there were several of his statues he had never seen. They were finished, as far as he was concerned, when they were moulded in clay. They were then cast in plaster by the mechanics who make a trade of it, and the plaster models were sent to Carrara, where there is a large village of copyists in marble living near the marble quarries. From Carrara the statues were sent, when finished, to Copenhagen, their ultimate destination, and Thorwaldsen, on his subsequent visit to his native country, saw them for the first time. The cost of delivering Clevenger’s statue from the womb of the mountain impregnated by his genius will be about one thousand dollars—a round fee for the accouchement of the stony mother of “a North American Indian!”

Burns’s Letters to Clarinda have disappointed many people, who expected, naturally, to find a poet’s love-letters better written than another man’s. I think the contrary would naturally be true. Fine writing is an arm’s-length dexterity, and the heart works only at close quarters. I should suspect the sincerity of a poet’s love-letter if it were not far within his habitual tact and grace. Besides, in strong emotion, the heart flies from the much-used channels of language, and tries for something newer to its own ear, and, while an ordinary man would find this novelty in poetical language, a poet would seek to roughen, and simplify.

and break up the habitual art and melody of his periods. By-the-way, the name of Burns reminds me of a little anecdote I heard told with some humor by Campbell, at a dinner-party in London. Count D'Orsay and Barry Cornwall were present, and they were drawing out the veteran bard as to his recollections of the great men who were setting stars when he was rising. "I was dining one day with Burns," said Campbell, "who, like Dr. Johnson and other celebrities, had his Bozzy worshipper, a friend who was always in his company. I have forgotten his name. Burns left the room for a moment, and passing the bottle to his friend, I proposed to drink the health of Mr. Burns. He gave me a look of annihilation. 'Sir,' said he, 'you will always be known as Mr. Campbell, but posterity will talk of Burns!'" Such an anecdote makes one look around in alarm, to see if there are not some unrecognised mononoms in our time, whom we are profaning, unaware, with our Mister-y.

It rains in Broadway—as it has often done before, it is true; but it seems to me a particularly wet rain, for there is an old black beggar standing in front of St. Paul's, holding out his hat for what must be, at any rate, a diluted charity. At a fair calculation (and I have watched him while writing, for the last two hours), every tenth passenger put something into his hat. His gray wool must hold more water than his leaky hat, and, at least, it acts like a sponge—on the passers-by. Begging, as yet, is a good trade in America, and I think that New York, particularly, is a place where money has little adhesiveness—easily made and readily given away.

I have noticed in history and real life that reformers, great enthusiasts, and great philosophers, produce effects quite commensurate with their ambitions, but seldom by success in the exact line they had marked out. Providence does not allow "steam" to be wasted. In the search after the "elixir of life," and the "philosopher's stone," for example, the alchemists have stumbled over some of the most important discoveries of chemistry. This is rather an essayish beginning to a hasty-pudding letter, but I have been looking over Brisbane's book on Fourierism, while eating my breakfast, and it struck me how poorly the direct objects of "socialism" succeeded, while combination, to produce great and small results, seems to me to be the most prominent novelty in the features of the time. Mercantile houses are establishing partners in all the principal capitals—new publications are circulated almost wholly by a lately-arranged system of combined agencies—information, formerly got by individual reading, is now fed out to large societies; and the rumor just now is, of a grand experiment of combining all the qualities of half a dozen newspapers in one—establishing something like the London Times, for instance, in which the subscriber would be sure to find everything that is going."

I went on Wednesday evening to the temperance tea-party, at Washington Hall, given in honor of the birthday of Franklin. Here was combination again—tea-party, prayer-meeting, lecture, concert, promenade, and tableau vivant (a printing-press worked in the room), all given in one entertainment. There were seven or eight long tables, with alleys between, and from a thousand to twelve hundred ladies and gentlemen seated "at tea," and listening to the singing, praying, instrumental music, and speech-making, with a great appearance of comfort. I did not stay for the "promenade all round," but I am told that it was very agreeable, and that the party did not separate till two in the morning! The temperance combination has been a great lesson as to the power of numbers united for one end; though I fear the action of it has been somewhat like the momentary sweeping dry of a river's channel by a whirlwind, so strikingly seems intemperance, of late, to have resumed its prevalence in the streets.

I find that, by my hasty observations on New York society in a late letter, I have given voice to a feeling that has been for some time in petto publico, and I have heard since a great deal of discussion of the quality of New York gayety. It seems to be the opinion of good observers, that the best elements of society are not organized. The intellect and refinement of the population (of which there is quite enough for a fair proportion) lies "around in spots," it is thought, waiting only for some female Napoleon to concentrate and combine them. Exclusively literary parties would be as unattractive as exclusively dancing or juvenile parties, and indeed variety is the spice of agreeable social intercourse. In London, beauty is, with great pains, dug out from the mine of unfashionable regions, and made to shine in an aristocratic setting; and talent of all kinds, colloquial, literary, artistic, theatrical, is sought out, and mingled with rank, wealth, and elegance, in the most perfect society of Europe. Any sudden attempt to discredit fashionable parties, and run an opposition with a "blue" line, would be covered with ridicule. But I think enough has been said, in a community as mercenary and sympathetic of news as is the population of New York, to induce the Amphytrions of gayety to look a little into their social mixtures, and supply the sweets or acids that are wanting. At the most fashionable party lately given, Madame Castellan was the guest of honor, and not called upon to sing—and this is somewhat more Londonish than usual. It is one of the newnesses of our country that we have no grades in our admiration, and can only see the merits of extreme lions. Second, third, and fourth-rate celebrities, for whom in Europe there is attention justly measured, pass wholly unnoticed through our cities. It must be a full-blooded nobleman, or the first singer or danseuse of the world, or the most popular author, or the very first actor, or the miraculous musician, if there is to be any degree whatever of appreciation or enthusiasm. This lack of a scale of tribute to merit is one reason why we so ridiculously overdo our welcomes to great comets, as in the case of Dickens—leaving very respectable stars, like Emerson, Longfellow, Cooper, Sully, and all our own and some foreign men of genius, to pass through the city, or remain here for weeks, unsought by party-givers, and unwelcomed except by their personal friends. To point this out, fortunately, is almost to correct it, so ready are we to learn; but I think, by the shadow cast before, that the avatar of some goddess of fashion may be soon looked for, who will shut her doors upon stupidity and inelegance, rich or poor, and create a gayety that will be enjoyable, not barely endurable.

I am very sorry to see by the English papers that Dickens has been "within the rules of the Queen's bench"—realizing the prophecy of pecuniary ruin which has, for some time, been whispered about for him. His splendid genius did not need the melancholy proof of improvidence, and he has had wealth so completely within his grasp that there seems a particular and unhappy needlessness in his ruin. The most of his misfortune is, he has lived so closely at the edge of his flood-tide of prosperity, that the ebb leaves him at high-water mark, and not in the contented ooze of supplied necessity where it first took him up. And by-the-way, it was in that same low-water period of his life—just before he became celebrated—that I first saw Dickens; and I will record this phase of his chrysalis ("the tomb of the caterpillar and the cradle of the butterfly," as Linnaeus calls it), upon the chance of its being as interesting to future ages as such a picture would now be of the ante-butterfly of Shakspeare. I was following a favorite amusement of mine one rainy day, in the Strand, London—strolling toward the more crowded thoroughfares with cloak and umbrella, and looking at people and shop-windows. I heard my name called from a passenger in a street-cab. From out the smoke of the wet straw peered the head of my publisher, Mr. Macrone (a most liberal and noble-hearted fellow, since dead). After a little catechism as to my damp destiny for that morning, he informed me that he was going to visit Newgate, and asked me to join him. I willingly agreed, never having seen this famous prison, and after I was seated in the cab, he said he was going to pick up, on the way, a young paragraphist for the Morning Chronicle, who wished to write a description of it. In the most crowded part of Holborn, within a door or two of the "Bull and Mouth" inn (the great starting and stopping-place of the stage-coaches), we pulled up at the entrance of a large building used for lawyers' chambers. Not to leave me sitting in the rain, Macrone asked me to dismount with him. I followed by long flights of stairs to an upper story, and was ushered into an uncarpeted and bleak-looking room, with a deal table and two or three chairs and a few books, a small boy and Mr. Dickens—for the contents. I was only struck at first with one thing (and I made a memorandum of it that evening, as the strongest instance I had seen of English obsequiousness to employers)—the degree to which the poor author was overpowered with the honor of his publisher's visit! I remember saying to myself, as I sat down on a rickety chair, "My good fellow, if you were in America, with that fine face and your ready quill, you would have no need to be condescended to by a publisher!" Dickens was dressed very much as he has since described "Dick Swivel"—minus the "swell" look. His hair was crimped close to his head, his clothes scant, though jauntily cut, and after changing a ragged office-coat for a shabby blue, he stood by the door, collarless and buttoned up, the very personification, I thought, of a close sailer to the wind. We went down and crowded into the cab (one passenger more than the law allowed, and Dickens partly in my lap and partly in Macrone's) and drove on to Newgate. In his works, if you remember, there is a description of the prison, drawn from this day's observation. We were there an hour or two, and were shown some of the celebrated murderers confined for life, and one young soldier waiting for execution; and in one of the passages we chanced to meet Mrs. Fry, on her usual errand of benevolence. Though interested in Dickens's face, I forgot him naturally enough after we entered the prison, and I do not think I heard him speak during the two hours. I parted from him at the door of the prison, and continued my stroll into the city.

Not long after this, Macrone sent me the "sheets of Sketches by Boz," with a note saying that they were by the gentleman who went with us to Newgate. I read the book with amazement at the genius displayed in it, and in my note of reply assured Macrone that I thought his fortune was made as a publisher if he could monopolize the author.

Two or three years afterward, I was in London, and present at the complimentary dinner given to Macready. Samuel Lover, who sat next me, pointed out Dickens. I looked up and down the table, but was wholly unable to single him out without getting my friend to number the people who sat above him. He was no more like the same man I had seen than a tree in June is like the same tree in February. He sat leaning his head on his hand while Bulwer was speaking, and with his very long hair, his very flash waistcoat, his chains and rings, and withal a much paler face than of old, he was totally unrecognisable. The comparison was very interesting to me, and I looked at him a long time. He was then in his culmination of popularity, and seemed jaded to stupefaction. Remembering the glorious works he had written since I had seen him, I longed to pay him my homage, but had no opportunity, and I did not see him again till he came over to reap his harvest and upset his hay-cart in America. When all the ephemera of his imprudences and im providences shall have passed away—say twenty years hence—I should like to see him again, renowned as he will be for the most original and remarkable works of his time.

A friend lent me yesterday a late file of "The Straits Messenger," an English newspaper published at Singapore. The leader of one number commences with, "We have always had a hatred for republicanism, and holding it to be the fosterer of every rascality in public life, and every roguery in private, we are not at all surprised when instances turn up to prove our theory true." This is apropos of some news of "repudiation." The advertisements in this paper amused me somewhat, and this consist principally of dissolutions of native partnership. Here are three of them:—

"Notice. The interest and responsibility of Kim Joo Ho in our firm ceased from the 8th January. (Signed) YEP HUN HO."

"Notice. The interest and responsibility of the undersigned in the firm of Chop Tyho ceased from this date. (Signed) CHEE ONG SEANG, CHEE JIN SEO."

"Notice. The interest and responsibility of Mr. See Eng San in our firm ceased from the 5th January. (Signed) BOONTEENG & Co."

In the old English of Gower's "Confessio Amantis" there is wrapped up a little germ of wisdom which you would hardly look for in the metaphysics of love, but which contains the hand-over-hand, boiling-pot principle of most of the make-money-ries of our country:—

"My sonne, yet there is the fift,
Which is conceived of envie,
And 'cleped is SUPPLANTERIE;
Thro' whose complaisment and guile
Full many hath lost his while
In love, as well as other wise."

In England nobody gets ahead but by shoving on all those who are before him, but a hundred instances will occur to you of leap-frog experiment in our country, by which all kinds of success in business is superseded. The most signal and successful jump that I have noticed lately is that of the periodical agents, over the heads of the old publishers—(the trick, indeed, which has hocus-poused the old pirates into changing their views on the subject of copyright!) Three years ago the great apparatus for the circulation of books, was entirely a secret in the hands of the trade, and a man might as well have attempted to run a rail-car across the fields by hand as an author to have attempted to circulate his own book without the consent of publishers. The names and terms of book-selling correspondents, the means of transportation of books, and the amount of profits on them, were matters of inaccessible knowledge. The publisher kept the gate of the public eye, and demanded his own toll—two thirds of the commodity, if not all! The first "little pin" that "bored through this castle wall," was the establishment of the mammoth newspaper, by Day and Wilson, and the publication of entire novels in one sheet; and, upon their agencies for the circulation of these, is now built a scheme of periodical agency totally separate from publishers, and comparing with these as the expresses of Hale and Harnden and Pomeroy do with the general post-office—cheaper, more expeditious and open to competition.

It is, perhaps, not generally known, that any author, now, can publish his own book, and get all the profits! Any printer will tell him how to get it printed and bound in paper covers—for which he pays simply what publishers do. Stored up in his own room or a warehouse, he has only to furnish it to the periodical agents, who will take of him, at their wholesale price, all that will sell—(bringing the risk directly on the proper shoulders, those of the author)—and returning to him very promptly the money or the unsaleable copies. There are no "six months publishers' notes" in the business; no cringing or making interest. The author is on a blessed level with the gingerbread bakers and blacking sellers he has often envied—salesman of his own commodity, if saleable it be, and made aware, to a certainty, in a very brief time, whether he has mistaken his vocation. Let but congress give us a law which shall prevent English books from coming, not into the market, but into the publishers' hands, for nothing, and the only remaining obstacle to a worldwide competition will be gloriously removed. And, books will be no dearer than at present—as the memorials to congress sufficiently show.

There are some delicious works of art now exhibiting opposite the hospital, in Broadway—Harvey's Atmospheric Effects of American Scenery. Those who have not been observers in other countries are scarcely aware how peculiar our country is in its atmospheric phenomena—how much bolder, brighter, and more picturesque. There is scarce a scene pictured in this beautiful gallery which could be at all true of any other country; but to the American eye they are enchantingly faithful and beautiful. The artist gives in his prospectus for engraving these works the following interesting bit of autobiography:—

"In 1827 I entered upon the line of portrait-painting in miniature; I pursued it for nine years with an assiduity that impaired my health. Country air and exercise being recommended me, I purchased a tract of land on the majestic Hudson; built a cottage after my own plan; amused myself by laying out grounds, and gained health and strength by the employment. These exercises in the open air led me more and more to notice and study the ever-varying atmospheric effects of this beautiful climate. I undertook to illustrate them by my pencil, and thus almost accidentally, commenced a set of atmospheric landscapes. The number had reached twenty-two, and as yet I had no thought of publication when business called me to Europe. I carried them with me, and, while in London, occasionally attended the Conversazione of Artists. At one of these I accidentally heard a gentleman, on leaving a little knot of connoisseurs assembled round my portfolio, pass a most flattering eulogium on its contents. I felt the more elated by his praise on learning that he was Professor Farrady, the able successor of Sir Humphrey Davy. At Paris, while partaking of the courteous hospitality of the American minister, Governor Cass, my portfolio was sent for and received the approbation of that gentleman and his guests. Governor Cass retained my drawings for a week; on returning them to me he recommended that I should have them engraved, and suggested that it might be done at once, while I was in Paris. I was too diffident, however, of their popular merit, to risk so extensive an undertaking. On my return to New York my personal friends encouraged me in the project, and at last I made up my mind to lay the original drawings before the Boston public; conceiving that I owed it to that city, where I had received liberal encouragement in my previous pursuits to give to them the opportunity of originating the work of publication."

Mr. Harvey went afterward to London to find print-colorists who could execute the work to his satisfaction, and, while there, Mr. Murray, who was formerly in this country, and is now attached to her majesty's household, showed to the queen the first number. The royal subscription was immediately given to the work at a munificent price. It is worth every one's while to see this delicious work of art, and every person of easy means should subscribe for a copy of the engravings.

The SLEIGHS flying very briskly up and down Broadway this morning remind me that Miss Howitt, in her late preface to one of Miss Bremer's works, mentions, among other phrases, our use of the words "sleighs, sleds, and sleighing, for sledges and sledging,"—calling them "Americanisms which all well-educated persons will be careful not to introduce into their families." Miss Howitt might allow, to a continent of the size of ours, the privilege of coining a word without the tariff of her contempt; but she forgets that sled is a good English word, and derived from the very language of the book she has translated—from the Swedish word slada. Thomson says in his Seasons:—

"Eager on rapid sleds
Their vigorous youth in bold contention wheel
The long resounding course."

And Fletcher says, in a fine passage of his Eclogue:—

"From thence he furrowed many a churlish sea,
The viny Rhene and Volga's self did pass,
Who sleds doth suffer on his wat'ry lea,
And horses trampling on his icy face."

The cold weather of the last week has justified another Americanism, for it has been literally "a cold spell"—dimming parlor lights, and arresting the flow of thought. The gas-lights burn dim because water freezes in the gasometers, and "whole stacks of new publications" (as a periodical agent told me yesterday) are "books and stationary," from the interrupted navigation.

PALMO'S NEW OPERA has been voted fashionable, nem. con. (as I have been fashionably assured), and the long ellipse of other theatricals will give it a flowing launch. It is a small and beautiful edifice, and is to be brilliantly lighted, and made every way conformable to the exactions of white kid and cashmere. Its situation is admirable—far enough up Chamber street to be away from the noises of Broadway, and accessible easily from all parts of the city. This evening comes off the preparatory rehearsal, to which the connoisseurs and gentlemen of the press are invited as guests. The printed invitation by the way, makes Mr. Palmo out to be (very properly) a fellow-citizen of the Muses, and is altogether an amusing production. A copy of it, filled up with the name of a friend of ours, lies by me, running thus: "The honor of the company of N. P. W—, Grand Scribe, are respectfully invited to attend the first public rehearsal of the Italian Opera, on Friday evening. The house will be brilliantly illuminated, and the connoisseur in music will have an opportunity of beholding an edifice erected and dedicated to the Muses, by their fellow-citizen, F. Palmò."

This making "fellow-citizens" of the Muses reminds me of a police report in the "True Sun," announcing that a namesake of the great Roman emperor who was "Anor et delicia generis humani"—a Mr. TITUS—was "arrested and committed for stealing a door-mat!" How a man with so great a name could steal so little, is a psychological marvel.

In looking over a western paper, a day or two since, my eye fell on an advertisement in very comical verse. Here are a couple of stanzas—to the tune of "the cork leg":—

"You all have in the papers read,
That KIBBE has caps for every head,
Which are marked so very low, 'tis said,
The price can scarcely be cred-it-ed.
Ritu-rinu-ri-iditti-l-do-da.

"You'll be well pleased to hear the news,
That KIBBE has got new boots and shoes;
They're sold so cheap that it beats the Jews;
He'll exchange for hides, if you do choose.
Ritu-rinu," etc.

I think there should be a committee sent out to invite Mr. Kibbe to become a poet.

"The Rococo" is the quaint, but, in fact, most descriptive name of one of the "extras of the New Mirror." Those of our readers who have been lately in France will be familiar with the word. The etymology of rococo has been matter of no little fruitless inquiry. It came into use about four or five years ago, when it was the rage to look up costly and old-fashioned articles of jewelry and furniture. A valuable stone, for example, in a beautiful but antique setting, was rococo. A beauty, who had the kind of face oftenest painted in the old pictures, was rococo. A chair, or a table, of carved wood, costly once, but unfashionable for many a day, was rococo. Articles of virtu were looked up and offered for sale with a view to the prevailing taste for rococo. Highly carved picture-frames, old but elaborately-made trinkets, rich brocades, etc., etc.—things intrinsically beautiful and valuable, in short, but unmeritedly obsolete, were rococo. The extra published by the proprietors of the New Mirror answers this description exactly. It comprises the three most exquisite and absolute creations of pure imagination (in my opinion) that have been produced since Shakspeare: "Lillian" by Præd, "The Culprit Fay" by Drake, and "St. Agnes' Eve" by Keats—all three of which have been overlaid and in a measure lost sight of in the torrent of new literature—but all three now to be had altogether in fair type, price one shilling! The man who could read these poems without feeling the chamber of his brain filled with incense—without feeling his heart warm, his blood moved, and his inmost craving of novelty and melody deliciously ministered to, does not love poetry enough to "possess a rose-tint for his russet cares." I declare I think it is worth the outlay of a fever to get (by seclusion and depletion) the delicacy of nerve and perception to devour and relish with intellectual nicety, these three subtly-compounded feasts of the imagination.

We are indebted for many beautiful things not so much to accident as to the quickness of genius to appreciate and appropriate accident. I was pleased with an instance that came to my knowledge last night.

Wallace (the omni-dexterous) was playing the piano in my room, and, among others of his own inimitable waltzes, he played one called the Midnight Waltz, in which twelve strokes of the clock recur constantly with the aria. In answer to an inquiry of mine, he told me he was playing, one night, to some ladies in Lima, when a loud silvery-toned clock in the room struck twelve. He insensibly stopped, and beat the twelve strokes on an accordant note on the piano, and in repeating the passage, stopped at the same place and beat twelve again. The effect was particularly impressive and sweet, and he afterward composed a waltz expressly to introduce it—one of the most charming compositions I ever heard. Wallace is the most prodigal of geniuses, and most prodigally endowed. He has lived a life of adventure in the East Indies, South America, New South Wales, and Europe, that would fill satisfactorily the life-cups of a dozen men, and how he has found time to be what he probably is, as great a violinist and as great a pianist as the greatest masters on those instruments, is certainly a wonder. But this is not all. He was rehearsing for a concert not long since in New York, when the clarinet-player, in reply to some correction, said that "if Mr. Wallace wished it played better he might play it himself." Wallace took the clarinet from the hand of the refractory musician, and played the passage so exquisitely as quite to electrify the orchestra. He is the most modest of men, and how many more instruments he is master of (beside the human voice, which he plays on in conversation very attractively), it would be wild to guess.* By the way, it would be worth the while of a music-publisher to send for the music he has literally sown the world with—for he has written over three hundred waltzes, of most of which he has no copy, though they have been published and left in the cities he has visited. He composes many hours every day. I think Wallace one of the most remarkable men I ever knew.

On Saturday night I was at the opening of the new opera—the beginning, as I think, of a regular supply of a great luxury. The bright, festal look of Palmò's exquisite little theatre struck every one with surprise on entering, and the cozy, sympathy-sized construction, and pleasant arrangement of seats, etc., seemed to leave nothing to be wished for. With a kindly fostering for a while, on the part of the press and the public, Palmò's theatre may become the most enjoyable and refined resort of the city.

The new prima donna made a brilliant hit. New York is, at this moment, in love with Signorina Borghese. She dresses a-merveille, has a very intellectual and attractive want of beauty, is graceful, vivid, a capital actress, and sings with a bird-like abandon, that enchants you even with her defects. Nature has given her quite her share of attractiveness, and she uses it all.

The opera was "I puritani"—BELLINI's last, and the one that was playing, for only the third time, the night he died—(at the age of twenty-seven). It was well selected for the opening opera—being full of intelligible and expressive melody, and not compelling the musically uninitiated to get on tiptoe to comprehend it. These same uninitiateds, however, are the class to cater for, in any country, and especially in ours. It is a great mistake to fancy that, in the appreciation of an opera, criticism goes before. On the contrary, feeling goes before and criticism follows very slowly. The commonest lover of music feels, for instance, that Bellini's operas are marked by simplicity and sameness—but, after having felt that, the the critic comes in and follows up the idea like an ink-fish, expressing that plain fact in cloudy technicalities this-wise: "Bellini rather multiplies the repetitions of the chord than gives distinct business to the several components of the score!" Who cares to know, when in tears at Rossini's exquisite harmony, that it is produced by a "profuse use of the diminished seventh," or that one of his most electrical effects is done by "an harmonic atrocity of consecutive fifths." To have one's tear shed on a piece of paper, and thus analyzed, may be curious, once, but not very necessary always, and I wish, with all my heart, that the humbug of technicalities in this, as in many other things, might be exposed. It would be a capital subject for a popular lecture. I lend the suggestion to Mr. Emerson—the man best capable of using it.

Supper is a natural sequence to music, and I must mention a pair of canvass-backs that were sent me by a Baltimore friend, and feasted on last night after "I Puritani"—for the sake of giving you and "your public" some valuable and toothsome directions for the cooking of these birds, contained in a passage of my friend's letter: "I have some anxiety," he says, "about the cooking of these ducks. Pray don't put them in the power of a Frenchman! Get hold of a good English or American cook, knowing in roasts. Let this cook erect a strong, blazing fire, before which he (or she) must tend the birds for about twenty-five or thirty minutes. To determine if they are done, have them held up by the feet, and if the gravy runs out of the necks, of a proper color, they don't require another turn. Serve them up with their own gravy. 'Tis safer than a chafing-dish and made gravy. Eat them with homnony patties, between which and the ducks there is a delicate affinity. Beware, I conjure you once more, of a Frenchman—except in the shape of a glass of Chablis. May they prove luscious as those we ate together at Guy's."

Here is an epigram on the turning of Grenough's Washington out of the capitol:—

Ye sages who work for eight dollars a day,
And are patriots, heroes, and statesmen, for pay—
Who of Washington prattle in phrases so sweet,
Pray why did you tumble him into the street?

YOUNG POETS.—An old man with no friend but his money—a fair child holding the hand of a Magdalen—a delicate bride given over to a coarse-minded bridegroom—were sights to be troubled at seeing. We should bleed at heart to see either of them. But there is something even more touching to us than these—something, too, which is the subject of heartless and habitual mockery by critics—the first timid offerings to fame of the youthful and sanguine poet. We declare that we never open a letter from one of his class, never read a preface to the first book of one of them, never arrest our critical eye upon a blemish in the immature page, without having the sensation of a tear coined in our heart—never without a passionate though inarticulate "God help you!" We know so well the rasping world in which they are to jostle, with their "fibre of sarcenet!" We know so well the injustices, the rebuffs, the sneers, the insensibilities, from without, the impatiences, the resentments, the choked impulses and smothered heart-boundings within. And yet it is not these outward penances, and inward scorpions, that cause us the most regret in the fate of the poet. Out of these is born the inspired expression of his anguish—like the plaint of the singing bird from the heated needle which blinds him. We mourn more over his fatuous imperviousness to counsel —over his haste to print, his slowness to correct—over his belief that the airy bridges he builds over the chasms in his logic and rhythm are passable, by avoiropois on foot, as well as by Poesy on Pegasus. That the world is not as much enchanted—(that we ourselves are not as much touched and delighted)—with the halting flights of new poets as with the broken and short venturings in air of new-fledged birds—proves over again that the world we live in were a good enough Eden if human nature were as loveable as the rest. We wish it were not so. We wish it were natural to admire anything human-made, that has not cost pain and trial. But, since we do not, and can not, it is a pity, we say again, that beginners in poetry are offended with kind counsel. Of the great many books and manuscript poems we receive, there is, never one from a young poet, which we do not long, in all kindness, to send back to him to be re-studied, rewritten, and made, in finish, more worthy of the conception. To praise it in print only puts his industry to sleep, and makes him dream he has achieved what is yet far beyond him. We ask the young poets who read this, where would be the kindness in such a case?

A young lady in Brooklyn who signs herself "Short and Sweet," writes to us to say that she is very tired of her name, and seeing no prospect of getting another (with an owner to it), wishes to know whether she may lawfully abandon the unsentimental prenomens inflicted on her at baptism, and adopt one of her own more tasteful selection. By an understanding with all the people likely to put her name in their wills, we should think she might. Names are a modern luxury, and if she chose to be rococo, she might do without one, or be known as the ancients were, by some word descriptive of her personal peculiarities. (So came into use the names of Brown, Long, Broadhead, etc.) "Short and Sweet" would not be a bad name. Or—if the lady chooses to follow the Arabian custom, she (supposing her father's name to be a well-sounding one—say Tiskins) would be called "Tiskins's Short and Sweet daughter"—people in Arabia being only designated as brown or fair, short or tall, children of such and such parents. There was a Roman fashion, too, that might help her out—that of adding to the name any quality or exploit for which the bearer was remarkable—Miss Short and Sweet Heartbreaker, for example, or Miss "Noli-me-Tangere," or (after the favorite flower of the Irish), Miss "Jump-up-and-kiss me." (The Irish designate Tom Moore by this pretty prenomens.) Our compliments to the lady, and we are sorry she should want a name—sorry she has a want we can not supply. It happens to be the one thing we are out of.

The opera gets more crowded, more dressy, and more fashionable, nightly. Some malicious person started a rumor that the building was unsafe, and many stayed away till it was tested. There are many, too, who wait for the stamp of other people's approbation before they venture upon even a new amusement. The doubtfuls have now gone over, however, and the opera is "in the full tide," etc., etc. Some of the first families have taken season-tickets in the opera-boxes (there are but two private boxes, and those very inconvenient and undesirable), and the best seats in the pit are sold out, like the stalls at the Italian opera in London, to bachelors in the market. The prima donna, Borghese, improves with every repetition, and what with dressing, singing, and acting—all exceedingly well—she is a very enjoyable rechauffée of Grisi, whose style she follows.

This is a day of such sunshine and air that those "Who can not spare the luxury of believing

That all things beautiful are what they seem,"

must be in love with the sunny sidewalk of Broadway. And this recalls to my mind a little book of poems, better described by their title than any book whose name I ever knew—"Droppings from the Heart," by Thomas Mackellar, lately published in Philadelphia. Everybody must love the man who reads his book, though its simplicity would sometimes make you smile. He thus apostrophizes the city of New York:—

"New York! I love thy sons, beyond compare
Ennobled—not by empty words of kings,
But by ennobling acts, by virtues rare,
And charities unbounded. These the things
That crown their names with honor. Peerless all
Thy lovely daughters, warm with sympathy,
Swift to obey meek mercy's moving call,
To heal the heart and dry the weeping eye,
And hush the plaint that fears no comfort is nigh."

The credulity of this stanza is not weak-mindedness, by any means—as the strength of expression and beauty of poetry in the other parts of the book sufficiently prove. The writer's only vent seems to be the expression of affection. He loves everything. He believes good of everything and everybody. I do not know that, in my life, I ever saw a more complete picture than this book of a heart overrunning with tenderness. The lines to his "Sleeping Wife," are as beautiful as anything of Barry Cornwall's. The piece called "The Heart-Longings," too, is finely expressed. A little infusion of distrust, bitterness, and contempt, would make Mackellar a poet of the kind most admired by critics, and most read and sympathized with by the world. He is, I understand, a printer in Philadelphia, and enjoys the kindly friendship of Mr. Chandler, of the United States Gazette, to whom is addressed one of the sonnets in his book. For family reading, among people of simple lives and pure tastes, the "Droppings from the Heart" is the best-adapted book of poetry I have lately seen.

One of the most charming resuscitations from the trance of oblivion that have come about lately, is the republication (in the "Mirror Library") of Pinckney's Poems. Mr. Pinckney, your readers will perhaps know, was the son of the Hon. William Pinckney, our minister in 1802 at the court of St. James, and was born in London during the diplomatic residence there of his father. He was partly educated at college, entered the navy, gave it up for the law, and, after much disappointment and suffering, died at twenty-five. With discipline and study, he might, I think, have written as well as Moore. What poetry would be in a world where Toil were not the Siamesed twin of Excellence (in other words, where man had not fallen), "is a curious question, coz!" The wild horse runs very well in the prairie, but we give a preference of admiration to the "good-continuer" by toilsome training. Whether the fainéant angels who "sit in the clouds," admire more the objectless careerings of the wild steed, or the "wind and bottom" of the winner of the sweepstakes—whether fragmentary poetry, dashed off while the inspiration is on, and thrown aside ill-finished, when the whim evaporates, be more celestial than the smooth and complete product of painful toil and disciplined concentration—I have had my luxurious doubts. Pinckney's genius, as evidenced on paper, has all the impulsive abandonment which marks his biography. He was a born poet—with all needful imagination, discrimination, perception, and sensibility; and he had, besides, the flesh-and-blood-fulness necessary to keep poetry on terra-firma. Several of his productions have become common air—known and enjoyed by everybody, but without a name. The song beginning—

"I fill this cup to one made up of loveliness alone,
A woman of her gentle sex the seeming paragon," &c.

—this, and two or three others of Pinckney's "entire and perfect chrysolites," should be regraven with his name, for the world owes his memory a debt for them. The small volume of his poetry from which the Mirror Library edition is copied, was printed in 1825, and has been long lost sight of. It contains—not the stuff for a classic—but a delicious bundle of heart-reaching passages, fresh and peculiar, and invaluable especially to lovers, whose sweetest and best interpreter Pinckney was. Every man or woman who has occasion to embroider a love-letter with the very essence-flowers of passionate verse, should pay a shilling for Pinckney's poems.

The chair and pen of an editor should be assumed with as binding vows and as solemn ceremony as were the sword and war-horse of knighthood—for the editor, like the armed and mounted knight, is an aggregation of more power than nature properly allots to the individual. Indeed, it is because the power has not been well considered by law and by public opinion, that the penalties of maleficent pen and ink are not more formidable than those of fist and dagger. Take the consideration of this thought for a while-time in your next omnibus-ride, dear reader, and if you chance to be young and have a lust for power, write down EDITORSHIP for your second choice—the church, of course, number one, and politics, possibly, number three.

The temptation to the abuse of pen-power is greater as the mind of the editor is more little. It is so easy to do brilliant tilting in the editorial lists, by slashing alike at the offending and unoffending! Abuse is the easiest, as courtesy is the most difficult kind of writing to make readable, and as it is a relief for the smooth-faced card-player to vent, before he sleeps, his pent-up malice upon his wife, so a heart naturally ill-willed makes a purulent bile-spigot of a pen—relieved, so the venom is spent, no matter upon what. There is so seldom good cause to be ill-natured in print, that it would be safe, always, when reading an ill-natured criticism, to "smell the rat" of a bad heart near by.

If perversion of pen and ink be very blameable, forbearance should be laudable, and we claim credit for much pains-taking in this latter way. The reputations, ready-spitted, that are sent us for roasting, would alone (did we publish them) sell our paper to the ten thousand malicious, who may be counted on as a separate stratum of patronage to periodicals. This is some temptation. Then we are often attacked, and we could demolish the assailant very amusingly, and we resist this temptation, though, if his pin be not winced at, puny impunity will prick again. There is much that is ludicrous, much that is pervertible to sport, in new books and new candidates to fame; and by fault-finding only, or by abusing the author instead of his book (easy and savory), the review is made readable without labor in writing—and this tempts both malice and idleness. No man can live, elbow to elbow, with competitors in love, life, and literature, without his piques and his resentments, and to "turn" these pleasantly "to commodity," with a laugh that outstabs a dagger, is very tempting—very—to those who can do it dexterously.

Now that you have read the three foregoing paragraphs, dear reader, you are prepared to know the value of your acquittal, if you acquit the Mirror of ill-nature, of which it has been accused. We do not remember that, in its pages, we have ever, intentionally, wounded feelings or trenced upon delicacy.

The Rococo No. 1, is ready for your shilling, dear reader—one shilling for the three purest gems ever crystallized into poetry—three narrative fairy-tales in verse, exquisitely full of genius. The book, too, is beautifully printed, as are all the works of the Mirror Library—suitable for company at a lavender-fingured breakfast, or for the drawing-room table of your lady fair.

Rococo No. 2, is also ready, containing Pinckney's long-neglected and delicious poems, and you should pay a shilling if it were only to know what the country has to be proud of among its poetical dead. The author of

"I fill this cup to one made up of loveliness alone,"

had a smoothness in his touch of a thought like the glide of a cloud-edge just under a star. For quaint and sweet couplets of love-makery there are few books like it. Witness this verse:—

"We break the glass, whose sacred wine
To some beloved health we drain,
Lest future pledges, less divine,
Should e'er the hallowed toy profane;
And thus I broke a heart, that poured
Its tide of feelings out for thee,
In draughts, by after-times deplored,
Yet dear to memory."

The following Bryant-like, finished, and high-thoughted poetry was written by a young lady of seventeen, and her first published production. She is the daughter of one of our oldest and best families, resident on the Hudson. If the noon be like the promise of the dawn of this pure intellect, we have here the beginning of a brilliant fame:—

"Thou beautiful cloud, a glorious hue is thine!
I can not think, as thy bright dyes appear
To my enraptured gaze, that thou wert born
Of evening exhalations; more sublime,
Light-giver! is thy birthplace, than of earth.
Art thou not formed to herald in the day,
And clothe a world in thy unborrowed light?
Or art thou but a harbinger of rains
To budding May? Or, in thy subtle screen,
Nursest the lightnings that alight the world?
Or wert thou born of the ethereal mist
That shades the sea, or shrouds the mountain's brow?
Spread thy wings o'er the empyrean, and away—
Fleethly athwart the untraveled wilds of space,
To where the sunlight sheds his earliest beams,
And blaze the stars, that vision vainly scans
In distant regions of the universe!
Tell me, air-wanderer! in what burning zone
Thou wilt appear, when from the azure vault
Of our high heaven thy majesty shall fade?
Tell me, winged vapor, where hath been thy home
Through the unchangeable serene of noon?
Whate'er thy garniture—where'er thy course—
Would I could follow thee in thy fair flight,
When the south wind of eve is low and soft,
And my thought rises to the mighty Source
Of all sublimity! O, fleeting cloud,
Would I were with thee in the solemn night!"

FEBRUARY 14.—This is the day, says the calendar, for choosing special loving friends"—as if there were room for choice in a world where

"He who has one is blest beyond compare!"

The Lupercalian custom of keeping Valentine's day (putting the names of all the marriageable girls in the community into a box, and making the bachelors draw lots for wives) would make a droll imbroglio of "New York society." By-the-way, if you know a working poet out of employ, recommend to his notice the literature of valentines. Never till this year have the copies of amatory verses, for sale in the fancy shops, been comparably so well embellished, and the prices of single valentines have ranged from two shillings to two dollars—fine prices to build a trade upon! The shops, for two or three evenings last past, have been crowded with young men purchasing these, and probably a little better poetry would turn the choice in favor of any particular manufacture of such lovers' wares. The favorite device seems to be stolen from Mercury's detention of Mars and Venus—a paper net, which, when raised, discloses a tableau of avowal.

Editorial skirmishing strikes a light into the people's tinder sometimes, and there is a paragraph this morning which explains the difference between paid puffs and literary notices. The True Sun says: "The man who edits the Hagerstown News can not, it seems, distinguish between an editorial article and an advertisement. He mistakes the long advertisement of Verplanck's Shakspeare, which appears in our paper, for the production of the editors of the True Sun, and declines inserting it in the News for less than forty-five dollars. What does the man mean? It is only surprising than an editor should be ignorant that puffs paid are set in minion type, and puffs of volition are set in brevier—a distinction not 'plain' (as yet) 'to the commonest understanding.'" The London papers print the word "advertisement" over all their puffs paid for, and, by using different type, the True Sun has taken one step toward making the volunteer distinguishable.

Mr. Verplanck's project, by-the-way, is a very noticeable one. We have never had (to my knowledge) an American annotator upon Shakspeare, and Shakspeare is as much ours as England's. Very many of the Shaksperian words are obsolete in England, but in use here, and put down as Americanisms by travellers. I do not know whether Mr. Verplanck promises to show any new readings of Shakspeare, but he is a man of much higher education, and more cultivated and scholarlike pursuits than Mr. Knight (whose edition of Shakspeare has lately been so popular in England), beside being a man of productive original genius, which Mr. Knight has no claim to be. The commentaries upon works of genius by different men of genius can never be repetitions, and are always interesting—so I look with some interest for Mr. Verplanck's preface and first number. As he is a man of large fortune and entire leisure, there is no obstacle to his doing it well.

The discovery of a gem in a dark mine is a poetical matter, but (to my present thinking) it is even a prosaic similitude for the sudden finding out of a work of genius progressing in one of the houses of a brick block. I had often passed DURAND's house in one of the retired close-built streets of New York, without suspecting that it contained anything but the domestic problem of felicity and three meals a day; but a chance errand lately led me to knock at his door. My business over, he placed upon the easel (in a charming studio built in the rear of his house) a large landscape to which he had just given the finishing touch. I sat down before it, and (to use a good word that is staled and blunted from overusing) it absorbed me. My soul went into it. I was, it is true, in good pictorial appetite. It was my studious time of day, and I had seen no pictures out of my own rooms for a week; but it seemed to me as if that landscape alone would be a retreat, a seclusion, a world by itself to retreat into from care or sad thoughts—so mellow and deep was the distance, so true to nature the coloring and drawing, so sweetly poetical the composition, and so single-thoughted the conception of the effect. The roofs of a comfortable farmhouse and outbuildings were the subordinate life of the picture, seen over a knoll on the right. The centre of the foreground, and the brightest spot in the picture, was a high grass-bank on which glanced a golden beam of the setting sun. On it was a group of cattle in well-fed repose, and over it stood the finest oak-tree I ever saw painted. Twenty miles of landscape lay below, enveloped in the veil of coming twilight, and a river wound gracefully away from the eye and was lost in the distance. It was indeed a glorious picture, and I stake my judgment upon the opinion that no living artist could surpass it. Durand, as you probably know, has turned painter, after having long been the first engraver of our country. He is patient of labor, and has approached landscape-painting by a peculiar education of hand and eye, and the probability is, that if he live twenty years, he will have no equal in this department of the arts. If you remember, I mentioned my great surprise at the excellence of two of his landscapes in the last exhibition of the academy here. To see pictures with an appetite in the eye, one should see them singly, however, and but two or three, at farthest, in a day. Artists who would be deliberately appreciated, should make their houses morning-resorts, as they are, and very fashionable ones, in France and Italy. There are people (and those, too, who can afford to buy pictures) who yawn for some such round of occupation during the summer mornings of the travelling season.

The want of an excuse to put on bonnet, and go out somewhere in the evening with father, husband, brother, or lover, is doubtless the secret of most audiences, whether in church or lecture-room. I arrived at this conclusion sitting and watching the coming in of an audience at a popular lecture a night or two ago. The subject was of a character that would only draw listeners (one would think) from the more intellectual and cultivated classes—dry and of remote interest—and one, too, that could be “read up,” to perfect mental satisfaction, by sending a shilling to a library, or buying a bit of the cheap literature of the day. It was a cold, raw night, the lecturer was no orator, and the benches of the lecture-room had no cushions. With these premises, you would look to see anything but a pleasure-loving and youthful audience. Yet this was just the quality of the comers—in till the room was crowded. There was scarce an unappropriated-looking damsel among them, and not one bald head or “adust” visage. That the young men would have been there without the ladies, I do not believe—not that the ladies came there with any special desire to know more of the subject of the lecture.

On this necessity for ladies to go somewhere in an evening is based, of course, most of the popular enthusiasms of the day—for they are never got up by individual reading, and would fail entirely, but for the opportunity to give, in one moment, one thought to many people. This fact seems to me to indicate in what way the inducements should be heightened when audiences fall off; and, instead of cheapening tickets, or spending more money in placards, I think it would be better to treat the ladies to an interlude of coffee and conversation, or to minister in some way directly to the tastes of those in whom resides the primum mobile of attendance.

I presume there are thousands of families in New York that are not linked with any particular round of acquaintance—very worthy and knowledge-loving people, who can afford only a few friends, and shun acquaintances as expensive. People in this rank are too moderate-minded to be theatre-goers; but the wife and daughters of the family must go somewhere in an evening. Parties are costly, public balls both costly and unadvisable, and there are eight months in the year when it is too cold for icecream-gardens and walks on the Battery. Lecture-tickets for a family are cheap, the company there is good, the room is warm, and so well lighted as to show comeliness or dress to advantage, and the apparent object of being there is creditable and reputable. I say again, that to add to the social inducements of this attraction, would be to make of the lecture system a great gate to the public heart. I add this gratuitous mite of speculation to the unused data that have been long waiting for a compiler of the statistics of metropolitan moments.

We have had a week of spring-weather, and the upper part of New York (all above the pavements, ca va dire) has been truly enjoyable. Most persons who do not wear their beards for a protection to the glands of the throat, have got the mumps—on dit. Writing in a warm room with the throat pressed down upon a thick cravat, and going into the open air with the head raised and the throat of course suddenly left exposed—is one of those provoking risks that “stand to reason.” By the elaborate inventions to keep the feet dry, there seems to be a “realizing sense” of the danger of wet feet also.* Mr. Lorin Brooks’s invention for expeditiously throwing an iron bridge over every small puddle—that is to say, of making boots with a curved metallic shank under the hollow of the foot)—has the advantage of adding to the beauty as well as the protection of the exposed extremities.

SIGNOR PALMO continues to pay his way and his prima donna, and not much more—for the upper gallery is so constructed that, though you can see the stage from every part of it, you can only see the dress-circle from the front row; and people go to play a little to see and hear, and a great deal to be seen and heard of. The price of places being the same all over the house, few will take tickets except for the lower tier. The best evidence that the opera is growing on the public liking is the degree to which the piques and tracasseries of the company are talked about in society. Quite a Guelph and Ghibelline excitement was raised, a few nights ago, by the basso’s undertaking indignantly to sing as the critics advised him—with more moderation. Signor Valtellina is a great favorite, and has a famous voice, ben martellato. He is a very impassioned singer, and when excited, loses his flessibilità, and grows harsh and indistinct—(as he himself does not think). By way of pleasing the carpers for once, he sang one of the warmest passages of the opera with a moping lamentivole that brought out a hiss from the knowing ones. His friends, who were in the secret, applauded. Valtellina laid his hand on his heart and retired—but came back, as the millers say, “with a head on,” and sang once more passionately and triumphantly. Excuse the fop’s alley slang with which I have told this momentous matter—quite equal in importance (as a subject of conversation) to any couple of events eligible by Niles’s Register.

OUR LIBRARY PARISH.—Our heart is more spread and fed than our pocket, dear reader, with the new possession of this magic long arm by which we are handing you, one after another, the books we have long cherished. Almost the first manifestation of the poet's love, is the sending of his favorite books to his mistress, and no commerce of tenderness is more like the converse of angels (probably), than the sympathies exchanged through the loopholes of starry thoughts—(so like windows twixt soul and soul are the love-expressing conceptions of poetry!) The difference between an hour passed with friends and an hour passed with strangers, will be some guide to you in forming an estimate of the difference between writing for our readers without, and writing for them with the sympathy of books in common. The Mirror becomes, in a manner, our literary parish—we the indulged literary vicar, with whose tastes out of the pulpit you are as familiar as with his sermons of criticism when in; and you, dear reader, become our loved parishioner, for whom we cater, at fountains of knowledge and fancy to which you have not our facility of access, and whose face, turned to us on Saturday, inspires us like the countenance of a familiar friend. This charming literary parish (now rising of eleven thousand) we would not exchange for a bishopric, nor for the constituency of a congress-member; and we hold our responsibility to be as great as the bishop's, and our chair better worth having than "a seat" in the Capitol. Few things gratify us more than the calls we occasionally get from subscribers who have a wish to see us after reading our paper for a while—and this feeling of friendly and personal acquaintance is what we most aim at producing between ourselves and our readers. We shall seldom be more pleased hereafter than in taking one of our parish by the hand—relying more upon the sympathy between us, by common thoughts, than upon any possible ceremony of introduction.

Let us beg our readers to have the different numbers of the Rococo bound with blank letter-paper between the leaves, and to read always with a pencil in hand. There are such chambers within chambers of comprehension and relish in repeated readings of such sweet creations, and the thoughts they suggest are so noteworthy and so delightful to recall! We have sent a poem to the printer this morning (to be published in the same shilling number with The Rimini), which we do not believe ten of our readers ever saw—(a poem never reprinted in this country, and apparently quite lost sight of in England)—but which exercised upon our imagination, when in college, an influence tincturing years of feeling and reverie. An English copy was given us by an old man curious in books, and it was soon so covered with pencil-marks that we were obliged to rebind it with alternate leaves of white paper, and we carried it with us for a travelling companion through Europe, and re-read it (once again, we well remember) sitting on the ruins of the church of Sardis in Asia. It is a narrative-poem of inexpressible richness and melody, and of the loftiest walk of inventive imagination. It is so sweet a story, too, that it would entertain a child like a fairy-tale. We could go on writing about it for hours—for it brings back to us days spent with it in the woods, green banks where we have lain and mused over it, lovely listeners who have held their breaths to hear it, and oh, a long, long chain of associations steeped in love, indolence, and sunshine! And this it is to have a favorite author—to have a choice and small library of favorite authors. It makes a wreath wherein to weave for memory the chance flowers of a lifetime! It gives Memory a sweet companion. It enables you to withdraw yourself at any time from the world, or from care, and recover the dreams built over these books in the rare hours dream-visited. More valuable still, it gives you—when you begin to love, and want the words and thoughts that have fled affrighted away —a thread to draw back the truants, and an instant and eloquent language to a heart otherwise dumb.

"Sybilla" wants a poetical color given to the "transition state" from the "uncertain age" to the "sad certainty of youth gone by." We can only give her a verse from a piece of poetry written to a delightful and fascinating old maid whom we once had a passion for:—

What though thy years are getting on,
They pass thee harmless by,
I can not count them on thy cheek,
Nor miss them in thine eye.
The meander things of earth grow old,
And feel the touch of Time,
But the moon and the stars, though old in heaven,
Are fresh as in their prime.

Spring is close behind us, dear reader. What think you of this bit of poetry, touching spring flowers?—

The flowers are nature's jewels, with whose wealth
She decks her summer beauty;—Primrose sweet,
With blossoms of pure gold; enchanting rose,
That like a virgin queen, salutes the sun,
Dew-diademed; the perfumed pink that studs
The earth with clustering ruby; hyacinth,
The hue of Venus' tresses; myrtle green,
That maidens think a charm for constant love,
And give night-kisses to it, and so dream;
Fair lily! woman's emblem, and oft twined
Round bosoms, where its silver is unseen—
Such is their whiteness;—downcast violet,
Turning away its sweet head from the wind,
As she her delicate and startled ear
From passion's tale.

A country subscriber writes to know who "Mrs. Grundy" is. She is the lady who lives next door, madam—the lady at whose funeral there will be but one mourner—the last man! We are not sorry that we know her, but very sorry that she must needs know us, and have her "say" about us.

February should be called the month of hope, for it is invariably more enjoyable than the first nominal fruition—more spring-like than the first month of spring. This is a morning that makes the hand open and the fingers spread—a morning that should be consecrated to sacred idleness. I should like to exchange work with any out-of-doors man—even with a driver of an omnibus—especially with the farmer tinkering his fences. Cities are convenient places of refuge from winter and bad weather, but one longs to get out into the country, like a sheep from a shed, with the first warm gleam of sunshine.

I see that Moore has virtually turned to come down from his long ladder of fame—his publishers, Longmans, having made a final collection of his works in an elaborate edition, and prefixed thereto a picture of an old man—Tom Moore as he is! It is melancholy to see this portrait. The sparse hair, made-the-most-of—the muscles of the face retreating from the habitual expression—the lamp within still unconscious of losing brightness, yet the glass over it stained and cracked. Moore should never have been painted after thirty. This picture is like a decrepit cupid—wholly out of character. His poetry is all youth, its very faults requiring youthful feeling for an apology; and to know that he has grown old—that he is bald wrinkled, venerable—is like some unnatural hocus-pocus—some hideous metamorphosis we would rather not have seen even in melodrama. Moore has not sobered away, twilight-wise, as he might have done. His wit and song have kept admiration so warm around him, that he has forgotten his sun was setting—that it was time the shadows of his face grew longer—time that his pen leaned toward life's downward horizon. The expression on this face of frisky sixty, is of a flogged-up hilarity that is afraid to relax. Moore will look facetious and dining-out-ish in his coffin.

I see that Wallack has added lecturing, as a new branch, to his profession, and is very successful. Mr. Barry, the stage-manager of the Park, is to try on the same experiment to-night at the Society Library. "Two strings to your bow" is a good economy in any profession, and there are sundry professions, the duties of which do not interfere, for instance, with authorship. A man who should read two hours before going to bed, and write for the first two hours after sunrise, would give time and attention enough to any literary pursuit, while the business part of the day, and a good part of the evening, would be still left unoccupied. Actors particularly (so capricious is fortune with them) should have a brace of vocations, and a poet, with an honest trade besides, is more likely to have his "lines fall in pleasant places."

It appears by the English papers that Madame Catalani indignantly denies being dead! She is still living, and capable of enjoying "good living," at her villa, near Florence. The American story, which went the rounds of the papers some time since, of a man whose capacious throat had "swallowed a plantation and fifty negroes," finds its counterpart in the villa and its dependants, which have come out of the throat of Madame Catalani. I was fortunate enough to enjoy much of her hospitality when in Italy, and there are few establishments that I have seen where the honors were done with a more princely liberality and good taste. She was then, as she is probably still, a well-preserved and handsome woman, of majestic mien, and most affable manners, and at her own little parties she sang, whenever asked, as well as ever she had done in public. She seemed to me never to have been intoxicated with her brilliant successes, and to have had no besoin of applause left like a thirst in her ears—as is the case with popular favorites too often. Her husband, M. Valabreque, was a courteous man and a fond husband, and their children were on an equal footing of social position with the young nobility of Florence. Most strangers who see anything of the society of that delightful city, come away with charming remembrances of Madame Catalani.

WASHINGTON'S BIRTHDAY is growing into a temperance anniversary, probably much to the pleasure, and a little to the surprise of the distinguished ghost. There was a grand temperance celebration at the Tabernacle last evening, at which the eloquent author of the Airs of Palestine, Rev. John Pierpont, delivered an address. By-the-way, it is an overlooked feather in the cap of temperance, that we owe to it the pleasant invention of KISSING. In the course of my reading I have fallen in with the historical fact, that, when wine was prohibited by law to the women of ancient Rome, male relatives had the right of ascertaining, by tasting the lips of their sisters and cousins, whether the forbidden liquor had passed in. The investigations of this lip-police, it is said, were pushed with a rigor and vigilance highly creditable to the zeal of the republic, and for a time intemperance was fairly kissed away. Subsequently, female intoxication became fashionable again (temperance kisses notwithstanding), and Seneca (in his Epistolæ) is thus severe upon the Roman ladies: "Their manners have altogether changed, though their faces are as captivating as ever. They make a boast of their exploits in drinking.* They will sit through the night with the glass in their hands, challenging the men, and often outdoing them." Now, by restoring the much-abused and perverted kiss to its original mission, and making of it the sacred apostle of inquiry that it was originally designed for, it strikes me that the temperance-committees would have many more "active members," and the cause would assuredly grow on public favor. I submit the hint to that admirable enthusiast, Mrs. Child.

There are two establishments in the city of New York which should be visited by those who require stretchers to their comprehension of luxury—Meek's furniture-warehouse, behind the Astor, and Tiffany's bijou-shop, at the corner of Warren street and Broadway. In a search I have lately made for a bookcase of a particular fancy, I have made the round of furniture-warehouses, and, as a grand epitome of all of them—a seven-story building, crammed with furniture on every floor—I should recommend the mere idle sight-seer to spend a morning at Meek's for his amusement. Upon the simple act of sitting down has been expended as much thought (in quantity) as would produce another Paradise Lost. Some of the chairs, indeed, are poems—the beautiful conception and finish of them, taken into the mind with the same sensation, at least, and the same glow of luxury. The fancies of every age and country are represented, those of the Elizabethan era and the ornate fashion of Louis XIV. predominant, though tables and sofas on Egyptian models are more sumptuous. At so much cost, they ought to put the mind at ease as well as the body. And, by-the-way, the combining of couch and chair in one (now so fashionable) would have pleased the Roman dames, whose husbands kept chairs for women and mourners—a man's sitting upon a chair (in preference to a couch) being considered a received sign of deep mourning or poverty. Few people can trust their taste to go into such an immense warehouse as Meek's and select (in one style, and that style suitable to their house, condition, and manner of living) the furniture for an establishment. It would be a good vocation for a reduced gentleman to keep taste to let, holding himself ready to take orders, and execute them at discretion, according to the suitabilities of the employer.

Tiffany's is a fashionable pleasure-lounge already, his broad glass doors and tempting windows being at one of the most thronged corners of Broadway. It is better than a museum, in being quite as well stocked with surprises, and these all ministering to present and fashionable wants. Where resides the prodigious ingenuity expended on these superb elegances and costly trifles, it would be hard to discover. And the seductive part of it is, that there are articles for all prices, and you may spend a dollar, or five hundred, in the same dainty line of commodity!

The times are "easy," if we can judge by the articles that find plenty of buyers. I heard yesterday

* They also became the cause of tipping in others, for it grew into a common practice at Roman suppers to drink a glass to every letter of a beauty's name—the longer the more toasted.

"Nævina sex cyathis, septem Justina bibitur."

that a shopkeeper in Broadway had imported several ladies' dresses, priced at one thousand dollars each, and had no difficulty in selling them. Mr. Meeks informed me that, of a certain kind of very costly chair, he could not keep one unsold. It was certainly a superb article, made of carved rosewood and purple velvet; price (for a single chair) one hundred and fifty dollars! We have not yet adopted, in this country, the French custom of ornamenting dinner-tables very expensively with silver vases and artificial flowers, nor has the old Roman custom ever been resumed, I think, of placing the "household gods" upon the table. The aspect of a supper-table in Cicero's time, indeed, must have been beyond the show even of Bourbon sybarites; the guests in white and scarlet robes, with chaplets of roses, myrtle, or ivy on their heads, lying by threes on couches covered with purple or embroidered with gold and silver—a crowd of slaves, chosen for their beauty, waiting within the square formed by the tables, and dressed in tunics of the brightest colors—over all a canopy of purple cloth, giving the room the appearance of a superb tent—the courses brought in with a regular procession marching to music—last (not least heightening to the effect), the custom, borrowed of the Egyptians, of bringing in a skeleton, in the midst of the feast, to furnish a *foi*l to the enjoyment. All these were common features of Roman luxury at the time when Rome had the treasures of the earth at her disposal, and probably will never be reproduced in the same splendor, unless we rebarbarize and make war upon Europe under a military chieftain.

The February rehearsal of spring is over—the popular play of April having been well represented by the reigning stars and that pleasant company of players, the Breezes. The drop-curtain has fallen, representing a winter-scene, principally clouds and snow, and the beauties of the dress-circle have retired (from Broadway) discontented only with the beauty of the piece. By-the-way, the acting was so true to nature, that several trees in Broadway were affected to—budding!

"Ah, friends, methinks it were a pleasant sphere,
If, like the trees, we budded every year!
If locks grew thick again, and rosy dyes
Returned in cheeks, a raciness in eyes,
And, all around us vital to their tips,
The human orchard laughed with rosy lips."

So says Leigh Hunt.

THE LAND OF INTERMEZZO.—If spring be cognate to one poetical subject more than all others, it is to the single dreamy fable upon which are founded three immortal poems—one by Thomas Moore, one by Lord Byron, and the third (quite as beautiful as either) by the Rev. George Croly. The last—"THE ANGEL OF THE WORLD," by Croly, and the first, "THE LOVES OF THE ANGELS," by Moore, are issued in extras of the Mirror. The other, Byron's "HEAVEN AND EARTH" (so universal are the works of the noble bard), we took for granted was already within the reach of every reader. Apart from the excessive beauty of these poems, it is curious to peruse them with a view to comparison—to read first the short and simple story of "Haruth and Maruth," and then study the different shapes into which it is cast by the kaleidoscope imaginations of three of the master-minstrels of the time.

[Stay—do you live in the country, dear reader? Have you a nook near by—(natural)—or can you go to one in imagination, or will you come to ours—where our spirit is likely to be—that is to say, while scribbling this page, this glorious morning? For spring makes a madhouse of a city's brick walls, and we must think in the country to-day—live, bodily, where we will.]

Here we are, then, in a deep down dell—the apparent horizon scarce forty feet from us—nothing visible that has been altered since God made it—and a column of clear space upward, topped by the zenith, like a cover to a well—this dell the bottom of it. (The zenith off, we should see heaven, of course!) In my pocket are the three poems abovementioned, and a few editorial memoranda—but we will bind ourselves to nothing—not even to talk about these poems unless we like, nor to remember the memoranda. Idleness was part of Paradise, and with the weather of Paradise it comes over us, irresistibly.

To bring heaven and earth together—to make heaven half earth, and earth half heaven—is the doomed labor and thirst of poetry; and of these three poems, the desire for this pleasant intermezzo is the exclusive under-tow, the unexpressed, yet predominating stimulus. To Byron (with his earthly mind unmodified), complete heaven would doubtless have been as unpalatable as were evidently the mere realities of earth. He, and Moore, and Croly, have seized upon the eastern fable, of angels made half human and mortals half divine, to give voice to the dumb ache of their imaginations—an ache as native to the bosoms of the "Mirror parish," as to these three immortal subjects of mortal Victoria. (She ought, by-the-way, to wear a separate crown for her loyal immortals—the undying men of genius who are her subjects exclusively, and whose fame is, at least, usque-millennial and a thousand years over.) Each of these has pulled down angels to the love of flesh and blood—(the happiness each would least like to lose, probably, in becoming an angel)—but there are differences in the other particulars of their half-and-half Paradise, most characteristic of the qualities of the different poets, and pleasant stuff for your idle hour's unravelling, oh reader, rich in leisure!

But this land of Intermezzo—this kingdom of Midlings—this beatific, and poet-loved half and half! Let us talk of it some more!

We are inclined to think that HALF WAY, in most things, is where happiness dwells. We say so timidly, for we live in a country famous for extremes. It must be Heaven "No. 1," to tempt the Yankee! Paradise, which lies between earth and heaven, would be poor stock in Wall street! The best—only the best and most exciting, in the way of pleasure, for this market—Rags, or the best broadcloth, the only wear:—Sullen privation or sudden luxury, the only living:—Stars, or no actors:—Millions, or hand-to-mouth:—Perfectly obscure, or highly fashionable! Medium—intermezzo—there is (quasi) none in America!

In this sweet land of Intermezzo we find ourselves, of latter years, laying up treasure. Quiet lives there. Revery is native there. Content dwells nowhere else. Modesty retires there when she would escape envy, for there envy never sets foot. St. Paul saw that land when he said—"Give me neither poverty nor riches." "Something I must like and love," says old Feltham, "but nothing so violently as to undo myself with wanting it." Travel where you will, up to middle age (says a certain Truth-angel, who sometimes stoops to our ear), but abide, ever after, in the land of Intermezzo!

But, in the land of Intermezzo does not live FAME! It is a land with an atmosphere of sober gray, and fame is the shadow of one living in the sun. If we may preach to the poets among our flock of parishioners, we should say, forego this shadow! Think of it as it is—only a shadow. Value it as you do the shadow of your friend—nothing, but for the substance that goes before. Live in the land of Intermezzo, and let fame find you—taking for it no more care than for your shadow when you walk abroad. Write—for the voice the soul wants—the utterance without which the heart seems over-full—but be not eager for the world's listening! Fame is sweet when it comes unbeckoned. The world gives, more willingly than it pays on demand. In the quiet fields of Intermezzo, pluck flowers, to dry unseen in your bosom, and if, by chance, years after, they are unloaded in the sun, they will be thrice fragrant for their shaded keeping. Amen!

When books were scarcer and scholars given to longer incubation, a pocket companion called a GO-WITH-ME, was the fashion—(Vade-mecum, it you like it better in Latin). It was commonly a favorite author, sometimes a volume of maxims, oftener yet a book of devotion. The monks profess to entertain themselves in all odd hours and quiet places with their pocket BRIEVIARY—the concentrated and vital essence of missal and prayer-book. We liked better, in our youth (Heaven assail us!) a self-compiled breviary of beloved poetry—a book half scrap, half manuscript, picked from newspapers and copied from readings—and, in a protracted youth (enriched with a most plentiful lack of anything-to-do), we struck together, with pin and paste, sundry consecutive volumes which had their consecutive day. Various were their uses! There have occurred deserts, in our travels though most of our loves and friendships, which could only be pleasantly crossed in the company of such caravans of poetry. There have been thoughts born without words to them, aptly fitted to a vehicle by this varied repository. We have been fed through many a famine of hope, supplied through many a drought of tears and memory, by these timely resources. We have them yet. The longer poems we are giving to our friends in the numbers of the Rococo. The shorter ones we purpose giving in the Mirror, or possibly in a sort of mosaic extra—imparting thus, piece-meal, the whole of our BRIEVIARY of IDLENESS. Here and there, it is possible, we may give something you have seen before, but that will not happen often—for we have frequented most, the least known shelves of libraries, and loved most the least-famed authors. Here is a stray passage upon roses ;—(but we don't give you the best first!)

"We are blushing roses, bending with our fulness,
Midst our close-copped sister-buds warming the green coolness.

Whatsoever beauty wears, when it reposes,—
Blush, and bosom, and sweet breath—took a shape in roses.
Hold one of us lightly!—see from what a slender
Stalk we bow in heavy blooms, and roundness rich and tender.

Know you not our only vital flower—the human?
Loveliest weight on lightest foot, joy-abundant woman?"

What we like about that is the well-contrived entanglements compelling you to stop and re-read it, and so find a new beauty—like the wheel of your carriage coming off amid scenery you are travelling through too rapidly.

The Vesuvius of new books has naturally its Pompeii, in which merit, among other things, is buried quietly under the cinders and remains long trodden over and forgotten. Upon the excavations and disinterments in this city of literary oblivion is founded, in a great measure, the NEW MIRROR project of a library of favorite authors, and perhaps the most interesting of its restorations to light, as yet, is the delicious poem by CROLY, "THE ANGEL OF THE WORLD." I hardly think there are ten people in the United States who know this sweet book, though it is founded on the same eastern fable as Moore's "Loves of the Angels," and, to my thinking, a finer expansion of that splendid story. BYRON'S "Heaven and Earth," and the two poems just named are all founded on this same tradition, and it is curious to read them with a view to comparison, and see of what varieties of combination the kaleidoscope of genius is capable. Byron makes his the vehicle of his audacious defiance toward sacred things, while Moore's is all love and flowers, perfume and gems. Croly's is more a poem of strong human passion and character, and comes home more to the human "business and bosom." It is written (the latter) with wonderful splendor of diction and imagery. Few poetical works will be more popular in this country, I think—profoundly as it has slept in Lethe for the last twenty years. Croly is a clergyman (the Rev. George), and, having a fat living from the church of England, his Pegasus has never been in hack harness, and, I think, shows the ease of pasture-gambol in his verse.

Tammany Hall is graced to-day with a showy transparency representing a huge owl sitting in a Gothic window, and a Latin motto beneath, declaring that "the countenance is the index of the mind." I can not see, by the morning papers, any explanation of the objects of the club whose celebration comes off under these ominous auspices; but if it be a physiological society, as the motto would purport, they have chosen well. It were a good symbol also for a club of "minions of the moon," if they were less fond of a lark—better still for a society of poets, if poets were ever (which is doubtful) fond of poetical society. It is the poet's cue to look wise and say little, to get his victual by night, to differ altogether in his habit, as owls do, from birds of other feather. Virgil, indeed, makes the owl a poet :—

"And oft the owl with rueful song complained
From the house-top,* drawing long doleful tunes."

Professor BRONSON, whose lectures are "going on" and still "come off," draws a very attractive picture in his advertised prospectus. "The lectures," he says, "will be comparatively free, an admission of twenty-five cents only being required." For this, among many other things, he promises that "a key shall be given to the connexion of natural and spiritual things by which all mysteries may be explained!" "The true source of our ideas on the sublime and beautiful will be explained, together with the true principles of taste and criticism."—"The French baquet, or grand mesmeric reservoir, will be exhibited, and minerals, vegetables, animals, and several persons at a time magnetized; the German rotary magnetic machine for similar purposes; also three or four hundred engravings pertaining to physiology, &c., and each auditor furnished with them gratuitously, with the evening programme; also several hundred paintings (many expressly imported from London), to illustrate the subjects of mineralogy, botany, natural history, and astronomy. A common rose will be shown, as developing from the bud to full bloom, appearing four or five feet high, in all its glory; a butterfly in the same manner several feet square, passing through its three stages of development; and all the phenomena of the natural heavens, to wit, the sun, moon, and stars." As a list of articles to be had for twenty-five cents, I think you will allow the professor's advertisement to be worthy of statistical preservation.

* Probably not called an altic in Virgil's time.

The girdle put around the earth by the English is, to my mind, less powerfully figured forth in their drum-beat (so finally alluded to by WEBSTER) than in the small colonial-looking newspaper—the same article, whether it come from the pagodas of India or the snows of Canada, the sheep-hills of New South Wales, or the plantations of the Bermudas. By the kindness of my friend AARON PALMER, Esq. (who does business with arms as long as the world's axis, and has correspondences and exchanges newspapers with every corner of the globe), I have by me, at this moment a file of English papers published at the seat of the Great Mogul, Delhi, and another published at Bermuda. You would think them all edited by the same man and supplied by the same contributors. They are filled principally, of course, with old English news, but the Delhi paper (only ninety days from the heart of Hindostan!) has some strictures on Lady Sale and her book, which show she is not to be a heroine without the usual penalty of envy and malice. An officer-contributor to the Gazette says:—

"We were nearly as much on the tiptoe of expectation for Lady Sale's book as the good folks of England, though the secret of its origin was here better known. It would be amusing to print, in parallel columns, the opinions on her production given by the press of India and England; c'est à dire, of those who know what they are writing about and those who do not. I am safe in asserting that, for every eulogium her ladyship has received in England, she has got at least one set down in India."

The same writer says, in another part of his letter:—

"We look forward to the notice of our Scinde doings in England. Let not the profit of the acquisition blind you to the iniquity. Our late dealings with that country commenced in perfidy, and went on in blood and rapine. May they not end in retribution!"

We have commonly two sweet hours of idleness in the afternoon—two hours that are the juice of our much-squeezed twenty-four hours—two hours that (to borrow a simile from the more homely and toothsome days of authorship) are "as sweet as a pot of lambaire electuary with a stick of licorice." At four o'clock,

"Taking our hat in our hand, a remarkably requisite practice," we button our coat over our resignation (synonym for dinner), and with some pleasant errand that has been laid aside for such opportunity, stroll forth. It is sometimes to an artist's room, sometimes to a print-shop, sometimes to an unexplored street, sometimes to look off upon the bay, or take a ride in an omnibus—now and then to refresh our covetous desires at Tiffany's. We have lately been the subject of a passion for pawnbrokery, and taken the precaution to leave our little pocket-money at home, we have tampered with exploring and price-asking in these melancholy museums of heart-ache.

"Twiddling" our pen, this morning (as Leigh Hunt represents Apollo doing with a sunbeam), we fell to speculating on what it was that made us think, whether we would or no, of the pyramids! This is last-page-day, and we had forty things to write about, but there!—there! ("in my mind's eye, Horatio!") stands the "wedge sublime" of a pyramid! Doubtless the ghost of some word, deed, or similitude of the day before—but why such pertinacity of apparition? We did, nor noted, nothing pyramidal yesterday. We watched the general; hanging up, in his new-garnished office, Dick's fine print of Sir Walter's monument, and that, it is true, is a pyramid in Gothic. We bought yesterday, in our pawnbroking researches, a bust of a man of genius whom we admired because he found leisure to be a gentleman—the accomplished victim of circumstances, just dead at Andalusia—and a pyramid, truncated by a thunderbolt near the summit, were an emblem of his career that may well have occurred to us. We were talking and thinking much yesterday of Moore's confessed completion of his literary lifetime; and what is his toil, just finished, but the building of an imperishable pyramid for the memory of his finished thoughts.

Stay!—an anecdote of Moore occurs to us. He is dead, "by brevet," having seen to (and got the money for), his own "last words;" and when, by the sythe of the relentless mower, Tom Moore shall be no more, to know more of his more personal qualities (what an echo there is to the man's name!) will add spices to his embalming. An old lady in Dublin, who was one of Moore's indigenous friends (he was only aristocratic as an exotic, perhaps you know), told us the story. It is not likely to get into print except by our telling for it records a virtue; and Moore is a man to have selected his biographer with a special caveat against all contributions to his "life" from its grocery source—his respectable father, the Dublin grocer, probably caring little for his "brilliant successes," and only cherishing in his brown-paper memory the small parcel of his virtues. But—to the story—(which Moore told the old lady, by the way, on one of his reluctant Irish visits).

Moore had just returned from his government-office in the West Indies, a defaulter for eight thousand pounds. Great sympathy was felt for him among his friends, and three propositions were made to him to cancel the debt. Lord Lansdowne offered simply to pay it. Longman and Murray offered to advance it on his future works, and the noblemen at White's offered the sum to him in a subscription. This was at the time subscriptions were on foot for getting Sheridan out of his troubles; and while Moore was considering the three propositions just named, he chanced to be walking down St. James street with two noblemen when they met Sheridan. Sheridan bowed to them with a familiar "how are you?"—"D—n the fellow," said one of the noblemen, "he might have touched his hat! I subscribed a hundred pounds for him last night!"—"Thank God! you dare make no such criticism on a bow from me!" said Moore to himself. The lesson sank deep. He rejected all the offers made to relieve him—went to Passy, and lived in complete obscurity, in that little suburb of Paris, till he had written himself out of debt. Under the spur of that chance remark were written some of the works by which Moore will be best known to posterity.

This reminds us (and if we don't nab it now, it may never again be nabable), of a laugh at Moore's expense in a company of very celebrated authors. They were talking him over, and one of the company quoted Leigh Hunt's simile for him—"a young Bacchus snuffing up the vine." "Bah!" said another, "don't quite deify the little worldling! He is more like a cross between a toad and a cupid!"

We have got hold of a string and we may as well pull away to see what will come of it. We had long forgotten two or three trifles tied together, of which this last paragraph is one, and we remember now, another anecdote told by the caustic person whose comparison we have just quoted. He said that Byron would never have gone to Greece but for a tailor in Genoa. The noble bard, he went on to say, was very economical, as was well known, in small matters. He had hired a villa at Genoa and furnished it, with the intention of making it a permanent residence. Lord and Lady Blessington and a large society of English people of good style were residing there at the time. In the fullest enjoyment of his house and his mode of life, Byron wanted a new coat; and, having some English cloth, he left it with his measure in the hands of a

Genoese tailor, with no particular instructions as to the making. The tailor, overcome with the honor of making a coat for an Eccellenza Inglese, embroidered it from collar to tail, and sent it home with a bill as thickly embroidered as the coat! Byron kept the coat for fear of its being sold, as his, to an actor of English parts on the stage, but resolutely refused to pay for more than the making of a plain and plebeian garment. The tailor threatened an attachment, and Byron assigned over his furniture to his banker, and finally quitted Genoa in disgust—ready of course, as he would not otherwise have been, for a new project. From indignation at an embroidered coat-tail the transition to “liberty or death,” “wo to the Moslem!” or any other vent for his accumulated bile, was easy and natural! He embarked in the Greek cause soon after, and the embroidered coat was not (as it should have been) “flung to the breeze at Salamis”—the banner of inspired heroism!

So was the tale told. So tell we it to you, dear reader. It is no damage to the gods or demigods to unpedestal them sometimes. The old Saturnalia, when masters and slaves changed places for a while, was founded on the principle in nature that all high-strung-itudes are better for occasional relaxing.

We have not done what we sat down to do—which was to run a pretty parallel between a fame and a pyramid—apropos of some trifles bought of a pear-shaped pawnbroker. Pity that ideas once touched are like uncorked claret—good for one draught only! We shall never dare to take up the figure again, so we may as well hand you the gold thread we meant to have woven into it—a little figurative consolation to the unappreciated poet. To him who is building a pyramid of poetical fame, a premature celebrity is like the top-stone laid on his back and carried till he has built up to it. We wish those of our contributors whom we neither publish nor praise, would apply this “parmeceti” to their “inward bruise.”

We take the vital centre of New York to be a certain lamp-post from which radiate five crossings—one pointing to the Astor, one to the American Museum, one up Broadway, one up the Bowery, and the fifth (dead east) to the office of the NEW MIRROR—the which office is clearly visible from the palm of the spread hand upholding this medio-metropolitan lamp-post. Having conceived—(you have—have you not, dear reader?)—the laudable purpose of subscribing for the Mirror's second year (now on the eve of commencing), your first inquiry is the geography of “ANN STREET,”—upon which money-welcoming spot shines nightly this central lamp of the municipality. You arrive safely at the Astor. You glide past its substratum of apothecaries, perfumers, goldsmiths, and hatters, and arrest your footsteps at the triple corner studded with three of the notable structures of Manhattan—the imperial Astor, the goodly St Paul's, and the marvellous museum with the “fifty thousand curiosities.” You now face due southward. Helm down (coat-skirt down Vesey street, that is to say), and you head east southeast, laying your course exactly. Before you lies a crossing of flags by which you may safely reach the island palm of the spread hand (holding two granite posts guarding a lamp-post), and, once there, you luff a little to the right, and follow the pointed forefinger of that same hand to the opening lips of Ann street. Cross over, keep down a few doors to the right, and “there you are”—(there we are!)—walk in!

And now, dear sir! (besides your receipt and the benign smile of the Brigadier) what will you have? Our visibilities to the naked eye are small, but there be caves and storehouses of our primrose-colored wares, and if we affect the Turkish fashion of a specimen shop, with room only for one purchaser at a time, it is for another reason besides saving the rent. Philosophic, like us, is the French Amphitryon, who does not show to his delicate guest the pièces de resistance. The roasted joints stand upon a side-table, removed from view, and if slices are handed you over your shoulder, it is with an apposite commendation which the sight of the whole dish would fatally smother. Small as the shop is, however (parva, sed apta mihi!) the welcome is spacious! All who come there, come with a parishioner's regard, self-chosen to our literary flock, and none turn the latch without unlocking our heart with the same door-handle. (“Qualis rex, talis grex!”) Having found comfort in loving ourselves, we venture the more easily to love those who are like us.)

Touching this shop (of which we have now given you the pictorial chart), we shall have more to say hereafter. It has its history. Our landlord is a “picked man of countries,” and has written his pleasant book. Around us “volcanoes belch their fires” of prodigal literature, and opposite us there is a deep-door by which the modest wits about town descend to WINDUST's, for news and things more succulent. There sometimes dives the brigadier, to lunch with needful celerity on the busy Saturday, and thence emerge daily and shiny-ly (after their pot of ale) refreshed, the manufacturers of public opinion. Oh, from our modest window, we see sights! But, enough for now!

I had a half-hour's interview with the TALKING MACHINE this morning, and found him a more entertaining android than most of my wooden acquaintances—(the man who thinks for him being a very superior person). I must first give you a tableau of the room. A German woman takes your half dollar at the door, and points you to a semi-boxed-up Turk (query: Why are all automata dressed in turbans?)—a Turk seated in a kind of low pulpit, with a green shirt, a good complexion, a very fine beard, and a pearl breastpin. Out from under his shoulder issues a bunch of wooden sticks, arranged like a gamut of pump-handles, and behind this, ready to play on his Turk, sits Mr. Faber, the contriver. (I immediately suggested to Mr. F., by the way, that the costume and figure had better have been female, as the bustle would have given a well-placed and ample concealment for all the machinery now disenchantingly placed outside—the performer sitting down naturally behind, and playing on her like a piano.*) The Turk was talking to several ladies and gentlemen when I entered, and my name being mentioned by one of the party, he said, “How do you do, Mr. —?” with perfect distinctness. There was a small musical organ in the room, and one of the visitors played “Hail Columbia!” the automaton singing the words “like a man.” There was no slighting or slurring of diphthong or vowel, syllable or aspirate. Duty was done by every letter with a legitimate claim to be sounded—the only fault being a strong German accent (which of course will wear off with travel), and a few German peculiarities, such as pronouncing v's like w's, gargling the gutturals, &c., &c.

I understood Mr. Faber to say that he was seven years contriving the utterance of the vowel e. Mr. F. has a head and countenance fit for a speech-maker (maker of the gift of speech, I mean)—a head of the finest model, and a mouth strongly marked with intelligence and feeling. He is simple, naïf, and enthusiastic in his manners. The rude musical organ in the room was his own handiwork, and at the request of one of the ladies he sat down to it and played a beautiful waltz of his own composing. He may well be completely absorbed, as he seems to be, in his androïdes. It says anything, in any language. It can not cough—not being liable to bronchitis; nor laugh—being a Turk. But it can sing, and has a sweet breath and well-governed tongue. In short, it is what would pass in the world for “a very fine man.” Besides those whom God has made (Boyle, the philosopher, calls the world “an automaton of God’s making”), I know of but one or two attempts before this to make a talking-machine—the famous one by Von Kempelen, and the celebrated brazen head constructed by Friar Bacon. What could be uttered by this unthinking brass has not come down to us. The statue of Memnon could utter musical sounds, and Maelzel’s chess-player could say “echec.” A much more useful automaton than any of these, Mr. Faber’s included, was one invented by one of the brothers Droz—“a child, sitting at a desk, who dipped his pen in the ink and wrote in French whatever was dictated to him” (the inventor, of course, somewhere concealed). It struck me as a great pity, indeed, that the admirable ingenuity and perseverance of Mr. Faber should have been wasted on a superfluity—for there is more talking than enough). Albertus Magnus invented, with thirty years’ labor, an automaton servant, who would open the door when any one knocked, and salute the visitor—capable, of course, of being able to say “not at home,” and so saving the conscience of the domestic; and this was, perhaps, worth the labor. Less meritorious, again, was the automaton fly made of iron by Regiomontanus, in the 14th century, which would make the circuit of the room with a buz, and return to its master. Something in the Pygmalion line has been attempted within a few years by a Swiss mechanician, Maillardet, who constructed a female with a “bosom that would heave for an hour,” once wound up. She would also play forty tunes on the piano with her fingers, and look languishingly by casting her eyes down—almost enough for one woman to do! I think these are facts enough for a very speculative essay on the value of such offices as may be performed by the body without the aid of brains.

* A suspicion has since crossed my mind that I may here have stumbled on an explanation of the great mystery of this supernatural addition to the figure, the supernatural continuance of articulation in the female requiring, perhaps, some android assistance to the lungs. If so, it would appear that woman, like “the church, can not do without a bishop.”

I have been prevented, of late, from going about as much as my wont, and have hardly seen or heard more of the city doings than the country readers of your paper. This will account, if not apologize, for some lack of variety in my letters. I broke through my freside habits last night, and went to the Methodist chapel in Madison street, to hear the Rev. Mr. Maffit’s diatribe against “Boz”—admittance twenty-five cents. My surprise on being called on for money at the door was pleasurable, for I rejoice in an injustice turned by its victims “to commodity.” Two hundred people were well amused, and religion (per one of its ministers) was profited fifty dollars in pocket. Except in this light, however, I should call the using of “Boz” for a pulpit text a decided case of le jeu ne vaut pas la chandelle. (The church gas-lights seemed to be of that opinion, for they suddenly paled their fires ten minutes before the conclusion of the lecture!)

While I think of it—Dickens has contradicted the report, published in the London papers, touching his durance for debt. I am glad it was not true. Mistakes of positive assertion and of this personal character are so rare in the respectable English papers, that I mentioned it in my letter to you with no suspicion of its being an error—the assertion supported, moreover, by the rumors, rife to the same purport, when I was last in London. The reports, doubtless, were born of the coupling of two well-known facts—the decrease of the prices paid for his books by publishers, and the increase of his “pledges,” with no corresponding reductions apparent in his style of living. The statement having once appeared in the papers of his own country, an expression of sympathy (as far off as the other shoulder of the world) was but complimentary to Mr. Dickens.

Mr. Maffit’s discourse was more of an event to me than to most of his audience, probably; for his eloquence made a great impression upon me when I was a boy between ten and twelve years of age, and I had not seen him since. He preached at that time in the Bromfield chapel, Boston (in the next street to the one in which I lived), and was then a “new light” in the Methodist church, and drew crowds after him. I left my play eagerly to hear him, and I have often since wished for an opportunity to analyze the peculiar delight he gave me—for it was all pleasure, without the slightest effect in the way of religious impression. I could fill my letter with what came to me upon the turned-back leaf of seeing Mr. Maffit in the pulpit again, but the comparison between the effects of oratory upon tastes mature and immature, though interesting elsewhere, would be out of place here. He was not so much changed as I anticipated. Macready has always reminded me of him, and they are still alike. Mr. Maffit did not use to shave his temples, and from this peculiar tonsure, his forehead looks higher and his hair less Hyperian and more oratorical than formerly.

He commenced with some general remarks as to the charm of variety in customs and manners, and the common English weakness of condemning pitilessly every departure from the cockney standards and peculiarities, trying, by this test only, every country under the sun. This part of the oration was written in lambent and oily-hinged periods, and delivered—really, in music absolute! I felt the spell over again. It is in the voice and accent of Mr. Maffit that the philtre lies hid. So sweet a tone no other man has, in my knowledge. His inflexions, so long as he remains unexcited, are managed with the skill of the subtlest rhetorician. He hides the meaning of his sentences under the velvet words that are sweetest to linger upon, and to press with emphasis, and in this department of oratory he seems to me unsurpassed. He soon broke the spell, however. As he left generalizing, and got from poetry to analysis, he began to show bad taste and clumsy discrimination, and fell into a kind of grimalkin sputter of sarcasm, that let down his dignity sadly. The audience began to applaud, and, with their applause, he grew inflated, both in matter and manner, and for the last half hour of his discourse was entirely off his feet—trashy, incoherent, and absurd—most applauded, however, when most incomprehensible. (And this ill-bestowed applause may easily have been the reverend orator’s Delilah.) I remember little of what he said after the first fifteen minutes. There was a good deal of illustration to show that the “Yankees could whip the British,” and much more of such clap-trap, and Dickens and Mrs. Trollope were each served out with as much pulpit-pounding and bitter epithet as is commonly given the devil, at a dose. One comparative testimony given by the orator is valuable, as he speaks on both sides with authority. He assured us that the society in every part of this country, “from the Aroostook to the Sabine,” is as refined and delightful as any society whatever, except that of heaven. He did not mention how long he had resided in the latter country, but he had been a travelling guest of American families for the twenty years since he left Ireland, and had been treated everywhere as a son and brother, and spoke advisedly. I could wish this Irish and celestial evidence in our favor might be put (for smocking) into the pipe of the London Quarterly.

I have discovered lately that the household-gods have a vocabulary of their own. Search after a trifling invention led me to Windle's furnishing-shop in Maiden lane, and after spending an hour in marvelling at the mind that has been expended upon the invention of household conveniences, I asked for a catalogue of the shop's wares. A pamphlet of twenty-one pages was handed me, and I give you, for your despair, a few of the names of the necessary utensils by which your comfort is ministered to: "Pope's heads and eyes," "Shakers' swifts," "beefsteak pounders," "faucets and bungstarts," "bootjacks and leg-resters," "salt and spit-boxes," "Chinese swings," "Chinese punk in boxes," "sillabub-sticks," "oven-peels," "allblaze-pans," "ice-cream pagodas," "paste-jaggers and cutters," "crimping and goffering machines," "sugar-nippers and larding-pins," "bread-rasps and sausage-stuffers," etc., etc., etc. This is vernacular, of course, to the ladies, but Greek to us.

Apropos of words—there should be a replevin (by poetry upon vulgar usage) to restore the word diaper to its original meaning. Ford says in one of his plays (The Sun's Darling):—

"Whate'er the wanton spring,
When she doth diaper the ground with beauties,
Toils for, comes home to autumn."

Diaper means literally, to embroider with raised work—after a stuff which was formerly called d'Ipre, from the town of Ipre in Flanders, where it was manufactured. There is such a load of descriptiveness in the word that it is a shame it should be lost to poetry.

Moore's carefully revised and corrected edition of his works is republished in this country at the price of three dollars and a half. Half of it, at least, is uninteresting to the general reader, consisting of his satires (with names left in unexplained blanks), local poetry, translations from the classics, and a mass of labored notes. The popular portions, consisting of "The Loves of the Angels," "The Irish Melodies and Sacred Songs," and the "National Airs, Ballads, and Miscellaneous Poems," have been published in three extras of the Mirror—five shillings for all of them. This will form as beautiful an edition of the enjoyable part of Moore's poetry as could be wished, and as cheap as beautiful.

CHARLES DIBDIN, "The Bard of Poor Jack," as he is commonly called, is one of those authors less known than his works, particularly in this country, where his songs are familiar to every lip, and his name hardly recognised. General Morris has made a collection of all the songs of Dibdin that are universal in their popularity, and has added others which from their bold and graphic excellence have been commonly attributed to him. This shilling extra of the Mirror will become, I think, the sailor's classic, embodying, as it does, all their most remarkable songs.

Montgomery's "World before the Flood," one of the sweetest poems in the English language, is also in press for the "Mirror Library." On looking over the biography of this good man and true poet, I find, by-the-way, the following passage, referring, I believe, to the father of one of the editors of the Intelligencer: "Mr. Montgomery removed to Sheffield (England) in 1792, and engaged himself with Mr. Gales, the publisher of a very popular newspaper, at that time known by the title of the Sheffield Register. Mr. Montgomery became a useful correspondent to this paper, and gained so far the good opinion and affection of Mr. Gales and his family, that they vied with each other in demonstrating their respect and regard for him. In 1794, when Mr. Gales left England to avoid a political prosecution, Montgomery, with the assistance of another gentleman, became the editor of the Register." Critics have unanimously agreed that "The World before the Flood" is the best production of Montgomery's muse, and it certainly is a noble and pure structure of elevated imagination. Among the sacred classics, Montgomery, I think, will rank first.

SORROW'S RELUCTANT GATE.—This last-turned leaf, dear reader, seems to us always like a door shut behind us, with the world outside. We have expressed this thought before, when it was a prelude to being gayer than in the preceding pages. With the closed door, now, we would throw off restraint, but it is to be sadder than before. It is so with yourself, doubtless. You sometimes break into singing on entering your chamber and finding yourself alone—sometimes you burst into tears.

There is nothing for which the similitudes of poetry seem to us so false and poor, as for affliction by the death of those we love. The news of such a calamity is not "a blow." It is not like "a thunderbolt," or "a piercing arrow;" it does not "crush and overwhelm" us. We hear it, at first, with a kind of mournful incredulity, and the second feeling is, perhaps, a wonder at ourselves—that we are so little moved. The pulse beats on as tranquilly—the momentary tear dries from the eye. We go on, about the errand in which we were interrupted. We eat, sleep, at our usual time, and are nourished and refreshed; and if a friend meet us and provoke a smile, we easily and forgetfully smile. Nature does not seem to be conscious of the event, or she does not recognise it as a calamity.

But little of what is taken away by death is taken from the happiness of one hour, or one day. We live, absent from beloved relatives, without pain. Days pass without our seeing them—months—years. They would be no more absent in body if they were dead. But, suddenly, in the midst of our common occupations, we hear that they are one remove farther from us—in the grave. The mind acknowledges it true. The imagination makes a brief and painful visit to the scene of the last agony, the death-chamber, the burial—and returns weary and dispirited, to repose. For that hour perhaps we should not have thought of the departed, if they were living—nor for the next. The routine we had relied upon to fill up those hours comes round. We give it our cheerful attention. The beloved dead are displaced from our memory, and perhaps we start suddenly, with a kind of reproachful surprise, that we can have been so forgetful—that the world, with its wheels of minutes and trifles, can thus untroubled go round, and that dear friend gone from it.

But the day glides on, and night comes. We lie down, and unconsciously, as we turn upon our pillow, commence a recapitulation that was once a habit of prayer—silently naming over the friends whom we should commend to God—did we pray—as those most dear to us. Suddenly the heart stops—the breath hushes—the tears spring hot to the eyelids. We miss the dead! From that chain of sweet thoughts a link is broken, and for the first time we feel that we are bereaved. It was in the casket of that last hour before sleeping—embalmed in the tranquillity of that hour's unnamed and unreckoned happiness—that the memory of the dead lay hid. For that friend, now, we can no longer pray! Among the living—among our blessings—among our hopes—that sweet friend is nameable no more! We realize it now. The list of those who love us—whom we love—is made briefer. With face turned upon our pillow—with anguish and fears—we blot out the beloved name, and begin the slow and nightly task of unlearning the oft-told syllables from our lips.

And this is the slow-opening gate by which sorrow enters in! We wake on the morrow and remember our tears of the past night; and as the cheerful sunshine streams in at our window, we think of the kind face and embracing arms, the soft eyes and beloved lips, lying dark and cold, in a place—oh how pitiless in its coldness and darkness! We choke with a suffused sob, we heave the heavy thought from our bosom with a painful sigh, and hasten abroad—for relief in forgetfulness!

But we had not anticipated that this dear friend would die, and we have marked out years to come with hopes in which the dead was to have been a sharer. Thoughts, and promises, and meetings, and gifts, and pleasures, of which hers was the brighter half, are wound like a wreath of flowers around the chain of the future, and as we come to them—to the places where these looked for flowers lie in ashes upon the inevitable link—oh, God! with what agonizing vividness they suddenly return!—with what grief, made intenser by realizing, made more aching by prolonged absence, we call up those features beloved, and remember where they lie, uncreased and unvisited! Years must pass—and other affections must “sweep, and garnish, and enter in” to the void chambers of the heart—and consolation and natural forgetfulness must do their slow work of erasure—and meantime grief visits us, in unexpected times and places, its paroxysms imperceptibly lessening in poignancy and tenacity, but life in its main current, flowing, from the death to the forgetting of it, unchanged on!

And now, what is like to this, in nature (for even the slight sympathy in dumb similitudes is sweet)? It is not like the rose’s perishing—for that robs only the hour in which it dies. It were more like the removal from earth of that whole race of flowers, for we should not miss the first day’s roses, hardly the first season’s, and should mourn most when the impoverished spring came one more round without them. It were like stilling the music of a brook for ever, or making all singing-birds dumb, or hushing the wind-murmur in the trees, or drawing out from nature any one of her threads of priceless repetition. We should not mourn for the first day’s silence in the brook, or in the trees—nor for the first morning’s hush after the birds were made voiceless. The recurrent dawns, or twilights, or summer noons, robbed of their accustomed music, would bring the sense of its loss—the value of what was taken away increasing with its recurrent season. But these are weak similitudes—as they must needs be, drawn from a world in which death—the lot alike of all living creatures that inhabit it—is only a calamity to man!

SPRING is here, and, with its earliest sunshine, Broadway puts out its first flowers in bright colors and gay drapery. It is a lounge we should love were we idle. We do not write for Autolycus, nor for Timon. (Thieves and misanthropes do not commonly take the papers.) And as all other classes of mankind yield to the gregarious instincts of our race, we feel free to discourse of Broadway as a place beloved. Beloved it is—by the philanthropist, interested in the peccant varieties of his fellow-creatures; by the old, who love to look upon the young; and by the young, who love to look upon each other; (ah! the celestial quality of youth!)—by the serious, for whom there would seem to be resorts less thronged with sinners (if need were), and by sinners, who are at least spared the sin of hypocrisy, for, with little disguise, they “love one another.” Now, if beautiful women are not laudable objects of contemplation and curiosity, as St. Anthony avers (and he is welcome to let them alone), we are not warned against beautiful children, nor beautiful horses, nor the bright sunshine, nor the gay product of the silkworm, nor the “stuffs from Colchis and Trebizond.”

Very handsome—isn’t she? And apparently in a very great hurry, and apparently very much disgusted at being seen in the street at all! You would think, now, that that lady’s coachman was ill and that she was, for this once in her life, walking alone to her mother’s. But she is more amused at this moment than she will be again to-day—and to-morrow she will take the same walk to be happy again. She has a husband, however, and a beautiful house, and not a wish (that money can gratify) ungratified. And her drawing-rooms are full of exquisite objects of art. She might stay contentedly at home, you think? No! She was a belle, pampered with admiration when she married, and she married a cynical and cold-blooded parsnip, who sits like a snarling ogre among his statues and pictures—a spot on his own ottoman—a blemish in the elegance of his own house. She married him for an establishment, but forgot he was a part of it—dazzled with the frame, she overlooked the hideousness of the picture. And he knows this—and likes her, with his statues, as his property—and is pleased to have her seen as his wife—though she is the wife to but one part of him, his vanity! She finds it hard to feel beautiful at breakfast, with her husband on the other side of the table, and he finds it hard to be very bland with a wife who looks at his acrid physiognomy with a shudder.

A superb house with him in it, is like a fine tulip with an adder in it. But she is a woman, and whether she has a heart or no, she has a well-cultivated vanity, and unluckily, the parents who taught her to secure luxury in wedlock, taught her no foresight as to her more needful supply of admiration. Love, she would like very well—but admired she must be! And too cold and worldly to be imprudent, and too proud to be willing to seem pleased with the gaze of Broadway idlers, she still thirsts after this very stare which is given to her beauty by the passers-by, and has very little happiness beyond her daily hurried walk on the crowded paré. She’ll make a match of sentiment if she gets another chance, or, at any rate, will marry for some love and less money.

“How are you?”

“How are you?”

What would a new-dropped angel think of these two unanswered questions? Indeed, what would an angel think of that smiling fellow who exchanged this nonsense with me. He is one of a thousand in the city who, “like the prodigal, squeezed through a horn,” are happy from having got through the tightest place of this mortal life. Though his dimensions are immeasurably smaller than they were not long ago, they are so much easier than they grew to be after, that he feels as if, like Uncle Toby’s fly, there was room enough in the world for him now. He is easy with the rebound after being broke with overstraining. He was a merchant, reputed to have made money enough. Sensitive and punctilious in all the relations of life, he was particularly soigné of his commercial honor. Never a breath sullied that clear escutcheon! For this he was supposed to be over-careful—for this he was inflexible where his heart would have prompted him to be indulgent—for this, it was soberly believed, he would sacrifice his life. His wife was (and has since proved herself by trial) an admirable woman, and with fine children and good looks of his own, he was one of those fallacious contradictions of the equal distribution of mortal happiness. Well—his star began to descend from its apogee, and he courageously lugged out his philosophy and retrenched his expenditure. And then began an agony of mind which could be increased, even hereafter, by the increased capacity of the mind—for, short of reason overturned, he could suffer no more. A thousand years of a common tenor of life would seem shorter than those six terrible months of sinking into bankruptcy. But now comes the curious part of it! He suddenly took the benefit of the bankrupt law. And instead of lying still prostrate upon the ground, crushed and humiliated—instead of hiding his head, as he longed to do while he still promised to pay, degraded, spiritless, lost, to the enjoyment of life—instead of still seeming an object of pity to the most ruthless sufferer by his fall—up, like a snapped spring, he bounds to the empyrean! He could not be gayer with his debts paid and his fortune in his hands again! He walks the street, smiling, and with a light step. He is a little smarter than he used to be in this dress. He eats well, and the wrinkles have retreated, and his eyes have thrown open their windows, and (as you saw when he passed) there is not a merrier or more fortunate-looking idler in this merry Broadway! Now, quere?—Is there a provision in nature for honor to cast its skin? Becomes it new, scarless and white, after a certain wear, tear, and suffering? Does a man remember, till, with the anguish of remembering, he forgets? Has God, in our construction, provided a recuperative, to guard us against over self infliction? Can we use up our sense of shame with over-working it, and do we come then to a stratum of self-approval and self-glorification? Enfin—is this inward whitewashing confined only to money-spots, and is nature hereby provided with a corrective check to our implacabilities of pocket?

TO OUR ONE WITHDRAWING SUBSCRIBER.

SIR: A French writer wittily turns the paradox: "Il faut de l'argent même pour se passer d'argent"—(is it necessary to have money to be able to do without it)—and we please ourselves with suspecting that it is only amid the forgetful ease of possession that you can have made up your mind to forego us. If so, and your first se'enight of unmirrored solitude prove heavier to bear than the aching three dollar void balanced against it—so! The pathos of this parting will have been superfluous.

Our connexion, sir, though born of a "promise to pay," has been a matter of friendship; and in dissolving a friendship, it is desirable, on both sides, to have back again the secrets safe only in a friend's keeping. It is common and easy, as you well know, for one man to "give" another "a piece of his mind," and we ask that piece of yours upon which we have stitched the lining of ours. For the goods and chattels we have sent you, that are yours, of course. Such third-person matters as stories and poesies, pictures, drolleries, gossipries and novelities—the visible contents of our primrose cover—are—like the three dollars paid for them—like the ear of rye up a schoolboy's sleeve—irreversible! They are yours. The money is (was) ours. We would not willingly change back! But other values have passed to your keeping, that are not strictly commodities of barter. We have vent-pegs, that are, as it may chance to turn out, largesses or weaknesses. We are known, favorably or unfavorably, for an incontinence of ourself—a certain need to expand upon our neighbor. If we are happy it runs over the brim—if we are sad, prodigal, too, with our tears. Withal, we have a natural incredulity of breakings-off—walking upright upon all manner of eternities till we have tumbled over the end. Do you see how subject we were to improvident confidences?

To fix upon the wares we would have back, you have only to ask what a stranger could buy of us, and subtract it from what you know of us. Could you stop us in the street, for example, and buy the fulness of our heart from us—such as has overflowed upon our last page often and unaware—for sixpence? Could you send to us for a thought that has sailed out of our bosom upon our private tear, and enclose a shilling for two copies through the village postmaster? Could you point us out to a dirty newsboy, and tell him "that gentleman had last week some pangs and some pleasures, and I will give you sixpence to see them in a Mirror, with their expressed gall or honey?" Could you touch us upon the shoulder in Broadway and say, "Sir, I should like to have sent to me, weekly, the thoughts which are stirred by all you enjoy or suffer, expressed in choice rhetoric and printed on fine paper; and you may throw me in a fine steel plate, a new story or two, all the gossip of the week, some criticisms and any fine poetry that has come to your hand—for which I will pay you sixpence per weekly copy?" Oh, there is much that you have bought of us with which you have no business, ceasing to be our friend! And when you have sent that part back, your money's-worth will still stretch its long legs comfortably under the covering blanket of the remainder!

Well, sir, adieu! There is some machinery, of one kind and another, that will now cease to labor, at sixpence per week, for your gratification—sundry male printers and engravers, sundry female folders and stitchers, our post-office boy and wheelbarrow, such trifling rail-roads and steamers as have been built to convey the Mirror to you—these and we, with our best brains and contributors, we are sorry to say, will now cease to minister to you—but you will have, instead, weekly, an unspent sixpence! Of this sixpence, much foregone for, we wish you joy in the overbalancing value of possession! And so, sir, drawing back our complicated machinery that you may lift this small silver bridge from between us, we bid you once more, over the chasm of removed equivalent, a respectful adieu!

TO OUR PUNCTUAL FIRMAMENT OF FIXED STARS.

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN: In the eleven thousand shining sixpences which duly rise and dispense their silver light upon our way, we see of course the "Heaven of eternal change" toward whose "patines of bright gold" we have been long stretching with tiptoe expectation. We trust that, like the unpocketable troop whose indefatigable punctuality you emulate, there are still comers to your number unarrived, and that the "Lost Pleiad" (the single heavenly body upon whose discontinuance to rise we indited the foregoing epistle), will come round again in his erratic orbit, and take his place in the constellation he has deserted. We give notice here, however, that, at eleven thousand, we shall, like the nuns of St. Ursula, stop numbering. There have been virgins since the shelving of the bones of the "eleven thousand virgins of Cologne," yet the oft-told number is still told, without increase, in the holy tradition. We believe with the sainted sisterhood that human credence can go no farther—that 'twixt millions and billions of virgins the disciple's mind would not be likely to discriminate. You will still permit us, therefore, to cast our horoscope upon this nominal number. As other starry sixpences fall into the chinks of boundless space, the perceptible increase of our brightness will alone tell the tale—but they will be marked and welcomed in the careful astronomy of our ledger.

You are ours, oh pleasant eleven thousand! The vain astronomer casts over the sky his net of parallels and meridians and calls the caught heavens his own, but the stars he numbers are not, like ours, convertible to things to eat. We will envy Herschel when he can change sixteen of his entrapped stars for a dollar—when he can dabble with their shining faces as we with our constellated “flips” You are ours, and therefore we will care for you.

It occurred to me in an omnibus to-day, that it would be curious to know with what eyes angels watch us. My opinion as to the importance of “every hair of our head” had been somewhat modified within the previous half-hour by a look at one or two of my own (hairs) through a solar microscope, and the thought naturally suggested itself, that if the eyes of our spiritual guardians were microscopic (as they may easily be), there was no so great marvel in the care they take of us. It was a warm, pleasant morning, and I was letting myself ramble and look into windows. An exhibition of a solar microscope came in my way, and I went in. The wall of a large room was apparently swarming with rats and mud-turtles when I opened the door, and this was some of the dust from a fig, held on the point of a pin, and magnified five million times. I had seen many of these experiments in college, of course, but one hears so many wonderful things, when one is growing, that I do not remember being much astonished in those days. It was different now, for I really never was more amused and amazed then at the snakes in the drop of vinegar, and the formidable apparatus of a certain un-nameable little customer, whose like I had occasion to slay in great numbers in the poetical Orient. To bring the thing home to my own business and bosom, however (the microscope, not the pediculus!) I begged the exhibitor to show me, magnified, one or two of my own hairs. I plucked one from my bump of imagination and another from my bump of acquisitiveness, and gave them both to him, with some curiosity to know if the roots would show the difference in the soil. Somewhat to my surprise there was a difference. He placed them carefully on his instrument, and the root of the imaginative hair was shaped like a claret bottle (and about its size), while that of the acquisitive hair was like a short fat porter bottle—the hairs themselves being, to the roots, in about the proportions of the necks to the bottles. I must say I was truly delighted at the discovery of this analogy, and seldom have bought so good a fact for twelve and a half cents. As I said before, “the hairs of our heads” being “all numbered,” my guardian angel knows how many dozen I have remaining of my imaginative claret, and how my acquisitive porter improves by age, and he looks after it all like one of Biminger’s clerks, letting none “fall to the ground” without careful putting down. The exhibitor asked me to try another, but a man thinks twice of plucking out a hair, impressed with the idea that it will have a hole in his head as big as a claret-bottle! I declined.

But if every hair of my head be as big (to a microscopic eye) as a bottle of porter with a neck a mile long, and my body in proportion, at what a very moderate charge (thought I, as I rode down) am I carried a mile in the unmagnified omnibus! What would have become of us if God had inflicted upon us a Babel of the eye instead of the ear, making different men see things through different lenses, diminishing and microscopic! What work for the lawyers! I was beginning to turn my mind to the quantity of magnified body that one unmagnified soul could properly inhabit (as a house may easily be expanded till one tenant is an absurdity), when the omnibus stopped. It is a very good subject for an extravaganza in Thomas Hood’s vein.

There is a certain curiosity to know “how the thing went off,” even though the show in question was a bore to the spectator. Perked up people think that only such curiosity as would sit well upon George Washington should be catered for in print, but I incline to think that almost any matter which would be talked about by any two people together would be entertaining to one man reading by himself. So I think I may put down what I saw at a show that was advertised as an “EXHIBITION OF LAUGHING GAS.”

My younger readers may perhaps require to be told that nitrate of ammonia, like himself, has a soul that fire will burn out of it. When the lamp over which it is held gets too hot “to be stood” any longer, up rises a little whitish cloud which has most of the properties of common air, but which has a sweet taste and an agreeable odor, and will pass into any human soul’s body upon very slight invitation. Once in, however, it abuses the hospitality extended to it, by immediately usurping all the functions of the body, and behaves, in short, extremely like another more notorious enemy, who, “when admitted into your mouth steals away your brains.” The stimulus of this intoxicating gas to the nervous system is very surprising. Sir Humphrey Davy administered it to Southey the poet, whose feelings are thus described: “He could not distinguish between the first effects and a certain apprehension, of which he was unable to divest himself. His first definite sensations were a fullness and dizziness in the head, such as to induce the fear of falling. This was succeeded by a laugh which was involuntary, but highly pleasurable, accompanied by a peculiar thrilling in the extremities—a sensation perfectly new and delightful. For many hours after this experiment, he imagined that his taste and smell were more acute, and is certain that he felt unusually strong and cheerful. In a second experiment he felt pleasure still superior, and has since poetically remarked, that he supposes the atmosphere of the highest of all possible heavens to be composed of this gas!”

There were between three and four thousand people assembled in the Tabernacle. A platform in the centre was hemmed in with benches, and it was advertised that “twelve strong men” would be there to prevent injury to the spectators. It was mentioned in the advertisement, also, that the gallery would be reserved for ladies, though I thought that the inviting of ladies to be present at the removal of all restraint from men’s tongues and actions, was a strong mark of confidence in the uppermost qualities of our sex. After some impatience on the part of the audience, the professor appeared with his specimen of “the highest possible heaven” in an India-rubber bag. The candidates for a taste of it were many and urgent, crowding up from below like the applicants to St. Peter, and the professor seemed somewhat embarrassed as to a selection. A thick-necked and bony youth got possession of the bag, however, and applied his mouth to the stopper. After inhaling its contents for a minute or two, he squared away and commenced pummeling the professor in the most approved butcher-boy style—which was possibly his idea of the “highest possible heaven.” The “twelve strong men” rushed to the rescue, the audience applauded vociferously, and the lad returned to his senses, having been out of them perhaps three minutes. A dozen others took their turn, and were variously affected. I was only very much delighted with one young man, who coolly undertook a promenade over the the close-packed heads of the audience. The impertinence of the idea seemed to me in the highest degree brilliant and delightful. There was one corsair-looking man who rushed up and down the stage, believing himself on the deck of some vessel in pursuit of another, and that was perhaps the best bit of acting. One silly youth went to and fro, smirking and bowing, and another did a scene in "Richard the Third," and a tall, good-looking young man laughed heartily, and suddenly stopped and demanded of the audience, in indignant rage, what they were laughing at! There was nothing else worth even putting down among trifles, and I was glad when it was over. The only imaginable entertainment in such an exhibition would be to watch the effect of self-abandonment on those whose characters we know when under restraint. Among acquaintances it would be charming—particularly if the subjects were ladies. I should recommend to the professor to advertise himself as open to invitations to administer his "highest possible heaven" to small and select parties. It would be better than a masquerade and not so unlawful.

The etymology of April lies in dispute between aperire, the Latin word for open (because at this time the earth is preparing to open and enrich us with its gifts), and Aphrodite, one of the names of the goddess of love, to whom the month is especially consecrated. By either derivation, it is the month of promise, and like the trees, we feel the juices lovingly ascending to our top, and we can venture to enter upon that "promising" which is the very "air o' the time," without fearing that "performance" will be "the duller for the act." And, by-the-way, while we think of it, we have been beset by a friendly letter to cut short the present year, and commence a new volume with January 1, 1845. We must be excused for preferring, altogether, a commencement in April, accident and convenience quite aside. There is a fitness in commencing (putting out our first leaves) with nature. After nature's example, we may venture, with our first issue, to promise a prodigal summer of flowers and a harvest of fruits, though there we trust the parallel will stop, for we do not propose with nature to "take our leaves" in October and fall presently to decay! No, sir! Let us commence our primrose-colored series in primrose-time. Our hopes are April-ish, as looks our cover. We hope to swell, not dwindle, from April into May—to give out our products more lavishly in June, and have a "harvest home" of prosperity in August. What says old Drayton of the order of such matters!—

"The primrose placing first, because that in the spring
It is the first appears, then sweetly flourishing,
The azure harebell, next, with them they neatly mixed;
'T' allay whose luscious smell they woodbine placed betwixt;
And 'mong those things of scent there pricked they in the lily."

—a fair picture of the art we mean to make manifest in our medley of literary flowers. There are some productions whose "luscious smell" requires the "allaying" of common sense; and, now and then, a lily of plain truth and simplicity, "pricked in" between high-wrought prose and gorgeous poetry, makes charming harmony. The periodical-writers of all times have practised this trick of diversity. "If a magazinier be dull" (says Goldsmith) "upon the Spanish war, he soon has us up again with the ghost in Cock-lane."

A writer

("but nameless he, for blameless he shall be") complains of us for taking liberties with the queen's English. He does not specify his instances. Mr. King, of the American (we were not aware before that he was the proprietor of the "King's English!") makes an outcry like Milton's stall-reader,* at the title of the "Rococo." If Mr. King will give us one of his newspaper-words that conveys, like the single word Rococo, the entire periphrasis of "intrinsically valuable and beautiful, but accidentally and unjustly obsolete," we will send the offensive word back to France, where we got it. Meantime, as Costard said of his new word "remuneration," we "will not buy nor sell out of it." But, withal, we confess to great responsibility, in the adoption of new words and the restoration of old, and we do not spare, upon every instance, careful consideration. It is due to the literature of our country, that those who write for popular prints should sanction no corruptions of the country's language; but it is also due to the dignity of America, since she has come of age, that her popular writers should claim her share of improving and embellishing her inherited language, and even the right of departing from the usage of the old country, if the inevitable changes, which there creep in, should not be conformable to American taste, customs, climate, or scenery. We would not further, but we certainly would not hinder, the having a language of our own, for we think one language little enough for a republic of fifteen or twenty millions. But, dependance upon England apart, the language of a country is a garden that requires looking after, and it needs grafting and transplanting as much as weeding and pruning. Who is to be the gardener? One man? One Mr. King of the American? No—but fifty men, if there be fifty popular writers. There are no trustees of the language appointed by congress. There is no penalty for the launching of words new and unfright-worthy. Professors of colleges (unless accidentally men of genius like Longfellow) have no power over the uses or abuses of language. With whom lies the responsibility? we ask again—for, upon its language, much of the repute and credit of the commonwealth is inevitably adrift. And we say again, with American popular writers lies the burden of it. Mr. Irving's administration of his trust in the country's language is worth to us any two common years of Washington legislation, and will tell with more favorable weight upon our history than any two sessions of our late congresses. We claim to have our small share of this same responsibility, and our small privilege of suggestion and appropriation. The language has owed much to exotic introduction in other days, and it may still be lawfully enriched by the same process; and if we, in our reading, or in our travel, have stumbled on more compact vehicles for meaning, and can bring them effectively into common use at home, we shall venture to claim praise for it. Indeed, we have long had half a mind to devote a corner of the Mirror to a record of the births and disinterments of the words new and prematurely buried. Whom would that horrify, besides Mr. King? Why, for example, should not the beautiful old English word summer-sunstead (descriptive of the season of the sun's stay or stead in summer) be restored to poetry—its relapse into Latin by the word summer-solstice being wholly unavailable from its technical inelegance? This is rather a forced instance, no other occurring to us at the moment; but our readers will remember pausing with regret, as we have, over the sweet passages which are the graves of lost words.

To the invariable question of "What's the news?" the invariable answer is, "Nothing at all!"—yet he who answers delivers his budget in the same breath—a death and a marriage perhaps the least of his announcements. I (the diarist) have no news—none! I could “swear the gods into agues” that I have none! Yet to entertain a visitor—to divert a country-cousin—to bridge over an awful pause—what would one naturally say? I ask for information.

The Park theatre is open—(very open—being nearly empty!)—Mitchell's, on the contrary, is very close—being nightly full. But I do not know that any one cares about theatricals—to have them written or talked about, that is to say. Critics, both of the drama and of literature, I think, have, of late, been shoved aside. The public are tired of interpreters to their taste, and express their opinions, now, by acclamation, not by one man's pen. Who cares now (as the Aurora said a day or two ago) for a column of criticism on a personation of Hamlet? If there is to be a play, or a concert, it is pretty fairly understood, in the Bowery as in Broadway, in Hyperborean Chelsea as in the tropics of the Battery, what will be the quality of the goer's money's-worth. And three lines in the morning-paper, when it is over, is all that is needful or advisable to be written on the performance. So, God speed the decline of criticism! Apropos, Miss Turnbull, the danseuse, has now become one of the regular Povey-dom of the Park—engaged “since the memory of the oldest inhabitant.”

The cutaneous epidemic of the season has attacked the museum with great violence—a breaking out of its inside humors covering at present the entire surface. In plainer phrase, Mr. Barnum has completely covered the prominent and spacious fronts of the American museum with oval paintings of the beasts, birds, fishes, and Indians “on show” within, and a more holiday-looking castle of curiosity could scarcely be invented. The “Kentucky Minstrels” are the allure just now, and the pictures of the four ebony bards, large as life, over the balcony, and the remainder of the be-windowed and be-pictured building, with its indefatigable flags, its lantern steeple-high, and its lofty windmill of Punch and Judy, must all fall very gayly, to say the least, on the sober eye of a Johony Newcome.

The funny little hat, small as Mercury's, which was laughed at upon the bagmen's heads six months ago, has fairly prevailed, and is the mode, nem. con. Truly, “every time serves for the matter (of hat) that is born in it.” The eye can be argued with, and convinced. It was stoutly maintained, three months ago, by one who is well known as “the complete varnish of a man,” that this fashion of hat was but a porringer thing, and would never thrive in Broadway. And now nothing but that scant porringer looks tip-top and jaunty! Orlando Fish (who, as tiler number one, is a man of more potent function, for my politics, than Tyler the first) is making money out of the blocks which my facetious dandy friend recommended him rather to make tops of than tops on. Well—fashion goes by “jerks of invention,” and as Holofernes says, “the gift is good in those in whom it is acute.”

Reception is raging up town. All ladies may be said to be “in a parlous state,” who have not a specified morning to “receive.” Six months ago, the six profane mornings of the week were the property of six privileged ladies by right of first seizure. Such pretenders to “society” as did not visit the week through in this established succession were as “damned” as Touchstone's friend, the uncourtly shepherd. This was a vexatious invention, for, in the stereotyped innumerableness of fashionable houses, a man might blissfully visit nowhere, and yet go undetected for a culprit “not in society.” Heaven be praised, however, for the “safety in numbers,” and especially for the imitative gregariousness of our country. There are now five hundred families who “receive!” Not quite, as yet, in inextricable confusion, however. A man of a generalizing mind may still comprehend his morning's work, and with fast horses and invariable French leave, may still refresh all necessary memories as to its existence. There is the Monday set, and the Tuesday set, and the Wednesday set, and so on through the week—crystallized according to neighborhood, with one or two supercilious and recusant exceptions. The engravers are in full cry, however, and every week brings out new cards, “at home on Monday,” “at home on Tuesday,” etc., etc., and we shall soon be by a general acknowledgment of the fact that nobody is more intensely at home than before, and everybody who has a house is simply “at home” whenever those who wish to see them can find leisure to ring the bell.

I don't know, by-the-way, that the compliment has been paid our country by foreign naturalists, of ranking us with the more virtuous wild-fowl, esteemed for their gregariousness. The Rev. Sydney Smith shows his lack of zoological learning in not modifying his abuse of us by remembering that “no birds of prey are gregarious.”—“Of wild-fowl,” says Grew, “those which are the most useful fly not singly as other birds, but are commonly gregarious.”—“Then for birds of prey and rapacious animals,” says Ray, “it is remarkable what Aristotle observes, that they are solitary and go not in flocks.” Long live our multitudinous hotels, our animated extinguishment of distinction by imitation, our altogetheriness of lordship and ladyship! The danger is in the stiffening of this fluidity of rank and condition before the scoria are recognised, and before the mould of aristocracy can be dexterously handled. We shall have lords and ladies or their catamounts tantamounts (bother! which is the word?) a few days, at least, before the millenium. This big orchard of green fruit is too large not to be destined to ripe and rot, reasonably and seasonably.

Apropos—I observe a spot advertised for sale that I have always looked upon as the most beautiful and aristocratic property in this country—an island cradled by the Niagara, and in itself the best cradle nature could possibly form for the family of a luxurious exclusive. It is about eleven miles above the falls, an arrow-shot from the American shore (with Grand island between it and the Canadas), and contains a hundred acres of land, charmingly wooded and varied, which have been turned into a paradise by one of the most refined gentlemen of this country. A beautiful villa crowns it, and baths, hot-houses, and all appliances to luxury, are there, and all fenced in by the bright water about to rush over Niagara. The island is called Tonawanda—a delicious word for the name of a home. One sighs to think that a little money could buy such a paradise for one's own.

I observe a new fashion of cap, which gives the ladies an air

“As pert as bird, as straight as bolt,
As fresh as flower in May,”— a cap that would fit a child's double-fist, worn perched upon the summit of the organ of self-esteem, looking like an apple-blossom on the top-knot of a French chicken. It is one of those fashions whose worth depends upon the wearer—very telling upon a pretty coquette, and very ludicrous, topping dignity or sentiment.

Original literature in the lump is sadly at a discount in this country. Miss SEDGWICK, in the plenitude of her intellectual power, has taken to school-keeping. Another authoress, very superior to Miss Sedgwick in the qualities necessary to saleable writing, Mrs. MARY CLAVERS, is employed in the same ill-suited drudgery. COOPER, I understand, makes nothing by his American editions, and thinks of publishing only in England and importing a few copies at English prices. American literature has nearly ceased, or it is scattered in such small rills of periodical-writing that it will make no mark upon the time. PRESCOTT is an exception, it is true, but Prescott is a man of fortune, and writes for fame, not bread and butter. Why should not a subscription be raised by the patriotic to give fair play and studious leisure to the original and poetic genius of Mrs. CHILD—wasted now on ephemera for newspapers! Money left for such uses, or given by the living, would better embalm the memory of the giver than many a common charity. What is to be the effect on the national character of the present hiatus of original American literature, and how long is it to last? For how long are we to take our mental wardrobe second-hand from England, and read to the world as all wearers of unfitting garments seem—out of harmony with our shape and model from nature?

It is stated in the Boston Daily Advertiser (in an article headed "THE GREATEST AMERICAN AUTHOR"), that, in a work of no small authority and importance in Germany, a continuation of Frederick Schlegel's "History of Literature," a writer by the name of SEALSFIELD is put at the head of American literature, and defined as "the great national painter of the characteristics of his native land, who has unfolded the poetry of American life and its various relations yet better than Cooper and Irving." The editor of the Advertiser remarks that the critical opinion of this work will be taken implicitly on this subject by half Europe, and no American authority, at least, will be able to gainsay it. He continues: "We have, therefore, taking shame to ourselves for past ignorance, made all reasonable inquiries in this matter. We have applied at the principal bookstores and libraries in the neighborhood, but to our surprise neither books or author have as yet been heard of. The Athenæum, Burnham, Little and Brown, and Redding and Co., are all in ignorance. We have applied to all literary circles to which the humble conductors of diurnal publications have the entrée, but a hearty laugh has been the only answer to our anxious queries.

"We are yet unwilling to let this sin of ingratitude rest upon American readers. We call upon the public to assist us and solve the question, 'Where is Sealsfield?' and absolve our country from the shame of ignoring an author, who has been crowned with the laurels of trans-Atlantic criticism. We trust the subject may seem as important to the public as to ourselves, and that if, as seems probable, some publisher who lives by stealing the brains of foreign authors, has added to his crimes by incarcerating in the dungeons of Cliff street, or Ann street, or Water street, this hero of our literature, let that public, or the 'American copyright club' have him disinterred immediately."

The probability is that better information than I can give will be brought out by this "call upon the public," but meantime I will record, that this great American author, Sealsfield, is a German, who has resided in this country for some years, returned to Germany a few years since, and could probably be heard of in the neighborhood of his intrepid reviewer and nomenclator. He probably "furnished the facts" for the review himself. He is ("to give the devil his due") a good writer, and while in this country contributed some excellent articles to the old Mirror.

Leaving to other people my share of curiosity as to the source of the Niger, I should like to know the author of now and then a joke that goes the round of the newspapers. Genius is the most promiscuous of animals, and is found in all sorts of disreputable places, dress, and company—in quack advertisements and negro wit, as often as in patented inventions and publications of gilt-edge. There is a kind of unlabelled genius, which is wholly incapable of being turned to any profit, but which how and then starts out from an unsuspected quarter and takes probability by the beard with a delicious intrepidity. This morning's paper has an instance—a three-line story of a Yankee who bought a bushel of shoe-pegs, and finding they were made of rotten wood, sharpened the other ends and sold them for oats! Quite aside from the fun of that, it is worth analyzing as an absurdity of the most brilliant audacity of invention. Will the respectable author oblige me with his autograph?

CONFAB IN THE CLOISTER.—Not a small part of our brain-twisting, dear reader, is the exercise of an office that, at Roman feasts, was delegated to a particular servant called the NOMENCLATOR. His business was to inform the guests of the names and ingredients of the dishes set before them. Simple as it seems when well done, there are few things more difficult to do well. It is to describe a book, or a series of books, in the compass of a phrase, and that phrase attractive to eye and ear, piquant, novel, and provocative of curiosity! Try your hand at expressing the contents of a charcoal-cart in the compass of a diamond!

It would amuse the reader to be present sometimes when No. 4, Ann street, is resolved into a committee of two for the finding of a good name. (Witlings, avant!) The firm is called together by a significant motion of the forefinger of the brigadier founder of the concern—called into THE CLOISTER, that is to say, a room of the proportions of a lady's shoe, extending to our (No. 4's) immediate rear. The door being closed, and the window-curtain dropped to exclude the uninspiring view of the clothes-lines of No. 4, up-stairs—the one chair having become occupied by his Serenity, and the remainder of the committee being seated upon the upright end of a ream of paper, the business in hand is forthwith put. Let no one imagine, because he may have assisted at naming a friend's child, that he has any, the most vague, idea of the embarrassments that ensue! We have a passably fertile invention. We have whiled away the dull transit of what is commonly called "a liberal education" by a diligent search after such knowledge as was above being "turned to account." We have been a profligate of verbal intemperance, we mean to say, and are likely to know the bin where lies in cobweb your old word, toothsome and tasteable. But for all this, it is no easier. Like the search after happiness, ten to one the thing sought lies near home—overstepped at starting! But let us particularize.

The Brigadier.—My dear boy (a facetious way he has of addressing the rest of the committee!)—my dear boy, stop looking out of that back window, and give your mind to business! Cast your eye over these four incomparable tales! Irving's "Wife!"

Committee.—You don't say he's married, general!

Brigadier.—Tales, my dear boy, I speak of tales—a new series of tales that want a good name! Come, think of it, now!

Committee.—Describe me the article, brigadier! What is the purpose, plot, character? Is it one book or a series? "Open up," as Bulwer says, and let us know definitively what is wanted!

Brigadier.—You know how many men of genius there are who are only capable of brief inspirations—

Committee.—Inspired to the length of a short tale. Well!

Brigadier.—You know that long tales are now out of fashion. People are tired of them.

Committee.—Indeed? Well!

Brigadier.—You know that such men as Brougham, Canning, Macauley—statesmen who are scholars and men of genius, and might have been authors—have occasionally given vent to their pent-up imaginations by a tale for the magazines.

Committee.—I do—witness Brougham's magnificent story of the "man in the bell." Well!

Brigadier.—We know what is good, that goes by with the flood, don't we?

Committee.—We are professed tasters. Yes.

Brigadier.—For experiment, then, I have put together, in one number, four tales that delighted me—in more than one enchanted perusal. You shall select the next. It will go, my dear boy!—people will give their couple of shillings, if it were only for the rescue we make, for them, of things they remember and have lost sight of. There are glorious things hit off, here and there, at a heat, by periodical writers—one hit in a thousand failures, it is true, but still enough of them for a brilliant collection—and these we want to gather into our beautiful library, and embalm from perishing. See here!—"JUDITH, OR THE OPERA BOX, by Eugene Scribe"—(great, my boy, great!)"—"THE BEGGAR-GIRL OF THE PONT DES ARTS," by a German man, Hauff (ah! what a rich bit to read over and over!)"—"THE PICNIC PARTY," by Horace Smith (you know all about that?)"—and "THE WIFE," by Ireing—a worthy companion for them; and now, what shall we call the series?

Committee.—Hm—m—m. How do you like "fannoms and fopperies?"

Brigadier.—Bah!

Committee.—"Diapasms?"

Brigadier.—Poh!

Committee.—The "pomander-chain?"

Brigadier.—My dear boy, let it be English and honest! You distress me with these affectations! What have cataplasms and pomatum-chains to do with a course of light reading! Don't waste time!

Committee.—A diapasm, my charming brigadier, was a bunch of aromatic herbs made into a ball with sweet water, and, in Ben Johnson's time, worn in a lady's pocket. Gallants wore these scented balls strung in a necklace under the shirt, and so worn, it was called a pomander-chain. Pardon me, but these would be good names, for want of better!

Brigadier.—Mr. King would be down upon us, and the definition would never get through his hair! No, my dear boy! We must be ostriches, and feel the ground while we fly. Keep out of the clouds till you're "sent for!" I like and so does my regiment—I mean the public. Imagine a good name, now, that would suit a plain man!

"The russet yeas, and honest kersey noes,"

Committee.—Faith, it takes imagination to come at that, sure enough! Hark! I have it!

Brigadier.—Come to my arms! What is it? Speak quick, or it'll die in delivery!

Committee.—Did you ever hear of a river in Asia called Pactolus?

Brigadier.—To be sure. An ass dipped his head into it to be able to stop making money.

Committee.—That's the fable. And ever since there have been gold sands in the river—"or so they say."

Brigadier.—And that you think is like fugitive literature?

Committee.—I do. I was there ten years ago, and the gold sands were as scarce as good things in the magazines.

Brigadier.—You'll swear to that?

Committee.—With a reservation, I will. I went to the Pactolus one moonlight night, and filled my pockets with sand to look at in the morning. I was travelling with a caravan, and we were off before day, but there was no gold in my pocket, come daylight—sifted out, most likely!

Brigadier.—Shouldn't be surprised! "SANDS OF GOLD," then, you think would be a good name.

Committee.—SANDS OF GOLD, sifted from the flood of fugitive literature.

Brigadier.—Good! passable good! Let the committee rise.

You see how it is done, dear reader, and you will the better comprehend, from this specimen, how we came upon another—a name for a series of sacred poetry, of which we are about to issue the first number. We have called this series "THE SACRED ROSARY"—a musical word that, in old English, meant a plantation of roses, but which was afterward used to define the verses of a church-psalter, strung together with beads for an aid to memory. In either signification, it figures forth what we enrol beneath it—for a more beautiful collection of hallowed verse was never collected than this we have to offer. We have always especially loved poetry on sacred themes, and have garnered up specimens of it, and let us assure the reader that in this field of poetry there is a rich harvest ungathered. Let him look at this first number for a specimen of the mind and taste scattered abroad in these stray leaves of poetry.

It will cut up for a fact, when you have done using it as a pun, that "the first sign of spring in the city is the prevalence of spring-carts." (I borrow this of the author, and lend him, in return, an analogy of my own discovering—between sidewalks and green pastures—the simultaneous outbreak of dandy-lions with the first warm weather.) Oh, the moving! But it should be remembered by those who groan over the universal exposure of household gods and shabby furniture on May-day, that when it ceases, our now mobile republic will harden into a monarchy. The "moss" of aristocracy is not "gathered" by the "rolling stone." People must live long in one place to establish superiority for themselves or to allow it in others. Mrs. Splitfig, the grocer's wife, is but just beginning to submit patiently to the airs of Mrs. Ingulphus, the banker's wife, when May-day comes round, and away she goes with her tin and crockery on a spring-cart, to start fair again with some other pretender, in some other neighborhood. "Old families" are of little use without old neighbors to keep the record. The subduing of neighborhoods is (at present) the battle of pretension with a hydra—one set of heads sliced off, a new set is ready to come on. So, long live our acquaintance with the shabby sides of easy-chairs, and the humiliations of bedding and crockery. Some fifty May-days hence, we shall be ready to stop shaking the sugar-bowl, satisfied that the big lumps are all at the top.

The most courted value in New York at the present time is unquestionably the "nimble sixpence." The new omnibuses that have been put upon the different lines within a week or two, are of a costliness and splendor that would have done for a sovereign's carriage in the golden age. Claret bodies, silver-plated hubs, and yellow wheels, cut-velvet linings and cushions, and all to tempt the once-unconsidered sixpence to get up and ride! (Query—as to the superiority of the “mirror held up to nature,” over the New Mirror held up to sixpence?)

The racing of omnibuses seems to be agreeable to inside passengers, since it might always be prevented by pulling the checkstring—but to those who have the temerity or the dangerous necessity to cross Broadway, it is become a frightful evil. King Sixpence could regulate it very easily, if he had his wits about him. As was said before, the checkstring is always obeyed. Terrified ladies, who chance to have no fancy for riding races in Broadway, should be reminded of this leather preservative.

Those who have the bold wish to tamper with their standard of human nature can now be gratified, as there are giants at one museum and a dwarf at the other. Mr. and Mrs. Anak, at the American museum, are certainly two very tall people—more tall than comely. The flat-chested and gaunt lady looks as if she had been lengthened with a rolling-pin—her length entirely at the expense of her intermediate belongings. Not so the husband, who is a thick-lipped, big-eyed, double-fisted, knoll-backed, and thick-tongued overgrowth. For one, I do not like to have my notions of human stature unsettled, and I abhor giants. Six-foot stature is undervalued by familiarity with seven—as diamonds would be ruined by the discovery of a few as large as potatoes. I am happy to console the eclipsed six-footers and under, by the information that this large vessel of human nature does not seem intended to hold more soul. He looks like as “regular a spoon” as could be wished by those who are compelled to look up to him—his wife, apparently, of the same utensil capacity.

The dwarf at Peale's museum, Rado Scauf (that he should ever have been thought worth looking!) is a sweet-faced minion, with feet in boots looking like two cockroaches with heels to them. A two-fingered lady's glove would make him an ample pair of trousers, and his walking-stick is a sizeable toothpick. He has fine eyes, and would look like a nice lad, through a magnifying-glass. If such bijous were plenty, ladies would carry them in their pockets—portable garter-claspers and glove-buttoners. Fancy the luxury! It were worth a Yankee's while to send a venture to Lilliput, to import them.

THE CLOISTER.—Four o'clock and the Pomeridian of an April day. The brigadier's audiences are suspended to make room for a session of the committee, and the door is closed—printers, poets, engravers, stitchers and folders (these female), advertisers, carriers, agents, stereotypers, ruthlessly excluded. Truly, as Shakspeare says, “every man hath business and desire” (for the brigadier's society), “such as it is.” Long last his “sua vite in modo,” his “fortiter in re!”

Brigadier.—To business, my boy! What lies in that fourth pucker of your eyelid? Smile and let it drop away easy!

Committee.—Thirteen letters by to-day's mail, containing propositions to publish immortal works by living and mortal American authors, most of them never before heard of—postage nine and sixpence, of which please make a memorandum in my favor.

Brigadier.—Fifty-nine cents each to the cause of unbaptized literature! Are we not involuntary martyrs, my boy! Why the mischief don't you last-page the fact that we publish exclusively for the trans-Atlantics and the trans-Styxians!—never for those who can cross the water to “settle!”

Committee.—It shall be done, but there is one applicant who deserves a hearing. One of the most gifted women now living has employed her leisure in compiling a book to be used as a round game played with forfeits, or as a parlor fortune-teller. The book is to be called “ORACLES FROM THE POETS.” Questions are proposed, and by the choice of a number the inquirer is referred to an answer, in a passage selected from the poets. The selections are made with great taste, so as not only to convey apposite answers, but to make the reader familiar with the most beautiful passages of poetry. What say to that?

Brigadier.—Worth lots of money to Riker or Appleton, my boy, but we are in the rapid line, and that sort of work takes time. Besides (and here the Brigadier looked modestly at his nails), we couldn't bring our minds to make money out of the sex, my boy! Fancy a lovely woman calling on us to fork out, as her publisher! Odious word, “publisher!” It has been too long a synonym for “pirate,” and “Philistine.” A few of us immortal bards have washed and donned the gaberline of late, but we must let it air, my boy, we must let it air, before wearing it abroad—at least into a lady's presence! Think of the maid's asking you to “step into the back room,” if you called on a lady and sent up your name as her “publisher!”

Committee.—Ah! my illustrious friend and song-builder, dignity is a Minerva that needs no nurse. It jumps out of your head and walks alone. I would not only publish, but peddle from two tin boxes, if my wants would not bear diminishing, and if only this would supply them! We're earthy ants, not chartered butterflies!

Brigadier.—Ha! ha! my boy! my dear boy!

“That all the sweetness of the world in one—
The youth and virtue that would tame wild tigers—
Should thus be cloistered up!”

Who else wants to gild a gold leaf in the Mirror Library?

Committee.—Seven and two are nine—seven poetesses and two he hardlings—pleading for print! We are “Loath to refuse, but loather for to grant;”

—will you write the declinatures, dear brigadier?

Brigadier.—Make a regret-circular, my boy! Say that we are a partnership of posterity. They must die, to qualify. The “Home Library,” and the “Parlor Library,” and the “Drawing-Room Library,” and the “Knickerbocker Library,” and many more—(for whose names, see puffs and advertisements)—these publish for the equivocal immortals now living. We publish only for the immortal dead, or for the buried alive, disinterred with our own pick and shovel. Write that out, and I'll have it lithographed to save time. What next?

Committee.—We want a new head.

Brigadier.—Speak for yourself, my boy!

Committee.—A new caption, then (if you will be critical) in the Mirror. Where can I praise things, now? There's Headley's new book on Italy, worth the best laurel-sprig of my picking. There's “Amelia,” of the Louisville Journal, who has written some poetry about hearing a sermon, that traverses your back-bone like electricity, and where to praise that! George Flagg has painted a delicious sketch of my Glenmary-born Imogen, and I will praise him! I want a place to praise—

Brigadier.—Hire a pew!

Committee.—Will you give me a column?

Brigadier.—To your memory, I will.

Committee.—Well, my memory wants a column, to record the good things I should not forget to praise.

Brigadier.—Take it—take it—but for Heaven's sake be pert and pithy, crisp and critical! Nothing so dull as praise to everybody but the praised. Any-thing more?

Committee.—Yes—

"The loving mother that nine months did bear
In the dear closet of her painful side
Her tender babe, it seeing safe appear Doth not so much rejoice," as I to inform you of the approaching delivery, from the press, of "Pencilings by the Way." My travels have seemed interminable.

Brigadier.—Well, as I assisted at their birth once before, I can certify now to their being "born again." Is that what you want?

Committee.—No—for, half the book was never a book before, not having been published except in the old Mirror. I want you to make it trip

"as merry as a grig,
And brisk as bottled ale,"

that I may hurry into "calf" all I have written up to last year, and start fresh from my meridian with "Dashes at Life," and gossips in the cloister. For, as says old Wotton in the "Reliquiæ," "Though I am a cloistered man in the condition of my present life, yet, having spent so much of mine age among noise abroad, there still doth hang upon me, I know not how, a certain concupiscence of novelty."

Brigadier.—Verbum sap. sat. Shall the committee rise—by getting down off the table?

Committee.—Yes!—one minute! Have you read the proof-sheets of that glorious—GLORIOUS—say "glorious!"—

Brigadier.—Glorious.

Committee.—Hood's "Midsummer Fairies"—the most delicious "Rococo" conceivable? Yes? Be off!

From the window in which I spin my cobweb, I look directly on the most frequented portion in Broadway—the sidewalk in front of St. Paul's. You walk over it every day. Familiarity with most things alters their aspect, however. Let me, after a long acquaintance with this bit of sidewalk, sketch how it looks to me at the various hours of the day. I may jot down, also, one or two trifles I have observed while looking into the street in the intervals of writing.

Eight in the morning.—The sidewalk is comparatively deserted. The early clerks have gone by, and the bookkeepers and younger partners not being abroad, the current sets no particular way. A vigorous female exerciser or two may be seen returning from a smart walk to the Battery, and the orange-women are getting their tables ready at the corners. There is to be a funeral in the course of the day in St. Paul's churchyard, and one or two boys are on the coping of the iron fence, watching the grave-digger. Seamstresses and schoolmistresses, with veils down, in impenetrable incognito, hurry by with a step which says unmistakably, "don't look at me in this dress!" The returning omnibuses come from Wall street empty, on a walk.

Nine and after.—A rapid throng of well-dressed men, all walking smartly, and all bound Mammonward. Glanced at vaguely, the sidewalk seems like a floor with a swarm of black beetles running races across it. The single pedestrians who are struggling up stream, keep close to the curbstone or get rudely jostled. The omnibuses all stop opposite St. Paul's at this hour, letting out passengers, who invariably start on a trot down Ann street or Fulton. The museum people are on the top of the building drawing their flags across Broadway and Ann by pulleys fastened to trees and chimneys. Burgess and Stringer hanging out their literary placards with a listless deliberation, as if nobody was abroad yet who had leisure to read them. The "brigadier" dismounting from an up-town 'bus with a roll of manuscripts sticking from his pocket, and hands and handkerchiefs waved to him from the omnibus windows.

Twelve and after.—Discount-seekers crowding into the Chemical Bank with hats over their eyes. Flower-merchants setting their pots of roses and geraniums along the iron fence. The blind beggar arrived, and set with his back against the church gate by an old woman. And now the streaks, drawn across my side vision by the passers under, glide at a more leisurely pace, and are of gayer hues. The street full of sunshine. Omnibuses going slowly, both ways. Female exclusives gliding to and fro in studiously plain dresses and with very occupied air—(never in Broadway without "the carriage" of course, except to shop). Strangers sprinkled in couples, exhausting their strength and spirits by promenading before the show hour. The grave dug in St. Paul's, and the grave-digger gone home to dinner. Woman run over at the Fulton crossing. Boys out of school. Tombs' bell ringing fire in the third district.

One and after.—The ornaments are abroad. A crowd on St. Paul's sidewalk watching the accomplished canary-bird whose cage hangs on the fence. He draws his seed and water up an inclined plane in a rail-car, and does his complicated feeding to the great approbation of his audience. The price is high—his value being in proportion (aristocracy-wise) to his wants! It is the smoothest and broadest sidewalk in Broadway—the frontage of St. Paul's—and the ladies and dandies walk most at their ease just here, loitering a little, perhaps, to glance at the flowers for sale. My window, commanding this pavé, is a particularly good place, therefore, to study street habits, and I have noted a trifle or so, that, if not new, may be newly put down. I observe that a very well-dressed woman is noticed by none so much as by the women themselves. This is the week for the first spring dresses, and, to-day, there is a specimen or two of Miss Lawson's April avatar, taking its first sun on the promenade. A lady passed, just now, with a charming straw hat and primrose shawl—not a very pretty woman, but, dress and all, a fresh and sweet object to look at—like a new-blown cowslip, that stops you in your walk though it is not a violet. Not a male eye observed her, from curb-stone in Vesey to curb-stone in Fulton, but every woman turned to look after her! Query, is this the notice of envy or admiration, and, if the former, is it desirable or worth the pains and money of toilet? Query, again—the men's notice being admiration (not envy) what will attract it, and is that (whatever it is) worth while? I query what I should, myself, like to know.

Half past three.—The sidewalk is in shade. The orange-man sits on a lemon-box, with his legs and arms all crossed together in his lap, listening to the band who have just commenced playing in the museum balcony. The principal listeners, who have stopped for nothing but to listen, are three negro-boys (one sitting on the Croton hydrant, and the other two leaning on his back), and to them this gratuitous music seems a charming dispensation. ("Tune, "Ole Dan Tucker.") The omnibus-horses prick up their ears in going under the trumpets, but evidently feel that to show fright would be a luxury beyond their means. Saddle-horse, tied at the bank, breaks bridle and runs away. Three is universal dinner-time for bosses—(what other word expresses the head men of all trades and professions?)—and probably not a single portly man will pass under my window in this hour.

Four to five.—Sidewalk more crowded. Hotel boarders lounging along with toothpicks. Stout men going down toward Wall street with coats unbuttoned.

Hearse stopped at St. Paul's, and the museum band playing "Take your time, Miss Lucy," while the mourners are getting out. A gentleman, separated from two ladies by the passing of the coffin across the sidewalk, rejoins them, apparently with some funny remark. Bell tolls. No one in the crowd is interested to inquire the age or sex of the person breaking the current of Broadway to pass to the grave. Hearse drives off on a trot.

Five and after.—Broadway one gay procession. Few ladies accompanied by gentlemen—fewer than in the promenades of any other country. Men in couples and women in couples. Dandies strolling and stealing an occasional look at their loose demi-saison pantaloons, and gaiter-shoes, newly sported with the sudden advent of warm weather. No private carriage passing except those bound to the ferries for a drive into the country. The crowd is unlike the morning crowd. There is as much of more beauty, but the fashionable ladies are not out. You would be puzzled to discover who these lovely women are. Their toilets are unexceptionable, their style is a very near approach to comme il faut. They look perfectly satisfied with their position and with themselves, and they do (what fashionable women do not)—meet the eye of the promenade with a coquettish confidence he will misinterpret—if he be green or a puppy. Among these ladies are accidents of feature, form, and manner—charms of which the possessor is unconscious—that, if transplanted into a high-bred sphere of society abroad, would be bowed to as the stamp of lovely aristocracy. Possibly—probably, indeed—the very woman who is a marked instance of this is not called pretty by her friends. She is only spoken to by those whose taste is common-place and unrefined. She walks Broadway, and has a vague suspicion that the men of fashion look at her more admiringly than could be accounted for by any credit she has for beauty at home. Yet she is not likely to be enlightened as to the secret of it. When tired of her promenade, she disappears by some side street leading away from the great thoroughfares, and there is no clue to her unless by inquiries that would be properly resented as impertinence. I see at least twenty pass daily under my window who would be ornaments of any society, yet who, I know (by the men I see occasionally with them), are unacknowledgable by the aristocrats up town. What a field for a Columbus! How charming to go on a voyage of discovery and search for these unprized pearls among the unconscious pebbles! How delightful to see these rare plants without hedges about them—exquisite women without fashionable affectations, fashionable hinderances, penalties, exactions, pretensions, and all the wearying nonsenses that embarrass and stupefy the society of most of our female pretenders to exclusiveness!

Half-past six and after.—The flower-seller loading up his pots into a fragrant wagon-load. Twilight's rosy mist falling into the street. Gas-lamps alight here and there. The museum band increased by two instruments, to play more noisily for the night-custom. The magic wheel lit up, and ground rather capriciously by the tired boy inside. The gaudy transparencies one by one illuminated. Great difference now in the paces at which people walk. Business-men bound home, apprentices and shop-boys carrying parcels, ladies belated—are among the hurrying ones. Gentlemen strolling for amusement take it very leisurely, and with a careless gait that is more graceful and becoming than their mien of circumspect daylight. And now thicken the flaunting dresses of the unfortunate outlaws of charity and pity. Some among them (not many) have a remainder of ladylikeness in their gait, as if, but for the need there is to attract attention, they could seem modest—but the most of them are promoted to fine dress from sculleries and low life, and show their shameless vulgarity through silk and feathers. They are not at all to be pitied. The gentleman cit passes them by like the rails in St. Paul's fence—wholly unnoticed. If he is vicious, it is not those in the street who could attract him. The "loafers" return their bold looks, and the boys pull their dresses as they go along, and now and then a greenish youth, well-dressed, shows signs of being attracted. Sailors, rowdies, country-people, and strangers who have dined freely, are those whose steps are arrested by them. It is dark now. The omnibuses, that were heavily-laden through the twilight, now go more noisily because lighter. Carriages make their way toward the Park theatre. My window shows but the two lines of lamps and the glittering shops, and all else vaguely.

I have repeatedly taken five minutes, at a time, to pick out a well-dressed man, and see if he would walk from Fulton street to Vesey without getting a look at his boots. You might safely bet against it. If he is an idle man, and out only for a walk, two to one he would glance downward to his feet three or four times in that distance. Men betray their subterfuges of toilet—women never. Once in the street, women are armed at all points against undesirable observation—men have an ostrich's obtusity, being wholly unconscious even of that battery of critics, a passing omnibus! How many substitutes and secrets of dress a woman carries about her, the angels know!—but she looks defiance to suspicion on that subject. Sit in my window, on the contrary, and you can pick out every false shirt-bosom that passes, and every pair of false wristbands, and the dandy's economical half-boots, gaiter-cut trousers notwithstanding.

Indeed, while it is always difficult, sometimes impossible, to distinguish female genuine from the imitation, nothing is easier than to know at sight the "glossed (male) worsted from the patrician saraset." The "fashion" of women, above a certain guide, can seldom be guessed at in the street except by the men who are with them.

You should sit in a window like mine, to know how few men walk with even passable grace. Nothing so corrupts the gait as business—(a fact that would be offensive to mention in a purely business country, if it were not that the "unmannerly haste" of parcel-bearing and money-seeking, may be laid aside with low-heeled boots and sample cards.) The bent-kneed celerity, learned in dodging clerks and jumping over boxes in Cedar and Pearl, betrays its trick in the gait, as the face shows the pucker of calculation and the suavity of sale. I observe that the man used to hurry, relies principally on his heel, and keeps his foot at right angles. The ornamental man drops his toe slightly downward in taking a step, and uses, for elasticity, the spring of his instep. Nature has provided muscles of grace which are only incorporated into the gait by habitually walking with leisure. All women walk with comparative grace who are not cramped with tight shoes, but there are many degrees of gracefulness in women, and oh, what a charm is the highest degree of it! How pleasurable even to see from my window a woman walking like a queen!

The magnetic threads of Saratoga begin to pull upon the calculating bumps of foreseeing papas, and many a hair whitens in these spring months that would have taken another lease of youth but for the trip to Saratoga. Ah, the contrivance! Ah, the calculation! Ah, the saving, upon things undreamed of!—for extravagance is like the lengthening of the Indian's blanket—the piece cut from one end that is sewed on to the other! But, out on monotony, and hey for Saratoga! If there be an approach to a gayety-paradise on earth—if there be a place where the mortifications of neighborhood are forgotten, and "people's natural advantages" are prominent and undisputed—if there be, this side Heaven, a place where it is worth while to dress, worth while to be pretty, worth while to walk, talk, and particularly and generally outdo

"The snowy swans that strut on Isca's sands," it is sandy Saratoga—Marvin's United States Hotel! Take your papa there, "for his health," my dear belle! "And tell him, too," that it was the well-expressed opinion of the philosopher Bacon, that "money, like manure, is offensive if not spread." Tell your mamma to tell him how pale he is when he wakes in the morning! Tell the doctor to prescribe Congress water without the taste of the cork! Tell him, if he does not, and you are not let go with a chaperon, you will do something you shudder to think of—bolt, slope, elope, with the first base

"Arimaspan who, by stealth,
Will from his wakeful custom purl
The guarded gold"

to which you are the heiress! For it is credibly and currently reported "in high circles," that the coming season at Saratoga is to be of a crowded uncomfortableness of splendor that was reserved for the making fashionable, by Mr. Van Buren, of the "United States" and its dependant colonies.

Among the alleviations to passing a summer in town (misericordia pro nobis!) is the completion of Mr. Stevens's Gothic cottage at the lip of the Elysian Hoboken, where are to be had many good things, of course, but where (I venture to suggest) it would be a bliss ineffable to be able to get a good breakfast! What a pleasure to cross the ferry, and, after a morning ramble in that delicious park, to sit down in the fresh air volant through the galleries of that sweet cottage, and eat (if nothing more) a nice roll with a good cup of French coffee! A restaurateur there would make a fortune, I do think. Bring it about, Mr. "Person Concerned," and you shall lack neither our company nor a zealous trumpeter.

THE CLOISTER.

Committee—(solus).—Oh, most beset of brigadiers! Most civil of military men! (for half a firm, the most yielding partner of my acquaintance!) when, oh responsible general, will you get through with your particular callers and come to confab? True, I have dined, and can wait! True, there are joint letters to answer! True, I can listen, and look out into the back yard! Hark! Syphax, my black boy, loquitur.

Syphax—(to the general).—Shall I cut out them favorable notices from the exchanges, sir?

Brigadier.—Those favorable notices, Syphax!

Heavens! what an unfeeling man! For the love of pity, corrupt not the innocent grammar of the lad, my dear brigadier! Out of seven black boys sent me for trial by the keeper of an intelligence-office, six, to my disgust, spoke with the painful accuracy of Doctor Pangloss. The last, my inestimable Syphax, whom that finished brigadier would fain bring to his own level of heartless good grammar—was ignorant (virtuous youth!) even of the sexes of pronouns! He came to me innocent: and, I need not say to any writer—to any slave of the rule-tied pen—to any man cabined, cribbed, confined, as are public scribblers to case and number, gender and conjugation, participle present, and participle past—I need not say, to such a victim, what an oasis in the desert of perfection was the green spot of a black boy's cacology! Oh, to the attenuated ear of the grammar-ridden!—to the tense mood of unerring mood and tense—what a luxury is an erring pronoun—what a blessed relief from monotony is a too-yielding verb, seduced, from its singular antecedent, by a contiguity of plural! Out on perfectionists! Out on you, you flaw-less brigadier! Correct your own people, however! Inveigle not my Syphax into rhetoric! Ravish not from my use the one variation, long-sought and chance-found, from the maddening monotone of good grammar!

And this brings to my mind (if I get time to jot it down before the brigadier comes to cloister) a long-settled conviction of my own, that the corrections in American manners brought about by the criticisms of Trollope and others, have been among the worst influences ever exercised upon the country. Gracious heaven! are we to have our national features rasped off by every manner-tinker who chooses to take up a file! See how it affects the English to laugh at their bloat of belly and conceit, their cockney ignorance and their besotted servility to rank. Do they brag less, and drink less beer? Do they modify their Bowbell dialect one hair, or whip off their hats with less magical celerity when spoken to by a lord? Not a bit! They will be English till they are smothered with Russians—English ghosts (those who die before England is conquered by Russia), with English manners, at doomsday. They are not so soft as to be moulded into American pottery, or German pottery, or French pottery, because an American, or a German, or a Frenchman, does not find them like his own country's more common utensils! Where do national features exist? Not among well-bred people! Not where peas are eaten with a fork and soup-plates left untitled by the hungry! All well-bred people are monotonously alike—whatever their nation and whatever the government they have lived under. Differences of manners are found below this level, and the mistake—the lamentable mistake—lies in submitting to correct this low level by the standard of coxcombs! What a picture would be without shade—what music would be without discords—what life would be without something to smile at—what anything would be without contrast—that are we becoming by our sensitiveness to criticism. Long live our (Bull-judice) "abominations." Long live some who spit and whittle, some who eat eggs out of wine-glasses and sit on four chairs, some who wear long naps to their hats, some who eat peas with a knife, some who pour out their tea into saucers, and some who are civil to unprotected ladies in stage-coaches! Preserve something that is not English, oh, my countrymen!

[Enter the brigadier.]

Brigadier.—Forgive me, my dear boy—what is that I see written on your paper about Russia?

"The Russian men are round of bodies, fully-faced, The greatest part with bellies that overhang the waist, Flat-headed for the most, with faces nothing fair, But brown by reason of the stores and closeness of the air."

So says old Tuberville, the traveller—and now to business. Jot!

Committee.—What?

Brigadier.—Jot—that we are glad to offer to the patrons of the "Mirror Library" a book they will thank us for, at every line—"THE PLEA OF THE MID-SUMMER FAIRIES," and other admirable poems, pregnant with originality and richness, by Thomas Hood. His poetry is the very attar, the aroma, the subtlest extract of sweet imagination. "EUGENE ARAM" is one of those included in this volume.

Committee.—What else are you glad of?

Brigadier.—Glad to be sorry that Parke Godwin's fine analytical mind and bold foundry of cast-iron English are not freighted with a more popular subject than Fourierism—worthy though the theme be of the regard of angels whose approbation don't pay. Politics should be at a lift to deserve the best energies of such a writer—but they are not, and so he turns to philosophy.

Committee.—But he should play Quintus Curtius, and write up politics to his level, man! The need is more immediate than the need of Fourierism.

Brigadier.—My dear boy, give away nothing but what is saleable. Gifts, that would not otherwise have been money in your purse, are not appreciated—particularly advice. We love Godwin—let us love his waste of ammunition, if it please him to waste it.

Committee.—

"Then let him weep, of no man mercied," if his brains be not coinable to gold. I would make a merchant of genius! The world has need of brains like Godwin's, and need makes the supply into commodity, and commodity is priceable. That's the logic by which even my poor modicum is made to thrive. Apropos—what do you think of these lines on "bells," by Duganne? A poet, I should say:—

"Ye melancholy bells,
Ye know not why ye're ringing—
See not the tear-drops springing
From sorrows that ye bring to mind,
Ye melancholy bells.

"And thus ye will ring on—
To-day, in tones of sadness;
To-morrow, peals of gladness;
Ye'll sound them both, yet never feel
A thrill of either one.

"Ye ever-changing bells!
Oh many ye resemble,
Who ever throb and tremble,
Yet never know what moves them so—
Ye ever-changing bells."

Brigadier.—Kernel-ish and quaint. But, my dear boy,

"twilight, soft arbiter
'Twixt day and night,"

is beginning to blur the distinctness of the cheeks on that apron drying upon the line in the back yard. Shall we go to tea?

The opening of the exhibition at the National Academy is like taking a mask from one of the city's most agreeable features. And it is only those who live in the city habitually, and who live as fast as the city does, who are qualified to enjoy it with the best appreciation. Did you ever notice, dear reader, how behind the tide you feel, on arriving in town, even after an absence of a week—how whirling and giddy your sensations are—how many exciting things there seem for you to do—how "knowing" and "ahead-of-you" seem all the takers-coolly whom you meet—how incapable you are of any of the tranquil pleasures of the metropolis, and with what impatient disgust you pass any exhibition which would subtract you, mind and body, from the crowd. It is not for strangers, then, that the exhibition is the highest pleasure. It is for those who have laid behind them the bulk of the city excitements in a used-up heap—to whom balls are nuisances, theatres satiety, concerts a bore, Broadway stale, giants, dwarfs, and six-legged cows, "familiar as your hand." It is only such who have the cool eye to look critically and enjoyingly at pictures. It is for such that Durand has laid into his landscape the touch that was preceded by despair—for such that Ingham elaborates, and Page strains invention, and Sully woos the coy shade of expression. And, truth to say, it is not one of the least of the gratuitous riches of existence, that while we are sifting away the other minutes of the year in commonplace business or pleasure, forgetful of art and artists, these gifted minds are at work, producing beautiful pictures to pamper our eyes with in spring! If you never chanced to think of that before, dear reader, you are richer than you thought! Please enclose us the surplus in bankable funds! Ehem!

There are more portraits in the exhibition than will please the dilettanti—but hang the displeased! We would submit to a thousand indifferent portraits, for the accident of possessing a likeness of one friend unexpectedly lost. For Heaven's sake, let everybody be painted, that, if perchance there is a loved face marked, unsuspected by us, for heaven, we may have its semblance safe before it is beyond recall! How bitter the regret, the self-reproach, when the beautiful joy of a household has been suddenly struck into the grave, that we might have had a bright image of her on canvass—that we might have removed, by holding converse with her perpetuated smile, the dreadful image of decay that in sad moments crowds too closely upon us! For the sake of love and friendship, let that branch of the art, now in danger of being disparaged by short-sighted criticism—let it be ennobled, for the sacred offices it performs! Is an art degrading to its follower which does so much—which prolongs the presence of the dead, which embellishes family ties, which brightens the memory of the absent, which quickens friendship, and shows the loved, as they were before ravage by sadness or sickness? There should rather be a priesthood of the affections, and portrait-painters its brotherhood—holy for their ministering pencils.

We have a customer in Andover, to whose attention particularly we commend the truly delicious poetry of "The Sacred Rosary," as some atonement for having inveigled him into the purchase of the "Songs of the Bard of Poor Jack." That mis-spent shilling troubled our friend, and he wrote us a letter and paid eighteen pence postage to complain of it!—but non omnia possumus omnes (we can't play 'possum with all our subscribers), and we humbly beg our kind friend (who lives where we learned our Latin) to refresh his piety with the "Rosary," and forgive the Dibdin. The apology over, however, we must make bold to say that of all the publications of the "Mirror Library," this collection of Dibdin's songs has sold the best. It has been indeed what our Andover friend scornfully calls "a catch-penny affair," and we wish there were (what there never will be) another catch-penny like it. No—by Castaly! such a book will never again be written! If ever there was honest, hearty, natural, manly feeling spliced to rhyme, it is in these magnificent songs. England's naval glory—her esprit-de-man-o'-war—her empire of the sea—lies spell-bound in that glorious song-book! She owes more to Dibdin than to Chat-ham or Burke—as much as to Howard or Wilber-force! Ah, dear Anonym of Andover, you have never hung your taste out to salt over the gunwale! You don't know poor Jack. Find out when your lease of life is likely to run out—go first to sea—read Dibdin understandingly, e poi mori!"

The proprietor of the "Connecticut pie depot" (corner of Beekman and Nassau), writes us that he will be happy to have us "call and taste his pies when we are sharp-set," and that he hails from Boston and takes a pride in us. So we do in him, though, for a puff, our pen against his rolling-pin for a thousand pound! He evidently thinks us "the cheese," for he says he wishes to be noticed in our "dairy of town trifles." Well, sir, we don't "fill our belly with the east wind," nor eat pies, since we left Boston, but we rejoice in your pie-ous enterprise, and agree, with you, to consider ourselves mutually the flour of the city we come from. Apropos—we can do our friend a service which we hope he will reciprocate by opening a subscription-book in his pie-magazine, and procuring us five hundred subscribers (payments invariably in advance). A young lady has written to us, imploring the Mirror's aid in reforming the prog at fashionable boarding-schools. There are symptoms of a "strike" for something better to eat in these coops of chicken-angels, and the establishment of a "Connecticut pie depot" seems (seems, madam, nay, it is!) beautifully providential! We can not trace our anonymous note to any particular school, but we hereby recommend to the young ladies in every "establishment," "nunnery," and "seminary," to "hang their aprons on the outer wall," and hoist in our friend's pastry, on trial. The French pockets will be filled the first day gratis, we undertake to promise. The second day and after, of course, the bill will be presented to lante or the music-master.

There are poems which the world "does not willingly let die," but which this same go-to-bed world, tired of watching, covers quietly up with the ashes of neglect, and leaves to grow as black as the poker and tongs of criticism that stand unused beside them. Stop the first twenty men (gentlemen, even) whom you see in the street, and probably not one can tell you even the argument of Goldsmith's great poem! And the "ponrquoy Sir Knight" is simply that "The English Poets," in six formidable volumes, are too much for cursory readers to encounter! The poems and passages they would "thumb," if they could light readily on them, are buried up in loads of uninteresting miscellany. They want the often-quoted, undeniable, pure fire, raked out of this heap of embers. Our last number of the Mirror Library begins a supply of this want, under the title of "LIVE COALS, raked from the Embers of English Poetry."

The following advertisement is cut from "The Sun":—

"NOTICE—To the gentleman that pushed the man over the curbstone in Broadway, at the corner of Lispenard street, with his dinner-kettle in his hand, from this time forth never to lay his hand on David Brown again."

Now, what other country than America would do for David Brown? God bless the land where a man can pour his sorrows into the sympathizing bosom of a newspaper! Query—does not this seventy-five cent supersede altogether the use of that dangerous domestic utensil, a friend! Add to this the invention of an unexpressive substitute for gunpowder, and the world will be comparatively a safe place.

Point of fact—we delight in all manner of old things made young again, particularly in all kinds of venerable and solemn humbug "showing green." If ever there was a monster, grown out of sight of its natural and original intention—a bloated, diseased, wen-covered, abate-worthy nuisance of a monster, it is the newspaper. The first newspaper ever published in France was issued by a physician to amuse his patients. "To this complexion" would we reduce it once more. Fill them with trifles, or with important news (the same thing as to amusement), and throw a wet blanket, and keep it wet, over congressional twaddle, polemical flubbery, tiresome essays, political cobwebberies—yes, especially politics! People sometimes cease to talk when there are no listeners, and it might be hoped, with God's blessing and help ("Ave Maria! ora pro nobis!") that congress members would cease to put us to shame as well as to bore us to extinction, if there were no newspapers to fan their indignant eloquence. It is a query worth sticking a pin in—how many nuisances would die (beside congress) if newspapers were restored to their original use and purpose? Any symptom of this regeneration inexpressibly refreshes us. Hence our delight at the advertisement of David Brown. Who would not rather know that a man had run against David Brown at the corner of Lispenard street, with a dinner-kettle in his hand (and had better not do it again), than to read the next any ten speeches to be delivered on the rowdy floor of congress! We have said enough to give you a thinking-bulb, dear reader, and now to our next—but

Apropos—we wish our friend Russell Jarvis, or any analytically-minded and strong writer half as good, would prepare us a speculative essay on the query which is the natural inference of the late Washington doings, viz.: how curious must be the process of mind by which a gentleman (there are one or two in congress) could be brought to consent to stay there—hail from there—frank from there—have his letters addressed there—in any way or shape take upon himself a member's share of this lustrum's obloquy and abomination! Not but what we think it wholesome—we do! You can not cure festers without bringing them to a head. The wonder is, how gentlemen are willing to be parts of a congress that is only the nation's pustule—the offensive head and vent of all the purulent secretions of the body politic! Thank God, they are coming to a head—to this head, if need be (it is rather conspicuous, it is true—like a pimple on a lady's nose, which might be better situated)—to have the worst issue of our national shame on the floor of Congress; but better so than pent up—better so than an inward mortification precursory of dissolution! For our own part (though we are no politician, except when stung upon our fifteen millionth of national feeling), we think we could do very well without a congress. We believe the supreme court capable of doing all the legislative grinding necessary for the country, or, if that would not do, we think a congress convened only for the first three months of every administration, in which speaking was prohibited, would answer all wise ends. We are over-governed. The reign of grave outrages and solemn atrocities is at its height, and Heaven overturn it, and send us, next after, a dynasty of laws "left to settle," and trifles paramount. Amen.

We are not of the envious and discontented nature of a mutton candle, blackest at the wick—that is to say, we do not think every spot brighter than the one we live in. We seek means to glorify New York—since we live here. Pat to our bosom and business, therefore, comes a letter "from a gentleman to his sister," apothecistic (we will have our long word if we like) of this same pleasant municipality. Our friend and anonymous correspondent does not go quite enough into detail, and we cut off his long peroration, in which he compares himself very felicitously to "a bottle of soda-water, struggling for vent."—"Now then," he continues, "to uncork (off hat) and let my exuberant contents be made manifest:—"

"Once more in New York—dear, delightful New York! the spot of all spots and the place of all places! the whereabouts which the poet dreamed of when he spoke of 'the first flower of the earth and first gem of the sea;' and once more here, too, not to look upon it for a moment, and then depart, but to stay, to live, to be, to exist, and to enjoy. You do not know the love I bear New York; it is, beyond all others, the place where existence is; where time passes, not like a summer's dream, but as time should pass, in a succession (constant) of employments and enjoyments.

"I love the city, as I love everything loveable, with a full and abiding joyousness. There is nothing passing, or in still life, but goes to make up the sum. The very odor of the atmosphere, which might shock your delicate, country-bred olfactories, is more to me than all the fragrance of all the green fields that were ever babbled of.

"The country is all very well, in its way. I love that also—at a distance, or in moderate quantities. Homeopathetically, as it were—as, for instance, the Battery. I love to walk there, to inhale the sea-breeze, and enjoy the sweet smell of the growing grass and the budding trees; and to look over to Long Island or New Jersey, and see the country blooming (afar off) under the loving smiles of spring. Yes, the country is, no doubt, very desirable—for a few days in the summer—for a change, or to come back from with a new relish for the real life that awaits one on his return.

"I love to stand on the docks, of a still evening, and hear the tide rush past. The very rime of the sea drifts in music to my ear. The rushing of the free and ever-changing waters, the glad dancing of its waves, the glowing reflex of the stars in their bosom, the rifling foam, and the swift gushing sound, like a continuous echo, stir up the dormant poetry of one's soul, and send him, with a glowing heart, back to his lonely home, happier for the sweet communion.

"All the time, too, is thought-filled; there is no standing still here. Business is part of life, perhaps life itself, and it is constantly going on around and with us. If I choose a walk, Broadway is full of life—never-ending, never-tiring. So all over the city. One can not stroll anywhere but he meets with something new, something strange, something interesting; some chapter opens, which has till then been to him as a dead letter.

"Somebody who wanted to express in strong language that nature might be improved by art, has said that 'God made the country, man made the town.' How true it is! And, beyond that, here are congregated hundreds of thousands of 'featherless bipeds' (men and women), of whom, perhaps, you know not a dozen, but every one of whom, in your walks, is to you a study.

"Then, again, the very situation—the form, structure, and appliances—of New York, are delightful and fascinating beyond compare. Such a beautiful promontory, swelling up from two magnificent rivers, rising from either, gently, to the palace-lined thoroughfare on its crown; and crossbarred with a thousand avenues to both rivers—inlets for pure air, ever fresh rising from the sea, blowing over and into every habitation, and freighted with health, like the gales of Araby the blest.

"Nature has been wonderfully prodigal of her bestowments on this spot, and the hand of man has not been niggardly in completing what the fair dame commenced, by putting a worthy superstructure on her noble foundation. I have often thought of the remark made by some one, that the man who first stood on Manhattan island, and looked around him with an eye and a mind that could comprehend and appreciate its wonderful beauties and advantages, must have 'held his very breath' in wonder and admiration.

"And then more of its present beauties to the dwellers therein. Should one, in hot and dusty weather, choose to change the scene, how joyous a trip to Sandy Hook! Often have I stood on the heights, and looked off on old Ocean, holding in my gaze one of the most glowing scenes that this world shows. The wide and boundless view—the noble Hudson and the city above, the green beauties of Long island before, and the heaven ocean below, spread out in its grand sublimity; the sails of all nations flashing on its breast and blending in its glory,

—like a mirror where the Almighty's form
Glasses itself?

"Oh who, with such a prospect before him, feels not his soul elevated and his thoughts sublimated! Thoughts, indeed, too wild for utterance, are born, not for others, but to sink deep in the heart and leave him a wiser if not a better man.

"This, you will say is the country—ah, but it is the country of New York, close by, and part of city life itself. Then there is another country (yours is only one) over the other shoulder, where the moderate sum of sixpence will waft us to the delightful walks, the green lawns, the shady groves, and cool zephyrs of dear, charming Hoboken. Doubly dear to a New-Yorker. Fresh smelling and fragrant in the spring, cool and breezy in the hot days of summer; and, with the rustling leaf of autumn, dear in its remembered beauties, its fading foliage, and the ever-sounding surges that beat with melancholy moan at the foot of its beetling crags and sloping lawns. Ah, lovely Hoboken,

'None know thee but to love thee,
Nor name thee but to praise!'

"Mr. Stevens, we owe you much; and we can afford to owe; but we pay you a large annual interest in gratitude and praise. 'Tis all we have, we can no more."

We also cut off the irrelevant tail of our friend's letter (tipped with a "G."), and beg another from him with a finer nib to his pen—going more into the individualities. If you would like a subject suggested (exempli gratia) give us the hopes, trials, temptations, and aspirations of a Broadway shop-tender. They seem fine youths, those silk-and-suavity venders. Who knows what is their pay and prospects? How can they afford such good manners and fine waistcoats? What is the degree of friendly acquaintance bred between them and the ladies in the course of a bargain? Have they legs (below the counter)?—Do they marry?—Have they combinations, and esprit de corps?—Which are the honorablest goods to sell?—As to the "beating down" of grass-cloth and stockings—is it interesting, or more so than the cheapening of calico? When do they eat? Do handsomer ones get higher wages? May their "cousins" come to see them? How do they look with hats on? What is the duration of their chrysalis—the time of metamorphosis from boy to "boss"—and what are their several stages of mental discipline? The most saleable book in the world would be the autobiography of a Broadway clerk—(dry goods, retail). Let this "verbum" be "sat" to a sapientia.

We have undertaken to make ourselves acquainted with the island on which we live. We mean to give our readers, bit by bit, the results of our observations upon the customs, manners, geography, and morals of the island of New York, as noted down in our rambles. We do not take our walks in chapters, however, and we shall, therefore, be equally miscellaneous and disorderly in our arrangement of topics. It is a curious island, and some of the inhabitants are curious islanders. Those who only walk up the city's backbone (Broadway) know very little of its bowels and extremities. Little by little, we hope to make out its truthful anatomy—veins, pulses, functions, and arteries.

We should like to know, among other things, why the broadest, most accessible, most convenient street in New York, the noble avenue of WEST BROADWAY, is entirely given up to negroes? The rage is to move up town—but there are people who are not rajahs, who are willing to pay high rents—people who don't care where the fashionable people go to (while they live), and who simply desire to reside in broad streets for air and light, and above all, to be near, if possible, to their business. Now the narrowest part of this bestreetsed island is of course the most wholesome, as the air from the two rivers comes over fewer chimneys and gutters. The broader the street the better, both for health and show. The access to a street should be good, and West Broadway, in its whole length, is parallel to Broadway, and approachable by Chambers street, Murray, Warren, and all the best short avenues of the city. It has, besides, near by, the beautiful "lungs" of St. John's park, the hospital grounds, and College Green, and is crossed at its upper end by the broad ventilator of Canal street. Where, on the island, is there a street more calculated to be wholesome—dirty as it now is from the character of its occupants? It would require, it is true, an entire renovation, before any one person, desirous of good neighborhood, could live there—but that renovation (we prophesy it) will be done. Some speculator will buy lots in it, and call a meeting of proprietors to suggest a general turn-out and improvement, or some one of the Wall street Astor-hood will buy the street, from lamp-post to lamp-post, and fill it with fashionable dwelling-houses. The up-town tide will partly ebb, the natural advantages of the Battery and Lower Broadway will regain their ascendancy, and the sand-dalled foot of the island will again wear jewels on its instep.

Pearl street (if Manhattan lie on his back) would be the main artery of his left leg, and Franklin square, which occupies a natural knoll, would be his knee-pan. This gives you some idea of its geography, though, probably, dear reader, if you are not in the dry-goods line, you have never visited it. It is a curious place historically, and was once the aristocratic centre of the city. There are still two famous houses in it—one the old Walton mansion, and the other a building that was once the headquarters of Washington. In the yard of the latter house is a pear-tree of Washington's planting. And, by the way, our companion (in a first visit which we made to Franklin square a day or two since) told us a story that may be new or old, touching an attempt made to poison Washington. A dish of some vegetables from a forcing-bed was put upon the table for dinner, and the general, remarking that growths so much earlier than was natural were not wholesome, threw them out of the window. Some pigs in the yard were poisoned by eating them. Colonel Stone can tell us if the story be true—always presuming it is not in some veritable history of New York.* The Walton house is still a noble-looking mansion, with its English mouldings in good preservation, and is now occupied as a lodging-house. The headquarters of Washington are tenanted by a pianoforte builder, and all around looks trafficky and dull.

One of the favorite spring amusements of the people of New York—(of course of the silly people, of whom there are at least several)—is to attend the auction sales at private houses. We heard of one silly but honest woman (they are often honest) who, on being rallied a day or two since at having so passed the last fortnight, said, "La! it's so amusing to see how people live!" And, truly enough, you may find out by this process how every class "furnishes," which is a considerable feature in living, and it is wonderful with how little ceremony and reluctance the household gods are stripped to the skin and exposed to the gaze of a public invited in by the red flag of an auction! It is possibly a very natural feature of a new country to have no respect for furniture; but to our notion it comes close after "honor thy father and mother" to honor the chairs and tables at which they have eaten and prayed, counselled and blessed. And even this were easier got over—the selling of the mere mahogany and damask—if the articles were removed to a shop and disassociated from the places where they had become hallowed. But to throw open sacred boudoirs, more sacred bedrooms, breakfast-rooms, bath-rooms, in which (as has been the case once or twice lately) lovely and cherished women have lived, and loved, and been petted, and secluded, and caressed—to let in vulgar and prying curiosity to sit on the damask seats and lounge on the silken sofas, and breathe the air impregnated with perfume that could betray the holiest secrets if it had a tongue—and then to stand by while an auctioneer chaffers, and describes, and tempts the vulgar appetite to buy! Why, it seems to us scarce less flagrant and atrocious than the ride of Lady Godiva—desecrating to those who sell out, and a profanity and license in those who go to see!

It is a famous time, now, to buy cheap second-hand furniture, by the way—for the fashion of French furniture has come in lately, with a rush, and the nabobs are selling out from sideboard to broom, and furnishing anew à la Française, from skylight to basement. By a year from this time there will be more houses in New York above a certain cost and up to a marquis's taste and wants, than either in Paris or London. (And this estimate is not extravagant, for only "the few" abroad spend money as "the many" do here.) There is a drygoods retailer in Broadway, who has a house furnished as sumptuously, and in as good taste, as the most extravagant nobleman's house in London. The thing is done very simply. The dimensions of the house, and an accurate description of the way it is lighted and arranged, are sent out to the first upholsterers of Paris—men who are artists in their way, and who have furnished for royalty and rank all over Europe. Carte blanche as to expense, and out comes your "interior," complete, lustrous, and as good as his majesty's—wanting only (really only) the society suitable to enjoy it—which is like (something like) a very fine play without a symptom of an audience.

So marked is this change of taste, and the new school of furnishing, that the oldest and most wealthy of the cabinet warehouse-men in this city has completely abandoned the making of English furniture. He has sold out an immense stock of high-priced articles at auction, and sent to France for models and workmen to start new with the popular taste. It is a great chance, by the way, to establish the European fashion of hotels garnis for strangers—giving them the temporary hire of houses ready furnished, by the week or month—their meals sent to them from a restaurateur. Such investments bring large profits; and the convenience of the custom, to families coming from the south or west, and wishing for greater privacy and more room than they can get at a hotel, is very great. So may good come out of an extravagant folly.

THE ANTIQUE CABINET.—Whether it is a perverse pleasure in seeing costly things out of place, or an aversion we have to new things (except new thoughts, new toothpicks, and new ladies' gear), or the natural love for miscellany common to all mankind—whether it is for one of these reasons, or for a little of each—we are in the habit of bestowing the loose ends of our idleness upon the warehouses of second-hand furniture. Nothing grows upon a man like a habit of choice between such entertainment and any society merely tolerable—the preference given, of course, to the shabby but more suggestive damask and mahogany. Ah, the variety of things people sell to get money! What curious places shops are, where they will buy anything that is “sacrificed!” How entertaining to moulder about among old portraits, broken ornaments, miniatures soiled by wearing in the bosom, unstrung harps, battered statuary, and furniture that has kept proud company! How curious-minded must become at last these dealers in nothing with a gloss on! How exactly they must know the duration and value of fashionable newness! How well they must understand the pitiless transit from ornament to lumber—how well the sudden chill of the money-test to articles valued, till then, only by affection! But we can not afford a digression here.

Resting our umbrella on the steps to a high bed the other day, and our chin on our umbrella (a posture taken for the leisurely perusal of a crowded corner of an old furniture shop), we began to pick out from the mass, an outline of an old cabinet secretary. Now we have been that degree of vagabond, that we have to confess having fairly topped our meridian without the knowledge of more luxury in writing-tools than any table, any pen, and any conceivable vagary of ink-holder. It is true, that while travelling we got accustomed to fastening the other end of our thought-string to an old black trunk—a companion to our hithering and thithering for seven long years—and, by dint of habit in many a far country, we could ill write, at last, where that old portmanteau was not ready to receive our eyes as they came off the paper. But, in reforming our baggage for matrimony, the old trunk was degraded to a packing-box, and at present it peacefully reposes, smelling of quinces, and holding the modest Sunday-clothes of our farmer's dame at Glenmary. Save and since this, our travelled and “picked pen of countries” has been without appanage or equipage, wearing all its honors upon its bare plume of service, and, like a brave and uncomplaining soldier, scorning to claim the dignities which should have been plucked down by its deservings. Well—well! “the whirligig of time!” “Pen!” We mentally ejaculated, as we made out the odd corners and queer angles of the antique cabinet—“thy proper honors are in flower! Thou shalt do thy work in luxury after this! What pigeon-holes can do to make thee comfortable—what drawers, what slits, what niches and nooks—is as good as done! Rise to-morrow rich and glorious!”

We had the advantage to be favorably known to the furniture-dealer. He was a man who rejoiced in our promotions. We bought the old secretary without chaffer, “at the lowest figure,” and requested that it might be dug out from its unsold neighbors, and sent home, not too vigorously dusted. Here it is. We are writing upon its broad let-down leaf, and our pen struts like a knight wearing for the first hour his well-earned spurs. It is an old chamberer—the secretary—brown-black mahogany, inlaid with sandal-wood—and has held money, and seen frowns and smiles. In its experience (for which we would give a trifle) we ourselves are but a circumstance. The hand that first wrote at it is cold; and, for the hands that are to write at it hereafter, nature may not yet have sorted out the nails. Our own hand will give over its cunning and turn to ashes, meantime. One man's life and using are but of the duration of a coat of varnish, to this old cabinet's apprehension. Ah “we!”

“By the pricking of our thumbs,” the brigadier is mounting the stairs. Since the possession of our first operative luxury, we have taken a disgust to the cloister—conceiting that the smell of soap, from the lavendering in the back yard, gave a stain to such flowers of imagination as were born there. The brigadier says we grow superfine. Soit! It is time—after “taking it as it comes” for so many years. Besides, we must have something to set off against his epaulettes! Glory in your staff, dear brigadier, but leave us our cabinet!

Brigadier.—(entering out of breath).—Paff! paff! How the breath of life flutters with this vicinity to heaven! Paff! paff!—prophetic nature! How are you, my dear upster!

Committee.—You see the ink wet in my pen—I was just about to dash into a critique. That straw-colored volume of poems, by Mrs. Lewis, shows feathers from Pegasus; though, as usual with lady-poems, without any parings from the hoof—any trace of that part of the old steed that touches earth. It takes wrongs and sufferings—like those of Mrs. Norton, L. E. L., and Mrs. Hemans—to compound a poetess of any reality and strength. Soil, that, if torn up with a ploughshare, may yield the heavy grain of anguish, will yield nothing but daisies and white clover, lying undisturbed in the sunshine. Yet this same white clover is very sweet grazing, and Mrs. Lewis's is a very sweet book. May she never write a better one—by having suffered enough to “qualify!”

Brigadier.—Amen! I say, my boy, what a clever thing Inman is making of his magazine! The May number is beautiful. What a good pick he has among the magazine-writers!

Committee.—Excellent—but he uses himself up with making his correspondents work, and sets too little value on his own writings. He wants a sub. for drudgery. He could, with his strong fabric of good sense (which is genius), and his excellent critical powers, make all the rest of the “COLUMBIAN” subservient to his own articles.

Brigadier.—Tell him so.

Committee.—Will he stand it—as your firm ally?

Brigadier.—Bless your soul, he has told you many a plain thing in print.

Committee.—Has he? Here goes, then:—

“For Jove's right hand, with thunder cast from sky, Takes open vengeance oft for secret ill.”

But now we think of it, you are bound to be particularly good-natured, my dear brigadier. With what enthusiasm they received your song the other night at the Tabernacle—“The Pastor's Daughter!” That, and “Boatman haste,” and “Cheerly o'er the mountains,” are three songs, that, skilfully built, as they are, upon three of our most exquisite national melodies, and intrinsically beautiful in words and music, will be classics. Atwill has published them charmingly, too. What lots of money you ought to make out of these universalities!

Brigadier.—My dear boy, stop praising me at a judicious place—for praise, like “heat, hath three degrees: first, it induratheth or maketh strong; next, it maketh fragile; and lastly, it doth encinerate or calcinate, or crumble to pieces.”

Committee.—Subtle tactician! How you have corrupted my rural simplicity! Mff—mff—mff! I think I sniff mint! The wind sets this way from Windust's. How it exhausts the juices to talk pleasantly with a friend; and, by-the-way, soft crabs are in the market. What say to a dish of water-cresses, and such other things as may suggest themselves—we two—over the way! We are in too good humor to dine in public to-day. We should seem to lack modesty, with this look of exultation on our faces.

Brigadier.—To dinner, with all my heart—for the Mirror has an appetite—the philosopher's tranquil appetite—idem contemptui et admirationi habitus.

Committee.—I go to shave off this working face, my dear general! Please amuse yourself with my waru pen. Our correspondents, "Y." and "E. K."—two "treasures trove," if such periodical ever had—should be gracefully and gratefully thanked. Do it while I am gone, with your usual suaviter.

I GAVE in to a friend's proposition to "poke about," lately, one afternoon, and, by dint of turning every corner that we had never turned before, we zig-zagged ourselves into a somewhat better acquaintance with the Valley of Poverty lying between Broadway and the Bowery. On our descent we stopped at the Tombs, making, however (as many do), rather an unsatisfactory visit. We lacked an Old Mortality to decipher the names and quality of the tenants. It is a gloomy access to Justice, up the dark flight of steps frowned over by these Egyptian pillars; and the resolute-looking constables, and the anxious-looking witnesses and prisoners' friends who lean and group at the bases of the columns, or pace up and down the stony pavement, show, with gloomy certainty, that this is not the dwelling of "Hope, with eyes so fair." We turned out of the dark portico into the police court—a dingy apartment with the dust on the floor—not like other unswept apartments, but ground into circles of fine powder by hurried and twisting footprints. No culprit was before the court, and the judge's terrors were laid on the desk with his spectacles. We looked about in vain for anything note-worthy. Even the dignity of "the presence" was unrecognised by us, for (not being in the habit of uncovering where there is neither carpet, lady, nor sign of holy cross) we were obliged to be notified by the "hats off, gentlemen," of the one other person in the room—apparently a constable on duty.

A side door led us downward to the watch-house, which occupies the basement of the Egyptian structure. It is on a level with the street, and hither are brought newly-caught culprits, disturbers of the peace, and, indeed (so easy is disgrace), anybody accused by anybody! It is not an uncommon shape of malice (so the officer told us in answer to my query) for the aggressor in a quarrel to give the sufferer in charge to the watchman and have him locked up! The prisoner is discharged, of course, the next morning, the complainant not appearing, to prosecute; but passing a night in a cell, even on false accusation, is an infliction which might fall with some weight on an honest man, and the power to inflict it should not be quite so accessible—"thinks I to myself." (I made a mental promise to get better information on the subject of arrests, and generally on the subject of the drawing of the first line between "ourselves" and the guilty. With Miss Lucy Long's privilege, I shall duly produce what I can gather.)

On application at the door of the prisons, we were informed nonchalantly (and figuratively, I presume) that it was "all open," and so indeed it seemed, for there was no unlocking, though probably the hinges would have somehow proved reluctant had a prisoner tried the swing of them. We walked in to the prison-yard unattended, and came first to the kitchens. A very handsome woman, indeed, was singing and washing at a tub, and up and down, on either side of the large boilers, promenaded a half-dozen men in couples—sailors and loafers, "in for a month," as we were afterward informed. They looked as happy as such men do elsewhere, I thought, and wearing no prison-dress, they seemed very little like prisoners. It is considered quite a privilege, by the way, to be employed in the kitchen.

The inner prison-door looked more like one's idea of a "Tolbooth," and by it we gained the interior of the Tombs. Gadsby's Hotel at Washington is a very correct model of it, on a somewhat large scale. The cells all open upon a quadrangle, and around each of the four stories runs a light gallery. In the place of Gadsby's fountain is a stove and the turnkey's desk, and, just as we entered, one of the prisoners was cooking his mess at the fire with quite an air of comfort and satisfaction. It chanced to be the time of day when the cell-doors are thrown open, and the tenants were mostly outside, hanging over the railings, smoking, chatting with each other and the keepers, and apparently not at all disturbed at being looked at. Saunders, the absconding clerk, whose forgery made so much noise not long ago, was pointed out to us, and a more innocent-looking fair-haired mother's boy you could scarce pick out of a freshman class. He has grown fat in the Tombs. His accomplice, Raget, the Frenchman, is not much older, but he looked rather more capable of a clever bad trick, and Frenchman-like, he preserved, even in prison, the dandy air, and wore his velvet dressing-cap with as jaunty an air of assurance as if just risen to an honest man's breakfast. He is handsome, and his wife still voluntarily shares his cell. A very worthy-looking old gentleman leaned at his cell-door, a celebrated passer of counterfeit money; and a most sanctimonious and theological-student-looking young man was pacing one of the galleries, and he had been rather a successful swindler. Truly "looks is nuffin," as Sam. Weller was shrewd enough to discover.

We looked into one or two of the cells. To a man who has ever suited his wants to the size of a ship's state-room, they are very comfortable lodgings, and probably a sailor would think quarters in the Tombs altogether luxurious. Punishment of this kind must be very unequal, until it is meted out by what a man has been used to. (Till then, at least, it is better not to steal!) Two or three of the cells were carpeted and decked with pictures, and the walls of one I looked into were covered with drawings. Friends are permitted, of course, to bring to prisoners any luxuries except liberty; and on the small shelf of another cell we saw a pyramid of gingerbread—the occupant, probably, still a youth.

We passed over to the female prison. The cell-doors were all open as in the other wards. But here were strong symptoms that, however "it is not good for man to be alone," it is much more unpalatable to woman. A poor girl who had just been brought in, and was about to be locked up, was pleading piteously with the keeper not to be shut up alone. Seven others who had just been sentenced and were "waiting for their carriage" to go to Sing-Sing, sat around the stove in the passage, and a villainous-looking set they were. It is a pity women ever sin. They look so much worse than we—(probably from falling so much farther)—and degradation in dress is so markedly unbecoming! Most of the female cells were double-bedded, I observed; and in one, which was very nicely furnished, stood a tall and well-dressed, but ill-favored woman, who gave back our look of curiosity with a ferocious scowl. It struck me as curious, that, out of nineteen or twenty women whom we saw in the Tombs, two thirds had scratched faces!

One of the police-officers joined us in the latter part of our rounds, but too late for the thorough inquiries I wished to make; and promising myself another visit to the Tombs, accompanied by some one in authority, I made my envious and unobstructed exit.

It was a sunny spring afternoon, the kind of weather in which, before all other blessings, to thank God for liberty. With a simultaneous expression of this feeling as we cleared the prison steps, my friend and I crossed the rail-track which forms the limit of the New York Alsatia, and were presently in the heart of the Five Points—very much in the same "circle" of society as we had just left, the difference probably consisting in scarce more than cleanly restraint without want, and dirty liberty with it. Luckily for the wretched, the open air is very nearly as pleasant for half the year as the inside of a millionaire's palace, and the sunshine is kept bright and the sky clear, and the wind kept in motion—alike for the pauper setting on his wooden door-step and the rich man on the silk ottoman in his window. Possibly, too, there is not much difference in the linings of their content, and if so, the nominal value of the distinctions between rich and poor should be somewhat modified. At the Five Points, to all appearance, nobody goes in doors except to eat and sleep. The streets swarm with men, women, and children, sitting down. The negro-girls with their bandanna turbans, the vicious with their gay-colored allures, the sailors tired of pleasures ashore, the various "minions of the moon" drowsing the day away—they are all out in the sun, idling, jesting, quarrelling, everything but weeping, or sighing, or complaining. The street is dirty, but no offence to their nostrils! The police officers are at the watch-house door, always on the alert, but (probably from possessing little imagination) the culprits of to-morrow have no apprehension till apprehended. A viler place than the Five Points by daylight you could not find, yet to the superficial eye, it is the merriest quarter of New York. I am inclined to think Care is a gentleman, and frequents good society chiefly. There is no print of his crow's-foot about the eyes of these outcasts. Who knows how much happiness there is in nothing to dread—the downfall well over?

We strolled slowly around the triangular area which is the lungs of the Five Points, and, spoken to by some one in every group we passed, escaped without anything like a rudeness offered to us. The lower story of every second house is a bar-room, and every bench in them had a sleeper upon it. There are some houses in this quarter that have been pretentious in their day, large brick buildings with expensive cornice and mouldings—one particularly at the corner of the famous "Murdering Alley," which would bring a six-hundred-dollar rent, "borne like Loretto's chapel through the air" to a more reputable neighborhood.

We wound our way into the German quarter, which occupies the acclivity between the Five Points and the Bowery; but as I wish to connect, with a description of this, some notices of the habits and resorts of foreigners generally in New York, I shall drop the reader at the corner.

It is right and wholesome that a new country should be the paradise of the working-classes, and that ours is so may be seen very readily. A wealthy merchant, whose family is about leaving the city, sold out his household furniture last week, and among other very expensive articles, a magnificent piano. It was bid off at a very fair price, and the purchaser turned out to be the carman usually employed at the merchant's warehouse! He bought it for his daughters. The profits of this industrious man's horse and cart were stated by this gentleman to approach three thousand dollars a year!

brated shops which are the prominent features of London and Paris. "Stuart" is the projector, and when it is completed, he will leave the low-browed and dingy long-room in which he has amassed a fortune, and start fresh in this magnificent "bezestein." Extending back to a great depth, the new structure is to open by a right angle on another street, giving the facility of two entrances. "Shopping" is to be invested with architectural glories—as if its Circean cup was not already sufficiently seductive!

Even this chrysalis-burst of Stuart's, however, is a less forcible exponent of the warrant for the importation of luxuries, than the brilliant CURIOSITY SHOP of TIFFANY and YOUNG. No need to go to Paris now for any indulgence of taste, any vagary of fancy. It is as well worth an artist's while as a purchaser's, however, to make the round of this museum of luxuries. The models of most of these fancy articles have been the perfected work approached with slow degrees, even by genius. Those faultless vases, in which not a hair line is astray from just proportion, are not the chance work of a potter! Those intricate bronzes were high achievements of art! Those mignon gems of statuary are copies of the most inspired dreams and revelations of human beauty! The arts are all there—their best triumphs mocked in luxurious trifles. Poetry is there, in the quaint and lovely conception of keepsakes and ornaments. Even refinements upon rural simplicity are there, in the simple and elegant basket furniture of Germany. The mechanic arts are still more tributary in the exquisite enamel of portfolios, the contrivance of marvellous trinkets, the fine carving and high finish of the smithery of precious metals. And then, nowhere such trim shape and dainty color in gloves—nowhere such choice dandy appointments in the way of chains and canes—nowhere such mollifiers of the hearts of sweethearts in the way of presents of innumerable qualities, kinds, values, and devices. I think that shop at the corner of Broadway and Warren is the most curious and visit-worthy spot in New York—money in your pocket or no money. And—(left out of our enumeration)—these enterprising luxuriers have lately opened a second story, where they show such chairs and work-tables as are last invented—things in their way gorgeous and unsurpassable. If the gods have any design of making me rich, I wish it might be done before TIFFANY and YOUNG get too old to be my caterers.

The theatrical astronomers have been much interested in the birth of a new star—lovely Mrs. Hunt of the Park—who has suddenly found her sphere and commenced shining brilliantly in a range of characters seemingly written for the express purpose of developing her talent. Her arch, half-saucy, and yet natural and earnest personation of Fortunio has "taken the town." She had made the success also of a very indifferent piece—a poor transfer of the celebrated Gamin de Paris—in which she played the character of a young rascal with a very good heart. The increasing applause with which Mrs. Hunt is nightly greeted, after having had her light so long "hidden under the bushel" of a stock actress, must be a high gratification to "Strong-back," her husband. Indeed, his undisguised enjoyment of her clever acting (as he plays with her in Fortunio), is as "good as a play" and much more edifying. Success to her, pray!

A drygoods palace is now going up in Broadway, which will probably exceed in splendor even the cele-

THE CABINET.—With difficult and analytical deliberation, we have, at last, duly distributed, to the slits, pigeon-holes, drawers, and cavities of our antique cabinet, their several and appropriate offices and functions. It was a discipline of our talent at strategy, was this job of office-giving—for, to confess a weakness, we have become superstitious touching this venerable piece of furniture. It seems to us haunted! We have harbored it, now, some three weeks, and have attempted with it, in that time, certain liberties of arrangement which have been mysteriously cross-purposed. Nothing about it would stay arranged. We put our approved contributions into one pigeon-hole, and our doubtfuls into another, our to-be-noticed into the upright slits, and our damed into the horizontal. We had a topic-drawer, and a drawer for memoranda—an oblivion-hole and a cave of ridicule. We committed the proper documents to each, and thanking Heaven for a tried secretary, commenced our tranquil reign. A week had not glided by, before all was in confusion. Every hole seemed to have kicked out its tenant. The "approved" had scrambled in with the "doubtfuls," and the "damed" into the "noticed-hole," and "things to be written about," "things to be laughed at," and "things to be forgotten," had changed places with marvellous and decisive celerity! We tried to restore order, but the confusion increased. Nothing would stay put. It was manifestly a Tyler cabinet—the doomed victim of disarrangement.

How order has been restored—by what spirit-fingers our labels have been changed—what intimations as to the occupancy of each particular pigeon-hole we have been compelled to regard—is more than a cabinet secret. We have had (to make a confession) enough of telling ghost-stories. We have been called on by all manner of men and women for our facts as to the only glimpse into the spirit-world which we ever described. It has cost us any quantity of brass (in the wear of our knocker) to satisfy curiosity on that subject. Enough that our pigeon-holes are labelled with supernatural certainty. Our contributors, now, will go to their appointed niche by a selective destiny of which the responsibility is not ours. The rejected will be kind enough to note this, and curse the cabinet—not us! If their manuscripts lodge in the upright slits of the "damed," it is because the "accepted" would not hold, keep, or harbor them. We wash our hands.

Our first three pulls from the topic-drawers are letters of complaint against postmasters for the postage on the Mirror. According to the interpretation of the law by some village postmasters, the government may charge more for carrying the light weight of the Mirror than we for editing, printing, embellishing, and wrapping it! The dunce in the Charlestown post-office has compelled our subscribers to have their papers sent to Boston, the nearest office presided over by a gentleman. Another pig's head has control of the Dedham office, and by-the-way, we clipped from a Dedham paper, the following results of his readings of the postage law:—

Twicedledum.—The postage at the Dedham office for the New World newspaper of 32 pages, is "one and 4-8ths of a cent."

Twicedledee.—The postage for the New Mirror newspaper of 16 pages, smaller in size, with a plate, is "3 and 12-16ths, or twenty four thirty-twoths of a cent!"

Twicedledum second.—The postage of a New Mirror extra, of 32 pages of smaller size, is five cents!

There are one or two offices in the interior of this state where the postage on a single copy of the Mirror has been charged fifteen cents—of course leaving it unredeemed in the office for the postmaster's use—as he expected!

Now, pray (we ask of our friend the town-pump), what is the use of the much-vaunted blessing of "cheap literature," if the government, or its petty officials, are to stand between the publishers and the people, making it dear by charging as much as its whole value for carrying it! Ought the government to favor the circulation of intelligence or not? Is it proper to put the most oppressive, or the least oppressive construction, on all cases which affect the spread of art and literature? It is a fact, that revenue sufficient has been received at the port of New York in the last two months to pay the whole expenses of the government of the United States for one year. (So we were authentically informed yesterday.) But, if government must have more revenue, should not literature (we scarce have patience to ask it) be the last thing taxed? Should not luxuries, vanities, goods and chattels, be levied upon, to the crack of endurance, for the support of authority, before one ray of light is stopped on its way to the public mind—stopped to be converted into a perquisite for the pocket of a petty despot? Of the postmasters in the larger cities there is no complaint. They are generally enlightened men. Mr. Graham here—Mr. Green in Boston—throw no obstacles in the way of literature. On the contrary, they do all in their power to promote and to facilitate it. It is the petty, ignorant, peppercorn postmaster of a small villog, who, clothed with a little brief authority, and knowing that his oppressions leaves the disputed article in his hands, reads the law perversely, and at last shuts his whole neighborhood against everything but newspapers!

It is rather a reproach to a country whose boast and whose reliance for the perpetuity of its free institutions is the superior intelligence of its population, that monarchical countries (England and France) should be before us in the reduction of taxes on the conveyance of intelligence. It has struck us as extraordinary, too, that in the revising of postage laws, the increase of facilities for carrying the mails should not have suggested a reduction of postage! But at any rate—leaving the laws as oppressive as they are—we call upon on enlightened statesman like Mr. Wickliffe to insist upon the most lenient and most favorable interpretation of them—instead of having his administration of the department distinguished, as it has been and is, for more postoffice oppressions than were ever known before. The postage on the Mirror, for one instance—never before charged higher than the newspapers which it scarce equals in weight—now varies (in some of the country postoffices) from five to fifteen cents—a gross "sliding-scale" of oppression which must put a stop to our enterprise, if persevered in, or cause us to give up cover and embellishment, and circulate only the newspaper sheet, suited to the petty letter of the law! The great majority of postmasters, however, we are happy to add, charge mere newspaper postage for the Mirror, "as the law" (properly understood) "directs."

Our favorite adversary of the American finds palatable fault with us for not appending Leigh Hunt's name to such good things as we have copied from him. Why should we? We do not claim them as original, nor are they leaded, as original contributions are wont to be. The original object of giving the author's name is lost (we conceive) at the distance of this country from England. Leigh Hunt collects and publishes in volumes all he writes, and his good things are well labelled and guarded in his own country. Neither his fame, his profit, nor his consequence (the three ends he aims at), could be affected by adding his name to what we occasionally take from him. Besides—tit-for-tat—ically considered—the English steal our articles by the dozen, and not only leave out our name but appropriate them, by other initials, as their own. They have at this moment a cheap edition of our poems in the press without our leave or license, and we have helped swell most of the collections of English poetry, with no clue left for posterity to discover that the author had also the honor of the "American's" frequent notice. Besides again, there is a precedent in nature. The rice-birds of the south are the bobolinks of the north—losing their name and copyright altogether by emigration. But now, having defended our castle, we would fain express our pleasure at the tone and quality of the "American's" fault-findings, invariably done in good taste, and confined always within legitimate critical bounds. This, which in a Utopia, would be like praising water for running down hill, is great praise in an unmitigated republic. Fault found with our writings, without a smutch on ourself, is "a thing to thank God on"—as things go. In the same breath let us laud the Boston Atlas, who says of us, with something between a pickle and a sweetmeat, that "he has one fault—he caters for his readers as for himself, and novelty or eccentricity of expression sometimes usurps the place which should only be accorded to thoughts of real value." We kiss the rod.

Brigadier.—My dear boy, what could have possessed you to get up so early? Ten o'clock, and the last page all written, and not a subject touched, I'll wager a julep, out of forty that were indispensible! Have you said no word of the "Mirror Library?"

Cabinet.—Supererogatory, brigadier! Why add perfume to the violet! Our selections for the Library are appreciated—they sell! They advertise themselves. They breathe sweetness.

Brigadier.—Like the lady's breath, which made all men exclaim, "Hereof be scent-bags made!" Eh, my boy?

Cabinet.—The "Rubric of Love"—that bundle of all the delicious things ever written on the exciting subject of love—what but its very name and purpose is wanting to make that universal! Everybody, whose lease of love is not quite run out, must have a copy of it!

Brigadier.—They must! they must! It is a book, charming and cheap at any price. But—

Cabinet.—I'll save off your "but" with a passage from Milton's Comus, for I'll talk of work no more. Did you know that the julep was to Milton what gin was to Byron? Listen!—

"And first behold this cordial julep here,
With spirits of balm and fragrant syrups mixed!
Not that Nepenthé which the wife of Thone
In Egypt gave to Jove-born Helena,
Is of such power to stir up joy as this,
To life so friendly, or so cool to thirst!"

Let us to this "Nepenthé"—for we thirst with Milton.

It would probably flabbergast most barn-door fowl to be asked the meaning of ecaloboon, though, call it the hatching of eggs, and they would laugh at being acquainted with anything else. This big word has mystified the poets and corners for a fortnight, and yesterday my curiosity came to a head. I looked at the bottom of the placard to see where the Ecaloboon was to be exhibited, and soon found myself at a small boy, keeping door opposite Washington Hall. (The lad was so small and pale, by the way, that I thought it warrantable to inquire whether he was produced by ecaloboon. It appeared that he was not. He had a regular mother, who "knew he was out.")

The chirruping of chickens saluted our ears as we opened the door, and we observed that a corner of the room was picketed off, where a dozen or two of these pseudo-orphans (who had lost their mother by not having been suffered to have one), were pecking at gravel and evidently doing well. Very good manners, for chickens, though, as the man in the menagerie says, "where they got them 'mity knows." It began to look very much as if mothers were a superfluity.

The centre of the room was occupied by the artificial mother—a square brick structure, containing ovens in which lay the eggs in different stages of progress. Pieces of carpet were suspended before the openings, and, on raising them and putting in the hand, the temperature within seemed to be at about blood-heat. The keeper took out an egg that was about to enter upon its new destiny of skewer and gravy. The chicken had been twenty days on the road from spoon-victual land, and its little beak was just hardened sufficiently to prick a hole into the world in which it was to be eaten. It lay in a heap, rather confusedly packed, its thigh bone close at its beak (apparently ready to be used as a fulcrum in prying the crack open), and its downy feathers, wet and forlorn, just lifted by respiration. This premature removal of the shell, however, the man said, would be fatal. The destiny of that little well-contrived heart, as far as this world was concerned, was to furnish material for this sigh and paragraph!

In dishes upon the table were eggs, without shells, in all the different stages of formation. In some the veins were just reddening, and the vessels filling around the heart, and in one, just opened, the newly-formed heart, a red globule of the size of a pin's head, was playing backward and forward, like a shuttle in a miniature loom. With a glass, every phase of the process of chicken-making could be distinctly seen. The yolk, I was surprised to learn, does not contribute to the material of the body—the most valuable portion of its existence, as an egg, being, therefore, of no value to it in its after-life of chicken! The provision is certainly a wise one by which winged creatures, that could not well fly if gravid like other animals, are provided with a removable womb in the shape of an egg, so that their parturition can be carried on outside the body, and their buoyancy of locomotion is not interfered with. The comparison between the incubation of fowls and human gestation immediately suggests itself, and the superior convenience of the former to the shape-destroying, beauty-marring, and painful maternity of our race, seems a blessing to be envied, at least by the beautiful. How long might women continue ornamental, and to what age would their personal loveliness be undiminished, if the care and suffering of maternity could be delegated to a brick oven!

I am inclined to think it is not peculiar to myself to have a sabbath taste for the water-side. There is an affinity, felt I think by man and boy, between the stillness of the day and the audible hush of boundaries to water. Premising that it was at first with the turned-up nose of conscious travestie, I have to confess the finding of a sabbath ramble, to my mind, along the river-side in New York—the first mile toward Albany on the bank of the Hudson. Indeed, if quiet be the object, the nearer the water the less jostled the walk on Sunday. You would think, to cross the city anywhere from river to river, that there was a general hydrophobia—the entire population crowding to the high ridge of Broadway, and hardly a soul to be seen on either the East river or the Hudson. But, with a little thoughtful frequenting, those deserted river-sides become contemplative and pleasant rambling-places, and, if some whim of fashion do not make the bank of the Hudson like the Marina of Smyrna, a fashionable resort, I have my Sunday afternoons provided for, during the pigritude of city durance.

Yesterday (Sunday) it blew one of those unfolding west winds, chartered expressly to pull the kinks out of the belated leaves—a breeze it was delightful to set the face to—strong, genial, and inspiriting, and smelling (in New York) of the snubbed twigs of Hoboken. The Battery looked very delightful, with the grass laying its cheek to the ground, and the trees all astir and tinkling, but on Sunday this lovely resort is full of smokers of bad cigars—unpleasant gentlemen to take the wind of. I turned the corner with a look through the fence, and was in comparative solitude the next moment.

The monarch of our deep water-streams, the gigantic "Massachusetts," lay at her wharf, washed by the waving hands of the waters taking leave of the Hudson. The river ends under the prow—or, as we might say with a poetic license, joins on, at this point, to Stonington—so easy is the transit from wharf to wharf in that magnificent conveyance. From this point up, extends a line of ships, rubbing against the pier the fearless noses that have nudged the poles and the tropics, and been breathed on by spice-islands and icebergs—an array of nobly-built merchantmen, that, with the association of their triumphant and richly-freighted comings and goings, grows upon my eye with a certain majesty. It is a broad street here, of made land, and the sidewalks in front of the new stores are lumbered with pitch and molasses, flour and red ochre, bales, bags, and barrels, in unsightly confusion—but the wharf-side, with its long line of carved figure-heads, and bowsprits projecting over the street, is an unobstructed walk—on Sundays at least—and more suggestive than many a gallery of marble statues. The vessels that trade to the North sea harbor here, unloading their hemp and iron; and the superb French packet-ships, with their gilded prows; and, leaning over the gangways and taffrails, the Swedish and Norwegian sailors jabber away their Sunday's idle time; and the negro-cooks lie and look into the puddles, and altogether it is a strangely-mixed picture—Power reposing and Fret and Business gone from the six-days' whip and chain. I sat down on a short hawser-post, and conjured the spirits of ships around me. They were as communicative as would naturally be expected in a tête-à-tête when quite at leisure. Things they had seen and got wind of in the Indian seas, strange fishes that had tried the metal of their copper bottoms, porpoises they had run over asleep, wrecks and skeletons they had thrown a shadow across when under prosperous headway—these and particulars of the fortunes they had brought home, and the passengers coming to look through one more country to find happiness, and the terrors and dangers, heart-aches and dreams, that had come and gone with each bill of lading—the talkative old bowsprits told me all. I sat and watched the sun setting between two outlandish-looking vessels, and, at twilight, turned to go home, leaving the spars and lines drawn in clear tracery on a sky as rosy and fading as a poet's prospects at seventeen.

POSTOFFICE ABUSES.—"It will none otherwise be," says Sir Thomas More, "but that some stumbling blockes will always bee, by malicious folk, laid in good people's way." Upon this text we propose to preach a little sermon.

We have given in to the rage of the day, which is the cheapening of brain-work, not very willingly at first, but heartily when our mind was made up to it. The author is depreciated, and that is, perhaps, not well—but the public is benefited, and that is, very certainly, good. Millions are touched by the lengthened wand of literature, who were beyond its reach till it was eked out by cheapness.

The old Mirror, at five dollars per annum, occasionally embellished by a plate, was considered, by the successive postmasters-general for twenty years, as a popular good, which it was well worth their while to favor and foster. It thrived accordingly. Had Mr.

Wickliffe been postmaster-general when it was started, it would not have lived a year! With or without its plate, with or without its cover, it went rigorously to all parts of the country, at newspaper postage. No village postmaster would have ventured to charge more upon it; and if one had been pragmatical enough to twist the law into a new reading for that purpose, the very first complaint would have set it right, or removed him. The editors had no trouble on the subject, and they went on, pioneering the way into the fields of art and elegant literature, and setting an example which has been followed by the large troop of tasteful periodicals now in existence, to the no small diffusion of taste and intelligence.

Literature began to cheapen. It was proposed to bring refinement, delicate sentiment, the ennobling love of poetry, and an acquaintance with heroic models through song and story, within reach of the humbler classes. New periodicals were started on this basis. The old Mirror was superseded by cheaper works—works which, for three dollars, gave as much or more matter, but without embellishment, and of very inferior typography and paper. That rage had its day. The circulation of light literature was very much enlarged, and the people, of all classes, became interested in the current writing of the eventful present hour. This sudden spread of taste (we may say in passing) was an ingredient thrown into the national character which no doubt powerfully furthered—what it seems Mr. Wickliffe's sole mission to retard—the refinement and growing intelligence of the American people.

But there was one more effort to be made. Complaints began to be heard that these cheap publications were inelegant; that, sent forth damp, unpressed and unembellished, they became smutched and grew unsightly and hurtful to the eyes; and that more careful workmanship and better type and paper were desirable. The founder of the old Mirror took the subject into examination and study. He made the closest calculations of the cost of fair print and embellishment, and after much thought and inquiry, aided by twenty years of experience and success, he matured the plan of the present "NEW MIRROR." It was the plan of a periodical to be suited to the now refined taste of the "greatest number," as well as adapted to the means of the greatest number, and the uniting of these two desirable extremes brought its price within a hair's breadth of its cost, and left the feasibility of the project dependant wholly on the chance of sailing at once, and smoothly, into an enormous circulation. The item of postage was not overlooked—but as the New Mirror, cover and plate included, would scarce weigh half as much as the Albion, Spirit of the Times, and other weekly papers which went for newspaper-postage, and it was no heavier than the old Mirror, which went for the same postage, the subject was not thought worth a doubt.

Well—the New Mirror made its appearance. A type worthy of the choicest library, a cover convenient and elegant, a beautiful steel plate, and sixteen pages of matter edited with careful experience and labor, were offered to the public for this same manageable price of "three dollars a year!" The poorest citizen need not now be without his fair share of knowledge of the arts and literature. Nothing seemed to stand in the way. The manifest high order of style and spirit in the design of the work, combined with its accessibility by cheapness, sent it abroad like day-rising. Its circulation became, as it well needed to be, enormous. And now, you ask, what is the matter? And we will tell you, and we wish Mr. Wickliffe to listen.

A gentleman called at our office a week or two since, and bought a copy or two of the "Mirror Library," expressing his regret that it was not convenient for him to take the Mirror. He lived in Vernon, Oneida county, New York, and the postage charged him by Mr. J. W. Jenkins, the postmaster of that place, was FOURTEEN CENTS on each copy—bringing the cost of the Mirror up to ten dollars twenty-eight cents a year! We immediately addressed a letter to Mr. J. W. Jenkins, inquiring respectfully into the reason of this exorbitant charge, and that letter Mr. J. W. Jenkins has never answered. The gentleman assured us that several persons of his acquaintance in Vernon had been deterred from subscribing to the Mirror by Mr. J. W. Jenkins's overcharge of postage. Again: we have discovered, in many instances, that our subscribers, after paying their subscriptions, have let their papers lie in the postoffice rather than submit to the extortionate charge of postage, and the postmasters have never notified us of the fact. Again: the Mirrors miscarry, to a degree that shows more than neglect on the part of the postmasters or their subordinates. The complaints and stoppages for this last reason are out of all precedent and proportion. Again: the postage charged on the New Mirror varies, as we have said before, from one cent to fifteen, in some of the country postoffices, more or less, according to the whim or tyranny of the dull official. The postmaster of Great Barrington is one of those pigheaded dunces, charging postage on the Mirror sent to the "Berkshire Courier"—in direct violation of the law which exempts papers from postage on exchanges.

What is the remedy for these abuses? We have complained to Mr. Wickliffe of the irregularity and extortion in regard to the postage on the Mirror, and have received in turn a letter of sesquipedalian flummery, the compounding of which required the education of a Virginia politician; and, our letter once answered, the abuse was probably never thought of in the department. Yet it was a matter serious enough to be worth Mr. Wickliffe's attention. These petty tyrants with their "little brief authority," stand between the public and the supply for public refinement and intelligence. They change the cost of the cheapest and most elegant publication of the day from $3.52 (postage and all) to $10.28! They strangle literary enterprise in the cradle. And for whose advantage? Not the government's—for subscribers will rather leave their Mirrors in the office than pay the extortionate charge. For the benefit of the postmasters themselves—who, by this indirect fraud, obtain a nice handful of periodicals weekly, to dispose of as one of the perquisites of their office! This is surely a matter worth Mr. Wickliffe's while to look after.

To the majority of postmasters we owe thanks rather than reproaches. They have rightly judged that the spirit of the law did not intend a difference of two cents between a paper stitched and a paper not stitched—(a difference made by some of the Dogberry postmasters). They feel justly that if there is a question as to the intention of a postage-law, the cause of intelligence and literature is to have the benefit of the most favorable interpretation. No law can exactly describe every periodical likely to be started. No senate, in making a law, intends to charge more for carrying three printed pieces that weigh one ounce, than one printed piece that weighs two or three ounces—yet so, again, do these petty Dogberrys interpret the law.

There is another point about which we would inquire of the committee now engaged on the revised postage-laws. Why should literary papers of the same weight be more taxed than newspapers? Is the circulation of moral and refining influences twice as taxable as the circulation of scandal and politics, rapes and murders, amusements and advertisements? Surely the intelligence that enlightens the community is as much contained in the weeklies and monthlies as in the daily papers. Yet in the bill now before the house, the former are taxed at twice the price of the latter! This, we suppose, is some of Mr. Wickliffe's handiwork.

We give up the postmaster-general—leave him to be bewildered with the technicalities of his office—careful of the husks while the grain sifts away from him. We make an appeal to the fountain of his official power—public opinion! Let this matter be understood, and let every petty postmaster who plays the tyrant, or misuses his authority, be memorialized out of office. The government ought not to be one penny richer for carrying the mails. No revenue should be derivable to the treasury from the carrying of intelligence. The cheapest postage-rate possible should be set by law, and the law should be bent to suit circumstances in all cases where the cost of carrying is not thereby made greater. Public opinion should so instruct the public servant. The postmaster-general, and the lesser postmasters who obey his dictum, should be made to feel that the least pretence for extortion or oppression on their part, or any want of accommodation and liberal conduct, would be promptly punished. We write freely on this subject, for our enterprise is at stake, and we speak somewhat, too, for other interests than our own. To offer a periodical for three dollars a year, that is made to cost ten by the oppression of postmasters, is to advertise a misnomer. Let the Wickliffe dynasty prevail, and we shall be obliged to leave off cover, plate, and stitching, and change the Mirror to a simple printed sheet, without protection from wear and tear, and without embellishment or capability of binding and preservation.

We have always felt great sympathy for the blind. We have felt also great curiosity to know exactly how much of human knowledge is forbidden to go in at the ear—and how much that is turned aside, as inadmissible at that one portal, can be smuggled in afterward under the cloak of explanation and description. The accounts of Laura Bridgman interested us proportionably more from her greater deprivations. It is putting this curiosity in a much more spicy vein of gratification, however, to know that a poet is imprisoned in one of these windowless temples, and to discover how he lives without light and color—as well as how much he is the purer and better from escaping all that offends the eye, which, by-the-way, is not a little. The poems of Miss FRANCES JANE CROSBY, a pupil of the New York Institution for the Blind, lie before us, and we have read them with great modification of our pity for the blind. Eyes could scarce do more.

No one in reading the miscellaneous poems by Miss Crosby would suspect that she was blind. She seems to forget it herself. She talks of "crimson tints" and "purple west" and "stars of mildest hue," with quite the familiarity of those who see. But it is evident that her ear has more than a common share of nicety and susceptibility to measure, for in no early poems that we remember is there such smooth elegance of rhythm.

The volume is composed principally of poems of the affections, and well-expressed, musical, and creditable to the authoress, are all the pieces. The price of such a volume should be nominal merely, and the kindly-disposed should give for it what their benevolence prompts. We would suggest to the publishers to send it round by agents with this view.

There are things in the world better than poetry and things written without genius that more stir th soul of a man than would some things ticketed for immortality. Now we do not make sure that we are not "weak" on the subject of young children. We always thought them quite eligible to any possible choir of cherubim. But we will venture to unmask our foible, if foible it be, by declaring that we have read the following downright, homely, truthful, and funny verses—(sent to us by some charming mother)—read them with delight. It is good honest poetry, with a foothold to it, and we should like to see the baby, since reading it:—

"MY BABY.

"She is not a beauty, my sweet little pet,
Her mouth's not a rosebud, her eyes not like jet,
Her nose far from Grecian, her skin not like snow,
She is not a beauty, dear me! no, no, no!
But then she is winsome, this bird of my bower,
And she grows on my heart every minute and hour.

"She is not a beauty, my sweet little pet,
On dimples more witching my eyes have been set;
Her mouth, I must tell you, is large like mama's,
While her chin, to-be-sure, is just like her papa's!
But when she smiles trustingly, what can compare
With this gem of my casket, bright, sparkling, and fair?

"She is not a beauty, my sweet little pet,
Far handsomer babies each day can be met;
Her brows are not arching—indeed, they're too straight,
Yet time will work wonders, with patience I'll wait.
But if she's not handsome, it matters not—no!
This bud of my bosom is pure as the snow."

"She is not a beauty, my sweet little pet,
That her forehead is too low I can not forget;
No, no, she's not beautiful! I must confess!
(Between you and I, would her mouth had been less)
But she loves me so dearly, oh, how could I part
With this light of my pilgrimage, joy of my heart. c. n."

We are fortunate in a troop of admirable contributors who write for love, not money—love being the only commodity in which we can freely acknowledge ourselves rich. We receive, however, all manner of tempting propositions from those who wish to write for the other thing—money—and it pains us grievously to say "No," though, truth to say, love gets for us as good things as money would buy—our readers will cheerfully agree. But, yesterday, on opening at the office a most dainty epistle, and reading it fairly through, we confess our pocket stirred within us! More at first than afterward—for, upon reflection, we became doubtful whether the writer were not old and "blue"—it was so exceedingly well done! We have half a suspicion, now, that it is some sharp old maid in spectacles—some regular contributor to Godey and Graham, who has tried to inveigle us through our weak point—possibly some varlet of a man-scribbler. But no! it is undeniably feminine. Let us show you the letter—the latter part of it, at least, as it opens rather too honeyed for print:—

"You know that the shops in Broadway are very tempting this spring. Such beautiful things! Well, you know (no, you don't know that, but you can guess) what a delightful thing it would be to appear in one of those charming, head-adorning, complexion-softening, hard-feature-subduing Neapolitans; with a little gossamer veil dropping daintily on the shoulder of one of those exquisite balzarines, to be seen any day at Stewart's and elsewhere. Well, you know (this you must know) that shopkeepers have the impertinence to demand a trifling exchange for these things, even of a lady; and also that some people have a remarkably small purse, and a remarkably small portion of the yellow 'root' in that. And now, to bring the matter home, I am one of that class. I have the most beautiful little purse in the world, but it is only kept for show; I even find myself under the necessity of counterfeiting—that is, filling the void with tissue-paper in lieu of bank-notes, preparatory to a shopping expedition!

"Well, now to the point. As 'Bel' and I snuggled down on the sofa this morning, to read the New Mirror (hy-the-way, cousin 'Bel' is never obliged to put tissue-paper in her purse), it struck us that you would be a friend in need, and give good counsel in this emergency. 'Bel', however, insisted on my not telling what I wanted the money for; she even thought that I had better intimate orphanage, extreme suffering from the burdens of some speculating bubble, illness, etc., etc.; but did not I know you better! Have I read the New Mirror so much (to say nothing of the graceful things coined 'under a bridge,' and a thousand other pages slung from the inner heart), and not learned who has an eye for everything pretty? Not so stupid, Cousin 'Bel'—no, no!

"However, this is not quite the point, after all; but here it is. I have a pen—not a gold one (I don't think I could write with that), but a nice little feather-tipped pen, that rests in the curve of my fore-finger as contentedly as on its former pillow of down. (Shocking! how that line did run down hill! and this almost as crooked! dear me!) Then I have little messengers racing 'like mad' through the galleries of my head, spinning long yarns, and weaving fabrics rich and soft as the balzarine which I so much covet, until I shut my eyes and stop my ears and whisk away with the 'wonderful lamp' safely hidden in my own brown braids. Then I have Dr. Johnson's dictionary—capital London edition, etc., etc.; and, after I use up all the words in that, I will supply myself with Webster's wondrous quarto, appendix and all. Thus prepared, think you not I should be able to put something in the shops of the literary caterers—something that, for once in my life, would give me a real errand into Broadway? Maybe you of the New Mirror pay for acceptable articles—maybe not. Comprenez-vous!

"O I do hope that beautiful balzarine like 'Bel's' will not be gone before another Saturday! You will not forget to answer me in the next Mirror; but pray, my dear editor, let it be done very cautiously, for 'Bel' would pout all day if she should know what I have written. Till Saturday, your anxiously-waiting friend,
"FANNY."

Well—we give in! On condition that you are under twenty-five, and that you will wear a rose (recognisably) in your bodice the first day you appear in Broadway with the hat and "balzarine," we will pay the bills. Write us thereafter a sketch of "Bel" and yourself as cleverly done as this letter, and you may "snuggle down" on the sofa and consider us paid and the public charmed with you.

In the days when we were "possessed" with horses, and horse-racing, we were sadly well-acquainted with a jockey who lost his wits in the excitement of losing a race. He hung about race-courses for some years after becoming an idiot, and by dint of always denying a horse's good qualities in the stable, and of never speaking well of one except at the winning moment, he contrived to preserve, through all his idiocy, some influence in the judgment of horseflesh. We have been reminded of our old friend Spavin (call him Spavin—"nil mortuis") by certain of our critical brother editors, and their very kindly-intended (possibly) critiques on the Mirror. Come a week (as such weeks will come) when our health is queasy, and when our spirits are gathering violets in dells where a paving-stone would be stoned to death as a monster (and there are dells incapable of a paving-stone)—come such a week, we say, and let the Mirror go forth, without such quantity of our own work as strains our extremest fibre to the crack, and down comes this vigilant critic upon us with a cry of "no go," "falling off," "idle," and "better formerly"—disparagements that would take the conceit out of a church steeple! And why does he do this? Why should we not be better at some times than at others, without being criticised like a steam-engine—a thing incapable of mood, humor, and caprice? Simply because this sort of critique is easy to write, and so favors, in the writer, the very idleness he criticises in us. But, good heavens! are we not entitled to our worse, as well as our better moments! Shall we always be at tiptop speed, and never have freedom from disparagement except when winning a race?

We boldly lay claim to more industry than rightly falls to us as our share of the curse! Supposing, for the moment, that our writings are better for the Mirror than what takes their place occasionally (a flattering inference from our critic's critique), we do more in quantity, in the course of the year, than one editor in a hundred. There is more copied from the Mirror (we have often had occasion to observe) than from any two periodicals in the country. The truth is, we are too famous for comfort!

"Oh mediocrity,
Thou priceless jewel only mean men have
But never value—like the precious gem
Found in the muck-hill by the ignorant cock."

You see what troubles us, dear reader!

The flowering into glory of such a century-plant of excellence as our worthy friend and fellow-publisher, JAMES HARPER, has in it, with all our willing acclamation, some occasional provocation to a smile. The sudden call for "his picture"—the eager lithograph of his fun-bestridden nose and money-making spectacles—the stir he has made among the abuses, with his Cliff-street way of doing business, and the salutary feel we get of the wand of power in his clutch, while we still see him in his accustomed haunts, busy and unpedestaled as before—there is something in the contrast which makes us say, with Prince Hal, "Ned, come out of that fat room and give us thy hand to laugh a little," though, with all our heart, we rejoice in his authority. The Courier, speaking of the likeness just published of Mr. Harper, says: "The new mayor's pleasant, shrewd, and half-quizzical countenance is cleverly hit off, and he is peering through the official eye-glasses in a manner that portends trouble to all municipal delinquents. Let them look to their ways, and let all subordinate official functionaries look to the streets; for this portrait would convince us, even if we were not acquainted with the original, that the chief magistrate has an eye upon them."

This bit of speculation as a preface to our laudamus of Mayor Harper's administration, as felt particularly in two or three abated nuisances. The hackmen are no longer permitted to devour passengers on their arrival in steamboats, nor to make a chevaux-de-frise of their whips at the landing-piers, but must sit quietly on their coach-boxes till called for. The omnibus-racing is to be put a stop to, we understand, and that should really be celebrated in an appropriate "northern refrain." There are two refrains more that we would suggest to our city Harper—that hose-boys should be made to refrain from flooding the sidewalks under the thin shoes of ladies, and that gentlemen who must smoke in the street should refrain from the windward side of ladies, particularly those who prefer air that has not been used.

And apropos—(it will be seen that we were born to make a word)—we wish to suggest to enterprise another abatement of the nuisances of Broadway. It is desirable to reduce the number of omnibuses in this great thoroughfare, for many very cogent reasons—but as long as they pay—that is to say, as long as the public require them—they must even go on—deafening promenaders, and endangering private carriages and the lives of people crossing the street. But who that is down town in a summer's day, and wishes to go anywhere to the western side of the city, would not prefer to take a ferry-boat (if there were one) from the foot of Maiden lane round the Battery to Chelsea? How preferable the fresh air, and beautiful scenery of the rivers and bay, to a crowded omnibus in hot weather! How much more desirable would be a residence in Chelsea, if there were such a convenience! The boats might touch at the foot of Cortland street and the Battery, and, indeed, extend their course up the East river to the foot of Pike street—plying, say, every ten minutes, from Pike street to Chelsea, and back—rounding the Battery, and touching wherever it was convenient. Who would not prefer this to omnibussing? Let this line communicate with Stevens's upper ferry to Hoboken, and the line would be continuous from that beautiful spot, all round the city. Quite aside from its utility, this would be one of the prettiest pleasure trips that could be invented. Pensez-y, Messrs. Stevens.

If any charitable person has an old man or woman whom he would like to set up in an easy and profitable business, we have a plan to suggest. Give them half a dozen light chairs, and send them to the Battery or the Park. In all public promenades in France there are chairs to be hired for two cents an hour, and besides being a good trade for the lame and old, this convenience is wanted.

By the way, where are the good things, clever couplets, and flings of wit, that used to fly about at the municipal elections? Squibs grow dull. Where is that witty conservative whig who, when "Forest and Liberty" was placarded by the democrats, put up a rival bill of "Povey and the Constitution?" Wit and poetry (we might have remembered) seem to have gone into advertisements. When people have done with "Who is Seatsfield?" we shall start a new query—"Who is the bard of Stoppani?" Moore's oriental flow of melting stanza and balmy imagery is quite paled in its glory by Stoppani's advertisement:—

"Will you come to the BATHS IN BROADWAY,
Where the genius of luxury presides,
And the glorious Croton, by night and by day,
Through the conduits silently glides?"

"The ceiling al fresco, the beautiful bar,
Rich drapery, and sumptuous screens,
The marble as white as a Persian Cymar,
The painting—of Italy's scenes," etc.

Mellifluously musical! Who is the distinguished author?

The advertisement of a hatter plausibly sets forth that the Miller prophecy being exploded, and the world really not coming to an end (at least within a hat's-wear of time), the prospects of the globe's continuance justifies the venture of a new hat! We think we see a hat bought on that hypothesis!

We are happy to see that our imported word, rococo, is coming into general use. A critic in the Herald, noticing the opera, says: "This concert-piece has been rococo for some time, and, like an old maid, is getting, every year, two years older." This is a clever critic, by the way, though in the sentence we have quoted he reminds us of a bit of dialogue in an old play:—

Manes.—Didst thou not find that I did quip thee?

Psy.—No, verily. What is a quip?

Manes.—A short saying of a sharp wit, with a bitter sense in a sweet word."

The True Sun quotes, with a clincher, from the Buffalo Commercial, "The common use of the word lady, instead of the definite honored term wife, is an atrocious vulgarism that should be universally scouted." We think the ladies should be informed of the etymological meaning of the two words, and take their choice after. Wife is derived from the Anglo-Saxon word signifying to weave, and means the person who weaves for the family. Lady originally meant a woman raised to the rank of her husband—from the Saxon word signifying elevated. The propriety of calling a man's better half his lady, depends, of course, on the fact whether she was made more respectable by the match; and the propriety of calling her his wife, hangs upon her expertness and industry at the loom. Which will the fair sex prefer?

NEW LITERARY EPOCH.—We have been, for the last year, not only working among, but watching, "the signs of the times" in the way of literature. We have been trying, not only to make out a living, but to make out head and tail to our epoch—to see what way the transition was tending, and when there was likely to be any reliable shape and form to American literature; or (to change the figure) whether the literary boatmen, who stand with their barques hauled ashore, uncertain of the current, and employing themselves meantime in other vocations, could be called upon to launch and dip their oars, sure at last of tide and channel.

International copyright has died a natural death. There was not a statesman in the country who had the courage to take the chance of making or marring his political fortunes by espousing the question. At the same time—palpably just, honorable, and expedient, as would be the giving of copyright to English authors—there was some excuse for shying the subject, in the violent abuse that was indiscreetly showered upon us by Dickens and the Reviews, at the very moment when general public attention had been called to the subject, and when there was every prospect of its turning the crisis favorably. It would have taken the statesmanship and eloquence of Clay or Webster to have made the discussion at all endurable to congress, and we are quite sure that it will be ten years before the public irritation against English travellers and critics will have sufficiently abated to tolerate any measure in their favor. Dickens, and his friend, the critic of the Foreign Quarterly, therefore, have sanded their own bread and butter in throwing dirt at us.

But the great end of international copyright is coming about without the aid of legislation. The abuse has been that American authors were thrown out of the market by English works that were to be had for nothing—(justice to the English author, of course, a secondary consideration). But this abuse is losing strength by surfeit. The publishers and periodical agents are aghast, at this very moment, of the falling off of interest in the most attractive publications. The zest for novelty has been so pampered, that only the first number or two, of anything new, sells well. And not from any falling off in their character. The English pictorial papers (for one example) have rather improved in merit, but a publisher informed us a day or two since that they do not now sell ten where they sold a hundred a month or two ago. Such enterprises used to begin small, and grow into favor gradually. Now, the cornucopia of their prosperity is reversed—the small end turned from the publisher. Copyrighted American books, and American periodicals, though dearer than reprints, sell much better, and in our opinion the American public, in three months more, will give a preference so decided to home literature, and home periodicals, that, as far as protection to our native authors is concerned, the international copyright will be useless. The truth is, that literature, to be permanently popular, must be produced under the meridian of the country it is to supply. Who will pretend that any periodical in this country is edited with half the ability of the London magazines and reviews? The leading intellects of the age—men who in this country would be eminent lawyers and politicians, devote themselves to magazine-writing abroad, and, besides, they are a trained class of professed authors, such as we have no idea of in America. Our contributors are men who dash off an article as by-play, and make no investment of thought or money in it—and of course it can not compare to the carefully-written and well-considered articles of English weeklies and monthlies. But look at the difference of circulation. See how periodicals languish that are made up of the cream of these London magazines, and see how Graham and Godey, Inman of the Columbian, and ourselves, quadruple them in vogue and prosperity! It was to be expected—it is the most natural thing in the world—that America should grow American, at last! What more natural than that we should tire of having our thinking done in London, our imaginations fed only with food that is Londonish, and our matters of feeling illustrated and described only by London associations, tropes, and similitudes? This weariness of going to so distant a well for better water, we do say, is to be relied upon as a sign of the literary times. The country is tired of being be-Britished. It wants its own indigenous literature, and we think we should be safe tomorrow in issuing a replevin upon law, politics, and commerce, for the men of genius draughted for their employ, during the want of a literary market. Give up the blood horses harnessed into your dull drays, oh, Wall street and Pearl! Untie your fetters of red tape, and let loose your enslaved poets and novelists, oh, Nassau and Pine! Discharge Halleck, oh, Astor; and give up Wetmore, oh, crates of crockery! Lead off with a new novel, Mr. Cooper, and let the public give us a five years' benefit of their present disgust with imported literature, to recover from the numbness of inaction and discouragement. Give us five years of the home tide of sympathy that is now setting westward, and we will have an American literature that will for ever prevent the public taste and patronage from ebbing back again to England.

THINGS AS THEY COME.—We know of a matter we mean to write about, somewhere between this and the bottom of the next column—somewhere within this half-cent's-worth, that is to say—(this page costs you not quite half a cent, dear reader!)—but we must first haul out two or three things that lie a-top of it in our fact-drawer; facts being, as everybody knows, obstinate as nails in a keg, when you want a particular one from underneath.

We have whins (this lies a-top), about the face of newspaper type. There are some most worthy and able periodicals that we could not read our own obituary in, without an effort—the type is so unexplainably anti-pathetic. Every editor who turns over exchange papers will know precisely what we mean. There is no necessity for naming those which we should never open if we had them in our pocket “forty days in the wilderness,” but we can, without offence, name an opposite example—the PICAYUNE—which, from the mere witchery of type, a man would like to take out of the postoffice on his way to execution. The BOSTON TRANSCRIPT is another—(fact No. 2)—which we fatuously read, and should read, even if it were edited by that broken mustard-spoon, the Portland Thersites. The type is captivating—a kind of insinuating, piquant, well-bred brevier, that catches the eye like a coquette in a ball-room. And this, be it noted, spite of the “burnt child’s” prejudice, for the fair editress does not always put on her gloves, before taking a tweak at our immortality! And, apropos—there is an editor “down south” who sympathises with this typical weakness of ours—declaring in a late paper that the reputation of our letters to the Intelligencer “was entirely owing to the large type in which they were printed.” And this we not only believe, but if we ever get rich, we will “fork over the swindle” to our deluded employers.

The reader will see that we are trying to apologise for our dissipation in reading—newspapers being such very loose mental company, and we, as news-writer, having, no more business with the luxury of news written, than a shoemaker with wearing the patent leathers he makes for his gentlemen customers. But we have read an article in the seductive type of the Transcript which led us to philosophise a little touching a point of contrast between Boston and New York; and as we grew up in Boston, but were dug up, and trimmed, and watered into flowering, in New York, we claim to know both places well enough to run a parallel with fairish fidelity.

The article we speak of was a letter, containing, among other things, a touch-up of the Astor house; but the Astor is so much the best hotel in the world, that fault-finding, merited as it may be, will send nobody from its door in search of a better. Without alluding farther to the letter, let us jot down the speculation it suggested.

New York is far more vicious than Boston, without a doubt. But it is not much more vicious than it was, when it was of Boston’s size. We have often wished to preach a sermon to the Bostonians from 1 Corinthians iv. 7: “For who maketh thee to differ from another? And what hast thou, that thou didst not receive?” Up to the present time, the Puritan obedience to authority, and the “power paramount” of good principles, have never been sapped or shaken in Boston. It is but one community, with one class of leading prejudices, and worked by one familiar set of moral, social, and political wires. The inhabitants are nearly all Americans, all church-goers of some sect or other, implicitly subject to general and time-honored principles, and as controllable by mayor and aldermen as an omnibus by passengers and driver. Indeed, the municipal history of Boston for the last twenty years, is a Utopian beau-ideal of efficiency and order, which will never be repeated. The authoritative break-up of the first formidable symptom of mobocracy two years ago, for example—when bold mayor Elliott quietly took the fire-engines from their turbulent companies, and put them into the hands of a paid fire-police—could never have been done in any other city of this country; and ten years hence (Boston continuing to increase and vitiate), a similar pluck at the beard of mob license would be a dangerous experiment.

But look at New York in comparison. There are at least a hundred thousand Irish in this city, twenty thousand French, sixty thousand Germans, and a miscellany of other nations, that probably leaves scarce one fourth of the population (say a hundred thousand), for indigenous and home-spirited New-Yorkers. One quarter too, of the general population, is in a condition that is scarce known in Boston—that of desperate extremity of livelihood, and readiness to do anything for the moment’s relief, vicious, turbulent, or conspirative. The municipal government of New York is, unfortunately, in some measure, a political tool, and compelled to shape its administration somewhat with a view to politics. Harsh measures, used in Boston upon the first germ or symptom of license, are reserved in New York for such signal instances as are melodramatically flagrant—such as can not be perverted, by the party out of power, into a counter-current of sympathy and resentment. What there is now remaining of the Knickerbocker influence in New York, is the degree in which New York can compare with Boston—and this small remainder of the old Dutch character is, as to power and check, about equal to what will be left of Puritan character in Boston, when Boston, by aid of railroads and inducements for foreign residence, shall have four hundred thousand inhabitants. Look at the difference in the observance of Sunday in the two places! At least twenty thousand people cross to Hoboken alone, to pass the sabbath in the fields—foreigners, mostly, who have been in the habit of making it a holiday at home. The Bostonians would suppress the ferry, without the slightest hesitation! There are four or five Sunday newspapers in New York, and Boston will not support one. There are German balls in various places in this city, on Sunday evening; and oyster-shops, and bar-rooms, and the drinking-places, in all directions in the suburbs, have overflowing custom on that day. The government of the city is, of course, in some degree, a reflex of this large proportion of the sovereign voters, and when public opinion countenances a degree of license, it is next to impossible to bring in a city government that can control it. We have not room to follow out this comparison in detail—but we wished to outline it, as a reply to the condemnations of New York (for the sale of vicious publications, etc., etc.), made from time to time, by our more virtuous brethren in the north. We shall take another opportunity to enlarge upon it.

We have received several truly delightful and gratifying letters from eminent clergymen of different persuasions, thanking us for the Sacred Numbers of the Mirror Library, and sending us the choice poems which they had severally laid aside, to add to another collection. We had no idea there was so much beautiful religious poetry in existence! This rich vein of literature has been unworked and overlooked, and we assure the religious world, confidently, that we are doing a most important work in the collection of these gems of piety and poetry in a cheap and accessible form. “SONGS FOR THE SABBATH,” falls behind none of them in interest, and will be a classic in religious books, as long as religious literature exists.

We do not know whether we were particularly in a mood to be pleased on the night of Simpson’s benefit at the Park, but several things pleased us more than they seemed to please other people—the dancing, for example, both of KORONAY, and of DESJARDINS. (Of the acting we do not speak, and by-the-way, we may as well say, here, that the stage is so much better kept in hand by the theatrical critic of the Albion than we could possibly do it, that we generally shie that part of criticism, from a sort of consciousness that it will be done for the public by abler hands. We love good criticism, and we love "honor to whom honor is due.") We did not see Korponay at his debut at Palmo's—but a friend pronounced his dancing a failure. As an attempt at anything in Vestris's line, it certainly was a failure. But that is not the dish to which the well-made Pole invites us. He is, among dancers, what olives are at a feast—"bad pickles" to the vulgar, but artful appetisers to the refined. Korponay seemed to us like a symmetrical and dashing nobleman, doing gracefully a difficult and grotesque dance for the amusement and admiration of a court—leaning as far away as possible from the airs of a professed dancer, and intent only on showing the superb proportion of his figure and the subtle command over his limbs. His face expressed exactly this role of performance. It was full of mock solemnity and high-bred assurance. He seemed to us exactly the sort of noble masquer that, at a Venetian festival of old time, would have "topped the jaunty part," and carried away the flower, the ladies' favor.

But the untrumpeted deservings of Monsieur Korponay are less surprising than the want of appreciation of Mademoiselle Desjardins. We never saw her before, though she has been dancing in town for some time, and, considering how easily most any hook and line of public amusement catches us, it is very plain that the bait has not been skilfully angled. In the first place, as to qualifications, we never have seen, in all our travels from Niagara to the Black sea (the two poles of our "inky orbit"), so well-bridged an instep, and so Dianasque a pair of servicable ankles. She should have stood to John of Bologna for his poised Mercury! There is not a woman's heart better mounted, we venture to say, between Ontario and the Euxine. And she uses these communicators with earth deftly and Ariel-wise! We only saw her in the Polacca, which is a kind of attitudinizing dance, and possibly, better suited to her abilities than a more difficult pas. But she walked and acted it with spirit and grace enough to be charming, and though she is not to be named with Ellsler, she is enough of a danseuse, in Ellsler's absence, to give one's eyes their night's rations very satisfactorily. Underrated she is!

We see, by one of the careful and elaborate reports of the Republic, that the Mercantile Library Association have had a report from a despair-committee, on the subject of the decline of lectures. Eloquence don't pay for the candle, it seems. This excellent association, however, shrinks the wrong way from the plague they have had with it. The taste for eloquence is no more dead or torpid in New York than the love of war or the relish for lions. While people have brains and hearts they will love a true orator. But they are tired (and reasonably enough) of the bald and unvarnished style in which oratory is served up to them. To go moping into the dark and silent Tabernacle—the gas economized till the rise of the orator, and a deathly and gloomy silence maintained for an hour (more or less) before the commencement of the lecture—to have the orator's first opening addressed to chilled, oppressed, and unelevated minds, and all this in a house of such structure, that unless seated clear of the pent-house galleries, the hearer loses everything but the emphatic words in a sentence—to sit an hour amid these disadvantages, and then hear a chance speaker, for whom they are not prepared by any previous information except the name of his subject—this, we say, is indeed "lenten entertainment." It is making of eloquence what the ascetic makes of religion—a dry crust instead of a relishing loaf. No, no! Religion should be adorned with its proper and consistent graces, as woman should be beautifully attired; and eloquence has its natural ornaments and accompaniments as well. See how eloquence was made a pleasure in the gardens of the academy of Athens! Instead of treating our orators as we do the fountain in the Park (giving them a broad margin of bare ground), we should surround their oratory with tributary ornament. The audiences now, at lectures, are that passionless and abstract portion of the community that can stand anything in the shape of an intellectual bore—the Grahamites of amusement. But give us orators on popular subjects, at Palmo's, with dress-circle, bright lights, opera-music, scenery, and interludes for conversation and change of place, and eloquence, from being a jewel dulled with the dirt of a mine, will be a gem in the fit setting of a sparkling tiara. This would be, beside, a kind of premium upon eloquence, that would foster it into a national excellence. There are men at the bar, in the press, and in business, who have the "volcano of burning words" within them, and would make eloquence a study, were it a source of renown and profit. What say to a new niche for oratory, oh, amiable public! Let us get a new serew upon public feeling, to use with effect when we have patriotism to arouse, or abuses to overthrow—passions to awake for good purposes. Let us have a power at the public ear that will be a check-balance to newspapers, that have a monopoly of the public eye. Let music, oratory, and painting, combine in a tripod to support each other—a fine orchestra, a glowing oration, and beautiful scenery—and we shall have public amusement in which the serious classes will join with the gay, and in which instruction shall be dressed, as it always may be, and should be, with captivating flowers.

And while we have this thread in our loom, let us express the delight with which we listened, not long since, to oratory in a silk gown—an oration on CONTEMPT, that was linked naturally enough to a text and a pulpit, but which would have been a noble piece of intellectual oratory in a public hall or theatre. The orator was Rev. HENRY GILES, and the sermon was delivered in a place that is used to eloquence—the pulpit of Mr. Dewey. There were passages in this discourse that were worked up, both in fervor of language and concentrated fire of delivery, to a pitch that we should call truly Demosthenian. Mr. Giles is a natural orator—a man of expanded generalizing powers. It is a treat to hear him, such as would not be second in interest to any dramatic entertainment, and properly combined with other things as agreeable to the taste, there would be an attraction in such oratory that would draw better than a play. We really wish that some "manager" would undertake the getting up of the scenery and musical accessories to oratory, and let secular eloquence take leave of the pulpit where it does not properly belong, and come into a field more natural to its aims and uses.

We had a June May, and a May June, and the brick world of Manhattan has not, as yet, become too hot to hold us. This is to be our first experiment at passing the entire summer in the city, and we had laid up a few alleviations which have as yet kept the shelf, with our white hat, uncalled for by any great rise in the thermometer. There is no knowing, however, when we shall hear from Texas and the warm "girdle round the earth" (the equator—no reference to English dominion), and our advice to the stayers in town may be called for by a south wind before it is fairly printed. First—our substitute for a private yacht. Not having twenty thousand dollars to defray our aquatic tendencies—having, on the contrary, an occasional spare shilling—we take our moonlight trip on the river—dividing the cool breezes, 'twixt shore and shore—in the Jersey ferry-boat. Smile those who have private yachts! We know no pleasanter trip, after the dusk of the evening, than to stroll down to the ferry, haul a bench to the bow of the ferry-boat, and "open up" the evening breeze for two miles and back, for a shilling! After eight o'clock, there are, on an average, ten people in the boat, and you have the cool shoulder under the railing as nearly as possible to yourself. The long line of lamps on either shore makes a gold flounce to the "starry skirt of heaven"—the air is as pure as the rich man has it in his grounds, and all the money in the world could not mend the outside of your head, as far as the horizon. (And the horizon, at such place and hour, becomes a substitute for the small hoop you have stepped out of.) No man is richer than we, or could be better off—till we reach the Jersey shore—and we are as rich going back. Try this, of a hot evening, all who prefer coolness and have a mind that is good company.

Then, there is our substitute for an airing. There is a succession of coaches, lined with red velvet, that, in the slope of the afternoon, ply, nearly empty, the whole length of Broadway—two or three miles, at an easy pace, for sixpence. We have had vehicles, or friends who had vehicles, in most times and places that we remember, and we crave our ride after dinner. We need to get away from walls and ceiling stuck over with cares and brain-work, and to be amused without effort—particularly without the effort of walking or talking. So—we step out from our side street to the brink of Broadway, and presto, like magic, up drives an empty coach with two horses, red velvet lining, and windows open; and by an adroit slackening of the tendons of his left leg, the driver opens the door to us. With the leisurely pace suited to the hour and its besoin, our carriage rolls up Broadway, giving us a sliding panorama of such charms as are peculiar to the afternoon of the great thoroughfare (quite the best part of the day, for a spectator merely). Every bonnet we see wipes off a care from our mental slate, and every nudge to our curiosity shoves up our spirits a peg. Easily and uncrowded, we are set down for our sixpence at "Fourteenth street," and turning our face once more toward Texas, we take the next velvet-lined vehicle bound down. The main difference betwixt us and the rich man, for that hour, is, that he rides in a green lane, and we in Broadway—he sees green leaves and we pretty women—he pays much and we pay little. The question of envy, therefore, depends upon which of these categories you honestly prefer. While Providence furnishes the spare shilling, we, at any rate, will not complain. Such of our friends as are prepared to condole with us for our summer among the bricks, will please credit us with the two foregoing alleviations.

"Taking our hat in our hand, that remarkably requisite practice,"

The postoffice irregularities of which we have so often complained, have drawn from one of our good-natured subscribers, a lament in poetry. We wish all our friends would take it as kindly, but give voice to it as expressively:—

"No Mirror to-day—
No price, no pay;
No chance to spend a sixpence all day long;
No work at all to do,
No help for feeling blue;
No plate, no tale, no 'trifle,' and no song!
No why and no because;
No faith in the whole race of editors;
No remedy, 'tis true;
No seeing exactly what it's best to do;
No chance of being heard,
No profit in a word;
No grumbling at the keepers of the keys;
No hope of men who do just what they please;
No chance to raise a breeze;
No hope, no sign,

No promise that I can divine;
No faith to-day in high humanity;
No doubt that life is vanity;
No dawn, no rising of a better day;
No faint foreshadowing of a golden way;
No knowing when Wickliffe will be turned away;
No last resort but a vile parody.
No Mirror "

We very seldom buy a volume of new poetry, but the portrait on the first leaf of Mrs. Butler's book, a portrait by the admirable and spiritualizing pencil of Sully, and engraved by the as admirable and spiritualizing burin of Cheney, was worth quite the price of the volume. We have since read the poetry. The picture bears a slight resemblance to the poetess, Mrs. Norton, and the poetry is very like Mrs. Norton's in its intention. But both in features and verse, Mrs. Butler is very far that glorious woman's inferior. We have been vexed to see how narrow an escape Mrs. Butler has had, of being a fine poetess, however—how easily with a little consistent labor, and some little unity of sentiment and purpose, she might have filled out the penumbra which provokingly shows what she might have been—but for the eclipse of caprice or carelessness. We have struck a word in this last sentence which seems to us to be the master-chord of all her poetry—caprice! She begins nobly and goes evenly and beautifully half through her strain, and then falters and winds weakly or inconsequently off. We could quote passages from this book as fine as anything of Mrs. Norton's, but there is no one finished poem in it worth reprinting. In all this, we are looking at it with the world's eye. To a poet, who judges of a fragment, as the connoisseur knows the statue of Hercules, by the foot, this volume is full of genius. There is a massy fullness in the use of epithets and figures that shows a Sapphic prodigality of fervor and impulse, and there is, moreover, a masculine strength of passionateness in the moulding and flinging off of emotion, that, well carried out, would have swept the public heart like a whirlwind. We had marked many passages of Mrs. Butler's book for extract, but on looking at them again, we find the best and most creditable blemished with flaws, and, with strong admiration for what the authoress might have been, we lay the book aside.

Our readers will remember a very clever letter, written to us by an anonymous lady who wished to conjure a new bonnet and dress out of her inkind. The inveiglement upon ourselves (to induce us to be her banker), was so adroit and fanciful that we suspected the writer of being no novice at rhetorical trap—one, indeed, of the numerous sisterhood who, denied the concentrated developments of maternity, scatter their barthesome ammunition of contrivance and resource upon periodical literature. We "gave in," however—walking willingly into the lady's noose—on a condition, that she should wear a rose recognisably in Broadway the day she first sported the balzarine and Neapolitan, and afterward send us a sketch of herself and her cousin. The "sketch" we have received, and when we have seen the rose we shall not hesitate to acknowledge the debt. In the following parts of the letter which accompanied the sketch, the reader will see that the authoress feels (or feigns marvelously well) some resentment at our suspicions as to her age and quality:—

"Have you never heard, my de—(pardon! I fear it is a habit of mine to write too 'honeyedly')—but have you not heard that 'suspicion is a heavy armor, which, with its own weight impedes more than it protects.' Suspicion is most assuredly a beggarly virtue. It may, now and then, prevent you from being 'taken in,' but it nips you in the costs most unmercifully. Oh! sharp-sightedness is the most extravagantly dear whistle that poor humans ever purchased! That you should suspect me too, when I was opening my heart away down to the core. How could you? 'Inveigle!' no inveigling about it! I want a bonnet and dress, and said so, frankly and honestly. And I never wrote a line for Graham in my life, no! nor for Godey either. As for le couleur des bas, your keen-eyed hawk pounced on less than a phantom there. From the day that I stood two mortal hours with my finger poked into my eye, and a fool's-cap on my head, because I persisted in spelling 'b-a-g, baker,' to the notable morning of christening my cousin by her profession, I have been voted innocent of all leaning toward the ucelestial. Indeed it is more than suspected by my friend (cousin 'Bel' excepted) that I affect dame Nature's carpet, rather than her canopy. Maybe I am 'some varlet of a man scribbler'—Oh! you are such a Yankee at guessing! 'Old'! ah, that is the unkindest cut of all! You an editor, and the son of an editor, and not know that 'old maids' are a class extinct at the present day, save in the sewing societies, etc., of some western village, subject only to the exploring expeditions of the indefatigable 'Mary Clavers!' Have you never heard of five-and-twenty's being a turning point, and ken ye not its meaning? Why, faire maydens then reverse the hour-glass of old gray-beard; and one by one, drop back the golden sands that he has scattered, till, in five years, they are twenty again. Of course, then, I must be 'under twenty-five;' but, as a punishment for your lack of gallantry, you shall not know whether the sands are dropping in or out of my glass. One thing, however, is indisputable: I am not 'sharp,' my face has not a single sharp feature, nor my temper (it is I, who know, that say it), a sharp corner, nor my voice a sharp tone. So much in self-justification, and now to the little package which you hold in the other hand.

"I send my sketch in advance, because I am afraid cousin 'Bel' and I might not interest you and the public so much as we do ourselves; and then how are we to 'consider you paid.' In truth, I can not write clever things. 'Bel' might, but she never tries. Sometimes she plans for me; but, somehow, I never can find the right words for her thoughts. They come into my head like fixed-up visitors, and 'play tea-party' with their baby neighbors, until I am almost as much puzzled by their strange performances as the old woman of the nursery rhyme, who was obliged to call on her 'little dog at home' to establish her identity. No, no! I can not write clever things, and particularly on the subject to which I am restricted; but if it is the true sketch that you would have for the sake of the information, why here it is. You will perceive that I have been very particular to tell you all.

"Pray, do you allow us carte blanche as far as the hat and dress are concerned? You had better not, for 'Bel' never limits herself. How soon may we have them! The summer is advancing rapidly, and my old muslin and straw are unco' shabby. Yours with all due gratitude, "FANNY FORESTER."

Whoever our fair correspondent may be, old or young, naïve or crafty, we can tell her that talent like hers need never want a market. We commend her, thus in print, to those princes of literary paymasters, Graham and Godey, with our assurance that no more entertaining pea strides a vowel in this country. The sketch of "The Cousins," which we shall give hereafter, has a twist-tear-and-smile-fulness which shows the writer's heart to be as young as a school-girl's satchel, whatever kind of wig she wears, and whatever the number of her spectacles. And she will be as young forty years hence—for genius will be a child, eternity through, in Heaven. If, by chance, the lady is a sub-twenty-fifty, she is a star rising, and we should like to visit her before she culminates.

THE REST OF WHAT WE HAVE TO SAY.—There is a circulation that beats newspapers—beats them particularly in this—the Tuesday's paper overtakes the Monday's, but the lie of Monday is never overtaken by the truth of Tuesday. Some time since a sketch appeared in the Mirror, written by a correspondent, which was seized upon immediately by some of the busy-bodies of society, as an intentional attack upon one of the first families in this city. A week or two after its publication, a friend informed us of the rumor, and we read the sketch over again to see what was objectionable in it. With the exception of a correction made by the proof-reader, and one accidental circumstance, invented by the writer to round a sentence, there was nothing in it that could possibly apply to the family in question, and we were amazed at the interpretation put upon it. Subsequent knowledge of the writer and her object has completely removed from our mind, and that of the family alluded to, all shadow of suspicion that any particular person or persons were in her mind while writing it. The story has again come round to us, however, and in so bold a shape that we think it worth while to nail it again with a denial. There never has been in the Mirror, and there never will be, any offensive allusion to individuals in private life. Descriptive writers constantly describe classes, and, if they describe them well, they will apply as the essays in the Spectator do, to hundreds of persons. The amiable Miss Sedgwick, utterly incapable of an intentional wound to the feelings of any one, has lived in constant hot water, from the offence taken at the supposed personalities of her descriptions. It is very easy for a malicious person to take any sketch of character, and find for it a most plausible original. But there should be a watch kept for those who first name these discoveries—the first finders of the key to a mischievous allusion. The first time you hear a malicious story, MARK THE TELLER OF IT—for ten to one, in that person, male or female, lies the whole malice of the invention and application. Such people do not work in the dark, however. Mischief-making is a most unprofitable trade, and we trust that, in the future school of American morals, the certain infamy of being the first teller of a malicious tale, will be a predominant feature. It can easily be made so, by "keeping the subject before the people."

One of the most curious features of New York is the gradual formation of a PATERNOSTER ROW—or the making of Ann street to correspond with that famous book-mine and fame-quarry of London. Our enterprising and thrifty friends and neighbors, BURGESS, STRINGER, & Co., are the "LONGMANS" of this publishing Row, and truly, the activity of their sales, and the crowds leaning continually over their counter, give a new aspect to the hitherto contemplative current of merchandise in literature. Their central and spacious shop on the corner of Broadway, is a thronged book-market, as vigorously tended and customered as the sales of pork and grain. They have lately added to their establishment two stores intervening between them and us, and, with the office of our friends of the "NEW WORLD" farther down the street, and several intermediate publishing and forwarding offices, we of the Mirror are in the midst of a formidable literary mart, that seems destined to concentrate the book-trade, and make, of Ann street, as we said just now, a Paternoster Row. The Turks (who, by the way, have many other sensible notions, besides washing themselves instead of their shirts), devote each different lane of their grand bazar to a single commodity—no shoemakers to be found out of Shoemaker-lane, and no books out of Book-alley. The convenience of this arrangement, to the public, is very great, and it would be, in this city, a prodigious saving of labor, in cartage and traffic, to the booksellers themselves. We have a faint hope of seducing over, to our Row, the agreeable clique of our friend Porter of the "Spirit," and we hope Inman of the Columbian will follow after (to save rent), and in this way, we shall have a morning lounge in Ann street for the beaux esprits, that will enable us to combine into a literary social order and have some fun and more weight. Nothing like combination, oh, fellow-pensmen! Why should we not have a head, and wag it, like the chamber of commerce and the powerful presbytery? For a class that keeps the key of the city's to-morrow, the press in New York is as strangely unorganized and segregate a body as anarchy of public opinion could possibly desire. But we are trenching here on something we have in petto, to write upon more gravely hereafter.

We seldom read a novel. We can not afford the sympathy, even when we have the time. But, somewhat lighthearted on a warm afternoon of last week, our resolution would not hold, and we took up "THE ROSE OF THISTLE ISLAND," a Swedish novel by Emilie Carlen, just published by Winchester. The story took hold of us immediately, and we read the book through before going to bed, charmed with its earnest and graphic truth of narration and character, and particularly with the entire fusion of the style, betraying no thumb-spot from the dictionary-cover, and no smack of haste or clumsiness in the transfer. It reads like a book original in English, and that, to our professional superfluity of noun and pronoun, is no small difference from ordinary translations.

THE REMAINDER.—One of the greatest pleasures of living in our free country, is the unceasing satisfaction one feels at not having died last week—fortunately surviving to put down one more lie that, if you had been dead, would be as durable as your tombstone. Another peculiarity of our country—good or bad as you chance to feel about it—is the necessity to talk a great deal about yourself, if you would keep up a lively popularity. With these two patriotic promptings, let us say a word of a trip we made lately to Albany.

It is not perhaps generally known that Albany was our birthplace. We were born once before, it is true, in Portland, somewhere about half a life ago—a "man-child." But in Albany, in 1827, we first opened our eyes, as an adult lion. Up to that period we had been under tutors, and had known only boy-friends. By a fortunate chance we suddenly acquired the friendship of a man of great talent and accomplishment, and on a visit to this, our first man-friend at Albany, we stood, for the first time, clear of the imprisoning chalk-lines of boyhood. Those who have "hived the honey" of their summers of the heart know well how intoxicatingly sweet was the first garden of life in which they walked as men. Still a child at home, and still a college-boy at New Haven, we were, at Albany, a man who had written a book, and as the companion and guest of our fashionable and popular friend,* we saw beauty enough, and received kindness enough, to have whipped a less leathery brain into syllabub. The loveliness of the belles of Albany at that time, and the brilliancy of its society, are perpetuated in a remembrance that will become a tradition; and we have never since seen, in any country or society of the world, an equal proportion of elegant men and beautiful and accomplished women. It was so acknowledged over the whole country. The regency of fashion, male and female, was confessedly at Albany. New York, Philadelphia, Boston, and Baltimore, were provinces to this castle of belle-dom! We have an object in showing what Albany was, at the time we were in the habit of visiting it, and how inevitably, from a combination of circumstances, it became and has remained, to us, a paradise of enchanting associations. There is no spot in this country which we remember with equal pleasure. It was the first leaf turned over in our book of manhood.

We went to Albany with these memories upon us, a week or more ago, to lecture. We spent the morning in finding old friends and reviving old associations, and in the evening we had an audience much larger than we looked for, and as brilliant as hope born of such memories could have prefigured it; and we returned to the city the morning after, gratified and delighted. But (and here comes the matter in hand) there seems to have been a gentleman in Albany who was unwilling we should be delighted. We have not seen the article he wrote, but, as condensed in another paper, it goes to show that the reasons why we were unsuccessful at Albany were, first, that we have been in the habit of abusing its Dutch aristocracy, and second, that two years ago we "insulted a lady there and refused a challenge from her friend!" Now here are four items of absolute news to us: 1, that we did not succeed—2, that we ever insulted a lady anywhere—3, that we ever declined any fight that was ever proposed to us—4, that we ever abused the Dutch at Albany.

On the fourth count of the indictment, alone, a friend has thrown a little light. We did once, inadvertently, use an adjective, in a way which has been remembered fifteen years! We said of the swine in the streets of Albany (in some trifling article for a newspaper), that they were a nuisance "more Dutch than decent." The alliteration seduced us somewhat, but there was provocation as well—for, the night luded to, JOHN BLEECKER VAN SCHAIK, will call up, at once, to the memory of the Albanians, as well as to the prominent men of all parts of the country, a loss, by early death, of one of our most accomplished gentlemen, and most admirably-gifted minds. The proportion—the balance of character and intellect, in Mr. Van Schaick—the fine sense of honor, and the keen discrimination of wit, the fineness and the delicacy, the common sense and the strong poetical perception—made him, to me, one of the most admirable of studies, as well as the most winning and endearing of friends. I loved and honored him, till his death, as few men have ever won from me love and honor. It was a matter of continual urging on my part, to induce him to devote his leisure, given him by ample means, to literature. Some of his poetry appeared in the magazines, and is now collected in a volume of the American poets. But he had higher studies and more vigorous aims than light literature, and he had just broken ground as a brilliant orator and statesman, when disease unnerved and prostrated him. Mr. Van Schaick had, however, another quality which would have made him the idol of society in England—(though, comparatively, little appreciated here)—unequaled wit and brilliancy of conversation. I say unequaled—for I have lived long in the society of the men of a most celebrated in London, and I have never thought that his countryman of my own was their equivocal superior. His wonderful quickness and fineness of perception and the ready facility of his polished language, combined with his universal reading and information, made his society in the highest degree delightful and fascinating; and though, as my first friend of manhood, I gave him warm and impulsive admiration, my subsequent knowledge of mankind has constantly enhanced this admiring appreciation. In all qualities of the heart he was uprightly noble; and, altogether, we think that in him died the best-balanced and most highly gifted character we have ever intimately known.

* I trust it will not be considered mistimed or unnatural if I follow the impulse of my heart, and put, into a note to so worldly a theme, the substance of a tearful and absorbing reverie, which, for the last half hour, has suspended my pen over the paper. The name of the gentleman I have just al-

before writing it, strolling home from a party in Albany, we had been brought from the seventh heaven to the sidewalk, tripped up by a pig! Now, to us, the pig was Dutch. We had lived only in New England, where this animal, from some prejudice against his habits, has not the freedom of the city. Visiting two Dutch cities, New York and Albany, we found the pig master of the pavé, and the offending adjective, lubricated by our disaster, slipped into its place with inevitable facility. We have heard from time to time, of this perversion of the word Dutch, as a thing remembered against us. We had hoped that the great fire in Wall street, the death of Harrison, the Miller-prophecy, and the other events of the last fifteen years, would have wiped that small adjective out. We do not know why it should outlive the poets who have written and been forgotten in that time—the steamboats that have been built and used up—the politicians who have flourished and fallen—the comets that have glittered and gone—the newspapers that have started and stopped. The secret of that little adjective's imperishableness is worth analyzing—especially by poets and the patentees of "asbestos safes." We wish we could stumble upon as long-lived a conjunction!

Seriously, we are annoyed and hurt at the discovery of a hostility that could make itself heard, in a place we owe so much to for past happiness. We beg the Albanians to forgive us for the unintentional offence, and to take us and our Mirrqr into that favor of which we have always been ambitious.

The spot where all the winds of heaven turn the corner—the coolest and most enjoyable spot in the hottest and least enjoyable summer's day—is the outside bastion of Castle Garden. We made our way there a few days ago, when the streets were fairly in a swoon with the breathless heat, and it was as cool and breezy, outside the round castle, as a hill-top on a May morning. For children—for happy idlers with a book—for strangers who wish to study the delicious panorama of the bay—there is no place comparable to the embrasures, parapets, and terraces of Castle Garden.

TWO OR THREE LITTLE MATTERS.—There is no struggling against it—we have a need to pass the summer in some place that God made. We have argued the instinct down—every morning since May-day—while shaving. It is as cool in the city as in the country, we believe. We see as many trees, from our window (living opposite St. Paul's churchyard), and as much grass, as we could take in at a glance. The air we breathe, outside the embrasures of Castle Garden, every afternoon, and on board the Hoboken and Jersey boats, every warm evening, are entire recompenses to the lungs for the day's dust and stony heat. And then God intends that somebody shall live in the city in summer-time, and why not we? By the time this argument is over, our chin and our rebellious spirit are both smoothed down. Breakfast is ready—as cool fruit, as delicious butter under the ice, and as charming a vis-à-vis over the white cloth and coffee-tray as we should have in the country. We go to work after breakfast with passable content. The city cries, and the city wheels, the clang of the charcoal cart and the importunities of printer's imp—all blend in the passages of our outer ear as unconsciously and fitly as brook-noises and breeze-doings. We are well enough till two. An hour to dinner—passed in varnished boots and out-doors-inesses—somewhat a weary hour, we must say, with a subdued longing for some earth to walk upon. Dinner—pretty well!

Discontent and sorrow dwell in a man's throat, and go abroad while it is watered and swept. The hour after dinner has its little resignations also—coffee, music, and the "angel-visit" from the nursery. Five o'clock comes round, and with it nature's demand for a pair of horses. (Alas! why are we not centaurs, to have a pair of horses when we marry?) We get into an omnibus, and as we get toward the porcelain end of the city, our porcelain friends pass us in their carriages, bound out where the earth breathes and the grass grows. An irresistible discontent overwhelms us! The paved hand of the city spreads out beneath us, holding down the grass and shutting off the salutary earth-pores, and we pine for balm and moisture! The over-worked mind offers no asylum of thought. It is the out-door time of day. Nature calls us to her bared bosom, and there is a floor of impenetrable stone between us and her! At the end of the omnibus-line we turn and go back, and resume our paved and walled-up existence, and all the logic of philosophy, aided by icecreams and bands of music, would fail to convince us, that night, that we are not victims and wretches. For Heaven's sake, some kind old man give us an acre off the pavement, and money enough to go and lie on the outside of it of summer afternoons!

Let us out of this great stone oven! The city is intolerable! Oh, from these heated bricks and stones, what moistureless, what wilted, what fainting air comes to the nostrils! The two river-breezes doing their best to meet across the island, swoon in Broadway. The pores gasp, the muscles droop, the mind is blank and nerveless. Let us out somewhere!

We had such a fever upon us as is expressed above, when a friend offered to drive us to ROCKAWAY. With a mental repetition of the affecting prayer of the poor woman in the ballad,

("Take a white napkin, and wrap my head softly,
And then throw me overboard, me and my baby!")

we crept into his wagon, and bowled away silently on the road to Jamaica. It was a hot evening, but the smell of the earth, and the woods, and the dairy-farms, roused our drooping petals a little. Jamaica lies somewhat in the island's lap, however, and it was not till we began to sniff the salt of the open Atlantic, that we were once more "capable creatures." But what a revivification as we approached Rockaway! The sea-breeze nudged up our drooping eyebrows, gave a pull to the loose halliards of our let-go smiles, crisped our pores, and restored everything to its use and its activity—the irrevocable starch in our shirt-collars alone incapable of rally. Rockaway (we write only for those who know nothing of it) is part of the snowy edge of the Atlantic—St. George's hotel, at Portsmouth, England, being all but next door to the Rockaway pavilion. Of course there is nothing to take the saline coolness out of the breeze (unless by chance it has come across St. Helena or the Azores), and the difference between the "entire quadruped" in the way of a sea-breeze, and the mixtures they get in some other sea-side places, is worth taking pains for. But let us tell, in plain language, what sort of place Rockaway is—for the benefit of those who are choosing a month's resort for health or pleasure.

The pavilion of Rockaway is an immense hotel, whose majestic portico forms the centre of a curving beach of two or three miles in the bend, on the southern shore of Long Island. From this portico, and from the windows of the hotel, the delightful sight and sound of the beating surf are visible and audible—eternal company to eye and ear. The beach extends for miles either way—a broad floor as smooth as marble, and so hard that a carriage wheel scarce leaves a print, and this, as a drive, we presume to be the most delightful and enjoyable in the world. The noiseless tread of the horse, and the unheard progress of the wheels, the snowy surf along the edge of which you keep your way, and the high exhilaration given to the spirits by the sea-breeze, and the enlivening beat of the waves upon the sand at your feet, form, altogether, an enchantment to which, in the way of out-door pleasure, we scarce know a parallel. And, as a walk, the pure hard floor of that interminable beach is, of course, equally delightful.

The arrangements for bathing are very well managed. There are some twenty bathing-houses on the beach, near the house, and, between the hours of ten and twelve in the forenoon, the ocean-side is guarded and kept exclusive to the ladies and their attendants. An omnibus constantly plies between the bathing-houses and the hotel, and to ladies and children, to old men and young, the hour spent in the invigorating surf is the pleasure of the day. All, alike, come back elated and animated, and the society of the place shows very markedly the fillip given by the sea-bathing to health and spirits. Children, more especially, who have drooped in the city, pluck up appetite and vigor immediately at Rockaway.

As the favorite and regular resort of many of the best families of the city, the society of the pavilion has always been acknowledged to be of a more refined quality and on a more agreeable footing than that of any other watering-place. It is equally removed from useless ceremony and undesirable freedom. Those who wish to combine gaiety with the pursuit of health and the enjoyment of luxury, have facilities for all these at Rockaway, in a degree as desirable as it is unusual. The table is not surpassed by that of any hotel even in the city, and this, in a watering-place, is a peculiarity! Mr. Cranston, the keeper of the house, thoroughly understands his business.

As to facilities for getting to Rockaway, the railroad from Brooklyn ferry takes you to Jamaica in half an hour; from Jamaica, on the arrival of the cars, starts regularly a mammoth omnibus with six horses, and other roomy conveyances are supplied if necessary, which bring you to Rockaway in an hour. All delays included, it is about two hours from the city.

Certain coolness and certainly-improved health thrown into the scale, the desirableness of Rockaway, as a summer resort, far outweighs that of every other watering-place in the country.

A late number of the Southern Literary Messenger contains two poems of uncommon merit for the drift of a periodical. One is by Mr. Gilmore Simms (whose much-worked mine has now and then a very golden streak of poetry), and the other is by H. B. Hirst—a poem of fifty-seven stanzas on the subject of ENDYMION. This latter is after Keats. It is very highly studied, very carefully finished, and very airy and spiritually conceived. Its faults are its conceits, which are not always defensible—for instance, the one in italics, in the following beautiful description of Diana as she descended to Endymion:—

“A crescent on her brow—a brow whose brightness
Darkened the crescent; and a neck and breast
On which young love might rest
Breathless with passion; and an arm whose whiteness
Shadowed the lily's snow; a lip the bee
Might dream in, and a knee
Round as a period; while her white feet glancing
Between her sandals, shed a twilight light
Athwart the purple night.
Cycling her waist a zone, whose gems were dancing
With rainbow rays, pressed with a perfect grace,
Her bosom's ivory space.”

Now we know as well as anybody what the “round of a period” is, and we have seen, here and there, a god-dess's knee, and we declare there is no manner or shape of likeness that justifies the comparison! With the exception of two or three of these lapses away from nature, however, it is a beautiful poem—this “Endymion”—and will read well in a volume. By the way, let us wonder whether the sweet poetess by the same name is a sister of Mr. Hirst.

We consider Niblo's garden one of the chief “broideries” upon our woof of probation in this dirty planet, and if there are to be offsets for good things enjoyed this side of Cocytus, we expect to pay for Mitchell. Oh, thou pleasant Mitchell! And he to grow fat under the exercise of such a wand of industrious enchantment! What is the man made of, besides brains!

We sat through the “REVOLT OF THE HAREM,” a night or two ago, and saw all its funny sights, seriatim. The ballet, as intended to be seen, was excellent—for the time and material, indeed, quite wonderful. But we had our little pleasures (not down in the bill), and one of them was to see pretty Miss Taylor, the clever opera-singer, figuring as an Odalisque danseuse! If that pretty actress be not abducted, and sold to the sultan within a year, we shall think less of the enterprise of Salem privateers! She only wants to forget that she is Miss Taylor, indeed, to dance uncommonly well—the consciousness of her silk stockings being at present something of a damper to the necessary abandon. But, modesty and all, she is very charming in this ballet, and one wonders what Mitchell will make of her next! Korponay, too—the elegant Korponay—figuring as an Abyssinian eunuch! That, truth to say, had for us a dash of displeasure! He entered into it with all his might, it is true, and played the nigger with Jim Crow facility; but the part, for him, was out of character, and we shall not be content till he is dis-niggered by appearing once more in the role of a gentleman. The bath-scene was well arranged, though the prettiest girls were not in the water—(pray why, Master Mitchell?) And the military evolutions of the revolted ladies were very well done, and will be better done—with a little more practice, and the mending of that corporal's stocking with a hole in it. The town seemed pleased, we thought.

We have not yet mentioned the première danseuse, Mademoiselle Desjardins, who did very well in the way of her vocation, but from whose feet have departed, with the boots she wore, the exquisite symmetry we admired at Simpson's benefit. Ah, ladies, you should wear boots! Here were two feet in tightly-sandalled shoes, looking like two tied-up parcels from Beck's, which, a night or two before, in brodequins bien faits, looked models of Arabian instep! Can boots do that? We hereby excommunicate, from the church of true love, all husbands, fathers, and guardians, who shall rebel against the preference, by wife, ward, or daughter, of Nunn's boots at $3 50, over Middleton's slippers at ten shillings. The embellishment is worth the difference!

We have received a very testy letter from some old gentleman, requesting us to reform the gait of the New York ladies. He manages to convey what peculiarity it is that offends his eye, but he is mistaken as to the stoop. The lady within stands straight enough! If he knows this, and means covertly to attack the artificial portion of the outline, we can tell him that he rashly invades, not merely a caprice of fashion (which in itself were formidable enough), but the most jealous symbol and citadel of female domination! There are thousands of ladies who would resign carriages and satin without a sigh, but who would die by fire and fagot rather than yield the right to mount on horse-back in the masculine riding habit! "Wearing the breeches" is a worn-out figure of speech, but does anybody in his senses believe that the usurpation has not taken refuge in a new shape? Need we open our correspondent's eyes any further? What bird is the most pronounced and unequivocal type of martial and masculine bravery? What bird is the farthest remove, in shape, air, and habits, from his female partner? What bird lives up systematically to woman's ideal of a hero—a life of fighting and making love? Draw the outline from the comb of a fighting-cock to the feather-tip of his bustle, and you have the eidolon of male carriage—and the dressmaker's ne plus ultra! We warn off our correspondent!

LETTER FROM CINNA BEVERLEY, ESQ., TO N. P. WILLIS.

SARATOGA, U. S. Hotel, August 1.

You are feeding the news-hopper of your literary mill, my dear poet, and I am trying on the old trick of gayety at Saratoga. Which of us should write the other a letter? You, if you say so—though as I get older, I am beginning to think well of the town, even in August. You have your little solaces, my fast liver!

Well—what shall I tell you? This great khan in the desert of dullness is full, to the most desirable uncomfortableness. Shall I begin with the men? God made them first, and as it is a test of the ultimate degree of refinement to reapprach nature, why, let men have the precedence! Less American than philosophical, you will say!—but men first, let it be! I must have my way in my post-meridian.

There used to be dandies! That was in the time when there was an aristocracy in the country. With the levelling (from the middle to the top) that has been going on for the last ten or twelve years, the incentive, somehow, seems gone, or, account for it how you will—there are no dandies! I am inclined to think that two causes may have contributed to it—the indiscretion of tailors in using gentlemen's ideas promiscuously, and the attention paid to dress by all classes—everybody who can buy a coat at all, being within one degree of comme il faut! The other side of that degree is not far enough off from the mob, and so dandyism is discouraged. Needless, it is true, for the difference is marked enough; but the possibility of a woman's being beautiful enough to adore, and yet not wise enough to know that degree of difference! Ah, my dear Willis, that an angel may "walk unrecognized!" It has killed the class!

There is one dandy only, at Saratoga, and he is but the dovetail upon the age gone by—a better-dressed man ten years ago than this morning at breakfast. One dandy among three thousand "fashionables!" It is early in the season, it is true, and (as a youth said to me yesterday, with a clever classification) "all Car-penter's coats are gone this year to Newport." But, still, there are those here—done into stereotype, and reckless of the peculiarities in themselves which are susceptible of piquant departures from the fashion—who would have been, twenty years ago, each one a phenix unressembled! How delightful the springs were, in those days of marked men! How adored they were by the women! How generously (by such petting as is now unknown) their anxieties of toilet were repaid and glorified! How the arrival of each "particular star" was hailed by the rushing out of the white dresses upon the portico of Congress hall, the acclamations, the felicitations, the inquiries tender and uproarious! There was a joyous reciproc-city of worship between men and women in those days!—and as innocent as joyous! Compare it with the arms'-length superfinery, and dangerous pent-up-tude of now!

And now, my dear Willis, a cautious word or two about the women. There are "belles" at Saratoga, well-born, well-moulded, and well-dressed—five or six of the first degree of perilous loveliness, none of the second degree (I don't know why) and fifty or sixty with beauty enough to make, each one, a dull man happy. The rest are probably immortal creatures, and have angels to look after them—but, as they make no sacrifices in proportion to their mortal plainness, they are ciphers, at least till doomsday. I will not impair my advantages by telling, to an enterprising admirer like yourself, even the names of the adorables, for as I slide into the back-swath of the great mower, I am jealous of opportunity—but there is one woman here who was the electric light of the court of France when I was abroad, a creature of that airy stateliness that betrays the veiled symmetry and she is as beautiful now as then, for a kind of tender and maternal mournfulness of eye has more than made up for the fainter roses and more languishing lilies of lip and cheek. (God be praised for compensations!) But, without specifying more to you, I must hold back a bit of speculation that I have in reserve, while I make you marvel at a triumph of toilet—achieved by the kind of short gown, or kirtle,* never before seen but at a wash-tub, but promoted now to be the lodestar of the drawing-room! There are articles of dress, you know, which are intensifiers—making vulgarity more vulgar, aristocracy more aristocratic—and the lady who comes kirtled to breakfast at Saratoga, is of Nature's daintiest fabric, only less proud than winning—but fancy a buttoned-up frock-coat over a snowy petticoat, and you can picture to yourself the saucy piquancy of the costume. Titania in the laundry!

I was going to philosophize upon the changes in lady-tactics within the last few years, but I will just hint at a single point that has impressed me. The primitive confidings of American girlhood (the loveliest social phase that ever ascended from the shepherd's fold to the drawing-room) has been abandoned for the European mamma-dom and watchful restraint, but without some of the compensatory European concomitants. I will not "lift the veil" by telling what those concomitants are. It would be a delicate and debateable subject. But the effect of this partial adaptation is, in my opinion, far more dangerous than what it seeks to supplant or remedy, and among other evils is that of making culpable what was once thought innocent. I shudder at the manufacture of new sins in a world where enough, for all needful ruin, grows wild by the road-side. I do not believe we shall grow purer by Europeanizing.

What else would you like to know? The water tastes as metallic as of old, though the beauties around the rim of the fountain are an increased congregation. The Marvins keep their great caravansary admirably well, as usual, though, surviving amid such a cataract of travel, they should rather call their hotel "Goat Island" than "United States." Union hall is making a fortune out of the invalid saints, and Congress hall looks romantic and flirt-wise as ever; and by-the-way, they are about to enlarge it, with a portico overlooking the spring. Delicious dinners can be had at the lake, and an omnibus runs there regularly, and in all matters, Saratoga enlarges. It serves a needful purpose in this gregarious country; and on the whole, no place of escape is pleasanter to man or woman.

How is the joyous brigadier? Make my homage acceptable to his quill and his epaulets, and ask him, in his next hour of inspired song, to glorify proud beauty in humble kirtle.

Come to Saratoga, my dear Willis, and let me tell you how sincerely I am yours,

CINNA BEVERLEY.

The time will come, perhaps, when we shall be a connoisseur in snuff-boxes, insects, or autographs—but, meantime, we are curious in the cultivation of the rarer kinds of friendship. The ingenious idea occurred to us, some ten years ago, of turning the waste overflow of our heart into some such special and available irrigation, and the result we shall leave to be published posthumously, under the title of AMICULTURE, or a TREATISE ON LOVE-WASTE. Our proper channels of affection being first supplied to the point of overflow, we have felt free to venture upon very bold experiments with the remainder, and some of our specimens, of course, are simply curiosities; but we have them (friends) of every quality, form, and condition, male and female, preserved with studious care and industry—guardedly confining ourselves to only one of a kind. Some of the humbler specimens are of great beauty, but will show better preserved and pressed in a posthumous ambiarium. We can only venture, in our lifetime, to give specimens of the more ornamental varieties; and our object now is to introduce a leaf of the species "callow dandy"—in other words, to give you a letter from a very elegant lad with a nascent mustache, a prized friend of ours, now, for the first time, at Saratoga. He writes about trifles, but in hot weather we (for one) like trifles best; and as he writes, after all, with a dash of philosophy, we have not thought it worth while to omit or alter. Here is his letter, written in the vanishing legibility of a once good school-hand:—

U. S. HOTEL, Aug. —.

DEAR WILLIS: Your kind note to St. John, of the Knickerbocker, got me the state-room with the picture of "Glenmary" on the panel, and I slept under the protection of your household gods—famously, of course. The only fault I found with that magnificent boat, was the right of any "smutched villain" to walk through her. It is a frightful arrangement that can sell, to a beauty and a blackguard, for the same money, the right to promenade on the same carpet, and go to sleep with the same surroundings on the opposite sides of a pine partition! Give me a world where antipodes stay put! But what a right-royal, "slap-up" supper they give in the Knickerbocker! They'll make the means better than the end—travelling better than arriving—if they improve any more! I had a great mind to go back the next day, and come up again.

Saratoga's great fun. I had no idea there were so many kinds of people—beasts and beauties. Five hundred men and women in one house is a lumping of things that shoves aside a great many secrets there's no room for. Old women popping out of their rooms, with their wigs off, to call a waiter—lazy men coming to breakfast unshaved—cross people that can not be smiling all day long—lovers besieging, when the lady would prefer cracker and cheese—jealous people looking daggers while they pretend to blow their noses—bustles flattened by dinner-chairs into upright pianos—ladies spreading their nostrils at unexpected introductions—old maids in calm disgust, and just-outs in "sweet confusion"—a Turk in the portico selling attars, and a Jew in the drawing-room, shining in patent leather—all pretty good sights, as the world goes, and stuff for moralizing—eh, old Willis?

The charm of society at Saratoga lies in getting the thing without paying for it. To see a pretty woman in town, one has to resolve at breakfast, shape his arrangements, stick three hours to his resolve; travel a mile, ring a bell, run the chance of intruding or "not at home," talk to some bore in the way of aunt or brother, and two to one, after all, you light upon an undress humor in the lady visited. In the great drawing-room of the United States, on the contrary, the whole visitable world is reduced to the compass of a gamut, and you have it all within the spread of your hand, and all in tune! You dress, breakfast, and sit on a sofa, and in ten minutes your entire female acquaintance passes within three feet of your nose, and every one as ready to be talked to as if you had ridden three miles, and wasted patience and a forenoon to have that pleasure. You leave her when you like, without the trouble of an adieu, see and talk to twenty more with the same charming economy of time and labor, and having got through your duty-talks by eleven, you select your favorite and devote yourself to her for the remaining twelve or fourteen hours—"a month's love in a day!" This, if you please, is letting and very glad to be rid of it! Now, don't you think, my paternal Willis, that society in town has too many hinderances, obstructions, cross-purposes, exactions, mystifications, and botherations—considering that a plague slices off just as much life as a pleasure? I wish the Marvins would take a lease of New York, roof it in, knock away walls, and make a "Springs" of it! It is so very cumbersome, letting people have whole houses to themselves!

"the serious part of life go by

Have you anatomized this new fashion of gaiter-boots, my dear dandy? Do you observe what a breakdown they give to the instep, and how shamble-footed, and down at the heel the men seem who wear them? After all, there is a "blood look" to a man's leg as well as a horse's, and no dandy can look "clean-limbed" with unstrapped trousers and his apparent foot cut in two by shoes of two colors. The eye wants a clean line from the point of the toe to the swearing-place of the patriarchs, and an unblemished instep rising to the pantaloons. The world's tailors have been ever since breeches-time learning the proper adjustment of straps, and now it is perfected, the capricious world condemns it to disuse! Write an article about it, my dear Willis! And then these gathered French trousers—making a man into a "big-hipped humble-bee"—as if we needed to be any more like women! I see, too, that here and there a youth has a coat padded over the hips! Though, apropos of coats, there is a well-dressed man here with a new cut of Carpenter's. He's a Prometheus, that Carpenter—hearing his goose by undoubted "fire from heaven!" The skirts of the last inspiration cross slightly behind, aiding the Belvidere "pyramid inverted" (from the shoulders down) and of course promoting the fine arts of tailoring. Allowing freely the tip-topness of Jennings in trousers, waistcoats, and overcoats, there is nobody like this Philadelphia man for coats! You might as well restore the marble chips to the nose of a statue as suggest an improvement to him. And what a blessing this is, my dear Willis! Do you remember the French dandy's sublime sentiment: "Si l'on rencontre un habit parfait dans toute sa vie, on pour-rail presque se passer d'amour!"

Ah! such an interminable letter as I am writing! Your friend "Jo. Sykes," the puller of the big wires, is here, handsome and thoughtful, with a daughter who is to be the belle of 1860—the loveliest child I have seen in my travels. The beautiful women I will tell you about over our olives and tinta. No events that I can trust to the indiscretion of pen and ink.

Ever yours, AUGUSTUS LIHO.

Of course there was a postscript, but that we must reserve for posterity. Our friend 'Gus Iliho is not a man to write altogether upon third person topics. But we have another friend at Saratoga—a female specimen—and we hope to hear from her, 'twixt this and the season over. Our readers will please expect it.

THE CABINET.

("The Committee" trimming pencil in the Eastern-most bathing-house on Rockaway beach. Enter the brigadier with nostrils inflated.)

Brig.—Fmff! fmff! God bless the Atlantic ocean! Fmff! "Salt sea" indeed! I never smelt a breeze fresher. Fmff! fmff! fmff! You got the start of me, my dear boy! (pulls his last high heel out of the deep sand and sits down on the threshold.) What say to a strip and dip before we come to business?

Com.—Fie!—general, fie! Look through your fingers at the other end of the beach! It is the hour of oceanic beatitude—the ladies bathing! The murmuring waters will be purer for the interview. Bathe we in the first wave after!

Brig.—How can you

"Play in wench-like words with that Which is so serious?"

Did you bring a towel, mi-boy?

Com.—Tut!—would you offend the south wind, that proffers the same offer so woefully? Walk on the beach, man, and let the sun peruse you, while you dry!

Brig.—So should I be more red, with a vengeance! But I don't like this dry-salting, mi-boy! It's too sticky! Ye gods! look at the foam upon that wave! What is that like, my poet?

Com.—Like the unrolling of a bale of lace on a broad counter! The "tenth wave" is the head clerk, and the clams and soft crabs are the ladies shopping! How I love the affinities of Art and Nature!

Brig.—Poh! Where's Nature's twine and brown paper? Don't be transcendental!

Com.—How ignorant you are, not to know eel-grass and devil's apron—Nature's twine and brown paper! My dear general, were you ever introduced to the Atlantic? Is this your first visit? Stand up in the doorway!

(Brigadier rises and the surf bows to the ground.)

General Morris! the Atlantic ocean. Atlantic ocean! General Morris. I am happy to bring two such distinguished "swells" together. Though (apropos, Mr. "Heaving Main!") the general is a gay man! Look out for your "pale Cynthia!" The moon is not famed for her constancy!

Brig.—What are you mumbling there, mi-boy! I wish, under the tender influence of these suggesting waters, to express a wish that you would write some poetry, or give us a new tale, or dash us off a play, or—

Com.—Or, in some other way make rubbish for posterity! No, sir! There are no pack-horses in Posthumousland, and, as much as will ride in a ghost's knapsack, with his bread and cheese, is as much, in quantity, as any man should write who has pity for his pedestrian soul on its way to dooms-day! Why, general, the TALES which I am about to publish (including "Inklings," "Loiterings" etc., etc.), will make, of themselves, a most adult-looking octavo. My POEMS and PLAYS have tonnage enough to carry, at least, all the bulk necessary to a fame; my MISCELLANIES, yet to be collected, will make a most sizeable volume of slip-slop; PENCILINGS is no pamphlet; and LETTERS FROM UNDER A BRIDGE, and other epistolary production—do you see how beautifully the sand immortalizes the industrious waves that write successively their sparkling lines on the beach!

Brig.—Don't malign your "eternal fame, mi-boy!" Com.—More eternal, I believe, than the love of the impertinent Lothario in the sonnet:—

("But say, my all! my mistress! and my friend!
What day next week th' eternity shall end?")

but how much more eternal it would be, if they would make the genesis of a man's works like that of the patriarchs—dateable from the first satisfactory off-shoot of his manhood! Do you remember the expressive genealogy of Shem?

12. And Arphaxad lived five and thirty years and begat Salah:

13. And Arphaxad lived after he begat Salah four hundred and three years and begat sons and daughters.

14. And Eber lived four and thirty years and begat Peleg:

15. And Eber lived after he begat Peleg four hundred and thirty years, and begat sons and daughters.

And so on, up to Abraham, whose father was seventy years old when he was born. But don't you suppose these boys did anything before they were thirty-odd! Their history begins with their first creditable production! Eber was nothing till he begat Peleg, though, very likely, the critics of that time "preferred very much his earlier productions."

Brig.—And you think you could begin, now, with your first Peleg and Salah?

Com.—You have said it. But, as I hinted before, my posthumous knapsack is already full of rubbish, and—a thought strikes me!

Brig.—"Call it out!"

Com.—"I'll change my style and start a new reputation, incog!"

Brig.—Famous!

Com.—And sell some man the glory of it for an annuity!

Brig.—Good!

Com.—(Thoughtfully)—The old countess of Desmond shed her teeth three times.

Brig.—A precedent in nature.

Com.—(Firmly)—Soit! Done! So be it! Hang me if I don't! You'll hear of a new author before long—one that beats me hollow! Look me up a purchaser, my dear brigadier! Literary fame furnished at—say, three thousand dollars per annum!

Brig.—Mi-boy, the ladies have left the beach—I wonder if the sea would condescend to us, now!

Com.—Pettry after roses and ivory!—I don't know!

Brig.—Talking of Esau—he should have lived in cravat-time. Well-drest, your hirsute customers looks not amiss! (No pun, you villain!) Stand back, my unclad-boy! Here comes a wagon load of women!

Com.—Chambermaids and nurses; who, by the way they flock to the beach in the male hours, must either have eyes with a nictitating membrane, or a modesty that is confined to what they hear. I wish to heaven that all females were patricians—undesecrated by low taste and servitude! It's like classifying owls with angels because they are both feathered, to call these rude creatures women! What's that scar on your breast, brigadier?

Brig.—Slide down your "nictitating membrane," mi-boy, and don't be too observing! Here goes! Hup! (The brigadier rushes into the surf, takes a stitch through three frills of the island's shirt, and rises like a curly-headed sun from the ocean.)

Com. (solus).—There he swims! God bless him for a buoyant brigadier! How the waves tumble over his plump shoulders, delighted to feel the place where ride his epaulets and his popularity! Look out for sharks, my dear general! They snuff a poet afar off!

Natural victims we are to them—on land or water! Hear him laugh as he shakes the brine out of his whiskers! Was ever such a laugh! His heart gives that "ha! ha!" a fillip as it sets out! I must swim off to him! Clear the beach, soft crab and sand-bird! Morris and Willis must swim together!

Brig. (Sitting down to dry.)—This salting freshens a man, and this wetting makes him dry. Oh for a drink and the asp of Cleopatra—a cobbler and a viper! Shake yourself, mi-boy!

Com.—Suppose we roll in the sand and take a wrestle, like the athletes of old—eh? How do you propose to get the sand and gravel out from your doigts du pied, general?

Brig.—"Gravelled," we are, mi-boy, but not "for lack of matter!" Let's dress first, and then go down and rinse our feet with the aid of the moon's lover—lacking a servant to bring a pail! Are you dry?

Com.—Inner and outer man—very! What's this—dropped out of your pocket!

Brig.—A song* that I wrote for Brown to set to music. Shall I read it to you?

(Brigadier reads with his hand on his breast.)

'TIS NOW THE PROMISED HOUR.

"The fountains serenade the flowers,
Upon their silver lute—
And, nestled in their leafy bowers
The forest-birds are mute:
The bright and glittering hosts above,
Unbar their golden gates,
While nature holds her court of love,
And for her client waits!
Then, lady, wake—in beauty rise!
'Tis now the promised hour,
When torches kindle in the skies
To light thee to thy bower."

"The day we dedicate to care—
To love the witching night;
For all that's beautiful and fair
In hours like these unite.
E'en thus the sweets to flowerets given—
The moonlight on the tree—
And all the bliss of earth and heaven—
Are mingled, love, in thee.
Then, lady, wake—in beauty rise!
'Tis now the promised hour,
When torches kindle in the skies
To light thee to thy bower."

Com.—True and smooth as a locomotive on a "T" rail! Is it sold and set?

Brig.—Beautifully set to music by Brown, and sold to Atwill, who will publish it immediately.

Com.—It's a delicious song, my happy troubadour, and destined to tumble over bright lips enough to make a sunset. That we should so envy the things we make! My kingdom for a comb! I shall never get the salt out of my hair—I'm

"briny as the beaten mariner,
Oft soused in swelling Tethys' saltish tears."

If you want a curl to keep, now's your time!

Brig.—Willis?

Com.—My lord?

Brig.—I hear you were voted in to the "Light Guard" last week.

Com.—Yes, sir, an honorary private! I feel the compliment, for they are a set of tip-top capables, joyous and gentlemanly—but, my dear martinet, what the devil do they want of a man's dura mater?

Brig.—A man's what?

Com.—The weary membrane of an author's brain.

Brig.—They want it, you say?

Com.—With the official announcement came an order to equip myself according to directions, and * This song, set to music, has been purchased and copyrighted by Mr. Atwill.

"deposite my fatigue-jacket" in the armory of the corps! What fatigue-jacket have I, but the jacket of my brain?

Brig.—True! Pick up your boots and come along!

(Exit the brigadier barefoot, and the cabinet adjourns.)

Half an hour later—room No. 300, Rockaway Pavilion. Two sherry cobbler on the table, with two straws, trout in the ice.)

Brig.—How like this great structure on the sand must be, to a palace amid the ruins of Persepolis!

Com.—The palace of Chilmear with forty columns and stairs for ten horses to go up abreast!—very like indeed—especially the sand! Somewhat like, in another respect, by the way—that the palaces of Persepolis were the tombs of her kings, and Rockaway is the place of summer repose for the indignant aristocracy of Manhattan.

Brig.—True, as to the aristocracy, but why "indignant?"

Com.—That there can be fashion without them at Saratoga (which there could not be once), and that "aristocratic" and "fashionable" are two separate estates, not at all necessary to be combined in one individual. Rockaway is full, now, of the purest porcelain—porcelain fathers, porcelain mothers, porcelain daughters!

Brig.—Then why is not the society perfect at Rock away?

Com.—Because the beaux go after the crockery at Saratoga. The rush, the rowdydow, the flirtations and game suppers, are all at Saratoga! Aristocracy likes to have the power of complaining of these things as nuisances inseparable from its own attraction. Aristocracy builds high walls, but it likes to have them pertinaciously overleaped. The being let alone within their high walls, as they are now at their exclusive watering-places, was not set down in the plans of aristocratic campaigns!

Brig.—But they are charming people here, mi-boy?

Com.—The best-bred and most agreeable people in the world, but the others give a beau more for his money. In all countries, but ours, people make acquaintances for life. But the hinderances and obstacles which are not minded at the beginning of a lifetime acquaintance, are intolerable in an acquaintance for a week (the length of most summer acquaintances with us), and the floating beaux from the south, the west, the Canadas, and the West Indies, go where they can begin at the second chapter—omitting the tedious preface and genealogical introduction.

Brig.—Rockaway is stupid, then.

Com.—Quiet, not stupid. The lack of beaux and giddy times is only felt by the marriageable girls, and there are a great many people in the world besides marriageable girls. And upon this same "many people," will depend the prosperity of the Pavilion. When it is known that it is a delightful place for everything but flirting, it will be a centre for sober people to radiate to, and a paradise for penseosos like you and me, general—eh? I suppose Cranston would as lief (liefer, indeed) that his rooms should be filled with tame people as wild.

Brig.—How's your cobbler?

Com.—Fit to immortalize the straw that passes it!

Brig.—What birds are those, my Willis?

Com.—Shore birds that build in the sedge and feed on molluscous animals—death on the soft crabs! And, general, do you know that the male of this bird (called the phalarope), is a most virtuous example to our sex? What do you think he does?

Brig.—Feeds the little-uns?

Com.—Hatches them, half and half, with the she-bird, and helps bring them up!

Brig.—Is the gender shown in the plumage?

Com.—No.

Brig.—So I thought. Your handsome peacock, now, leaves it all to the hen. The domestic virtues are their own reward—remarkably so! Is that the dinner-bell?

Com.—Yes, it is that music!

"Give me excess of it—that, surfeiting,
The appetite may sicken, and so die."

I'll meet you below, my dear general! Adieu!

(Cabinet adjourns for the day.)

THE CABINET.

(Rockaway beach, Sunday evening. The brigadier and committee seated on their boot-legs, after walking two miles, barefoot, on the hard sand.)

Brig.—Boots are durance vile, mi-boy! How much we lose in not keeping our feet open to female assiduities! Fancy one of those apostolic washings—a sweet woman kneeling before you, and, with her hair breathing perfumes over your ankles, performing it as an office of tenderness and hospitality! Can patent leather be weighed against desuetude so melancholy!

Com.—I am satisfied that the tender pink in your toe-nails was intended by nature to be admired, my dear brigadier! And there is nature's remonstrance—eloquent in a corn—against the airless confinement of boot and stocking! Why is a poet like a sandal!

Brig.—Philosophize, my dear boy, don't quibble!

Com.—Because he's a soul kept under with a thong!

Brig.—Willis, I love the sea!

Com.—So sung Barry Cornwall, "the open sea." As if Pharaoh had not yet passed over! To me the sea seems, on the contrary, for ever slamming down trap-doors of surf, and carefully covering the "treasures of the deep" with cold water. I never saw anything less "open!"

Brig.—There goes the sun down! as red as—what shall I compare it to?

Com.—A wafer, sealing up this 17th of August for the doomsday postoffice. Happy they who have not forgotten the P. S. of repentance!

Brig.—Ah, mi-boy! that pious infancy of yours! It oozes through the after-crust of your manhood in drops of poetry! Pity you are less of a saint than you were at seventeen!

Com.—Less of a saint I am not, though more of a sinner I am. All I had seen at seventeen was beauty and goodness, and with an innate sense of beauty and goodness, I worshipped the Maker, my youth through, with a poet's adoration! The heart melts and drops upon its knees within a man, at any sudden revelation of unusual loveliness; and I have worshipped God, and loved one of his angelic creatures, with the white quivering lip of the same rush of blood inward. If to look often and adoringly "through nature up to nature's God" be devotion, I am still devout. No sunset, no morning's beauty, no rich and sudden sight of loveliness in scenery, goes by without the renewal of that worship in my heart that was once religion. I praise God daily. Worldling as I am, and hardly as I dare claim any virtue as a Christian, there is that within me which sin and folly never reached or tainted. The unprompted and irresistible thoughts, upsprings in my mind in any scene of beauty, would seem prayers, and pure ones, to many an humble Christian. Pardon me for reading to you this inner leaf, my dear brigadier!

Brig.—Thank you, on the contrary, for its philosophy, my dear boy! Saints and worldlings have more feelings in common than the pulpit admits. That I believe.

Com.—The chasm between them in this world should be narrowed, for they have many sympathies. The bigot makes the separation unnaturally wide. Who is the one man mentioned in Scripture as "loved" by the Savior? The "young ruler" who could not give up his "great possessions" "to inherit eternal life!" Is not this tender interest in one "out of the fold," a lesson—a most unheeded lesson, to the strict sect? I talk feelingly of this, for I have an admiration of goodness and purity that has never separated itself from my love of beauty. I love a simple and unobtrusive piety, and am drawn irresistibly toward the possessor. Yet this better part of my nature is excluded with the rest, when I am denied Christian sympathy. Come out of dream-land, brigadier, and observe the tender violet in that upper cloud!

Brig.—I was thinking whether the wave that falls upon the beach is to be congratulated or pitied—comparing its arrival, that is to say, with its "swell" time upon the sea.

Com.—Congratulated, I should say. The hoary locks with which it approaches the beach, though they are breakers ahead when seen from the sea, are beautiful when seen from the shore—as the head, whitened with the dreaded troubles of life, grows more beautiful in the eyes of angels, as it is more whitened and troubled, approaching heaven! But what hypocrites these shore-birds are, with their whitest plumes turned earthward! See that dark-backed snipe on the beach, with his white breast and belly!

Brig.—Rather what knowledge of mankind they have—preferring to keep their darker side for the more forgiving eye of Heaven!

Com.—True—the better reading! Do you like snipe?

Brig.—With a pork shirt they are fairish—that is, if you can't get woodcock. But, mi-boy, it isn't you that need ever eat snipe!

Com.—As how?

Brig.—(Pulling out the Sunday Mercury and reading)—"Willis, it is said, has profited $5,000 by the sale of the last edition of 'Pencilings by the Way.'"

Com.—The mischief he has!—for "has" read would be pleased to. Perhaps the editor of the Mercury will be kind enough to fork over the difference between fact and fiction! By-the-way, I have read the book, myself, for the first time in eight years, and I have been both amazed and amused with the difference between what I saw then, and what I know now! And I am going to give the public the same amazement and amusement, by writing for the Mirror a review of "Pencilings" with my new eyes—showing the interesting difference between first impressions and after familiarity.

Brig.—They'll want to read "Pencilings" over again, mi-boy!

Com.—For a hasty pudding it has held out surprisingly already. The fifth edition, embellished with engravings, is still selling well in England, and in the most stagnant literary month of the year we have sold two editions, as you know. I am inclined to fear that I shall be less known by my careful writings than by this unrevised book—written between fatigue and sleep, by roadsides and in most unstudylike places, and republished, in the Mirror edition, exactly as first written! There is a daguerreotypy in literal first impressions, my dear general, and a man would write an interesting letter, the first moment after seeing the Colosseum for the first time, though a description from memory, a month after, would be very stupid. Did you ever feel posthumous, brigadier?

Brig.—No. I never was dead.

Com.—Nor I, except "in trespasses and sins"—but a letter I received to-day has given me a most posthumous sensation. It was sent me to publish, by a lady who has lived several years abroad, and has lately revisited Saratoga. It will "rub my brass" as the maids say, to publish the passage about myself (quoted from the letter of a German baron), but it may make somebodies buy "Pencilings" to know that it has passed abroad into a vade-mecum for travellers. So, down modestly and swell pocket! Who knows but that the "Sunday Mercury," that "lighted on the heaven-kissing hill" of $5,000, may be a better prophet than historian! Set your heels comfortably into the sand, general, and listen to this letter. There are some sweet lines at the close, written by the same lady after visiting the home of the young poetess Davidson, whose precocious genius and premature death have been so feelingly written upon:—

"When you and I, my dear sir, met so pleasantly some weeks since at Saratoga, I forgot to give you an extract from a letter which I had received from Germany. No one can be insensible to deserved praise from a far land, and I know you will read with gratification these few lines from a distinguished friend of mine: 'I remember with pleasure our visit to your splendid frigate, the United States, in the bay of Naples. We met Mr. N. P. Willis on board, and after his cruise I met him again at Lady Darley's. He will not remember me, but if you ever see him, tell him that a person who has visited almost all the spots described in his "Pencilings by the Way," feels the greatest pleasure in reading his book at least twice a year. It accompanies him regularly from Dresden to his estates in the spring, and back to the city in the autumn.'

"Not having seen Saratoga for many years, I was curious to perceive what changes time had made. Of course, its outward condition is greatly improved, and the remarkable change of all is the transition of the fashion and gayety from Congress hall to the United States hotel. It would be unwise to compare this latter establishment with any other that we have seen in Europe, inasmuch as the whole order of arrangement is entirely different; but this must be conceded, that for a fortnight, no place in the world offers more amusement. One may remain months at Carlsbad, Baden-Baden, &c., without fatigue, in consequence of the entirely independent manner of living; but Saratoga must be taken, to be enjoyed, in homeopathic doses of the beforementioned fourteen days. It is really extraordinary how well-ordered and conducted is the United States hotel, when we remember the crowds that dwell within its four walls and its colonies; and assuredly the brothers* who bring about this state of things, deserve great commendation. Having been repeatedly told, since my return from a long absence, that Saratoga had deteriorated, I confess to having seen nothing of the sort. I had the good fortune to meet some of the most remarkable men of my country, and many of the fairest of its daughters, and to enjoy their society. I hold that Saratoga must be visited upon broad American principles—no cliques (like will come to like)—but a gracious word for all. At Carlsbad, and all other continental watering-places, the government provides a master of ceremonies, who introduces, regulates the balls, &c. The voice of the people gives this position, at the United States hotel, to a citizen of Baltimore, and allow me to say, that those who look upon him as a mere manager of balls, totally mistake his character; for a kinder and better heart never beat within a human breast than he possesses. Indeed, Baltimore seems to have been singularly well represented this year—the incomparable beauty of its women eclipsing all, and the wit alone of one finished gentleman of that town being sufficient to leaven a 'mass meeting.'

"I think the visits of clergymen to watering-places a signal benefit, when they resemble the Rev. Dr. Bethune, engaging in pleasing conversation with young and old, whom he enlivened by his eloquence. He never lost sight of the great aim of his existence—their improvement. Ever surrounded by eager listeners, he left them better, wiser. On the whole, I think we must consider Saratoga as a great public good—a neutral ground, where the south discovers that the north is not a Mont Blanc, and the north perceives that the south is not a Vesuvius!

"My last visit at Saratoga was to the late home of the gifted Davidsons. Their brother kindly accompanied me, and presented me to his bereaved father. It seemed, as I lingered amidst their remains, a very home of shadows—a wondrous contrast to the surrounding scenes. I considered myself quite fortunate in having paid this visit, as Dr. Davidson leaves Saratoga shortly, and the establishment will thereby be entirely dismembered.

* "A home of shadows! mid the din
Of fashion's gay and glittering scene
So calm, so purely calm within Breathing of holiness serene.

"A home of shadows! where the twain,
Who dwelt within its hallowed core,
Are sought with wondering eyes in vain,
Alas! to bless its walls no more!

"The pair have winged their glorious flight,
And, borne by angels through the air,
To realms of everlasting light,
Are linked with cherubs bright and fair.

"Some student, yet, in time untold,
Star-seeking in the dark blue sky,
Will, midst its silver lamps, behold
These joyous Pleiads wandering by.

"Back, back to earth—its pleasures, cares—
Must thou, my soul, my thoughts be given,
But, bless the spot, that, midst its snares,
Called for a lingering look to heaven."

Brig.—Charming verses, and she must be a fresh hearted and impressive woman who wrote them. Do you remember the first thought of "Pencilings," mi-boy—the oysters at Sandy Welsh's, over which I offered to send you abroad?

Com.—Theodore Fay, you, and I, supping together!

Brig.—You have a way of knowing opportunity when you see it! I little dreamed of so long a lease of you! Dear Theodore! how I should like to eat that supper over again!

Com.—I am very glad it agreed with you (presuming it is me and Theodore you want over again—not the oysters!) They say Fay has grown fat, handsome, and diplomatic. When shall we have that sweet fellow back among us?

Brig.—When they want the place for a green sea retary, who knows nothing of the court or court language. As soon as a man has been long enough attached to a legation to be presentable and useful, they recall him! What is that other letter I brought you?

Com.—From a lady at Fishkill, who is dazzled with the upshoot of "Fanny Forester." She thinks Fanny's offhand piquancy is easy to do, and the letter shows how much she is mistaken. I would fain say an encouraging word, however, for she seems to have the best of motives for wishing to be literary. Now, is it kinder to discourage such beginners at once, or to encourage them good-naturedly into a delusion?

Brig.—Always discourage, mi-boy, for if they have genius, they will prosper

"like a thunder-cloud, against the wind,"

* Messrs. Marvin—excellent hosts and most worthy men.

and if they have none, they are better stopped where they are. How many heart-aching authoresses do we know at this moment, who can write just well enough to be wofully distressed with the reluctance of the market! The only style saleable is the spicy but difficult vein of bright Fanny Forester, and yet, to a neophyte, that very woof seems the easiest woven! A woman who is more intelligent than the people around her, is very apt to believe that she might be famous, and make money with her pen; and unless "Fair politure walk all her body over,

And symmetry rejoice in every part,"

she endeavors in this way to compensate herself for the lack of belleship. Better raise flowers and sell bouquets, dear Rosalie Beverly!

Com.—The gray lace of twilight's star-broidered veil has fallen over the sea, brigadier. Let us paddle back through the surf-edge to the bathing-houses, boot, and reappear to a world (I don't think) disconsolate without us.

THE CABINET.

(Shop-door, Ann street. The Brigadier and Committee standing, sphinx-wise, outside.)

Brig.—The "devil" was here just now for "copy," my dear boy!

Com.—The devil here and no Fanny Forester! We have given our readers a taste of this charming incognito, brigadier, and now they'll not feast without her! I wonder whether she's pretty?

Brig.—So would she be over-endowed. No, mi-boy! I warrant that, with all her cleverness, she has envied, many a time, the doll of the village!

Com.—A woman is, sometimes, wholly unadmired, who would become enchanting by a change of her surroundings. That playful wit of Fanny Forester's, what-like shell soever it inhabits, would make her the idol of a circle of appreciators—for its work is in her face, somewhere! Do you remember George Sand's description of one of her heroines? "Elle était jolie par juxta-position. Heureuse, elle eût été ravissante. Le bonheur est la poésie des femmes, comme la toilette en est le fard. Si la joie d'un bal eût reflété ses teints rosées sur ce visage pâle, si les douceurs d'une vie élégante eussent rempli, eussent vermillonné ses joues déjà légèrement creusées, si l'amour eût ranimé ses yeux tristes, elle aurait pu lutter avec les plus belles jeunes filles. Il lui manquait ce qui crée une seconde fois la femme :—les chiffons et les billet-doux!"

Brig.—(who had gone in to escape the French quotation, and returned as the last word lingered on the committee's lips).—Write a "billet-doux" to the next unrisen star, mi-boy, and ask her—(him, it, or her)—to shine first, like Fanny Forester, in the columns of the Mirror. I love the baptism of genius, and (modestly speaking) I have been the St. John in the wilderness of new writers.

Com.—Apostolic brigadier! You do know a star, even "at the breast"—though, from sucking poets deliver me mostly, oh, kind Heaven! They exact a faith in their call and mission that precludes everything but the blindest and most acquiescent admiration. I remember my own difficult submissions to the corrections of the kind, but truthful and consistent critic of my youth, Buckingham of the Boston Courier. He was always right, but it is hard, when your feathers are once smoothed down, to pluck out and re-stick them in your poetical peacockery! Ah, juvenilities! We build bridges over chasms of meaning, but they drop away behind us, as we pass over! In Heaven, where there will be no grammar and dictionary, we shall have a new standard of excellence—thought. Here, it is thought's harness—language! What makes these people throw their potato-parings into the gutter, my dear general?

Brig.—Ann street, mi-boy, calls for the attention of Mayor Harper. The Mirror has a dainty nostril or two, and there are flower-pots in the windows opposite, and Burgess & Stringer keep the choicest of literary conservatories, yet we reside upon a rivulet of swill! The simple enforcement of the law would sweeten things, but there is no police except for criminals in this land of liberty. Look at that brace of turtle-doves coming up-street! What loving friendships women have, at an age when boys are perfect Ishmaelites.

Com.—Pardon me, my dear general, if I correct your cacology. The sportsmen call two turtles a duple of turtles, not a brace. Though, by-the-way, I have not long been in possession of my learning upon that point. Let me read you a chapter on the nomenclature of such matters from this book in my hand. Will you listen? The book is "Goodman's Social History of Great Britain"—a gem of delightful reading:—

"The stags which ran wild in the king's forests were named as early (if not earlier) as Edward III. (1307), from their antlers; thus the first year the male is called a calf, second year a brocket, third year a spayer, fourth year a stag, fifth year a great stag, sixth year a hart of the first head.

"In the notes of Sir Walter Scott's 'Lady of the Lake,' is a curious account of the brytling, breaking up, or quartering of the stag. 'The forester had his portion, the hounds theirs, and there is a little gristle, called the raven's bone, which was cut from the brisket, and frequently an old raven was seen perched upon a neighboring tree waiting for it.

"The fallow-deer, which are kept in the English parks, have also names, but not exactly the same as for stags. The males and the females the first year are called fawns, second year the females are called does, which name she always retains; but the male is called a prickett; third year he is called a shard; fourth year, a sword; fifth year, a sword-ell, or sorrell; sixth year, a buck of first head; seventh year, a buck; eighth year, a full buck; he is then fit for killing, and not before: and in the summer is very fat, which he loses in winter. Buck-venison is not fit to eat in winter, and ought not to be killed.

"When beasts went together in companies, there was said to be a pride of lions, a lepe of leopards, a herd of harts, of bucks, and all sorts of deer; a bevy of roes, a sloth of bears, a singular of boars, a sowndes of swine, a dryfte of tame swine, a route of wolves, a harass of horses, a rag of colts, a stud of mares, a pace of asses, a barren of mules, a team of oxen, a drove of kine, a flock of sheep, a tribe of goats, a skulk of foxes, a cete of badgers, a richness of martins, a fessynes of ferrets, a huske or a down of hares, a nest of rabbits, a clowder of cats, a kendel of young cats, a shrewdness of apes, and a labor of moles.

"When animals are retired to rest, a hart was said to be harbored; a buck lodged; a roebuck bedded; a fox kennelled; a badger earthed; a hare formed; and a rabbit seated.

"Dogs which run in packs are enumerated by couples. If a pack of fox-hounds consists of thirty-six, which is an average number, it would be said to contain eighteen couples.

"Dogs used for the gun, or for coursing, two of them are called a brace, three a leash; but two spaniels, or harriers, are called a couple. They also say a mute of hounds, for a number; a kennel of raches, a cowardice of curs, and a litter of whelps.

"The seasons for all sortes of venery were regulated in the olden time as follows: The 'time of grace' begins at midsummer, and lasteth to holy-rood;

the fox may be hunted from the nativity to the announcement of our lady; the roebuck from Easter to Michaelmas; the roe from Michaelmas to Candlemas; the hare from Michaelmas to midsummer; the wolf, as the fox and the boar, from the nativity to the purification of our lady.

"So for birds there is a vocabulary; and first, for aquatic birds: a herd of swans, of cranes, and of curlews, a dropping of sheldrakes, a spring of teals, a serges of herons and bitterns, a covert of cootes, gaggles of geese, sutes of mallards, baddylynges of ducks. Now for meadow and upland birds: a congregation of plovers, a walk of snipes, a fall of woodcocks, a muster of peacocks, a nye of pheasants, a dule of turtles, a brood of hens, a building of rooks, a numeration of starlings, a flight of swallows, a watch of nightingales, a charm of goldfinches, flights of doves and wood-pigeons, coveys of partridges, bebies of quails, and exaltations of larks.

"When a sportsman inquires of a friend what he has killed, the vocabulary is still varied; he does not use the word pair—but a brace of partridges, or pheasants, a couple of woodcocks; if he has three of any sort, he says a leash.

"If a London poulterer was to be asked for a pair of chickens, or a pair of ducks, by a female, he would suppose he was talking to some fine finicking lady's maid, who had so puckered up her mouth into small plaits before she started, that she could not open it wide enough to say couple.

"As the objects sportsmen pursue are so various, and as the English language is so copious, various terms have been brought into use: so that the everlasting term pair, this pairing of anything (except in the breeding-season) sounds so rude, un instructive, and unmusical, upon the ears of a sportsman, that he would as soon be doomed to sit for life by the side of a seat-ridden cribbage-player as to hear it.

"It is the want of this knowledge which makes the writings of Howitt and Willis, when they write upon this ever-interesting national subject, appear so tame; the sportsman peruses their pages with no more zest than he listens to the babble of a half-bred hound, or 'a ranging spaniel that barks at every bird he sees—leaving his game.'"

Mr. Goodman adds, in a note, the explanation of my blunders in dog-nomenclature:—

"Mr. Willis, in vol. iii., p. 203, 'Pencillings by the Way,' gives the following information, speaking of the duke's greyhounds (at Gordon Castle): "'Dinna tak' pains to caress them, sir," said the huntsman, "they'll only be hanged for it." I asked for an explanation. He then told me that a hound was hung the moment he betrayed attachment to any one, or in any way showed superior sagacity. In coursing the hare, if the dog abandoned the scent, to cut across or intercept the animal, he was considered as spoiling the sport. If greyhounds leave the track of the hare, either by their own sagacity, or to follow the master 'n intercepting it, they spoil the pack, and are hung without mercy.' Perhaps Mr. Willis will excuse me if I show how unsportsman-like this is. In the first place, there are no packs of greyhounds; in the next place, those who attend on them are not called huntsmen; in the next place, they never run by scent: if they did, they ought to be destroyed. As to the caressing, no dog ought ever to be caressed without he had first performed some extraordinary feat, and then it should be done instantly. The everlasting petting or patting a dog, spoils it in its nature, its disposition, its temper, and its habits. It becomes worthless, except as a lapdog, and that is the most contemptible and worthless thing in all God's creation.

"Many years' close observation has convinced me, that where the dog is once admitted into the house, and petted, the dogs rule the children, and the children rule the rest; bringing in its train all the usual concomitants of turbulence, filth, and frownsiness; and turning the room into a dog-kennel.

"If men transact like brutes, 'tis equal then
For brutes to claim the privilege of men."

The correction is very right—thanks to Mr. Goodman. My attention was called to the blunder, by the duke of Gordon himself, soon after the publication of the book in England; and I should have corrected it in this new edition, but for determining not to read the proofs, that the letters might be published literally from the first copy. But what beautifully descriptive words are those in the nomenclature of birds, my dear general: "A watch of nightingales!—a charm of goldfinches!—a numeration of starlings, and exaltations of larks!" How pretty it would be, instead of "Here come two pretty women!" to say, "Here comes a charm of women!" Instead of, "There stand Morris and Willis!" to have the shoemaker opposite say, "Look at that pride of lions," or that "exaltation of editors!"

Brig.—A "muster of peacocks" hits my fancy—descriptive, say, of two loungers in uniform! Ah! mi-boy!—fine!

Com.—Most brigadierish of brigadiers! You would rather be the sodger men have made you than the poet God made you! So would not I!

Brig.—you rejoice in a destiny fulfilled, then?

Com.—Quite the contrary. I mean to say that God made me a natural idler and trifler, and want made me a poet and a worky; and unlike you, I would rather be what God made me. By-the-way, do you know the trouble there was in the first composing of a horse? This same amusing book quotes from Fitz-herbert's old book on agriculture: "A horse has fifty-four properties, viz.: two of a man, two of a badger, four of a lion, nine of an ox, nine of a hare, nine of a fox, nine of an ass, and ten of a woman. This description has been somewhat altered, but perhaps not improved upon, viz.: three qualities of a woman, a broad breast, round hips, and a long inane; three of a lion, countenance, courage, and fire; three of a bullock, the eye, the nostrils, and joints; three of a sheep, the nose, gentleness, and patience; three of a mule, strength, constancy, and good feet; three of a deer, head, legs, and short hair; three of a wolf, throat, neck, and hearing; three of a fox, ear, tail, and throat; three of a serpent, memory, sight, and cunning; and three of a hare or cat, cunning, walking, and suppleness."

(Committee's private study. Brigadier lounging in a fauteuil.)

Com.—My dear general, what do you think, abstractly, of industry? Does no shuddering consciousness of awful platitude creep over you, in this dreadfully exemplary career that we are pursuing? I feel as if the very nose on my face were endeavoring to "dress," as you military men say—striving to come down to the dull, cheek-bone level of tedious uniformity! I declare I should be pleased to "hear tell" of something out of the "way of business"—sentiment of some sort!

Brig.—Listen to a song that I have just written. There is a background of truth to it—the true sadness of a lovely living woman—that would supply your need of a sensation, if your imagination could picture her.

Com.—It shall! Read away, my friend!
(Brigadier reads.)

* * * * *

Com.—That is a peculiarly musical and engaging measure, and you have hung it upon hinges of honey. It smacks of the days when poets wrote a song a year, finishing, to the last vanishing point of perfection. What do the women say to you for translating their prose into angel-talk?

Brig.—They love poetry, mi-boy! The more poetical you can make their life, the more they love life and you! They would rather suffer than live monotonously. So, beware the "even tenor!"

Com.—Even of prosperity, eh? I'll beware when I see it coming!

Brig.—Ah, mi-boy, you have no idea of the intense abstraction of mind necessary to bring a poetical imagination down to habits of business.

Com.—Do you really wish to know what is to be the new rage in society this winter?

Brig.—What?

Com.—Married belles! The 'teens dynasty is passing away! The talk, this summer, at all the watering-places, has been of beautiful women, who (if, perchance, they have loved out their love) have not shone out their shine! Heavens!—how many there are completely shelved in American society, who have never had more than two winters of vogue in the world, and who are compelled to believe that, out of thirty years of loveliness, only two are to be rescued from the nursery—only two to intervene between the nursery filial and the nursery maternal! What a utensil woman is, in this way! For what did Heaven give them their other powers? Heaven did not put the smile of woman under her arm! No! it was placed where it could not be covered without suffocation, and, doubtless, with a purpose:—that the lips and their outgoing should be kept open to society! Till those lips fade—till the mind that speaks through them loses its playfulness and attraction, woman can not be monopolized without a manifest waste of the gifts of nature—making that bloom for two years only, that was constructed to bloom for forty! Besides—these very charms are withdrawn from the world before ripening—flowers permitted only to bud! There never was a belle who was not more agreeable after marriage than before. An unripe mind is far less agreeable than a ripe one. The elegant repose of lovely married women is far more enchanting than the hoydenish romping or inexperienced sentiment of girls. Speak up, brigadier! What say?

Brig.—It is highly natural, mi-boy, that this change should be coming about, now! But it was both natural and necessary that, hitherto—in the unornamental foundation of American society, woman should be reduced to her simple primitive mission—shining, like the glow-worm, only long enough to attract the male. When married, she passed into the condition of an operative in a nation-factory—a working mother, a working educatress, a working patriot-maker. Her whole time was then needed for offices that are now performed—(all but the first)—by schools, moral teachers, surrounding example, and national routine. Lubricate the child now with money, and it will slide on to manhood over an inevitable railroad of education and good influences. Of course, the mother is now at liberty to shine as long as nature feeds the lamp; and, indeed, it is in this way, only, that she can fulfil her destiny—dispensing elsewhere the sweet influences no longer needed exclusively by her children.

Com.—Statesmanlike and pellucid! Well, sir, this great national metamorphosis is now coming about! It has been secretly resolved, among the young married men of New York, that there shall exist, this winter, a post-connubial belle-ocracy; and that married belles shall, accordingly, have the pas, in waltz, quadrille, promenade, and conversation. How delicious!—isn't it? It enlarges the field so! I believe, general, that I, for one, shall "cast my slough," and try my youth on again!

"For when the life is quickened, out of doubt,
The wits that were defunct and dead before,
Break up their drowsy grave, and newly move
With casted slough and fresh legerity."

and who knows? I may be agreeable in the reformed baby-house of society!

Brig.—"Hope on—hope ever!"

THE CABINET.

(Committee and Brigadier in confidential session.)

Com.—My dear general, it won't do! Read these two letters!

Brig.—I won't waste my eyes with them! It must do! who says it won't do!

Com.—One Noggs.

Brig.—Who's Noggs?

Com.—By Jove, he writes a capital letter! Hear this, my incensed brigadier!—(reads.)

"DEAR WILLIS: You frightened me to-day, terribly, in the hint you threw out in the course of conversation with the 'brigadier,' to wit: 'Shall we make it into a monthly?'"

"Make the WEEKLY NEW MIRROR into a monthly! God forbid! I forbid, anyhow. 'Who are you?' I am a live Yankee, at your service, who lives in the land of soles and codfish, whig pow-wows and democratic clam-bakes—one who has not been so 'decorously brought up,' perhaps as some of your readers, but 'a man for a' that—a constant reader of the Mirror, at any rate—proof of my manhood, eh?"

Well, sir, I, Newman Noggs, Esq., of Lynn, county of Essex, etc., etc., do hereby seriously and ardently protest against any such nonsense as is implied in the above question. Excuse me, sir, but I couldn't help it. I feel so worked up at the bare idea of the visits of the Mirror coming only monthly, that I can hardly stick to decency. Why, sir, I shouldn't be in trim for my sabbath-day meeting—albeit a pious man am I—were it not for the 'preparatory' study in the Mirror, Saturday nights. Not that you are so dreadfully religious, but there is always sure to be something in you that makes me feel better, and when I feel 'better' I want to go to church, of course, to let myself and the world know that I'm getting kind o' good. As for the literary merits of the Mirror, it don't become the like o' me to be offering an opinion. All I've got to say is, that I 'individually' like it first-rate. There's a sort of racy, spicy, off-hand, unstudied wittiness about it that takes my eye amazingly. So, for God's sake, or more particularly for my sake, dear Willis, don't ye change it. Suppose it does cost some folks a little more for postage than it would for something else—what o' that? Who's afraid of a cent or two? I'm a poor man 'long side o' some folk, and yet I rather pay letter-postage than have it stop So, Willis dear, just tell your postage friends to economize in some other department, or, if they can't do that, tell 'em I'll make it up to 'em.

"No, no, friend of my early youth, don't think or any such thing, that is, if ye love me—for I could better spare—something better, than the piquant dish of conversation which weekly (oh, let it be ever weekly) occurs between 'mi-boy' and our dear beloved general, the 'brigadier.'"

"Mrs. Noggs, too—a strong woman, by the way—is, nevertheless, weekly on this point, very. She says she'll never forgive you if you change the fair form of the Mirror. Think o' that! Though not a vain woman, she has a passion for looking into the Mirror that is very affecting. On the other hand, she says if you'll give up the horrid notion of changing the form of the Mirror, she'll fry you 'a nipper' as brown as a nut, with her own fair hands, when next you come Bostonward, and will visit our humble cottage near the sea. I have ye now! For my well-tried friends, Gentleman Charles (him of the Astor house, I mean) and his handsome partner, tell me you are a gallant youth and well affected toward the ladies.

"We shall look anxiously in the next Mirror to find our anxious hopes confirmed, and, if not disappointed, shall henceforth, as in duty bound, ever pray for your everlasting welfare, world without end.

"Yours till then, "Nogges."

Com.—I have had twenty letters the last week (none as good as that, but) all to the same purpose! I am inclined to think, general, that Heaven's first periodical (Sunday) was arranged in accordance with some revolution of our mental nature, and that once in seven days, as it is good to rest, so it is good to read, or grieve, or go love-making. Friends dine together once a week, making friendship a weekly periodical. Lovers of nature in cities ride to the country once a week. We eat a boiled dinner once a week. Everybody in New England needs beans once a week. The weather comes round once a week—fair Sundays and wet Sundays coming in successive dozens. There is nothing agreeable in nature that is monthly, except the moon, and the very sight of that periodical puts people to sleep!

Brig.—There is the monthly rose, mi-boy!

Com.—The poorest rose that blows!

Brig.—But here is a point I should like to make clear to the public. With an enormous subscription every day increasing, we are every day making less money.

Com.—How, oh, business man?

Brig.—Thus: For Mirrors that we sell through agents in cities, we get but four cents each. For Mirrors that we send to subscribers by mail, we get the full price—sixpence each. The irregular and exorbitant postage has nearly killed our mail subscription, on which we chiefly depended, while in cities, where our patrons get them from the agents without postage, we have a sale growing daily more enormous. The dense of it is, that the Mirror at sixpence is as cheap as it can possibly be sold with anything like profit, and selling it to agents literally at cost, the increase of the agency circulation does us no manner of good!

Com.—Why sell to agents at cost?

Brig.—It was a necessary evil in the beginning—lacking capital to hire the doing of what agents do.

Com.—And we must go on as we begun?

Brig.—Short of a six months' paralysis, which we could not afford, there is no help for it! But the postage is the great block in our way! Most people would subscribe and have it sent to their houses by mail, if the postage were not more than the subscription.

Com.—How would that be helped in the monthly form.

Brig.—Ah! now you come to the matter. The monthly Mirror goes for seven cents postage, and most of our mail subscribers who remain, have the Mirror sent in the monthly form, by mail—and I wish all who value the Mirror, or care for us, would do the same. To take it weekly from an agent, does not bring back to you a single leaf of Glenmary, my dear boy!

Com.—Ah, my dear friend—Glenmary! Some villain—some wanton and unfeeling villain—has destroyed a vine I planted, which had completely embowered that sweet cottage. In an Ithaca paper, sent to me yesterday, I find a letter—here it is—from some Owego gentleman to the editor. Let me read you part of it:—

"The cottage you know, like a bird's nest, is almost hid in the foliage. On one side is the road passing over 'the bridge,' and all around a sweet lawn, sloping away to 'Owego creek.' The bridge was once white, and neat in its outward appearance. But how Willis, even in the 'summer months,' made his 'bridge-gipsying delicious,' is now a mystery. The 'groundwork' is flood-wood, and reptiles crawl where 'swallows peeped out from their nests against the sleepers,' while every five minutes a baptism of dust comes down from above, as a benediction from the passing traveller. But the pruning hand of a man of taste has been wanting to all this rural spot for two years past, which may account for the blemishes we find in the picture so beautifully drawn in 'A P'abri. Some Caligula among shrubbery has cut the roof of a luxuriant vine, which spread itself over the cottage front, making a delightful arbor of the piazza; and its leaves and tendrils, already changed in hue, are folding themselves to die. As through it the night-breeze rustled, it seemed to breathe of the desolation that had stolen upon this garden, sacred to the memory of a lovely exotic which made it a paradise, and the fadeless light of genius."

That is written by some kind man, who understood how a heartstring might be cut through with a vine one had planted and cherished. Whoever may be the perpetrator of that needless outrage, I commend him to the notice of my friendly neighbors, adding a petition from me, which may thus reach them, that only Time's hand may be suffered to ravage my lost paradise.

Brig.—The subject troubles me, mi-boy! Let us change it. I've a funny communication here, from a Rip Van Winkle, who dates fifty years hence, and—

Com.—Keep it till next week, general, and let us get into the fresh air. I'm manuscript sick. Allons! Stay—while I mend my outer man a little, read this funny letter, sent me by the lady to whom it was written. She thinks her friend, young "Cinna Beverley," is a genius.

(Brigadier reads, with an occasional laugh.)

"TO MISS PHEBE LORN.

"DEAR BEL-PHEBE: I have been 'tiddling my sunbeam' (you say my letters are 'perfect sunshine') for some time, more or less, in a quandary as to what is now resolved upon as 'Dear Bel-Phebe'—the beginning of this (meant-to-be) faultless epistle. I chanced to wake critical this morning, and, 'dear Phebe,' as the beginning of this letter of mine, looked both vulgar and meaningless. I inked it out as you see. A reference to my etymological dictionary, however, restored my liking for that 'dear' word. It is derived from the Anglo-Saxon verb Der-ian, which means to do mischief. Hence dearth, which, by doing mischief, makes what remains more precious, and hence dear, meaning something made precious by having escaped hurting. 'Dear Phebe,' therefore (meaning unhurt Phebe), struck me as pretty well—you being one of those delicious, late-loving women, destined to be 'hurt' first at thirty. Still, the sacred word 'Phebe' was too abruptly come upon. It sounded familiar, and familiarity should be reserved for the postscript. I should have liked to write 'dear Lady Phebe,' or 'dear Countess Phebe'—but we are not permitted to 'read our title clear,' in this hideously-simple country. Might I invent an appellation? We say char-woman and horse-man—why not put a descriptive word before a lady's name, by way of respectful distance. Phebe Lorn is a belle—why not say Bel-Phebe? Good! It sounds authentic. This letter, then, is to Phebe, unhurt and beautiful (alias), 'Dear Bel-Phebe!'

"You are an ephemeron of a month—the month at Saratoga, in which you get wings to come forth from your eleven months' chrysalis in the country—and you are now once more 'gathered to your fathers,' and mourning over the departed summer! Your Arabian mare feels your thrilling weight again, and you astonish your pet cow with sponge-cake over the lawn fence, and give caraways to your top-knot hens, and say 'Sir' to your greyhound, and make-believe care for your dahlias and tube-roses—but the pleasantest part of the day, after all, is its heavenly twilight of closed eyelids, when you can live over again that month at Saratoga—myself, perhaps, then, cursorily remembered! For you rejoice in the perils of love, unburth and adorable Phœbe!

"But you know enough about yourself and you wish to hear about the town! Well!—the flies are numb with the first frost, the window-blinds are open nearly to Union square, somebody has been seen with a velvet waistcoat, starch is 'looking up,' and the town is full of palmetto-hatted and ready-made-clothing-ized southerners. By these data judge of the epoch. I, myself, am among my dusted household gods, and, at this moment (writing in my bed-room) see my boots phalanxed in their winter parade. I must say it is, so far, pleasant! Perhaps—but you want news, not the philosophy of boots in repose.

"You heard of the marriage of one of our wild Indians to an English girl, not long ago in London. She has been at the Waverley some days, and has excited no little curiosity. She is moderately handsome, but in such an unusual style of beauty that she out-magnifies many a more strictly beautiful woman. My vaurien friend, F., the artist (who chanced to dine opposite the chief and chief-ess at the table-d'hôte a day or two since), declares the face to be wholly unique, and a sufficient explanation of the extraordinary whim of her marriage. I have never, myself, wondered at it. The crust, impenetrable upward, of English middle life, is enough to drive geniuses of any kind more mad than this! What hell like inevitable mediocrity in anything! This fine woman, now going to live a dog's life with an Indian in the wilderness, would have spent her days in a brick row, and grown idiotic with looking out upon the same sidewalk till death. Which would you rather?

"Do you remember (for beautiful women don't always remember beautiful women) the adorable Mrs. C., at Saratoga—that charming specimen of a healthy and practicable angel? She has been here a week on her return from Niagara, and Flagg, the beauty-painter, has stolen a copy of her on canvass. Ah, Bel-Phœbe! You have a loss in not realizing what it is to a man when an exquisite face holds still to be critically admired! You can see the grain of the velvet in her brown eye, now, and trace by what muscle her heart pulls, to keep down that half-sad corner of her delicious mouth! He is an appreciator, that Flagg, and paints a woman as she looks to appreciators—differently from the butchers'-meat estimation of common gazers on beauty. Mrs. C., has gone to Baltimore, where beauty is an indigenous drug—belles of that 'city rich in women' being never valued till transplanted. But heavens! how tired you will be of reading this long female paragraph! Hasten to speak of something with a man in it!

"One of the most fascinating men in England is ekeing out an exile from May fair, by singing and lecturing on songs to the delighted Croton drinkers. He is a man of that quiet elegance of address that seems nothing in a woman's way till she has broken her neck over it, and he sings as such a man shouldn't—to be a safe man, that is to say! Fancy Moore's songs any more bewitched than Moore intended! Mr. McMichael's voice glides under your heart like a gondola under a balcony—Moore's melody representing the embellished and enriched moonlit water. It is the enchanted perfection of lover-like, and gentleman-like song-singing. I heard Moore sing his own songs in England, and Mr. McMichael sings them in the same style—only in apothecosis! (Ask your papa to translate that big word.)

"Do you care about theatres? We have a new tragedian, about whose resemblance to Macready the critics are quarrelling, and a new tragedian-ess who has put the boxes into fits by coming on the stage without a—bustle! (Fancy Desdemona without a bustle!) Of course you are surprised, for this is one of these 'coming events' that could not possibly 'cast their shadows before,' but fashion is imperative, and

'Where ruled the (bustle) Nature broods alone!'

I understand the omnibuses are to be re-licensed to carry fourteen inside, and the shops in Broadway are petitioning (so Alderman Cozzens told me to-day) to put out bow-windows, in expectation of the vacated space.

"Seriously, there has been a growing mistrust (Pearl-streetingly speaking) of the article woman, as shown to customers! 'Thank fashion, there is more chance now of a poor youth's knowing the ('ground covered by the imposing obligations of matrimony!')

"As to the fault found with Anderson—his resemblance to Macready—I see it in no objectionable particular, unless it be the incorrigible one, of a mutual brevity of nose. He was educated to his profession by Macready, and of course has his master's severe taste, and smacks somewhat of his school, which is a good one. I like him much better than I do Macready, however, for, though he has most of his excellences, he has none of his defects, and, in voice and pliancy of action, he is much that artificial man's superior. Criticism aside, Anderson plays agreeably and makes you like him, whereas Macready, playing ever so well, does it disagreeably, and makes you dislike him! But I am no judge—for I would rather sit on a sofa by most any woman than sit in a box during most any play. Pity me!

"Hast thou great appetite, and must I vouchsafe thee still another slice of news? The new hotel up-town is waxing habitable, and the proprietor is in a quandary what to call it. The natural inquiry as to what would be descriptive, has suggested a look at the probabilities of custom, and it is supposed that it will be filled partly with that class of fashionables who feel a desire to do something in life besides laboriously 'keep house,' partly by diplomatists and dandies wishing to be 'convaynient' to balls and chez-elles, and partly by such Europeanized persons as have a distaste for American gregariousness, and desire a voice as to the time and place of refreshing and creature. The arrangements are to surpass any previous cis-Atlantic experience, and the whole project is considered as the first public flower of the transplanted whereabouts of aristocracy. It has been proposed to call it MAY FAIR HOTEL—'May Fair' being the name of the fashionable nucleus of London. HAUTEVILLE HOTEL has been suggested, descriptive of its position up-town. HOTEL RECHERCHE, HOTEL CHOISI, are names proposed also, but more liable to criticism. I, myself, proposed A L'ABI—as signifying a house aside from the rush of travel and business. Praise that, if you please! Billings, the lessee, is a handsome man, of a very up-town address, with the finest teeth possible for the welcome to new-comers—this last no indifferent item! He is young—but young people are the fashion. 'Young England' and 'Young France' wield the power. I have not mentioned the system of the hotel, by the way, which is that of Maurice's at Paris—a table-d'hôte and a restaurant, and dinner in public, or private, or not at all, at your option. Charming—wont it be?

"Crawford, the sculptor, has come home from Italy, and, as he is the American, par excellence, in whom resides the sense of beauty, I trust he may see you.

"What else had I to say? Something—but I'll write it on a slip, for it will be personal, and you like to show all your letters to 'the governor.'

"Adieu, dear Bel-Phœbe, and pray tear up the slip enclosed as soon as you have recovered from fainting. Yours at discretion. "CINNA BEVERLEY, JR."

"FANNY FORESTER."—We have been accused, face to face, several times, and by letter once or twice, of being, ourselves, that bewitching masquerader. We have conjured some variety out of our workyday quill, it is true, and have an unfulfilled and recorded vow of a new alias—but in "Fanny Forester" there resides a dimpled youthfulness and elasticity that is not found so many miles on the road as our present sojourn! Oh no, sweet Fanny! they slander you and do too much credit to our industry and versatility! Those who wish to know more of Fanny Forester, may hear of her, now, among the high-priced contributors of Graham and Godey.

DR. LARDNER'S LECTURE.—We did not chance to hear Dr. Lardner's excellent and amusing lecture on the "London literati," etc., but the report of it in the "Republic" has scraped the moss from one corner of our memory, and we may, perhaps, aid in the true portraiture of one or two distinguished men by showing a shade or two in which our observation of them differed from that of the doctor. We may remark here, that Dr. Lardner has been conversant with all the wits and scholars of England for the last two or three lustrums, and we would suggest to him that, with the freedom given him by withdrawal from their sphere, he might give us a book of anecdotal biography that would have a prosperous sale and be both instructive and amusing. We shall not poach upon the doctor's manor, by the way, if we give our impression of one of these literati—himself—as he appeared to us, once in very distinguished company, in England. We were in a ball in the height of the season, at Brighton. Somewhere about the later hours, we chanced to be in attendance upon a noble lady, in company with two celebrated men, Mr. Ricardo and Horace Smith (the author of Brambletye House, and Rejected Addresses), Lady Stepney, authoress of the "New Road to Ruin," approached our charming centre of attraction with a proposition to present to her the celebrated Dr. Lardner. "Yes, my dear! I should like to know him of all things!" was the reply, and the doctor was conjured forthwith into the magic circle. He bowed "with spectacles on nose," but no other extraneous mark of philosopher or scholar. We shall not offend the doctor by stating that, on this evening, he was a very different looking person from his present practical exterior. With showy waistcoat, black tights, fancy stockings and small patent-leather shoes, he appeared to us an elegant of very bright water, smacking not at all, in manner no more than in dress, of the smutch and toil of the laboratory. We looked at and listened to him, we remember, with great interest and curiosity. He left us to dance a quadrille, and finding ourselves accidentally in the same set, we looked at his ornamental and lover-like acquittal of himself with a kind of wonder at what Minerva would say! This was just before the doctor left England. We may add our expression of pleasure that the Protean facility of our accomplished and learned friend has served him in this country—making of him the best lecturer on all subjects, and the carver out of prosperity under a wholly new meridian.

But, to revert to the report of the lecture:—

"The doctor gave some very amusing descriptions of the personal peculiarities of Bulwer and D'Israeli, the author of 'Coningsby,' observing that those who have read the works of the former, would naturally conclude him to be very fascinating in private society. Such, however, was not the case. He had not a particle of conversational facility, and could not utter twelve sentences free from hesitation and embarrassment. In fact, Bulwer was only Bulwer when his pen was in his hand and his meerschaum in his mouth. He is intimate with Count D'Orsay, one of the handsomest men of the day, and in his excessive admiration of that gentleman has adopted his style of dress, which is adapted admirably to the figure of the second Beau Brummell, but sits strangely on the feeble, rickety and skeleton form, of the man of genius."

Now it struck us, on the contrary, that there was no more playful, animated, facile creature in London society than Bulwer. He seemed to have a horror of stilted topics, it is true, and never mingled in general conversation unless merrily. But at Lady Blesington's, where there was but one woman present (herself), and where, consequently, there could be no têtes-à-têtes, Bulwer's entrance was the certain precursor of fun. He was a brilliant rattle, and as to any "hesitation and embarrassment," we never saw a symptom of it. At evening parties in other houses, Bulwer's powers of conversation could scarce be fairly judged, for his system of attention is very concentrative, and he was generally deep in conversation with some one beautiful woman whom he could engross. We differ from the doctor, too, as to his style of dandyism. Spready upper works, trousers closely fitting to the leg, a broad-brimmed hat, and cornucopial whiskers, distinguished D'Orsay, while Bulwer wore always the loose French pantaloons, a measurable habrim, and whiskers carefully limited to the cheek. We pronounce the doctor's astrology (as to these stars) based upon an error in "observation."

The reporter adds:—

"D'Israeli he described as an affected coxcomb, with a restless desire to appear witty; yet he never remembered him to have said a good thing in his life except one, and that was generally repeated with the preface, 'D'Israeli has said a good thing at last.'"

That D'Israeli is not a "bon-mot" man, is doubtless true. It never struck us that he manifested a "desire to appear witty." He is very silent in the general mêlée of conversation, but we have never yet seen him leave a room before he had made an impression by some burst in the way of monologue—either an eloquent description or a dashing new absurdity, an anecdote or a criticism. He sits indolently with his head on his breast, taking sight through his eyebrows till he finds his cue to break in, and as far as our observation goes, nobody was ever willing to interrupt him. The doctor calls him an "affected coxcomb," but it is only of his dress that this is any way true. No schoolboy is more frank in his manners. This is true, even since D'Israeli's "gobble up" of the million with a widow. When we were first in London, he was the immortal tenant of one room and a recess, and with manners indolently pensive. Three years after, returning to England, we found him master of a lordly establishment on Hyde Park, and, except that he looked of a less lively melancholy, his manners were as untroubled with affection as before. We do not in the least doubt the sincerity of the doctor's report, but it shows how even acute observers (we two are that, doctor!) will see the same thing with different eyes. This article is too long.

New York has an unsupplied want—no less a thing than a FASHIONABLE PROMENADE. Broadway, that used to be the parade of all that was feminine, fashionable and fair, has been, for some time, only a walk of plain-dress-necessity to the noli-me-langeries, and it will soon be left entirely to the deaf and the humble—so intolerable is the Bedlam racket of its abominable omnibuses! (To get an audible answer to the "How do you do?" one has need to take one's friend into a store.)

Our ladies have done like the English, in giving up shopping and walking the street in full dress, and now, where is to be the English or French substitute—our Hyde park or our Bois de Boulogne? Ladies, in London, are supposed to be so incapable of walking at all in the street, that, if they do so, it is rather well-bred not to recognise them in passing. But after shopping in disguise in Regent street (their Broadway) they go home and "dress for the carriage," and drive out to meet all the world in the "Rotten row" of the park. Up and down this half mile they follow in slow procession, meeting as slow a procession going the other way, and bowing at every carriage length, and, no public hack being admitted into the park, those who have no carriages have no promenade!

Don't let us improve with our eyes shut! We have taken off our foot of fashion from one round of the ladder. How long is it to be suspended in the air—for, a driving park is the next inevitable step upward?

ODD ENOUGH.—The best view of Trinity steeple and almost the only view of Trinity church, is across some old one-story wooden groceries in Greenwich street, the spectator standing upon the opposite sidewalk! "We never know to whom we look best," said we to the steeple, when we discovered it! To Broadway-gazers, Trinity steeple is a Gothic column. The body of the church is wholly lost as to effect, and it was a great mistake not to set it sidewise upon the street. But, let us suggest something to the enormously wealthy vestry of that church. There is not a valuable building, nor scarce a lot unoccupied by a nuisance, between this splendid fabric and Greenwich street. How easy to buy this advantageous slope, and make of it an ascending foreground, unequalled except by the ascent to the capitol at Washington! Besides the addition to the beauty of the city, it would give another "lungs" to the neighborhood of Wall street, and grace, fitly and with additional beauty, the resting-place of the gallant and lamented Lawrence.

CHANGE IN NEW YORK HABITS.—The great peculiarity of America—our gregariousness, as shown in our populous hotels—has taken a large stride on its way to the exclusivism of Europe. The office of the lessee of the new hotel up-town has been overrun with applicants, and most of them, we understand, with a view of availing themselves of its privileges as a hotel garni—or furnished house where the meals are discretionary, as to place, time, and price. Let us look a little into this.

A gentleman arrives at a London hotel. He alights at the door of what resembles a private house. He is shown to a small parlor and bed-room, and left alone with his baggage and the peculiarly neat and unsociable chairs and table. He orders his dinner and tea, and it is served to him alone. He is as much alone the remainder of the day and evening, and from that time to doomsday, if he stay so long; and there is no place about the house where he can vary this loneliness, except the coffee-room, where the parlor class of lodgers have no errand and rarely go. His engagement with the landlord is to pay so much, by the day, for his rooms, and for whatever else he chooses to order.

What with the absence of books, and all the comforts and trifles that give a look of home, and, on the other hand, the lack of the American compensations, such as reading-room, ladies' drawing-room, sitting-rooms, and thronged halls and entries, the solitude and gloom of a hotel in the heart of London could scarce be exceeded.

But, admirably suited as is the American system of hotel to the relief and pleasure of the stranger and traveller, there is a class of hotel-lodgers who would be more comfortable in New York were there a hotel after the European fashion—and it is with a view to this class, mainly, that the new hotel up-town has been designed. We refer to the class who wish a luxurious home, but can not afford time, trouble, or money, to be housekeepers. There are many families of this description—families who pass the summer in the country, but in the winter reside in town, and, dreading the trouble and expense of a town house, would still prefer a private table and drawing-room. For such, a hotel garni, with elegant suites of apartments and a restaurant on the floor before, is the well-adapted provision, and this class is sufficiently large to more than warrant the enterprise of the hotel up-town.

The great mass, however, even of families (and certainly of bachelors), prefer the gregarious hotel, where two or three hundred people form almost one family, where eating and dancing and social pleasures are all enjoyed in common, and where business and amusement are closely, and without foresight or trouble, closely intermingled. This style of living best suits the great mass of a business community, and it will not be till we have a ruling proportion of aristocratic idlers, that the gregarious hotel will go out of fashion. That may be fifty years hence, or our "gregariousness" may become a national peculiarity, and the Astor "stay put" for a century.

We speak the Tuscan, and lively Mr. Palmo is betrayed by his soft c to be a Piedmontese or a Venetian—else we should venture to give him the ideas here-below embodied, in his own lingua de belleza. We beg his worthy and eloquent legal counsellor, however (whom we have the pleasure to know), to translate to him, through some medium more pellucid than the last, the nicer shades of our meaning. We put up our prayer for his happy voyage to the manager's harbor of comprehension.

AN OPERA, like a woman, is never to be taken literally. It is not, exclusively or mainly, a place wherein to hear good music. If the music be the best that can be procured (though it were only the best in Ethiopia), the uncrowned but very executive King Public is content. "Our" ear is merciful! But the opera is a place for the advancing of two ends more—human tenderness and human vanity. Ten go thither to flirt, and forty to be seen, where one goes to pamper his auricular nerve upon a cadenza. We don't see that this requires enlarging upon.

We wish to enlighten those who have hitherto been proudly content with their own country (haven't travelled, and that's the reason), as to the true uses of the opera abroad—the way it is truly used, that is to say, where sing Rubini and his starry troupe. First, as to construction. The London opera-house (like the Parisian) is composed of a hundred or more private boxes, and a pit. The private boxes are used by their lady-proprietors to receive company during the evening, and the pit is used to reconnoitre the boxes, to lounge, to chat, and to be visible in white gloves and opera-glass (this last a most necessary demonstration by those who would not otherwise be considered "men about town"). We have not yet mentioned the lis- tening to the opera. This very subordinate part of the evening's entertainment commences at the signal "sh!" "sh!" from the connoisseurs, indicating that some favorite aria is commencing which is worth listening to, or a duett or quartette, or fine point of action, coming off, and, till this is past, the audience, above and below, is breathlessly still and attentive. At all other times during the performance of the opera, it is rather green than otherwise to pay attention to the stage, and anybody who should request that his neighbors would not converse during the recitativo secco, would be smiled at as "capital fun!" The opera, in short, is considered as a help, an accompaniment (or, if you like, a stop-gap) to conversation, and the consequence is that nowhere are people so much at their ease, and nowhere are so many bright and merry things said as at the opera! We'll mend our pen, dear reader, while you compare this with the quaker-meeting attention so tediously given at Palmo's.

But this is to be mended (the practice, we mean—the pen does pretty well), and the first thing we wish to suggest to Mr. Palmo is an improvement in the "fop's alley" part of it. To go round behind the boxes, as the house is constructed now, is formidably conspicuous, unless one has a direct errand to the lady next the stage; yet this, with the exception of having a seat in the pit, and sitting in it, is the only way to get a look at the house and "see who is there." Let Mr. Palmo drop a staircase, passing under the stage-box to the front of the pit, and there would be an excusable lounge of observation all round the house—a prodigious difference in the attraction for the dandies, let us assure you, signor! You need the dandies! You wish to make it among the necessities of a "man about town," that he should have a season-ticket to the opera. But it is no pleasure to sit cramped and silent in one seat, and no pleasure to come in and stand behind the audience for the whole evening, or for an hour. It would be a pleasure to see the audience from the front, and that can not be done now, without a pretty "cool" walk to the orchestra and back. Now could it?

We have two or three other propositions to make for the improvement of the social opportunities of the opera, but this will do for to-day. Addio, signore!

We cordially approve of the reason for, and the feeling which prompted the following paragraph. We have the pleasure of knowing the three gentlemen mentioned in it, particularly the urbane captain, and we wish the Howards a happy retirement, and Captain Roe a bounding prosperity—but this done, we wish to note a nationality as it passes; and first, to quote a paragraph:—

"It has been announced in various quarters that the Messrs. Howard, who have established the hotel so extensively and favorably known as Howard's Hotel, have disposed of that establishment to Captain Roe, of the "Empire" steamboat. * * * As for the Howards, we are glad that they have done so well. We presume that, being relieved now from the labor of keeping such a large establishment, they will retire to some of those beautiful retreats with which their native state, Vermont, abounds."

It will be seen at once that a traveller who should measure this trio by the European scale of condition in life—(rank these gentlemen, that is to say, with "mine host" in any other part of the world)—would make a blunder. The difference between an American hotel-proprietor, and a London Boniface, is not merely that our hotels are six times as large. It is not merely that he is six times as great a "proprietor." The vocation is almost wholly different—and the difference is a result of the totally different habits of the two countries. In London, you may, by chance, see the "land-lady," daily, but you may be months in the house without seeing the "land-lord." (Two terrible misnomers, by-the-way, for the hostess, though she has no land, is not a lady but as a land-lady, and mine host is far enough from a lord with land, though he is no lord except as a land-lord!) The English host, therefore, is never an acquaintance of his guest, and the guest knows his hostess only in the quality of an upper servant. The reader will have recognised the difference we wish to point to. The American hotel-keeper has charge, not of twenty or thirty people living wholly in their own private rooms, but of two or three hundred, whose habits are all gregarious, and to almost every one of them he (the landlord) is a personal and familiar friend. The extent of this friendly intercourse with persons mostly of the better class, gives to the hotel-proprietor a mass of influence, direct and indirect, which makes him a very important person in the community. He is continually appealed to for knowledge on popular subjects, such as is got only by great facilities of hearsay. He is often made a reference in disputes, from his necessary habit of impartiality. He is intrusted with deposits of great value by his guests, and is the confidant-general of the secrets and difficulties of strangers, and of travelling lovers and mourners. Ladies and families are committed to his charge. Public entertainments are given by his advice and direction; and, in short, he has so much harm, and so much good influence, in his power, that he is, necessarily, a person of high moral character, superior judgment, discretion, and information—without all which public opinion would not tolerate him in his place—and, with which, while in the full exercise of his vocation, he naturally holds a high station of republican social rank. It is in tacit obedience to this scale of valuation, that the change of masters in a public hotel is made the subject of newspaper announcement and comment—a notice of the fact which would seem to a London editor wholly beyond its consequence and value.

We are aware that it is rather Utopian to give nominal rank to people according to their actual worth and influence; but let us have our little bit of fancy now and then! We should be afraid to call public attention to the rank of editors—measuring it by their power!

OLE BULL AND HIS MISSING "SPOT."—As we predicted, this great luminary took the light of the world to himself on Saturday night, and became visible above the horizon of the footlights precisely at eight,

"Bright as a god, but punctual as a slave!"

Mrs. Child (the moon who reflects the masculine gold of his music in the feminine silver of language) sat in the stage-box, somewhat obscured in the penumbra of a shocking cap. (We rely upon Miss Dorsey to invent a "silver cloud," or, at any rate, some headdress more becoming for the waxing glory of this charming reflector.) The Memnonian music awoke, of course, with the appearance of Ole-Apollo, and the crammed world of fashion sat breathless. By the time the first piece was played, however, it was felt that there was something wrong. The audience was irresponsible. The ivory inside edge of the moon's disk (disclosed by the tranquil smile at first), became less and less visible, and disappeared. The applause was mechanical. Madame Burkhardt arose like a morning vapor, and clouded the horizon with an abominable song. Ole Bull broke out again, and though the shadows had shortened somewhat before he finished his second piece, there was still a lack—still but a dull acknowledgment of his glory.

We presently discovered the cause. A heavy forelock of hair, which used to drop over the forehead of the inspired Norwegian, descending "with the linked sweetness long drawn out" of a cadenza, and then tossed back like an absorbed comet with the revulsive sweep of a return to the fion-fion of the air—this expressive forelock, with the steeped sweetness of the Niagara it had overheard, and the dreams of melody it had stirred to, was gone to "— and scissors." The "sun was (the day before) shorn of his beams"—by Cristadoro! Mingled with the hair of the uninspired, that magic lock had been swept into Broadway from the floor of the indiscriminating barber, and, fallen from the heaven of harmony, is now sticking to the wheels of omnibuses in a purgatory of Sisyphus. Those in other cities who remember the toss back of that wild lock of hair in the convulsive transitions of Ole Bull's music, will understand that there must have been, emphatically, a spot missing on his luminous face.

Spite of politics and attractions elsewhere, the house was crammed; and in spite of the missing lock, Ole Bull recovered his power over the audience. The last piece he played was electric, and the curtain fell amid unlimited plaudits.

THE PAY FOR PERIODICAL-WRITING.—What a butcher would think of veal, as a marketable article, if everybody had an ambition to raise calves to give away, is very near the conclusion that a merely business-man would arrive at, on inquiring into the saleableness of fugitive literature. It is as pleasant for people not hackneyed in authorship to see their thoughts transferred to print, as it is for beauties to see their faces transferred to canvass; and, if customary, most contributors to periodicals would pay the publisher as willingly as women pay the portrait-painter. Another thing. Females are naturally facile writers, and the attention paid to the mental culture of women in our day, has set their thoughts a-flow upon paper, as the letting in of sunshine upon the dark floor of the forest draws to the surface new springs of water. These facts to begin with, the reader will easily understand the pourquoi of the unpromising literary market we have to "open up" to him.

There are several of the magazines that pay for articles, but no one of them, we believe, pays for all its contents. Graham and Godey (two men of noble liberality to authors) pay prices to some of their contributors that would far outbid the highest rates of magazine-payment in England. Their prose-writers receive from two to twelve dollars a page, and their poets from five to fifty dollars an article. The Columbian and the Ladies' Magazine also pay well. The North American Review used to think it liberal enough to pay Edward Everett a dollar a page. All the paying magazines and reviews, however, reject fifty articles to one that they accept, and they pay nobody whose "name" would not enrich their table of contents. In point of fact, but for the necessity of a brag, and the misfortune that a writer, once made famous, esteems pay a desirable manner of compliment (whether he wants the money or not), the literary periodicals in this country might do well, relying only on the editor's pen and the epidemic "cacoethes." The Mirror did so—and was as cleverly contributed to, we think, as any periodical in the country. The rejected articles (offered to us, of course, as a gratuity) would have filled, at least, a barrel a month!

Newspapers pay for reporting and editing, but seldom or never for "articles." The favor, on the contrary, of giving room and circulation to another man's ideas, is growing into a saleable commodity—the editor (on the ground that he risks the popularity of his paper by relinquishing the chance of a better article) charging rent for his columns instead of hiring a tenant. To every scheme of public interest—to every society—to everything which newspapers can binder or further—there is attached some person who is both desirous and able to present the subject forcibly on paper; and, quite as readily and zealously, if there be an objectionable side to it, springs up a pen-and-ink caviller in opposition. Between them, and with the desire to figure in print which besets very many able men, newspaper-editors need pay for little ad except eyewater and scissors, and they get credit for a world of zeal in good causes by articles they neither write nor pay for. We have got to the footboard of our Procrustes bed.

AUTHORS' PAY IN AMERICA.—We have hot coals smouldering in the ashes of "things put off," which we poke reluctantly to the surface just now—reluctantly only because we wish to light beacons for an author's crusade, and we have no leisure to be more than its Peter the Hermit. We solemnly summon Edgar A. Poe to do the devoir of Cœur de Lion—no man's weapon half so trenchant! And now let us turn the subject round, small end foremost.

These are days when gentlemen paint their own boots, and we have latterly been our own publisher. We have thereby mastered one or two statistics which, we know not well why, never looked us in the face before, and which we proceed to hold up by the nape of the neck for the encouragement of the less stuffy or less inquiring. Authors who can not find publishers, and authors who, having found them, have been as much respected by them as pig-iron by the razor-maker, are invited to "lend us their ears"—on interest.

What proportion should an author have of the net profits of a book? This seems a shallow question enough, but there is a deep hole in it. Remember, in the first place, that the author wrote the book—that God gave him the monopoly of the vein from which it is worked—that he has been at the expense and toil of an education, and to other expenses and toils—(as in travel)—that his mind's lease is far shorter than his lease of life—and that thoughtsmiths should be better paid than blacksmiths or goldsmiths (that is to say, if the credit the work does to the country goes for anything in the valuation). The question of the division of profit is between author and publisher, and the publisher gives his uneducated mental attention to the sale, a brief use of his credit for the printing and binding, and runs a most partial risk as to the result—for he need not purchase the book except in obedience to his own judgment and his readers', and the cost is paid, of course, before there are any "net receipts." (There is great capital made of this "risk," but ninety-nine books in a hundred more than clear expenses!) Now, taking a stereotyped dollar-book for example, the plates, worth four or five hundred dollars, are paid for, with a moderate sale, in the first month. Suppose it to be three months. The use of the publisher's credit for $500 for ninety days has been his only outlay of consequence; but the author has had his outlay of brain-work, time, genius, and years of education. The printing and getting up, after the plates are paid for, cost about one fifth of the retail price—twenty cents on a dollar. To charge ten cents more on each copy for the absolute expense of selling and circulating, is more than liberal; and now, how shall the remaining seventy cents—the net profit—be divided between author and publisher?

We should like to have a watchmaker's answer to that question. How much ought the jeweller to have for buying it from the maker, warranting it "to go" after examining it, for advertising it, and for selling it across a counter? Suppose the watch to sell for a hundred dollars, and seventy dollars to be the net profit above cost of material. What would you say, if the maker got but ten or twenty dollars, and the retailer fifty or sixty? Yet that is the proportion at which author and bookseller are paid for literary production—the seller of the book being paid from twice to five times as much as the author of it!

Certainly, the readiest-minded man we ever knew, as well as one of the most brilliant and highly cultivated conversationists, is Major Davezac, the subject of the anecdote below. Never was a man more out of place as a stump-orator and agitator, well as he acquits himself in these turbulent vocations. It is none of our business to discuss that point, however. We were only about to roll the anecdotal snow-ball a little larger, by recording a bon mot of the major's, at the birth of which we chanced to be present. Davezac was chargé at Naples in eighteen hundred and some time ago, and French being the language he was born in, his wit of course played freely in the court vernacular. He was quite the idol of the diplomatic corps, and an "indispensable" at all dances and masquerades. We were dining one evening in his company during the carnival. The major sat opposite to us, next to a very pretty German countess. During the procession and the pelting of sugar-plums which had occupied the early part of the day, the countess had received a slight bruise upon her cheek. Davezac wore court-plaster on his lip—a bit also from the sugared ammunition. They were both complaining. "Eh, Monsieur Davezac," said the countess, mournfully, "il faut reunir nos douleurs!"—"Oui, madam, et nos blessures!" replied the major instantly, placing his lip upon the cheek of the surprised sufferer.

COSMOPOLITE ATTRACTION IN BROADWAY.—Within a few doors, in the neighborhood of Prince street, are collected accidentally, at present, four most vivid representations of four very distant and different countries—Spain, India, Paris, and Constantinople—the "Ahmanra," the "Panorama of Madras," the "Panorama of Paris," and the new shop of "Turkish curiosities." He who wishes to realize what balloons are to do for us in '55, can astonish and confuse his geographical impressions to his entire satisfaction, by a visit to all these in one morning.

The Turkish shop has articles for sale that could seldom before be obtained except by a voyage to the Orient. We brought some curiosities from Constantinople, but we have a thousand times regretted, since, that we had not quadrupled our purchases in the bazars and bezestein—so much were the articles admired, and so impossible was it, even in the curiosity-shops of Europe, to find specimens of them. No person who is luxurious in personal habits would willingly be, for example, without the Turkish shirts—having once seen them. They are the poetry of negligé costume—the idealized romance of the drapery of dishabille. Those who have time to make a luxury of dressing-room or boudoir—the beautiful and idle of either sex—should take a look at the gossamer shirts from Constantinople. But there are all manner of things in this shop beside. There are beautiful gold-embroidered slippers, small carpets and ottoman-cloths, attars in gold bottles, gold-embroidered handkerchiefs and gilded pastilles—everything, in short, that one buys of old Mustapha, near the Hippodrome in Stamboul, confectionary included. We inquired after old Mustapha yesterday, and the Greek who keeps the shop (who was himself a confectioner in Constantinople) delighted us with talking of him, as if he had seen him yesterday! Picturesque and jolly old turbaned Mustapha!—what fun it was to have the curtain lifted by his grinning Abyssinian in anklets and wristlets, and step into the back shop to take coffee and try his essences! It quite came over us like a dream yesterday—the chat with this Broadway Constantinopolitan. If you have any curiosity, dear reader, call and taste the confectionary at this shop, and look at the translucent shirts, and see the Persian inksands, and handle the graceful cimeters, and look at the Brusa silks and seraglio slippers—in short, see Constantinople—for that is a palpable slice of it!

JUMPING THE PEW.—We were once in the gallery of a country church when an address was to be delivered to a Sunday school. The body of the house was reserved for the adult audience, and the boys were confined to one of the side aisles. There was evidently an understanding, however, that if not otherwise wanted, the well-cushioned seat facing the chancel was to be given up to as many lads as could occupy it. It would hold, perhaps, twenty, and a hundred of them were packed in the aisle like figs, waiting till the class leader at the head should "open up." Looking on with some amusement, we found our eye arrested by the bright face of a lad, half way down, who bore the keeping back very impatiently. His struggles to pass the other boys were vehement, but of no use. He was slight, and his neighbors were bold and sturdy. Presently he bit his lips, entered a pew, jumped the partition into the central aisle, and walked round to the front. There was a murmur of indignation among the boys, and a general smile among the spectators, but he secured his pick of seats. The clergyman, in the course of his address, thought proper to get up an impromptu colloquy, and, to the evident annoyance of the other boys, selected the pew-jumper, who sat just before him, for the honor. The lad arose, when questioned, and surprised the whole audience with the clearness of his replies. He sat down amid general applause, and (whatever reproof he got in private for his daring) he was the envied hero of the day. We have often since had the successful boldness of this lad recalled to our memory by the class of things it illustrates, and our mental reply, after reading a letter to which this was the preface, was—"Better jump the pew!"

Our correspondent can not get a hearing from the public! Few things are more difficult. We have not read his book, but it may be excellent snuff to keep a fame going, and yet not the stuff to start one. Genius is expected "never to go into the water till it knows how to swim"—never to expect to be read but for having been read before! With any degree of ability, more or less, it is easy to be almost hopelessly overlaid. We, ourselves, are a very humble example. We "jumped the pew" unconsciously, in England, with our furiously abused "Pencillings," and immediately sold, for the highest price, an edition of "Inklings of Adventure"—a series of tales that had fallen still-born into the lap of Boston, and for the first printing of which we paid more than a thousand dollars on our return to their birth-place. Instances of "jumping the pew" will occur to every observer of men—every reader of biography. It is the shabby door to many a path of glory. Almost every profession begins with a dilemma—hope deferred, or a pew to jump! The starving lawyer in the west, who flogged his neighbor to have a case to plead, jumped the pew!

The veteran Buckingham, one of the most judicious, able and respected editors in the country, was starving in Boston, when he "jumped the pew" with the abusive "Galaxy"—making himself read from terror till he was famous enough to be read for merit. The game is dangerous, however, and the principle lies in most questionable neighborhood. For one who would succeed in it there are ninety-nine who would fail, and failure is hopeless extinction! The pew can be jumped but once. The attention of the public can be but once summoned by a rude pluck at its beard; and, to keep attention long enough to have the rudeness forgotten, there must be merit that the public would regret overlooking—merit, indeed, of which the neglect was injury enough to justify violent extrication.

THE MIRROR STEAM-PRESS.—It would be curious not to lose sight of the Latin word, dropped for translation into the scholar's ear, till it re-appears in English on his tongue, but a half-hour's watching of the steam-press on which the Mirror is printed would be hardly a less instructive spectacle of contrivance. To complete the assimilation of the second process to the first, it would have been necessary, till lately, to employ a boy to pull the word off the scholar's tongue; but, by the ingenuity of R. HOE & Co., the great organ of public opinion is endowed with a happy delivery of its own—laying off the sheet that was printed and ready for utterance, that is to say, and drawing in its iron tongue, unaided, to be laden with the meantime coinage of another.

The improvements in printing-presses within the last ten or fifteen years are probably far less remarkable than some other progresses of mechanic invention, yet they are wonderful enough to use up quite as much curiosity as it is comfortable to find epithets for, in a day. The difference between the old Ramage press, and the steam-miracle in our present office, is peculiarly impressive to myself. There is a small bar of iron in this press which fulfils precisely the same destiny to which we were at one time devoted. We were considered in an exemplary line of life while performing exactly its office—that of inking the type—during a long year of disgust with Latin—(when a sensible papa took us at our word, and allowed us to prefer a trade to a satchel!)

The ink was in those days kept in a wooden box, and, with two stuffed leather balls, a boy or man, beside the press, distributed it over the face of the type, while the pressman was fixing the sheet for the impression. We remember balling an edition of "Watts's Psalms and Hymns," which it took weeks to print, and, by the same token, there are lines in that good book of which we caught glimpses on the "frisket," that, to this day, go to the tune we played with the ink-balls while conning them over! Reviving ambition sent us back to school, however, and invention soon after superseded the ink-boy's elbows (encumbered with a stomach), by a bit of machinery that neither required to be fed, nor committed verses to memory while inking the type! This getting rid of the boy was the peculiarity of the Smith press, and then followed the Napier press, which dispensed with the man, and needed only the tending of two girls or boys; and now (thanks to Mr. Hoe), we have a steam-press, which puts up three iron fingers for a sheet of white paper, pulls it down into its bosom, gives it a squeeze that makes an impression, and then lays it into the palm of an iron hand which deposits it evenly on a heap—at the rate of two thousand an hour! We often stop with curiosity to look at the little arrangement which does the work our elbows have ached with, and we think the Mirror press altogether is a sight worth your coming to see, dear reader!

THE FIRST DAY OF THE WORLD'S NEW LEASE was clasped upon the last yesterday of the completed series, by as glorious a retiring moon, and as brilliant a rising sun, as were ever coveted by the "old gray-beard," at whose funeral they are to be the expiring candles. A finer night than last night—a finer day than to-day—never relieved watch upon the "tented heavens." We stood looking up a steeple from our bed-room window at midnight (having first finished an article for to-day's paper, upon the venture of its being wanted), and we stood shaving at the same window when the gold smile of the unexpected sunrise called upon the surprised weather-cock to look about him as usual! We, therefore, certify to the world's coming honestly by its "situation." Go about your business, oh, mankind!

Coming down the front steps of the Astor, at half-past six, we naturally enough took a look up Broadway, to see if, perchance, some blessed change in the pavement might not give the first sign of a new Jerusalem. But if the sapphire paviers had called upon Mayor Harper, he had struck at something in the contract. The old holes were there, with stones of the accustomed complexion—(chafed "trap," mineralogically speaking)—and the mud evidently unaware of a miracle. But, hey! now! WHAT! a rainbow across Broadway? Could we believe our eyes?—a many-colored arch completely spanning the street, hung with flowers, and men walking over it!!! Was an advent forthcoming, after all?

While we write, that Advent is in progress! It is the ADVENT OF YOUTH—JUVENOCRACY IN THE ASCENDANT! A flowery arch spans the breadth of Broadway, and under it winds, at this moment, the procession in honor of first maturity—manhood in youth! It scarce needed, it is true, that the world should be born again before its new monarch should make formal entry. It was, ten years ago, discovered in France—two years ago in England—last year in America—that the gray head was only the wisest while there were no books but experience! That which men once waited to know till the hair was silvered, is now taught the child at school—conned in the ambitious dream of the youth in his puberty. The world has "hung fire" in other ages, from the damp of burnt-out enthusiasm spread like a blanket over its brain-powder. Improvement has gone upon crutches. Action waited for enterprise to cough. Courage stayed to fumble for spectacles. The forenoon shadows of the sun of human intellect were of untrustworthy measure, and the dial to begin to work by was shadowed till post-meridian!

Without touching upon the political articulation in "the roar of the Young Lion," we MARK THE EPOCH—the epoch of "Young France," "Young England," "Young America!" We could show, had we time, how strikingly the peculiar habits of our land have more prepared us than other countries, for the sovereignty of YOUTH! We have no time now. We must go forth with the crowd and see the bright cheek and curling beard of the Young Monarch in his hour of triumph. The cannon are pealing! The drums shake upon the prophetic sunshine in the air!

"Hail to the" YOUTH "that in triumph advances!"

12 o'clock.—We have been to Broadway. The procession is soon to form. The mounted marshals of the day are galloping to and fro with their ribanded insignia—the pictorial outside of the Museum is perfectly embroidered with petticoats (a charming relief!)—the windows on both sides of Broadway are crammed with gayly-dressed spectators—the 500 Boston young men (fine, wholesome-looking fellows, who certainly do credit to their "parsley bed"), are assembled with their badges in front of the Astor—the town is full of what the ladies would call "handsome young strangers"—the omnibuses carry flags—the whole street, from the triumphal arch to the pinnacles of Trinity, looks impassable with the glittering crowd. We never saw comparable preparation for a festal march. It will be a day to be remembered—mocked at, perhaps, as the first after a millennial crisis, but glorified as the first in the great era of Youthfulness!

MASS MEETING OF NEWSBOYS.—We may be permitted, perhaps, to please our friends with the announcement that we at least stand well upon the sidewalk! The exhaustion of our large edition at four o'clock, yesterday afternoon, and a general return of the newsboys from their routes with eager demands for more, occasioned a multitudinous holding of counsel among those piping potentates, and to the astonishment of our corner and the neighborhood, the assembled varlets actually gave the Evening Mirror three cheers! We bow to the tattered vox populi, and own the soft impeachment. Gentlemen newsboys! give us your hand (with a newspaper between!) and permit us to offer you a business suggestion. Astonish one of your insinuating number with a white shirt, and try the new trick of selling us with a smile to the ladies! Call him the ladies' boy, and treat him delicately when he is dressed and can't afford the results of your familiarity! Your powerful body amounts at present to some three or four hundred, and your profits will soon tempt the competition of older gentlemen, unless you find more worlds to conquer. Hurrah for the ladies, gentlemen (waving whatever you have to represent a pocket-handkerchief)—and now, if you will graciously withdraw your attention, we would speak to those over whom you have the advantage of youth.

We have to thank the press all over the country for the most flattering mention and the kindest encouragement. Our own craft seem to love us. We thought of quoting some of their felicitous notices, but our grateful pride would thus fall into a shape used for puffing, and we shrink from the medium. Thanks to our friends—simply but fervently.

GOLD INKSTAND TO THE AUTORESS OF THE SCOTTISH CHIEFS.—The works of JANE PORTER have probably brought more money into the hands of booksellers than those of any writer except, perhaps, Scott, and at this moment steam-presses are employed in printing large editions of her delightful novels. An enthusiastic man, a great admirer of Miss Porter, has, for the second time, started a subscription among the booksellers of this city to present her with a gold inkstand, and the Harpers, Appletons, Langleys, and others, have subscribed with enthusiastic liberality. Perhaps a description of Jane Porter with a little of her hitherto unwritten history may not be unacceptable.

MISS PORTER was the daughter of a gallant English officer, who died, leaving a widow, and three children, then very young, but all destined to remarkable fame SIR ROBERT KER PORTER, JANE PORTER, and ANNA MARIA PORTER. Sir Robert, as is well known, was the celebrated historical painter, traveller in Persia, soldier, diplomatist, and author, lately deceased. He went to Russia with one of his great pictures when very young, married a wealthy Russian princess, and passed his subsequent years between the camp and diplomacy, honored and admired in every station and relation of his life. The two girls were playmates and neighbors of Walter Scott. Jane published her "Scottish Chiefs" at the age of eighteen, and became immediately the great literary wonder of her time.

Her widowed mother, however, withdrew her immediately from society to the seclusion of a country town, and she was little seen in the gay world of London before several of her works had become classics. Anna Maria, the second sister, commenced her admirable series of novels soon after the first celebrity of Jane's works, and they wrote and passed the brightest years of their life together in a cottage retreat. The two sisters were singularly beautiful. Sir Thomas Lawrence was an unsuccessful suitor to Anna Maria, and Jane (said by Sir Martin Shee to have been the handsomest woman he ever saw) was engaged to a young soldier who was killed in the Peninsula. She is a woman to have but one love in a lifetime. Her betrothed was killed when she was twenty years of age, and she has ever since worn mourning, and remained true to his memory. Jane is now the only survivor of her family, her admirable mother and her sister having died some twelve or fourteen years ago, and Sir Robert having died lately, while revisiting England after many years' diplomatic residence in Venezuela.

Miss Porter is now near sixty. She has suffered within the last two or three years from ill-health, but she is still erect, graceful, and majestic in person, and still possessed of admirable beauty of countenance. Her large dark eyes have a striking lambency of lustre, her smile inspires love in all who see her, and her habit of mind, up to the time we last saw her (three or four years ago), was that of reflecting the mood of others in conversation, thinking never of herself, and endeavoring only to make others shine, and all this with a tact, a playfulness and simplicity, an occasional unconscious brilliancy and penetration, which have made her, up to sixty years of age, a most interesting, engaging, and lovely woman. We have had the good fortune to pass several months, at different times, under different hospitable roofs, with Jane Porter, and, considering the extent of her charm, over old and young, titled and humble, masters and servants, we sincerely think we never have seen a woman so beloved and so fascinating. She is the idol of many different circles of very high rank, and passes her time in yielding, month after month, to pressing invitations from the friends who love her. The dowager queen Adelaide is one of her warmest friends, the highest families of nobility contend for her as a resident guest, distinguished and noble foreigners pay court to her invariably on arriving in England, she has been ennobled by a decree of the king of Prussia, and with all this weight of honor on her head, you might pass weeks with her (ignorant of her history) without suspecting her to be more than the loveliest of women past their prime, and born but to grace a contented mediocrity of station.

This is an impartial and truthful sketch of the celebrated person for whom the above-mentioned compliment is intended. We trust it may find her alive, and with her accustomed bright smile upon her lips—God guard and preserve her!

ROCKING-CHAIR vice INKSTAND resigned. We gave, "by authority," an account of a subscription paper, the purpose of which was to present to Jane Porter an inkstand of gold. Our publisher-mayor Mr. Harper, headed the list with $40. We wrote a paragraph on the subject, and the same evening were called to see a rocking-chair into which the inkstand had been suddenly converted by a rub against the Aladdin's lamp of propriety. We went into Meek's museum of sumptuous furniture, and the chair was disrobed, for us, of a beautiful chintz cover presented to Miss Porter by Messrs. Meeks, the makers. The chair is a bijou. The model is appropriately Elizabethan—(a chair for the virgin queen of English romance, made in the style of the virgin queen of English history)—the carving in rosewood relief, and the lining of crimson velvet. The exact model of the chair was sent to Queen Victoria not long since, as a specimen of American furniture, by a club of English gentlemen. The cadeau goes out consigned by the mayor of New York to the lord-mayor of London, for his worshipful presentation. Mr. Griswold, the packet owner, giving it an honorary passage. The following letter, written on parchment and sealed with the city arms, accompanies it:—

"NEW YORK, October 28, 1844.

"DEAR MADAM: The undersigned, booksellers, publishers, and authors, of the city of New York, have long felt desirous of transmitting to you a memorial of the high and respectful admiration which they entertain for one to whose pen we are indebted for some of the purest and most imaginative productions in the wide range of English literature. As the authoress of 'Thaddeus of Warsaw,' the 'Scottish Chiefs,' &c., your name has spread over the length and breadth of our land, and the volumes of your delightful works may be found gracing alike the abodes of the wealthy, and the humble dwellings of the poor. And deservedly so—for if purity of sentiment, felicity of expression, and the constant inculcation of the noblest lessons of religion and morality, be any passport to literary fame, then will the name of Miss Porter rank high on the list of those whom the present age delights to honor, and for whom coming ages will entertain a deep feeling of reverential esteem.

"Regarding you, therefore, as that one among the writers of our time who first opened up the path that has been since further embellished by the kindred genius of a Scott, we take the liberty, as well on our own behalf as in the name of thousands of American readers to whom your charming productions have taught, in so graceful and captivating a manner, the lessons of true virtue, of presenting you with the accompanying testimonial of our sincere and grateful esteem.

"We have the honor to remain, dear madam,

"Your obedient servants,

"JAMES HARPER, Mayor of New York,

W. H. APPLETON, DANIEL APPLETON,

CHAS. S. FRANCIS, S. B. COLLINS,

HARPER & BROTHERS."

We have still another light to throw upon this famous chair. The Wood, without which it might not have been built, did not come from the West Indies in planks of amyris balsamifera (rosewood), but from Canandaigua, in the shape of a gentleman whose heart distils a better balsam—of courtesy! We first heard of Mr. Wood and the proposed presentation of an instand, from Miss Porter herself. She inquired whether we knew Mr. Wood, and gave us the history of his project to compliment her, apropos of promising us a sight of barrels of presents which had showered upon her from all parts of the world. She expressed a most simple-hearted delight in the extent of her American reputation, and wished to see a copy of one of the American editions.

On our return to this country we found a small copy of the "Scottish Chiefs," almost illegible with grease and thumbing, in the kitchen of a remote tavern in Pennsylvania. We sent it to her with a little water added unintentionally to its romance—having fallen overboard with it in our pocket while ferrying a skiff across the Susquehannah. By the way, let us here record an act of liberality in an English publisher, which is apropos of this present from the American bibliopoles. We were one day requested by Mr. George Virtue, the enterprising publisher of the American Scenery, to be the bearer of a message to Miss Porter. He wished to publish her Scottish Chiefs in a beautifully-embellished edition. The copy-right, by English law limiting duration, had long since expired—but Mr. Virtue wished to give Miss Porter £200—one thousand dollars—for her formal consent. The check was sent the next day, and the edition, one of the most superb specimens of embellished edition in the language, is since completed.

The old proverb says of a burn,

"Rub it to Wood,
It will come to good,"

and we had a burn at our fingers' end as to the real mover's getting his share of the credit of this compliment to Miss Porter. There is little enough enthusiasm for others' glory in the world—little enough to prevent all fear of surfeit by mention. We have recorded, therefore, against his express orders, the disinterested zeal of WILLIAM WOOD in this matter.

THE OVERCOAT DILEMMA.—We have received a note from a dismayed tailor in a thriving inland town of Massachusetts, begging us, "for charity's sake," to inform him "what is the fashion for overcoats." He protests that the models sent him from the city are inelegant and unbecoming—and he begs us to inquire of some dandy, regnant or ci-devant, as to the existence, among knowing men, of some other habilliment more becoming than the prevailing type. This is our summing up of his wishes as expressed in a letter of three pages.

Before venturing to tamper with so ticklish a subject, let us fortify the ground by an extract from a very grave and well-considered lecture on the "Changes of the Fashions," lately delivered before a lyceum in Portsmouth:—

Although the inventors of new fashions and the leaders in them are highly culpable for the injury they do society—yet nine tenths of those whom we see in fashionable attire are persons on whom no imputation can be cast: neither is there one in a hundred of their dressmakers or tailors, hatters or cord-wainers, who are deserving a breath of censure for doing their work in a fashionable style. So powerful an impetus has been moving the fashionable world, that no individual can with safety hold up a resisting band. Nothing but a combined strength can overcome it.

Common sense asks—why is it that a coat of a few years' standing, with a broad back and long waist, which the prudent man has kept for his holyday wear, is not as really valuable as one in which the seams are more nearly allied, or the buttons placed in a different position?

Public opinion replies—the man is not in fashion. The observers point him out among the multitude—"There is a sample of old times!"—"There goes a miser who can't afford a new coat!" and a soft voice whispers as he passes—"I wonder who would have that old-fashioned man!" How frequently is the public sympathy excited for an adroit rogue in fashionable attire, who has received the just sentence of the law—while the poorly-clad culprit by his side, not more guilty, passes almost unpitied to the gal-lows.

Thus to be out of fashion a man is generally regarded as wanting in spirit or purse; and it becomes a matter of necessity for a modest man, who wishes to elude the notice of the world, to follow along in the wake of fashion. However much a person in common life may be disgusted with its fluctuations, he must bear the imputation of vanity, and in some degree lose his influence in society, if he either has a new dress made in an old style, or for convenience appears in any new clothing which is made more with a view to general utility than in subservience to fashion.

With this warrant for giving a grave opinion on the subject, we proceed to huddle together our kersey-mere ideas as follows:—

The sack-coat belongs to the climate of England, and is wholly desorienté in this country. It was invented as a kind of body-umbrella in which elegant men could pass unwet from club to cab, in that climate of eternal moisture, and was never meant to be used but as a garment of transit. A dandy bien pointu in his kid and varnish extremities, may certainly walk the street safely in a sack-coat, as his quality would be known by his gloves and boots only, were he otherwise parenthesized in a barrel. But, unless redeemable by the point of his boot or a finger of his glove, no man is "dressed" in a sack. By universally making sack-coats of coarse cloth in England, they class them very definitely with hackney-coaches and umbrellas—temporary conveniences of which the material is by no means a point of honor.

In England, however, dandies dress to drive, and in this country they dress to walk, and, of course, it is more important here that the street coat should be becoming to the shape than is thought necessary in England. The paletot (for a description of which see "Scott's" authentic "Mirror of Fashion") is becoming to men of fine carriage, and the "Tagliioni," when cut into the back adroitly, is becoming to slender figures. In the present anarchy of overcoat, however, every man can choose for himself, and our pastoral querist of the shears, we venture to assure him, is perfectly safe in first suiting his customers, and then swearing it to be the fashion. We would just hint, in conclusion, that there is a mixture of cloak and overcoat that we have seen on a "slap-up" man lately from Paris, and this chanced to hit our weakness. Any man who has genius in his shears will require no broader hint of what the combination looks like!

YOUNG MEN'S PROCESSION.—The procession of yesterday, was less remarkable for its numbers (estimated at 3,000) than for the unusual interest taken in it by the spectators—the enthusiasm of the ladies and more quiet lookers-on, and the boundless heartiness of the cheers by the people in the streets. The quality of the general feeling, to our thinking, was more nearly up to the warmth of the Lafayette Ovation, than any procession that has taken place since. We remarked, also, that in the escorts and cavalcade, there was a large mixture of fashionable young men, which is a new feature in the public processions of this city. There were also more clergymen, who had errands in town and about the streets, than usual—the white cravat in rather uncommon proportion. Altogether, we think the bed of this new party has a longer and broader blanket—covering higher toward the fastidious public head, and falling more kindly upon the serviceable public feet—than any new-party blanket spread within our recollection. Youth is beloved. Its hopes are contagious. Its opinions are supposed free from selfishness. Its ardor is credited with inspiration. The party of youth, whenever it is combined for one object, must triumph, it seems to us—for it carries with it an outside atmosphere of electric sympathies exclusively its own, while, within, it has the energy of enthusiastic first manhood, and confidence unsubdued by experience.

OPENING OF THE RAILROAD TO WHITE PLAINS.—The first rush of blood through the heart of Pygmalion's statue, and the first rush of a rail-car, on Saturday, through the bosom of the Bronx valley, would seem to us a well-matched fable and fact, were not the fact, both as a surprise and a change, more electric than the fable. To realize it, one must get at the way it is looked at by the rustic dwellers in the plains beyond. They were called upon to believe that a city which has, all their lives, been four hours distant, "good driving," would, after the forthcoming celebration, be slid up to within one hour, "easy going." Their potatoes are to glide to market, and coal and groceries to glide back, with magical facility—their women-folks are to go to town, stop and get home between dinner and supper—the morning newspapers are to arrive from New York a little after breakfast—the citizens are to come out by hundreds for an afternoon walk—New York, in short, is four times as near as it used to be, only the land is not knocked away between! A gentleman told us, just before the cars started on their return, from White Plains, that the country-people, around, were not only incredulous as to the completion of the road, up to the time of the arrival of the cars, but that they still (6 o'clock P. M.) looked upon the whole affair—celebration, train, music and guns—as a humbug that could never hold out—got up for some Millerite or political hocus-pocus, and to end only in the ruin of their credulous neighbors!

To start fair, however. We were invited to join the worshipful society of aldermen, bank-directors, stockholders, and judiciary, who, on Saturday afternoon, were to invade, for the first time, by public railroad, the virgin seclusion of the White Plains. The access, through the valley of the Bronx, promised something attractive in the way of landscape, and there was a pull out of town in the soft air of the morning. We were at the cars punctually at one, found a friend inside, and a band of music a-top, and rolled away from the City Hall with a double momentum—steam to draw the cars, and the gentlemen in the cars who are drawn on for the steam! We went on our musical way through Centre street, embellishing it (by the beauty attracted to the chamber-windows) as the moon brightens the clouds in passing through, and with a momentary chill from the deserted propriety of streets up-town, were soon in the fields—fields by the way, which are secured to Nature and shorn of their chief value (nearness to town) by the railroad which makes fields beyond quite as come-at-able.

We gave Harlem an outbreak of music in passing through, stopped a moment at Williams' bridge, where the road has hitherto terminated, and then proceeded upon the new track through the Bronx valley.* The scenery for the next twelve miles was as primitive and fresh as if a three-days' journey lay between it and a great city—the most unconscious looking old water-mills on the stream, the woods and hill-sides with a look most innocent of snob and suburb, and a universal gape of amazement on the faces of cottagers and their cows. The seclusion and thorough country of the whole twelve miles were enchanting, and we promised ourselves a ramble to twenty successive nooks that we saw (and twenty successive times of course had occasion to remember that we had' become a utensil of daily use, labelled "never to be taken out of the kitchen!") We are sorry to say the grass will probably do pretty well without us, now, till we disturb it to ask leave to pass under.)

The hill-sides suddenly fell back and we glided into an open plain, where two or three hundred rustic-looking people were assembled—six or seven of them busy on a knoll near by, ramming a welcome up a gun. The report rang as the engine stopped, and—White Plains was cosmopolized! Out jumped Wall street and City Hall. An old negro and his very old wife commenced furiously opening oysters at a bench near by. The cars stood in the middle of a corn-field. The country people gathered around and looked hard at the boots of the company. Two or three barrels of crackers were rolled over the corn-hills to a new stable building in the field. Everybody from the city seemed exclusively occupied with smelling the ploughed ground. Horses were tied to the fences all about. The landscape (breasted with fine, fertile hills, and having the White Plains for its lap), was slumbering in a soft haze, with just sunshine enough to content a man who would be contented without it, and altogether the scene was simple and fresh near by, and the distance more picturesque than the name of "White Plains" had suggested.

On the floor of the new barn, half boarded and nearly shingled, were spread four long tables, laden with a very profuse and substantial repast, and, in fifteen minutes after arrival, the president was in his place, and the stockholders and their guests seated and "in a fair way" to be enthusiastic. After a round or two of champagne, the president's health was drank and his report called for—but we will give the statistics in another paragraph.

Pretty sure of hearing the report and reading the speeches "in the way of business," we accepted the invitation of Mr. Lyon, and drove to his beautiful residence, near by—a Gothic cottage of most absolute taste, a sketch of which we had seen in the new edition of "Downing's Rural Architecture." It is enough to make one doubt all the ills of life to see such a place to pass it in. The table-land of the White Plains lies behind the house, and a valley—folded slope over slope, and sunk, knoll below knoll—drops away from the lawn in front, showing miles of wild-wood and fertile fields, with a shady glen leading away to the left—the whole combination, for an inland view, unsurpassed in variety and beauty. The cottage is in the Tudor style, faultless within and without. We wish we had time and space to say more of it and its surroundings. We should add that Mr. Lyon has been the zealous apostle of the road, and that a procession was formed after the collation to make him a complimentary visit. They went to his house, preceded by the band, but were unfortunately missed by Mr. Lyon, who was conducting his friends back by a shorter path across the fields.

The White Plains moon rose to see us off, and as we got under way with music and cheers, she added another full face to the gazing rustics, and, when last seen, was apparently climbing up on a barrel to look over the spectators' shoulders. As she was in town when we arrived at half past nine, and as there were no ladies invited by the directors, she must have got a ride somehow behind, and whatever the conductor may say (for we know her well!) the paying her passage was probably "all moonshine."

LABOR AND BRAINS.—We hear much about "protection for labor," and very little about protection for brains—(except in the way of a hat). The working men, those who use their hands skilfully and industriously, have many advocates of their claims. The politicians and the law-makers and the newspaper press, take up their cause loudly and sincerely, but those who "can not dig," who are "ashamed to beg" and have nothing but their brains—their intellect, to depend upon—are whistled down the wind, "the prey to fortune."

One class of these luckless personages, is that of editors and assistant editors, and their remuneration is not only inadequate, generally speaking, to their support, but far below their real merit. What would the newspaper press of this city be but for these men? Nothing! They are the indirect means of giving a livelihood to thousands, and are never thanked for it. For example. We know of a newspaper in this city which owes its success to a small corps of editors, whose whole pay is about two thousand dollars per annum. If they should withdraw their aid, the paper would stop beyond a question.

Let us see what their brains do for others. The paper-makers receive from the establishment, $18,000 a year. The compositors receive about $10,000 more—the reporters and clerks about $3,000 more. The type-makers and ink-manufacturers about $2,000 more. And this expenditure goes on from year to year. It would be utterly impossible for this $32,000 to be received and expended in this way, but for the talent and tact of two or three persons connected with the paper. A large number of persons is actually supported by their brains, and yet there is not one among the number thus supported, who does not think his own personal labor and toil, far more important and praiseworthy than that of the men who actually furnish them with employment! This is the justice of the world! This is the result of the ridiculous notions prevailing, that the lifting of the sledge-hammer is more deserving of reward than the skill which guides its blows. Mechanical labor of all kinds is better paid than literary labor, and it is time that just impressions prevailed on this subject. Let us honor the working men, but when they are aided by talent and literary industry, they should honor them in return.

The editorial corps are making the fortunes of many newspaper and magazine establishments in this country, and yet many men of talent are starving under the effort.

PORTRAIT OF WORDSWORTH BY HENRY INMAN.—Without wishing to compare our great painter to a worm—except as having used up one system (of artistic ideas) and being fairly on wing in a new one—we think the worm in chrysalis and its emergent new creature very fair types of the Inman that was, in America, and the Inman that is, in England. Before this time we think he would have gone abroad prematurely. Genius requires to complete its first identity—to ripen fully—to acquire the perfection of command over, and familiarity with, its in-born peculiarities—before trusting itself in a sphere which is both removed from habit and aids to concentration, and bewildering with the glitter and supremacy of other models. No matter what the pursuit, there is a natural mental chrysalis—a time after completed manhood, when a change of scene, change of habits, change of influences, external and internal, renew the life of both mind and body, open chambers in the soul hitherto unseen, and incredibly beautify and enrich the whole existence. How many painters have we seen confirmed into tame copyists—crushed by the weight of the masters above them—by going abroad with a new-born style just struggling into shape and seeming of its own! In a minor way, how many characters are smothered by being forced into a too trying element of society before completing their natural idiosyncrasy!

Power went abroad at the right stage of his existence as a sculptor—Grenonagh, perhaps, too early. Inman might, possibly, have gone earlier, with equal advantage. He has been, for some time, gaining little in his art. The easily-given and ill-weighed praise of our country had long ago satiated him. He had little stimulus beyond the profit of his pencil. But the mind that lies fallow under such torpor, ripens and collects richness under the surface, and ploughed again, before it is mastered by weeds and tangle, it shows wondrous fertility and vigor.

We have put down, now, what passed through our mind while looking yesterday at a head of Wordsworth, which is just received from Inman. It is a masterly piece of work, though but a sketch. The truth to nature convinces you that it is an infallible portrait, without your ever having seen the original. It is Wordsworth. It is the shell of the meat in his books. His feeblenesses and his philosophic simplicities are there. You see how he came to write what we have read. He has done his own portrait—a faithful copy, in poetry, of the same as this on canvas. Majestic and weak, wise and silly, far-sighted and credulous old man! He looks like his poetry, and to a man who could read characters as some do, there would be nothing new in his books after seeing Inman's picture, nor any surprise in Inman's picture, after seeing his books.

What will Broadway be like, with omnibuses excluded, and two lines of railcars plying its entire length? Where will the tracks be?—both in the middle, or one on each side? If the latter, how will carriages stand by the sidewalk with safety? If the former, will there be room left for two carriages to pass each other on either side? Will not the frequent taking-up and setting-down of passengers, and the consequent hinderance of cars behind, make the passage up and down tediously slow? These are questions that, with sundry others on the same subject, will furnish table-talk to the city for the ensuing week—the announcement of the corporation's intention to have a railroad there being yesterday made public. Let us mumble about it a little. The slowness of the motion would justify a very narrow track. By placing the seats lengthwise, and back to back, the cars themselves might be made very narrow, and with a roof overhead, and no sides (or sides removable in fair weather), passengers might easily jump on and off, and be sufficiently protected. They will probably stop for passengers at the crossings only. The fare will be taken by a boy inside, as soon as the passenger is seated, to prevent delay. We shall have the comfort (sitting back to back) of not becoming so compulsively acquainted with anybody's face, breath, knees, and umbrella. Our chances of being the subject of a coroner's inquest will be diminished 100 per cent.—the present rate and manner of omnibus-driving having (we presume) nearly doubled the cost of life-insurance to those who live in the upper part of the city. There will probably be fast lines established in the streets nearly parallel to Broadway, and the great tide of human life, now concentrated in one thoroughfare, will be divided into three. McNair & Scarpa, and other sellers of "acoustic oil," will languish under the suspended deafening of Broadway, and that charming lounge will be once more susceptible of enjoyment by walk and talk. The danger of prying off a wheel upon the railtrack, or coming in contact with the cars, will deter the timid from taking their carriages into Broadway, and we shall meet all the pretty shopperesses on foot (the greatest Amelia-ration)! The "Kipp & Brown" buses will be obliged to come down Church street, and have their terminus at the corner of Fulton street and Broadway—or (query?) will the lower part of Broadway, between the Park and Bowling-green, be necessarily left open to the converging lines from east and west?

"Taglioni is coming to this country." So say the papers; and if it prove true, we shall see the difference between the apparent efforts of a football and a balloon—between common and rarefied air (in manner as well as in motion)—between a smile which, beautifully dissected from the muscles that might else move it, is left stereotyped upon the face, and a smile timid, natural, and impulsive—in short, the difference between the "divine Fanny" and the womanly Taglioni. (We prefer a woman to "a divinity" any day!) Like all women permitted to be desirably famous, Taglioni paid the inexorable penalty of being undesirably mated. She has amassed a fortune or two from the "gold dust" at the toe of her white slipper—dissipated, they say, without pity, by her husband, and she has at last cut him (in toto), and goes entirely upon her own legs. We hope they and the Cunard paddles will, indeed, bring her to this country. In seeing any other stage-exhibition, one is conscious of the seat he sits on and the trouble of holding his hat. To see Taglioni is to be in a trance, during which one might almost be content with the seat of St. Lawrence—on a gridiron. We shall remember (talking of seats), "while memory holds her seat" (and has any pleasure in sitting on it), the first performance of La Sylphide at Paris—by far the most entrancing and intoxicating spectacle we ever witnessed. We venture to refer the reader to our description of it in "Pencilings." We wonder whether Taglioni will come! Echo—"come!"

MAJOR NOAH AND HIS APOLOGY FOR THE CRUCIFIXION.—Our friend, the lecturer on the Restoration, has written us a letter, phrased with great forbearance and kindness, but finding grievous fault with our yesterday's notice of his discourse at the Tabernacle. His letter is too long to publish, as he requests, but we will give its substance, and leave out only his expressions of good will. He says he "understood from a friend that we were fast asleep before the lecture commenced, and slept throughout the whole of it." With his letter, the major sent us a copy of the Mirror with the objectionable passages of our report underlined. Here they are:—

"Major Noah arose and commenced with an apology for the Jews as to the crucifixion of our Savior." "With the exception of his very adroit disparagement of the Savior," &c., &c.

Some extracts from the lecture, copied from his MS. into the Express, were also sent us by the major, and we extract the page which, in the delivery, impressed us as represented in our objectionable sentences.

"The Jews were amazed, perplexed, and bewildered at all they saw and heard. They knew Jesus from his birth: he was their neighbor; they knew his father Joseph, and Mary his mother, his brothers, James and Judas; he was in constant intercourse with his brethren in their domestic relations, and surrounded by their household gods; they remembered him a boy, disputing, as was the custom, most learnedly with the doctors in the temple; as a man pursuing to the age of thirty, the modest and laborious calling of his profession; and yet he proclaimed himself the Son of God, and performed most wonderful miracles, was surrounded by a number of disciples, poor, but extraordinary gifted men, who sustained his doctrines, and had an abiding faith in his mission; he gathered strength and followers as he progressed; he denounced the whole nation, and prophesied its destruction, with their altars and temples; he preached against whole cities, and proscribed their leaders with a force which, even at this day, would shake our social systems. The Jews became alarmed at his increasing power and influence, and the Sanhedrim resolved to become his accuser, and bring him to trial under the law as laid down in the 13th of Deuteronomy.

"In reflecting deeply on all the circumstances of this, the most remarkable trial and judgment in history, I am convinced, from the whole tenor of the proceedings, that the arrest, trial, and condemnation of Jesus of Nazareth, was conceived and executed under a decided panic."

Now it seemed to us, and it seems to us (for we are wide awake now), that to represent the Son of God, while on a mission from Jehovah for the salvation of a world, made the victim of a "decided panic"—the "earth quaking, the rocks rent, the sun darkened, the graves opened, and the veil of the temple rent in twain," as the consequence of a "decided panic," under the influence of which the Jews had crucified one whom they "knew as a boy," and as an industrious laborer—this does seem to us a "disparagement of the Savior," and of the dignity of his mission, and it does seem to us as intended to "apologise for the Jews." What other aim or relevancy has this very new and original reason for the crucifixion, but to apologise for the act?

As this is the "first time for centuries" that the Jews have had an apologist, our readers will be interested to know more particularly how the crucifixion is defended. We therefore yield to our own wish, and give the following more extended extract from Major Noah's lecture, underlining those passages which we offensively described as "adroit disparagement," and "apology for the Jews":—

"The title of God was a title of power and dominion, and frequently was conferred by the Almighty himself on earthly rulers. 'See, I have made thee a God to Pharaoh,' as God supreme said to Moses. Son of God was a title frequently conferred on those of distinguished piety and learning, and on those possessing the emanations of the divinity, and this title the apostles themselves carry out in their writings.

"The Son," "My Son," not the Father; the humanity, not the divinity, the image of the invisible God, not the invisible God himself; and as Paul said, there is one God and one mediator between God and man. Could the Almighty delegate a mediatorial character to any one on earth? Who can doubt it? God said to Moses, 'Behold, I send an angel before thee to keep thee in the way; provoke him not, for he will not pardon your transgressions, for my name is in him; my spirit is in him.' It was not therefore altogether on the charge of Jesus having called himself Son of God, that the Sanhedrim accused and condemned him; political considerations mingled themselves, and in a measure controlled the decision of the council, and this is demonstrable from the declaration of Caiaphas himself, as stated in the Gospel: 'Better that one man should die than that the nation should be destroyed.'

"It was the sedition, and not altogether the blasphemy, the terror and apprehension of political overthrow, which led to conviction, and this political and national characteristic was maintained throughout; it was that consideration which induced the Jews to urge upon Pilate a confirmation of the sentence. It was the charge of assuming the prerogatives of Cesar, not the name of the Divinity, which overcame the well-founded objections of the Roman governor, and crucifixion itself was a Roman and not a Jewish punishment. The opprobrious insults heaped upon the master came from the Roman soldiers, and that mixed rabble, which, even in our day, desecrate all that is held sacred.

"I place these most absorbing events before you, my countrymen, not to contrast things sacred with those which are profane, but that you should understand the exact position of the Jews at that time; their painful situation, their prostrate condition, their timidity, their hesitation, without even a ray of hope; a people so venerable for their antiquity, so beloved and protected for their fidelity, on the very threshold of political destruction.

"It is not my duty to condemn the course of our ancestors, nor yet to justify the measures they adopted in that dire extremity; but if there are mitigating circumstances, I am bound by the highest considerations which a love of truth and justice dictates, to spread them before you, at the same time to protest against any entailing upon us, the responsibility of acts committed eighteen hundred years ago by our fathers, and thus transmit to untold generations the anger and hatred of a faith, erroneously taught to believe us the aggressors.

"The Jews, my friends, were but the instruments of a higher power, and in rejecting Jesus of Nazareth, we have a great and overwhelming evidence of the infinite wisdom of the Almighty. Had they acknowledged him as their Messiah at that fearful crisis, the whole nation would have gradually sunk under the Roman yoke, and we should have had at this day paganism and idolatry, with all their train of terrible evils, and darkness and desolation would have spread over the earth. But the death of Jesus was the birth of Christianity; the Gentile church sprang from the ruins which surrounded its primitive existence; its march was onward, beset with darkness and difficulties, with oppression and persecution, until the Sun of Reformation rose upon it, dissipating the clouds of darkness which had obscured its beauties, and it shone forth with a liberal and tolerant brightness, such as the Great Master had originally designed it. Had not that event occurred, how would you have been saved from your sins? The Jews in this did nothing but what God himself ordained, for you will find it written in the Acts of the Apostles, 'And now, brethren, I know that through ignorance ye did it, as did also your rulers!'

We leave it to any Gentile (saved by the "decided political panic" of the Jews under Caiaphas), whether it was not reasonable enough—at least for a man "fast asleep"—to fancy he could detect in the above argument, an "apology for the Jews," and a "disparagement of the Savior." We were quite too fast asleep to detect anything else!

No, dear major, we were not "asleep" when this was delivered! Our head was down—for you had two unshaded lamps, looking like blazing earrings, on either side of your benevolent head, and our eyes are as weak as your heartstrings—but we went to the Tabernacle, not only with the interest of friendship for yourself, but with high excitement in the unparalleled background of your theme! We could not tell you, without a seeming rhapsody—we could not trust ourself to record, out of blank verse—the scope your subject seemed to possess, the tragic sublimity of your position, the climax of events you wished to be instrumental in bringing to a close, and the interest that might be awakened in the Christian world by an eloquent, life-devoted, fervent apostle of the restoration! There is no theme for eloquence with a thousandth part of the pathos, depth, splendor, and present convergency of this! Heavens! what a theme! The key of the whole Christian era! The winding up of a cycle of two thousand years numbered from the crucifixion! The close of the one expiation which is the theme of scripture-prophecy, and with the closing of which comes in the millennial glory, and the renewal of Paradise on earth! This theme, on the lips of genius, one would think—genius accused eighteen hundred years ago, and to be one of the forgiven at the second coming of the Messiah—might burn like the fire upon the lips of Paul, and turn all eyes toward waiting Jerusalem. This was the view of the subject with which we went to the Tabernacle, dear major!—almost envying you your qualification by birth for the using of it. We meant no disrespect in our notice. We were only a little disappointed and annoyed that you did not kindle into a crusader, or try on Peter the Hermit, till we gazed at you, spite of your earrings!

And now—"to step out of the carriage and see ourselves go by"—you are wrong if you are right, major, and right if you are wrong! If your Jewish creed be right, you are wrong to deny its manifest deduction. If your Jewish creed be wrong, you are right in wishing to explain it away. But you can not have your cake and eat it, too. You can not reconcile the church with the synagogue, nor can you lecture palatably and frankly from the synagogue to Christians. The time, at least, is not come. "At the end of the world" (says a commentator on the Bible), "Christ will unite the church with the synagogue, the Jew with the Christian, the Christian with the Gentile; then all things will be restored to a perfect union, and there will be but one shepherd and one flock."

PRICES OF WOMEN—COLD AND WARM.—A lovely female slave, warm from the mountains of Circassia, and warranted not to be second-hand, may be bought at Constantinople for three hundred dollars. A lovely female statue, cold from the marble mountains of Carrara (and spotless as the snow, without a doubt), was lately sold by Mr. Power to the Hon. William Preston, for three thousand dollars. Something would seem to be wrong here—the "clay-tariff"—or the Ottoman "protection"—or something! Various questions arise. Is an original woman a favorite article? Is the imitation by Power of the fabrics of Nature & Co. an improvement upon the model? Is the presence of the faculty of speech in the cheaper article any special indication of a preference that can be relied upon in the buyer? Perhaps some extensive dealer in both articles will oblige us with a solution of this mercantile problem.

We had a bonne bouche of opera last night at Niblo's which made us long for the whole feast—a hint of a ballet which provoked great desire for more—and just such a sprinkling of judicious white gloves as satisfied the cognosceants that there was something in the bill that had a pull upon the town's fashion. Then, as if it were to be nothing but an appetizer, Madame Pico appeared in a private box, and the audience saw, that, whatever the warble might be, the throat it would come from was of the most capable fullness of beauty. We have had our suspicions, from the quietness with which she "bides her time," that Madame Pico is a star conscious of the swing for a large orbit, and very sure of "putting a circle round the" town, whenever she rises. It is a considerable spoke in the wheel of this same orbit that she is a very superb woman. She has the adorable low Greek forehead, like Mrs. Norton's (the poetess), and a certain maintien of bust and neck which shows the kind of passionate uprightness the old gods used to be fond of. (Vide the gods' old pictures.) We were not surprised last night to overhear a foreigner telling one of his countrymen that Madame Pico would make more impression in New York than any prima donna since Malibran. What say, Corbyni! Light up your dress-circle with a little more gas, and give us ballet and opera with Borghese and Pico on alternate nights!

In every civilized country but this, the government backs up the opera, as an important public refinement. The royal treasurer is always half a stage manager. With us, the people are the sovereign, but Chancellor Bibb, not having, as far as we know, offered terms to Madame Pico, we, as one of the royal pores, do our part of the insensible perspiration, and express the warm desire of the public, that Madame Pico should appear. It is manifest dulness of enterprise, to have no opera now. There are no parties, the autumn weather is moderate, the strangers hang about town, till after the Indian summer, and there is no room for doubt that the thing would be supported.

There was a demonstration of enthusiasm, last night, which appeared to be quite a l'improvista, at the performance of the Polka, by "Master Wood and la Petite CARLINE." These two little miniatures—of the size of children six years old—danced, to our thinking, quite wonderfully. We are likely to have no grown-up dancers, this year at least, who, reduced to the same size by an inverted opera-glass, would do the Polka any better. The necessary air of galliardise, the precision, combined with abandon, the look and gesture, were all capitally well done. They are charming little people, and a good deal of a "good card" for any theatre. Query, for Corbyno—Would not a ballet, by these Lilliputians, got up for children, to commence at four o'clock in the afternoon, and last about one hour, be a paying enterprise?

One hint more: Is there not the making of a fine actress and singer in Miss Rosina Shaw? She has beauty, remarkable voice, grace and confidence—four "pretty wells." Keep an eye on her, Mr. Manager!

THE DAY AFTER THE BALLOT.—The contention for the favors of Mrs. Vox Populi is over. The difficult dame has made her election. The future president is in the ballot-box, and that womb of authority is now silently waited upon by the paternal majority. God bless whatever it is to be brought forth!

Thank Heaven the town is stiller! There is more noise upon the blacksmith's anvil and the shoemaker's lap-stone—more clatter upon the tinman's vice and the coppersmith's rivet—but the town's heart beats less audibly, to-day, and the town's pulse less feverishly and wildly. The political bully is looking around unwillingly but peacefully for work. The club wrangler's vocation is gone. The working-man will give less of his evening to the bar-room and caucus. Wives rejoice. Children are glad.

Considering only individuals, the immediate tumult and recoil of politics seem only evil and violence. The pore and the pediculus will complain of blood-letting and blister. We believe the country at large is benefited by the bringing of these bad humors to the surface, however. We are sure at least that we see all there is, in our body popular, that is dangerous. There is evil disposition, antagonism, discontent, craving for excitement, love of combination, dormant energy, and ambition—qualities everywhere distributed, and hungering, every one, for a field of action. Where better would they break out, than in politics? How, easier, should we know our neighbor's length of conscience-string and proneness to trick and unfairness, than by watching him when his passions are roused and his cautiousness forgotten? What man in a political committee knows too little of his fellows for future living with them?

But, thank God, the tumult once over, the city returns to peace; industry, and prosperity. Injury and calumny stand no more behind the editor's chair—literature and commerce, instead, look promptly over his shoulder. The merchant is relieved from anxiety, and knows how to shape his venture. The mechanic "hangs" politics for a plague and a bother. The republic has set up its master, and is content to be governed while it toils and prospers.

There is one feature of the late contest, however, for which we can find no philosophical offset. We refer to the unparalleled and insane extent to which betting has been carried. Of any good this practice does we do not see even a shadowing. Of its intolerable evils we hear mournful accounts at every turn. It seems to have infected, with a gambling mania, those who never before hazarded money on a question of chance or uncertainty. We have heard several really most lamentable instances of fatuity and disaster in this new demon-shape of party-spirit. Families are ruined, creditors robbed, children deprived of education and bread—by men who would as soon cut off their hands as throw a stake at a gaming-table! Is there no power in the law to put a stop to this new evil of politics? We ask this question to provoke, if possible, an answer.

And now—as politics walk out from the public mind, and there is room for something else to walk in—let us mention a great evil in this country of ours, and tell some news that has an example by which to mend it.

WE TOIL TOO MUCH!

LADIES' DICTIONARY—the word Alpaca. The Alpaca is a South American animal, much used as a beast of burden by the Indians, with long hair, principally black, but slightly grizzled. It is an excessively irritable animal, and indomitable till soothed. The importance of this animal has already been considered by the English, in their hat, woollen, and stuff trade, and an essay on the subject has been published by Dr. Hamilton of London. The wool is so remarkable, being a jet black, glossy, silk-like hair, that it is fitted for the production of textile fabrics differing from all others, occupying a medium position between the wool and the silk. It is now mingled with other materials in such a singular manner, that while a particular dye will affect those, it will leave the Alpaca wool with its original black color, thus giving rise to great diversity.

WHO WANTS A DRESS-OPERA?—There is a large class in every metropolis who are fond of gayety, dress, and “a place to go to,” but who do not like private parties for three or more reasons: 1st, the lateness of the hours; 2d, the trouble of making the agreeable; 3d, the card-and-visit nuisance, the management and ceremony, necessary to keep up fashionable vogue. The part of the evening between eight and eleven is, to this class, the time of the twenty-four hours in which they wish to be abroad, to be admired, to be amused. The less trouble with it the better; and they would rather give a dollar and think no more about it, than leave a card at an expense of memory, time, equipage, and politic calculation. They want a place where everybody dresses; where it is light; where they will see beauty, and be seen themselves by appreciative eyes; where there is music to hear and a show to look at if they like to be silent, or friends in a box near by if they wish to converse—a place where they can hear the gossip, have singers to criticise, and “see the world”—in short, an OPERA. To the great majority of ball-goers—particularly to the men—the time from eight to eleven hangs heavily. They would gladly dress early and go first to the opera, if it were habitually a dress-resort.

There are many well-off people to whom a dress-opera is the only tolerable amusement—lame people; ladies who only look well sitting, or look best in shawls and opera-dress; foreigners who do not speak the language; timid persons, who wish to see the gay world without encountering it; and the many families who have a competency to live and can afford amusement, but want a handle to the door of society.

The first object of strangers in town (of whom there are always several thousands), is to go where they can see the well-dressed and fashionable people. Most strangers, in a large city, would rather see the exclusives in an opera-box, than the Croton reservoirs, or the monsters in a menagerie.

People in ceremonious mourning find a great relief in seeing the gay world from an opera-box.

Last (not least, unless you please!) some people would frequent the opera, the season through, for the music. It “sooths” our “savage breast”—for one, and we think the “hang” of opera-music in the town hum and whistle is a desirable and refining variety.

Now, with all this desirableness and frequency, is it not wonderful that no larger capitalist than Signor Palmò (pocket edition), should have ventured to embark in a scheme for an opera-house! It is not a scheme to prosper—done by halves. It must be a splendid affair, or a failure. There must be comfort in the seats, breadth in the alleys, boundless prodigality in the lights, luxury in the saloons and entrances, and Alhambrian excellence in the refreshments. The manager should be a mixture of Cæsar, Talleyrand, and Bluebeard—awful, politic, punctual in pay, and relentless to the caprices of primadonnas. Two slashing critics should be employed to annihilate each other daily, in opposing preferences for the performers. The exaction of full dress for all comers should be rigidly enforced. The names of the belles at every last night's opera should be disembowelled and paragraphed every morning. Prestige, celebrity, show, humbug, and ceremony, should be added to the most indefatigable real merit in the management, and then the shareholders would make money.

Then, too, we should have a DRESS-RESORT—what no theatre now is or ever has been in New York, but what, of all refinements and resources, is the most delightful and indispensable. We could write a column about the blessing of beauty seen in public, the chastening and refining influences of music, the restraining proprieties of dress and observance, etc., etc., etc.—but we confine ourself to tangibilities. One more fact—the existence of such an opera-house, so conducted, would link New York in the operatic chain of star-travel; and Grisi, Lablache, and the rest, would as certainly come here from London and Paris, as go to Vienna and St. Petersburg, Berlin and Naples. Our readers in Wall street will please consider this as a “money article.”

PROMISCUOUS REPLIES TO LETTERS.

DEAR JACK: Since my compulsory budding, flowering, and bearing fruit, have been accelerated to one season per diem, to feed a daily paper, you will easily understand that I found it necessary at first to work all my sap into something useful—omitting as it were, the gum deposite of superfluous correspondence. I accordingly left you off. Your last letter was slipped into the no-more-bother hole, without the usual endorsement of “answered,” and I considered you like a trinket laid aside before a race—not to encumber me. I miss the writing of trumpery, however. I miss the sweeping out of the corners of my mind—full of things fit only for the dust-pan, but still very possibly hiding a silver-spoon.

Do you want any more explanation of why you get a letter from me for one cent, printed, instead of a written one at eighteen and three quarters? It is wonderful how much cheaper printing is than writing!

I left off my envy of your country life as usual with my summer trousers, not caring to see the death of anything—even the resigned summer. As soon as I have occasion to button my coat to keep out the air, I am content with that part of the earth's breast that is paved over. The town is honored now by the presence of those who could go away if they wished, and, as, human-like, the town values those who can do without it, "New York is gay." Shopping is this month's pastime, however. The ladies have no need of parties while they can yield reluctant dollars to insidious temptation. It was in competition with the "fall goods" that the opera failed a month ago—opened on the supposition that people had nothing to amuse them! A manager, and not know the sex! Kech! Palmo!

The town is to be illuminated on Monday next by the apparition of a new base and a brace of primadonnas. Madame Pico has been biding her time like game in the larder, and the town is quite ready to sweeten her with the current condiment and devour her. She is a beautiful woman, and though I never could get my sentiment over the foot-lights, I love to see the town fascinated. Pray Heaven she sings well—after all the heralding I have done for her! If that well-chiselled throat should have an awkward corner in it, we should have to restore to Borgheze her divided throne and go back to our worship of her toilet and other utmost-possibles, with an indifferent grace. Happy queen of Sheba, who ordained that no woman should reign after her!

Well, sir, what do you want to know? There are few things above ground that I do not hear of, some hundreds of newspapers doing their best to make news and send it to me—to cook to your liking! He who subscribes to the Mirror appoints me his fashioner of things palatable to know, and though, like other cooks, I pass under my nose a vast deal I should not choose for my own relishing, I do my best to give it with due spice and proportion. Indeed, what with serving so many people with so many different kinds of knowledge, I feel like the omnificent man called for in Ben Jonson's "Staple of news":—

"Where is my fashioner, my feather-man,
My linener, perfumer, barber, all!"

When Saturday comes round with the life, business, fun, and literature of the whole week in one—a mirror'd E Pluribus Unum—it seems wonderful to me how so much, and of such endless variety, could have been gathered into one week's history! That weekly Mirror is worth binding and keeping, if it were only as a choice record of the events of the buyer's times—set down, point by point, with the life he lived amidst their occurrences. There is nothing good, brilliant, or important, that is not recorded in it, and, if a man wants to forget as he goes along, that pack-horse will take the load off his memory, and for three dollars a year bring it safe after him!

And now, dear Jack, assuring you that this letter is wholly confidential, and that you are not at liberty to give it away as an autograph, I record myself,

As usual, Yours,

To JOHN ——— Esq.,
(a friend in the country).

ETIQUETTE OF WEDDING-CARDS.

MESSRS. EDITORS: My friend John Smith is to be married to Lucy Jones. She issues a card of invitation like this:—

MR. AND MRS. JOHN SMITH
AT HOME,
No. 59 B—street, Tuesday Evening,
November 14th.
JOHN SMITH,
LUCY JONES.

Now he intends to use this for inviting to the ceremony; but I tell him it is wrong, and can only be used to invite to the party after the ceremony. He contends that this is the usual form—so the engraver tells him, etc.

Please give us the law in these matters (we can appeal to no higher authority in matters of etiquette and fashion); let us have the two customary forms, for wedding and party, for the enlightenment of inexperienced candidates who wish to follow the fashions, and much oblige,

P. S.—We wait for your infallible decision.

Wednesday morning.

REPLY.

DEAR CUSTOM: Your friend is wrong, from the egg to the apple. Miss Lucy Jones has a mother, or father, guardian, or friend, at whose house she is to be married. The invitation should come from the person under whose protection she is given away—(sent, if you please, to Mr. Smith's friends, with Mr. Smith's card, but understood by Miss Lucy Jones's friends, without card or explanation). It is tampering with serious things, very dangerously, to circulate the three words, "AND MRS. JOHN SMITH," one minute before the putting on of the irrevocable ring. The law which permits ladies (though not gentlemen) to change their minds up to the last minute before wedding, exacts also that the privileged angels should not be coerced by the fear of seeing the escaped name afterward on a wedding card! Besides, such a card, so issued, would be received from Mrs. Smith before there was any such person.

The first proper use of the wedded name is to send it with parcels of wedding-cake, the morning after the ceremony, to friends and persons desired as visiting acquaintances. This is considered an excusable advance on the part of persons entering newly upon life, and the promptness with which a return-card is left upon the bride is an indication of the degree of pleasure with which the proposition of acquaintance is received. Another advantage of cake and card—the etiquette of (exacting that a new nail should be thus driven in all acquaintances that are to be kept up) enables bride and bridegroom to drop, without offence, such acquaintances of each as are respectively undesirable—persons inseparable from the set in which the lady has lived, who are not agreeable to the bridegroom, and bachelor acquaintances of the bridegroom, who may be thought too free for the fireside. Wedded life is thus begun with a "culled posy of friendship," the door of society open before, and mischief-makers shut out behind.

Our compliments to Miss Jones, and we remain,

Very truly

Open to card and cake,

MIRROR TRIPLET.

UNMARRIED PEOPLE four times as liable to insanity as MARRIED PEOPLE.—The "Concord Freeman," in a statistical article made up from hospital reports, shows, that if a man is, perhaps, oftener out of pocket when married, he is not so often out of his head. The editor says: Few people are aware how much more insanity prevails among bachelors and unmarried ladies than among the married of both sexes. We learn from the examination of very many reports, that of every five of all lunatics sent to American hospitals, three are unmarried, and only two are married, and that almost all of them are over twenty-one years old. On the other hand, it is pretty certain that in all the community over twenty-one years of age, there are more than three times as many in as out of wedlock. If this be the case, then the unmarried are more than four times as liable to become insane as married people.

The Herald seems to think we have bought the "Republic." We are sorry that a republic is a marketable commodity, but at any rate we have bought nothing of that name or description. Our ambition, somehow, does not seem to stumble upon things republican. In this world we desire a farm, on which we can be "monarch of all we survey," and in the next, we pray for a citizenship in the kingdom of heaven.

"UP-TOWN" AND "DOWN-TOWN."—We see that these names of the different halves of the city are becoming the common language of advertisements, etc. A person advertises in one of the papers a "Down-town singing school," and another a "Down-town dancing academy." We think our friend Billings would better stick to "Up-town Hotel" as the better designation of the new brick khan.

THE NEW SEQUEL TO THEATRICAL INTELLIGENCE.—Since the bishops and deacons have taken to indicting each other for fallings-away of which the public like to read the Scan. Mag., we observe that the particular column of newspapers which is devoted to spicy news, theatricals, police incidents, etc., has silently become the locality for brief paragraphs announcing where distinguished preachers are to hold forth. In the salad column of one of the papers there is one announcement of a play followed by six announcements of sermons! And in another paper there are very nearly two columns of sketches of sermons, from a specific "reporter!!"

We saw yesterday, for the first time in this country, an equipage of full ceremonial splendor, faultless in taste, and evidently not at all modified by any dread of democratic prejudices. We admired the "bravery" of the turn-out, and the courage of using it. The ice broken, there will soon be conjured others from the vaults in Wall street—but meantime, let us look a little at the necessity for a promenade drive in New York, and its probable locality.

In or near every capital of Europe there is a spot which serves, for those who have carriages, the same purpose which Broadway serves for promenaders on foot. In London it is the Mayfair side of Hyde park; in Paris it is the Champs Elysées and Bois de Boulogne; in Florence it is the Cascine; in Rome the Pincian hill; in Naples the Strada Nuova. In all of these capitals the titled and wealthy avoid driving in the crowded streets except upon errands of necessity, and in London it is the custom to keep a plainer vehicle with cob-horses expressly for use at night and errands in the city. Ladies who have occasion to go out in the morning, do so on foot and in the plainest dress, followed invariably by a servant. They return to lunch at one or two, and immediately after dress for the show part of the day's out-door occupation. The carriage comes round in full livery at the specified hour, and, the shopping and business-errands having been despatched in the forenoon, the equipage starts upon the afternoon destination of ceremony or pleasure.

An hour before sunset or the dinner hour, the principal drive is over, and the scattered equipages meet, as upon a fashionable exchange, for a promenade of display. This conventional assembling is relied upon for recognition of acquaintance, for arrangements as to the evening, for keeping advised of the fashions, for seeing strangers, and for contests of style in equipage and personal attire. The dandies must be seen there, in cab or mounted; the women of "position" must refresh there the memories of forgetful tributaries; the new candidate for fashion must there display that taste in "belongings" which can only be guessed at in a ball-room; there are seen all whose means make them eligible to expensive circles of society, and who (by something that will and does tell, in the equipage, or the mode of dressing for, and appearing in, it) there make claim to fitness for, at least, a ceremonious converse with the haute volée.

Of course, there is a postern of society in all cities, through which are admitted certain classes, who keep no equipages—those who are to amuse, instruct, or embellish the gay world—poets, parsons, and pretty women; but the promenade on wheels, to all others, the inexorable vestibule, and, as far at least as this gate, the ordinary seekers of the heaven beyond must come with horses. Cowper only mentioned the barest essentials when he said,

"Well-drest, well-bred,
Well-equipped, is ticket good enough
To pass us readily through every door."

In New York, however undesirable to the mass, this formidable gulf is about to be sunk, between wealth and competency. At present there is no distinction among the upper ten thousand of the city. There is no place where equipages are exclusively looked for. There are five or ten thousand young men who dress as well as the millionaire's son; five or ten thousand ladies for whom milliners and mantua-makers do their best; ten or twenty thousand who can show as well on foot, and walk as well without heart-burnings, in Broadway—one as another. New York is (at this critical moment, before the shoot of the centripetal particles to a new nucleus) the largest republic of "first quality" people that the world ever saw.

There is one spot which has been talked of as a promenade drive, and we believe some endeavor has been made to purchase it for the purpose—the beautiful wood on the right of the Third avenue. That charming spot would stand to New York very much as the Cascine to Florence. We doubt, however, whether, yet awhile at least, the object would warrant the purchase.

The first probable promenade drive, we should say, would be the FIFTH AVENUE, from Washington square to the Croton reservoir. The splendor of the houses on this broad highway is far beyond that of any other portion of the city; it is no thoroughfare for omnibuses; it leads from the wealthiest neighborhood to a prominent public work; it is on the return route from the loveliest drives on the island; and, should the summit of the rising ground on which the reservoir stands be fixed upon, as proposed, for the Washington monument, and planted and decorated, that limit would be a convenient turning-place, and a charming and airy spot for a sunset soirée en voiture.

A STORY FOR YOUR SON, SIR.—The present king of France, one very cold evening, was riding from Boston to Salem on the outside of the stage. He was entirely without money to pay for a lodging that night, and he began to make friends with the driver to get part of his bed. After a while the driver's compassion was aroused. "You are not a very clean looking chap," said he to the poor Frenchman, "but my bed is in the harness-room, where there's a stove, and if you'll keep your trowsers on, and sleep outside, I don't mind!"

THE REPUBLIC OF BROADWAY.—Eyes were contrived at some trouble; the great sun shows only the outside of things; the present and visible (Carlyle-ically speaking) is the world God adapted our senses to; and though some people like to live the life of a sundial under ground, we prefer to throw to-day's shadow from whatever we do—writing about what we see, and thinking most about what jostles our elbow. This explained.

We have a loose slip-slop or two for the young men about town—not as to their invisible minds and morals, but as to their visible walking and dressing. Having “bought our doublet in Italy, our round hose in France, our bonnet in Germany, and our behavior everywhere,” we may perhaps excusably scale a pedestal to give our opinion; though the credit we take to ourselves may be granted in the spirit of Falstaff’s to Doll Tearsheet, “We catch of you, Doll, we catch of you!”

There is nothing so republican as a dressy population. We are no “leveller,” but we like to see things level themselves; and the declaration of independence is impotent in comparison with the tailor’s goose. A young man about town slips his miniature into five thousand eyes per diem. Fifty of the five thousand who see him know whether his father is a mechanic or a rich man; and it depends wholly upon his dress and mien whether the remaining four thousand nine hundred and fifty take him to be a rich man’s son or a mechanic’s son. It is reasonable, of course, to let the fifty who know think what pleases them, and to dress for the very large majority who don’t know. This is apparently the tacit philosophy of the young men of New York. There is no telling, by any difference in dress, whether the youth going by has, probably, a sister who is an heiress, or a sister who is a sempstress. There is no telling the merchant from his bookkeeper—no guessing which is the diner on eighteen pence, and which the gourmet of Delmonico’s—no judging whether the man in the omnibus, whom you vaguely remember to have seen somewhere, was the tailor who tried on your coat, or your vis-à-vis last night at a ball.

As we said above, this is a true republic. A young man whose appearance is four-story-housy, can very well afford to let a few people know that he sleeps over the shop. If he is more elegant than a rich man’s son, he gets as nearly the full value of the difference as ordinary vanity would require. Every young man finds means to dress to his liking, and of course every young man starts fair, each morning, with all of his age, for the day’s competition in bright eyes.

We shall be understood, now, in our republican effort to add still another levelling to this of the tailor’s goose—to bring the attractions of plain men up to those of the “aristocracy of nature.” The hints we have to throw out will be slighted by the good-looking; taken advantage of by the plain—thus levelling, in another respect, upward.

The rarest thing seen in Broadway is a young man who walks well. A stoop in the back is almost national; and an upright, graceful, gentlemanlike gait is as rare as it is singularly striking. If you can afford the time to walk slowly, high-heeled boots are a great improvement. With time enough, you drop the foot insensibly from a high heel, like an actor walking down the slope of the stage. Beside, it makes the instep look high, which implies that your father did not carry a hod.

Avoid a broadcloth shirt, in the shape of a shapeless garment with sleeves (one of the new fashions). It looks colic-y, with the wind belying it out in all directions as you walk along.

Leave long cloaks to the clergy. The broad velvet collar, turning over, diminishes your apparent breadth of shoulders, and it should be worn with careful dramatic propriety, not to be very awkward and inelegant.

If you are about to have an overcoat made, get a fat friend to go and be measured for it. At any rate, let not your diaphragm be so imprisoned, that the first heroic sentiment will tear off a button. One of Jennings’ cutters is the apostle of a reform in this matter—measuring you (if you request it) by a magnifying-glass, from the waist upward.

These are not King Canute’s days, when “none under the rank of gentlemen dare presume to have a greyhound to follow him.” The outward symbols, once peculiar to elegance, are pretty well levelled up to, as we said before—but, by careful observation, you will now and then see a something that nice men do, or do not do, which has not yet got through the hair of the promiscuous. As an example, and in the hope that it will not be generally understood, we will mention, that very particular men, for the last year, have walked the street invariably with a kind of grieved look—very expressive and distinguishing.

We will resume this republican theme.

THE DESIGNATION OF THE LADY PRESIDENTESS.—If it had not been for a certain ante-expitiary “white horse,” we should have prayed for the miraculous return to this world of “John Tetzel, Vender of Indulgences.” The editor of the Morning News did justice to his Irish blood a day or two ago, by giving back, to the loser’s wife, a saddle-horse he had won in a bet; but how, in the name of all the gallant propitities, can he justify himself to the ladies of the democracy for making no distinction between their queen and the (of course) less glorious queen of any country on earth? The promiscuousness of two “Mrs. P.’s!”

“WHITE-HOUSE.—Among other consequences of the election of Mr. Polk, it is said, will be to locate in the White-house at Washington the handsomest and perhaps the most accomplished lady that ever presided in its stately halls. Mrs. P. has, for some years, been remarkable not only for personal beauty, but for that greater charm, graceful manners, and a highly-cultivated mind.”

If, in this democratic country, one may venture to say a word for the other “Mrs. P.,” we think that Louis Philippe’s having slept with a stagedriver in this country (vide a late anecdote) might have procured for his wife the easy privilege of at least one distinguishing initial. It surely would not seriously invade the simplicity of our court circular to add a “J.” to the single-letter title of the lady presidentess of fifteen millions and Texas! Be generous, gentlemen people! Let us have some distinction in the Queen “P.’s” of the two countries. The editor of the Morning News will be some day minister to France. Fancy his being called on to present “Mrs. American P.” to “Mrs. French P.”

OVERHAUL OF SAILING ORDERS.—The sails draw—the freight sits trim in the hold—the ship minds her helm, and the wind strengthens on the quarter with a freshness that strains rope and spar. It is perhaps the best moment that will occur, in the long voyage before us, to overhaul our signals and sailing-papers, and understand how we are to communicate with the fleet, and go straightest and most prosperously to our destined haven.

(Whoa, Pegasus! We have been as poetical as will have been expected of us at one day’s notice. Drop to the ground and let us go off on a plain trot!)

We have always looked upon the gentlemen of the daily press as among the enviably unlabelled potentates of this country of King Everybody-nobody—enviably as having enormous power and little responsibility to the using of it. The power will doubtless remain as large and the responsibility as small. "A free press" is the lesser of two evils. In the perpetuation of this state of things, however, lies our future vocation, and—while we have it yet in our power to "make a clean breast," and avow what we have objected to in the exercise, by others, of the spells by which we are to conjure—let us name at least the one blot which most smirches the forward face of the profession.

It were of little use for one editor to declare that he would make war freely upon opinions—never upon persons. And the disadvantage is not merely that of throwing away the dagger in battle, because the sword is more gentlemanly—not merely a lessening of one's formidableness to an opponent. The evil is in the greater curiosity to watch the stabber, felt by the lookers-on. The temptation to be personally abusive lies in the diseased appetite of the crowd that will follow the abuser—leaving the scrupulous man alone with his decency. Living as editors do, by the favor of the crowd, if many are willing to minister to this diseased appetite, decency in the few is a kind of slow, business-suicide.

It would almost require a Utopian fancy to picture the beauty of a press from which personalities and illwilled abuse were wholly excluded. No personalities in literature, and none in politics—the author, editor, and statesman, alike intrenched in "that credent bulk

That no particular scandal once can touch,
But it confounds the breather,"

—how completely the envy of malignant mediocrity would be deprived of its now easy sting, and how completely rufianism and brutality would be confined to the bully-club and dram-shop! Scholars would wait on public opinion, at the editor's table, busied only with embellishing, and not engrossed with defending their fair fame; and gentlemen of sensitive honor, who are now appalled at the calumnious gauntlet of politics, would come forward to serve their country at the small posts occupied now only by men senseless to defamation.

To the coming about of this paradise of letters, editorial consent is alone wanting. No one man could live long, the only calumniator of the press. No one man would dare to hold the only pen deficient in courtesy and gentlemanlike regard to private character. Complete silence from the rest of the press toward the one offender, after a unanimous publication of his disgrace—refusal, without exception, to exchange papers with him from that time forward—any combination, in short, which should make the ostracism of such an individual, by his brethren of the press, universally known—would suffice to purge the press of him. One year of such united self-censorship would so purify the public habit of news-reading, that an offence against propriety would at least startle and alarm the public sense; and, arrived at that point, a very moderate apostleship might complete the reform.

We do not anticipate this. Oh, no! We are

"—in this earthly world, where to do harm
Is often laudable; to good sometimes Accounted dangerous folly;"

but, at the risk of being the "grave of our deserving," we shall do the leaning of one to the better side. We shall have harder work for it. Nothing is easier than to be popular by habitual illwill. Trashy minds write most readable satire, and, with the mood on or off—the industry willing or reluctant—fault-finding is fecund production. But if good nature can be spiced—if courteous treatment of our brother editors, brother authors, and all nameable men, can be made palatable to the public—if a paper wholly incapable of an unkindness, but capable of all things pleasurable else, can be fairly tested—we trust to do without the price of giving pain, and we trust that the money so turned out of our hand will not be like the lost oil of the tomb of Belus—irreplaceable.

THE COST OF FASHION.—From a pamphlet sent us, we learn that five hundred millions of dollars are spent annually in the United States for such articles of dress as are subject to the fluctuations of fashion. Of this sum, it is computed that sixteen millions are spent for hats, probably about twenty millions for caps and bonnets, and for other articles of dress not less than four hundred millions!

So that not far from a million and a half dollars are spent daily for clothing; of which, if the calls of fashion claim but ten per cent. (but probably she receives double that sum), one hundred and fifty thousand dollars are sacrificed daily at the footstool of the fickle goddess, by the enlightened citizens of the United States!

Is it not time that some standard of national dress was established? We certainly have had sufficient experience to know what kinds of clothing are the most convenient, and one good reason can not be produced for the unmeaning changes which are every day taking place.

It is not to be expected that in a free country, where it is proverbial that "every man is at liberty to wear shoes or go without," an association to fix upon a general standard of dress would lead all to adopt it. No—there would be those still found who, lacking other points to recommend them to public notice, would act the camelion still. But no small portion of the community would recommend that course which would most evidently be for the public good.

The number, if large and respectable, would exert a sufficient influence by their example to prevent the standard fashion from ever appearing out of date. The ladies' bonnets would then be new at the end of three years, instead of being old-fashioned at the end of one. The gentlemen's hats would be fashionable until worn out; and the wedding coat, which is saved for holiday occasions, might descend from father to son, a fashionable garment.

A HUMBUG FAME.

THOMAS CARLYLE.—We have nowhere seen a juster view of this much-talked-of writer than is given in the October number of the Biblical Repository, a journal conducted with great ability by an association of divines. The writer (Prof. J. T. Smith, of Newton Theological Institute, Mass.) allows Carlyle to be a "most vigorous, unique, and original thinker and writer," and that his "Past and Present" is "certainly worth reading." He allows further, that that work contains many noble and truthful sentiments, uttered with commanding energy. This, however, is the extent of his commendation. "We must, on the whole," says the writer, "characterize it as a book, in style, barbarous; in politics, incendiary; in philosophy, dubious; and in theology, execrable." This opinion the reviewer supports by an analysis of the work, and by a specification of particulars.

The barbarity of the style no one doubts, and no one, except a few very warm admirers, defends. This very barbarity seems to us only another manifestation of that arrogance which characterizes all Carlyle's attempts. A man who condemns everybody must needs be an inventor.

The work is said to "breathe an overweening, morbid admiration of the past." Nothing of the present satisfies Mr. Carlyle; nothing of the past but elicits his commendation, and among other things, Scandinavian savagery, Mohammedanism, twelfth century catholicism, the fighting barons of feudal times, Popes Gregory and Hildebrand, and other personages of like stamp, each and all present to him some phase worthy of special notice and admiration. The religion and the systems of government of the present day, have very hard fare at his hands, since the former is all cant, hypocrisy, and quackery, and the latter nothing better, to say the least. We are, in truth, recommended to go back to the twelfth century for models of religion and government. The hero must be found by some means—or he must find himself. A fighting aristocracy like that of the twelfth century is no longer possible; but a working aristocracy must take its place, and the system of villanage be restored. Indeed, American slavery seems essentially the system recommended by this practical preacher.

The sum and substance of our own view of the whole matter is, that while we sympathize to some extent with Mr. Carlyle in his dissatisfaction with the present state of things, the remedies he proposes in his deep-mouthed and most oracular tone, are absolutely nought—the mere dreams of a mind well-intentioned enough, but half-crazed with overweening self-estimation.

He insists much on the necessity of a "French revolution" in England. "There will be two, if needed; there will be twenty, if needed. . . —The laws of nature will have themselves fulfilled," and much more to the same purpose. Yet this inevitable fulfilment of the laws of nature which is to work all good, seems, according to the seer's estimate, as yet to have wrought nothing but ill. His final hope is a hero-king: "Yes, friends: hero-kings and a whole world not unheroic—there lies the port and happy haven," &c. In fine, if Carlyle's words mean anything (which, the more we read the more we doubt), the whole people are to be roused to violent revolt, and plunged into all sorts of horrors, as a preparation for a better state of things!

Carlyle speaks of the last two centuries as godless centuries—and that in contrast with the long ages that went before them. What is this but to shock the common sense of history? And his remedy is hero-hood. What is this but inane twaddle? Monstrous, unblushing egotism, is one of Carlyle's striking characteristics. Great and learned men, astronomers, philosophers, and others, are "poor scientific babblers;" he alone, it would seem, discerns the reality of things, and has the key to the mysteries of nature. "Insight" has been granted to no other.

One of the wonders of the age to us, is, that such a monstrosity as Carlyle should have attained so high a place in its estimation. His merits are so overloaded by the most shocking and unbounded affectation and egotism, that we rise from the perusal of much that he has written with no other sensations than those of weariness and disgust.

The poems of the Kentucky Sappho, AMELIA, have been published in a very elegant gift-book volume, by Tompkins, of Boston. We have expressed our almost unqualified admiration of this lady's poems, as they separately appeared. She has a mind fed equally from a full heart and a prodigal imagination.

It was once remarked to us, by a critic as candid as he is discerning, that there is a great development of the poetic sentiment in this country; that many of our collections, which, in their brief existence, resemble the flowers that seem to be born only to die, like those delicate, odorous, and lovely objects in nature, have often a character of sweetness, purity, and freshness, grateful to refined taste and a feeling heart. The pieces contained in this volume are worthy of such praise. A loving heart, and a soul in harmony with the beauty of the world and the divine spirit which informs it, dictated these poems.

We might make many beautiful selections from this handsome volume; but we must content ourselves, for the present, with naming one, "The Little Stepson," which, in its earnest simplicity, and its ringing music, reminds us of that favorite translation, "My ear-rings! my ear-rings! they've dropped into the well!" Not merely that the measure is the same, but that the whole tone seems the echo of far-off and primitive manners—the voice of untutored affection.

MIFF BETWEEN JOHN BULL AND BROTHER JONATHAN.—The offensive club exclusion by which English aristocrats have undertaken to make Americans pay their debts, does, unquestionably, put the screw upon a national weakness. We are not sorry for it—but there could have been nothing in worse taste or showing a more ignorant lack of discrimination—setting aside the fact of its being done by a class of men, who are themselves, notoriously bad paymasters. We do not believe, however, all that is in the papers on the subject. The "Reform-Club," in which it originated, is a new combination of ill-ballasted politicians, and the movement will be disclaimed in some authoritative shape, before a month is over. Trifling as the matter abstractly is, it would act very pungently on any question of war-making which should arise among us within a year.

Perhaps some of our readers would like to know how far an exclusion from the clubs affects Americans in England. The fact of not having the honorary privilege of admission to the two principal clubs, was (before this national exclusion) sufficient evidence that a gentleman had not come well introduced. One of the first and most natural questions addressed to a stranger in London is, "What club are you in?"—the intention being to ask you to a tête-à-tête club dinner, if you turn out agreeable. This is almost the only courtesy that a literary man in England has it in his power to show you. He can give you a dinner for a few shillings at his club (if you are a member of it and not otherwise), which in point of style and comfort is equal to a nobleman's entertainment. Or (which is more common) he can say, "I dine at the Athenæum to-day at six. If you have no better engagement, we'll put our chairs together!"—each man in this case paying his own bill. An invitation to club privilege is only got up by high interest, however. It requires some person of consequence to play the applicant, and the number of strangers in each club, at one time, is seldom more than twenty or thirty. The following are the formulas of invitation to the two principal clubs:—

"PALL MALL, 28th January, 1835.

"DEAR SIR: I am directed by the committee of the 'TRAVELLERS' to inform you that they have great pleasure in admitting you as a visitor to the club for the ensuing month, and that they hope to be favored with your frequent attendance.

"I have the honor to be, sir,

"Your most obed't and humble serv't,

"J. W. SINGER, Secretary."

"ATHENÆUM, LONDON, 19th February, 1835.

"SIR: I am directed to inform you that the committee of the 'ATHENÆUM' have ordered your name to be placed on the list of distinguished foreigners residing in London, who are invited to the house of the club for three months, subject to the same regulations as the members are required to observe.

"In case your stay should be prolonged beyond that period, and it should be your wish to have this invitation renewed, it will be necessary that an application be made to the committee to that effect.

"I have the honor to be, sir,

"Your very obedient, humble servant,

"EDWARD MAGRATH, Sec'y."

It is rather important to a man making his way in London society, that he should be seen at the clubs. The formidable "Who is he?" is always satisfactorily answered by, "Don't know, but I saw him at the club." It influences all manner of introductions, breaking down scores of invisible walls between the new-comer and desirable things and people. A call at the clubs is an invariable part of the routine of a fashionable man's morning. He goes there to meet friends, to hear the news, to bet, to smoke, to make engagements—to prepare for the out-door part of the day, in short. All notes, requiring a very private delivery, are addressed to a man at his club. Men who have no libraries of their own, do the most of their reading there. It is the place to see great men, fashionable men, famous men; and to see them without their masks—for the security, as to the proper introduction of all present, throws an atmosphere of marked laissez aller around sensitive greatness.

We sat down, however, to comment upon the ignorance as to our country, shown by the late narrow-viewed movement of club-exclusion—the evident ignorance of any distinction between state responsibility and national responsibility. To mention it is enough, however; and we turn to that which will show the out-lying proof of English ignorance of us.

One of the dullest, most arrogant, and unscrupulous of travellers is commended in the last foreign quarterly, by one of the most unfair and ignorant of critics. If all travellers and critics were like this well-matched pair, the subject of British tourists and reviewers, and their opinions and statements concerning us would not be worth a thought. Of the capacity and information of the reviewer, take one or two specimens. "The unanimity of whigs, tories, and radicals, upon the one topic of American society (i. e., in condemnation) is a thing to wonder at and reflect upon." Two of the most readable works of this class within the last ten years are decidedly favorable—those of Miss Martineau, and the Hon. Charles Augustus Murray. A more striking instance still of the reviewer's utter ignorance or most shameful falsification is his representing the internal traffic in slaves as publicly repudiated, and founding on that a charge of duplicity, since "men—are ready to swear there is no such thing from one end of America to the other as a trade in slaves." A very suitable person this to write comments on American travels! With such endorsements Mr. Featherstonhaugh's statements can not but pass current! We did not suppose there was, in the obscure corner of Europe, one dabbler in ink so profoundly and inexcusably ignorant as not to know that slaves were openly bought and sold in the slave states of this country. That such Cimimerian darkness (to make the most charitable supposition) should envelope the brain of a British reviewer is a marvel indeed!

It was not, however, to expose such ignorance that we took up the pen, nor to draw the very natural conclusion of the amount of information, which Mr. F.'s book conveyed to his countrymen at large, since, notwithstanding the title "slave states," his reviewer concluded there was no acknowledged slavery—for without purchase and sale the system is of course knocked on the head.

But such are not all British tourists, nor such all British reviewers; and it is worth while to inquire why it is, that, placing out of the account writers of this class, there is still so large a proportion of our well-informed and sensible visitants, who get an unfavorable impression of our institutions and of our state of society.

We ought to give up the idea of a prevalent ill-feeling toward us in the fatherland of our ancestors, or a wish to put us down, because we are on the wrong side of the water. Few Englishmen like us the less because we are Americans, and not French or German or Russians. Thousands of us when abroad have experienced the contrary.

Nor ought we to suppose that envy, jealousy, or ancient grudges, are at the bottom of the hard measure meted out to us by tourists. True, we have met in war as enemies, and in peace as commercial rivals, and have in both held our own; but meanness and spite form no part of the character of John Bull. He has tremendous faults, but he keeps tolerably clear of pettinesses.

One fault shows itself with the English abroad, wherever they are. Though the greatest travellers, they are the least cosmopolitan. The island mania attends them everywhere, except at home. Like some mistresses to some lovers, old England seems the dearer the farther they get away from her. Goldsmith's Traveller's lengthening chain is no fiction. Across the ocean it is often insupportable. Sometimes, also, this distance has, at the outset of the voyage, "lent enchantment to the view," which, when dispelled, leads to a bitter, though unreasonable disappointment.

The very resemblance which we bear to the English—and must bear, from our origin, our language, our literature, and our continued intercourse ever since the ocean rolled between us—is unfavorable to a just, and still more to a partial judgment of us, on the part of those honestly disposed to do us justice. To other people the British traveller can apply, in some measure, the true standard—i. e., to each its own; but for us, he can have only the home standard. Weighed by this, we are, of course, found wanting. He find us nine tenths English, and scolds that the other tenth is not English too.

It is needless to discuss the point, whether that tenth is better or worse—the English blood renforcés (as some Frenchman has pronounced, justly we—hope) or not—it is enough that it is not English for the genuine John Bull to pronounce it ridiculous or insufferable; to laugh or rail at it according to his humor. The general resemblance he can not deny, but he unreasonably demands an exact likeness. In the points where this is not perceptible, he of course considers us shockingly degenerate, altered altogether for the worse. Now there are various points which we should not expect him to appreciate justly, for we know he is a creature full of prejudices and contradictions, and he must see with his own eyes or not see at all.

Another real difficulty is, that no mere passing traveller can realize the crowning glory of our country and of our institutions—the general diffusion of comfort and intelligence. A traveller is looking out for the salient points—something striking or marvellous—something that will tell in his book and his memory. A thousand comfortable or even elegant private dwellings that he might pass, would not make upon him so vivid an impression as one splendid palace—while the former would indicate a thousand families living in comfort and abundance, and the latter that there was one family of over-grown wealth with a presumption against its possessing the average worth of the former, or even enjoying their average happiness.

We contribute to the severity of the judgments against us by our own fault. Our sensitiveness lays us peculiarly open to attack, and none reply to such attacks with more violence. The foreigner who knows this and who can not perhaps conscientiously grant us all we ask, sharpens his weapons beforehand for the encounter, and deals harder blows in anticipation of those which he knows he is about to bring down upon himself.

To this must be added our national vanity—a characteristic which the candid among us own. From demanding too indiscriminate praise, we do not get that which we really deserve, as the trader, who praises his wares extravagantly, is sure to have them undervalued. If our claims were more moderate, they would be oftener acknowledged. If we exacted less, more would be voluntarily given. If we did not rise up against deserved reproof, we should be oftener spared that which we did not deserve.

When we claim the eloquence of a Chatham for every stump orator, and then apply the same phrases to our really great and eloquent men, the latter are sufferers. If we claim for our every-day life or even for our soirées recherchées the grace and polish of a court, where they have nothing to do but to kill time agreeably, the assertion is simply ridiculous. Some traveller (Dickens we believe) says of the factory-girls of Lowell, that they have the port and bearing (or something to that effect) of well-bred ladies. Pretty complimentary we should think! But an annotator somewhere (but where we know not), is not satisfied. He adds, that if Mr. Dickens should meet these persons in private circles, he would find they had the corresponding elegance and manners. As if any good factory-girl at Lowell would pass muster at Queen Victoria's drawing-room!

THE NEW PRIMA DONNA.—The haste with which it is the fashion to write about prima-donnas, giving them a cornucopian criticism, on their début, and dropping directly after into very brief notices, reminds us of a lady's reproach to her lover, in the old play of the Spanish friar: "You men are like watches, wound up for striking twelve immediately; but after you are satisfied, the very next that follows is the solitary sound of single one." We should like very much to defer expressing an opinion of Madame Pico, till she had a little recovered from the embarrassment of a first performance, and (more important still in criticising) till we had steeped our tympanum a little longer in the honey the bees of Italy have shed upon her lips; but—

The audience at Palmo's, last night, was, probably, the best ever assembled since Malibran's time, as to the capability of judging of a cantatrice by taste and comparison. Madame Pico, even in Italy, would scarce have dropped her golden cadences into more judicious ears. Fortunately, too, the unripeness of an entirely new opera was corrected by the predominance of natural melody in the composer's style—making it all come to the ear with the impromptu welcome sometimes refused to the best music. By the way—without knowing whether this opera will grow upon us, and allowing, at once, that it has none of Beethoven's under-song, nor any of the supernatural combinations of Mozart—we must express our almost passionate delight in its main burthen and character. We write, it is true, by a past-time-to-go-to-bed candle, and with the graciles-que sensus still reeling under the intoxication of the cup of bewitched sound; but if this gets to press (and we shall look it over before breakfast, to-morrow morning), we congratulate the every-day-ear of the city we live in, upon an opera that is natural as a bird's song, and that can be enjoyed with as simple a taste for music—at the same time, no more to be disparaged, for its simplicity, than the bird's throat for not having the harp-stop of a piano. But let us go on, story-fashion.

The curtain drew up, and after the appearance of the usual precedent foil of chorus-singers, Sanguirico, the ben amato of the company, came on as a postillion. After making a bow, with the good-will of a waterfall, in acknowledgment of the applause with which he was met, he went on playing his part, and (to dismiss him with this brief notice) most admirably to the last. The make-way motions of the guard and the aspettando impatience of the music, now prepared us for the prima-donna. She was to represent a young girl, under the protection of the prince and princess, whose escape from ruin by a villain is the story of the opera. "Chiara!" trilled the "cue" and in glided Chiara!

Madame Pico has a look in her face as if "Sorrow had passed that way." She has had a narrow escape of being superlily handsome, and, as it is, she could personate, with small call upon the imagination, the part of "Mrs. Helpless Ingulfus," on the stage or off it. Tho' not near so beautiful, she is a strong likeness of Mrs. Norton—the same low, concentrative forehead, the same something-or-other in the sweep of the dark hair, the same caressing inwardness in the white round of the shoulder. There is rather too much of a cadenza in her bust, and her under lip does not always come up with the alacrity we like in a woman, but we may change our opinion. She was very much frightened, and these matters are "now high, now low again,

Like a ring of bells that the wind's wooing alters."

The welcome of applause ceased, and the expected voice trembled on the silence. It was listened to with pricked ears, nodded to by the cognoscenti at the first pause—approved, applauded. It was a rich, clouded contralto, its depths hidden by a soprano part, like a dark well impoverished by a slant beam of sunshine. As she went on, gathering a little more control, her voice sank to the inner sound-chamber where the heart sits to listen, and the audience, instead of louder applauding, began to murmur their admiration. Evident as it was that the delicious home of her voice was never reached, or borrowed from, by the notes of that soprano part, there was a kind of full forth-shadowing of reserved power which made, even what she did sing, satisfy the ear. And then, occasionally, where the lower notes approached her treasury of un-used power, she flung out a contralto cadence upon the air with an effect the audience waited impatiently to hear repeated. We feel bespoken to be enchanted with a fair development of that full throat's capabilities. Artistic comparison apart, we have a passion for a contralto—nothing that can pass the portal of an ear touching with half the delicacy our levia affectuum vestigia. Those who take our criticisms will, if they like, make allowance for this weakness.

Borghese was in one of the avant-scene boxes, lending her captive town to her rival with the best grace imaginable. She well may—for a smiling rivalry between her and Pico will give each new attraction, particularly since their voices are of totally opposite quality. The little soprano comme-il-faut has her advantages, and Madame Pico has hers. Neither of them is quite the "horn of Astolpho, at the sound of which the hearer went mad," but while hearing either, as Esdras says, "a man remembereth neither sorrow nor debt." May they pull together "like Juno's swans, coupled and inseparable!"

The FOOTRACE we have seen this afternoon "carried the town" more completely than any excitement we have yet been abroad in—politics not excepted. We were late, but a thousand people were on the road with us, and when we arrived, the first race was just over, Jackson the winner. The weather was Indian summer, in its most bracing smile—good omen, a punster would say, for the red-skinned competitor! The roads had been dried pretty well by the sharp wind of yesterday, the grass looked glossy, and King Pluribus was in unusual good humor—as he generally is on the first bright day after bad weather.

The stands looked like stacks of noses and hats, and after a vain attempt to find room in the principal ones, we descended to the course to take our chance with the great company of the jostled. As it was an object to get a near view of the runners at the end of the first quarter of a mile, we crossed the area of the field to the less thronged side of the course, and awaited their coming. Several loads of undisguised sinners were near us, one of whom, a professed matron, apparently, coolly sat with a pair of pistols, waiting some expected attack from a crowd of ruffians who had surrounded them. She looked quite capable of a tragedy; but the striking of the bell at the stand drew off the rowdies to the ring-fence, and the pistols in the gloved hands gave place to a bouquet. We had been thinking that there should be a competitor in the race to inherit the honors of Atalanta, and a female, by a pull of the forefinger, might easily have taken the day's notoriety from the competitors in the race.

A stroke of the bell—a shout from twenty thousand throats—a sudden radiation, to one point, of all the loose vagrants in the field—and around came the horse-fence, that in single file kept pace with the runners, hemming them in from the crowd. The grotesque-looking pedestrians hugged the wooden railing very closely as they came along, Barlow ahead, the Indian close on his heels, and Gildersleeve, the victor of the last race, quietly consenting to be number three. The foremost man was simply "diapered," as the nurses say, exhibiting his white Saxon skin in strong contrast to the smoked hams of the Indian behind him, and if the race had depended on muscle merely, a good anatomist might have picked out the winner, by points fairly displayed, as easily as a horse's capabilities are seen by the jockey.

They ran very differently. A plumbline, dropped from the forehead of each, would have fallen a foot in advance of Barlow's body, and eighteen inches in advance of the Indian's, while it would have lain close to the breast of the erect little Gildersleeve. Barlow never took his eyes from the ground, and kept his lower jaw relaxed in a kind of shame-faced smile. We observed that his make was in exceeding good distribution, and though he was slightly knock-kneed, he made play as straight ahead as a pendulum, losing nothing by sideling. Gildersleeve's natural ballast, on the contrary, rounded him to, slightly, at every step, and his shoulders were partly employed in counteracting the swing. McCabe, who was compact all over, trotted along like a stiff little pig, giving nowhere, and the Indian, a long, stringy six-footer, seemed to follow his head like a kite's bobs—the nearest way for a wave. Gildersleeve, it struck us, was lividly pale, the Indian ready to cry with anxiety, McCabe spunky, and Barlow slyly confident of success.

We crossed over to the stands, where, we presume, upon four acres of ground, there were twenty-five thousand men. It was a peculiar-looking crowd—sprinklings excepted, very game-y. We presume no pick of New York city could have brought out of it, so completely, the stuff it holds for an army. The betting was going on vigorously—Barlow and Steeprock the favorites, but every man talking up his countryman. The Irish swore up McCabe as he came along, the English applauded Barlow, the New-Yorkers encouraged Gildersleeve and the Indian. Meantime, the horse-fence-men rode open the crowd with striking and shouting; betting-books were whipped out at every completed mile; boys cried cigars; rowdies broke down barriers and climbed into the stands; the men on the roofs pointed after the runners, and hallooed the gainings and losings; and every third minute the naked white shoulders came round ahead, and it was manifest that Barlow gained constantly, and, unless the little Yankee or the Indian could overhaul him by a miraculous push, he was sure to win.

They came along for the tenth mile, and the crowd were almost still with anxiety. The overtaking rush, by which Gildersleeve won in the last race, was now expected of him by his backers. Barlow passed, a hundred feet ahead; Steeprock strained after, with a sponge at his lips, and his knees tottering; Gildersleeve came third, a spectacle of pallor and exhaustion; Greenhalgh, another Englishman, was evidently making more speed—and that was the last we saw of them in motion.

With the thousands rushing in from all sides we were swept toward the judges' stand. The horsemen came on, in the midst of a sea of heads keeping pace with them, whips going, shouts pealing, boys and bullies screaming, swearing, and crowding. "Barlow!" "Barlow!" "Barlow!" arose from hundreds of wild voices, and the tumult of inquiry as to the others grew deafening. We backed out a little to hear the victor called off by the judges. A moment's stillness was procured, and the competitors were named from the stand in the order in which they had come in: Barlow, Steeprock, Greenhalgh, Gildersleeve. The time made by the winner was ten miles in fifty-four minutes twenty-one seconds.

As we turned away, Gildersleeve was brought along by two men, with his eyes half closed and his tongue loose in his lips; and he seemed just able to place his feet, one after the other, mechanically, as he was lifted over the ground. A sicker-looking man we never saw. A minute after, Barlow appeared above the crowd, on a man's shoulders, waving his hand and smiling quite composedly, and the shouts, apparently from every voice, hailed him victor.

P. S. We had nearly forgotten a good conundrum the race gave birth to:—

Question.—Why did Barlow run so like a locomotive yesterday?

Answer.—Because he had behind him an Indian-near.

NEW TRIAL OF CULPRIT POETS.—Mrs. Gilman has invented a new kind of book ("Oracles from the Poets," of which we gave a notice a few days ago), and the opening preface, very charmingly written, tries the poets by new standards altogether. She had occasion to ransack all the popular authors for answers to the fate-questions of her Fortune-Teller, and of course she discovered where lay the most thought and feeling of a peculiar character. She begins by finding out that poets are benevolent. She had great difficulty in finding sixty answers to the question, "To what have you a distaste or aversion?" while "What gratifies your taste or affections?" was stuff as common as clover. She says that in Shakspeare there is a singular lack of mention of places of residence, and there seems not to be even a fair proportion of passages descriptive of musical sounds, hours, seasons, and (except in the Winter's Tale) of flowers. In Wordsworth, scarcely a flower or musical sound is described. They are alluded to, but not painted out. The poetry of Crabbe, though abounding in numerous characters, could furnish almost nothing for her purpose, on account of their being woven into the general strain of his narrations. Shelley, Landon, and Howitt, are eminently the poets of flowers, while Darwin, with a whole "Botanic Garden" before him, and Mason, in his "English Garden," gave none fairly entitled to selection. Few passages of any sort, except those hackneyed into adages, could be gained from Milton, on account of the abstract, lofty, and continuous flow of his diction. Coleridge has corresponding peculiarities. Keats and Shelley are the poets of the heavens. Byron, with faint exceptions, does not describe a flower, or musical sound, or place of residence. The AMERICAN POETS, in contradistinction to their elder and superior brethren of the fatherland, display a more marked devotion to nature, with which a continued glow of religious sentiment aptly harmonizes.

Apropos—as the living American poets are in process of 'broidery, would it not be well to know where their worsteds are deficient, that they may shop up their lacking threads in the Broadway of contemplation? Will not some of our several sleeping female geniuses (intellectual dolce-far-nientes, of whom we know at least a capable dozen) take up the American poets and go through them with a discriminating bodkin, showing what colors lack replenishing? It would serve the poetry of Bryant-dom—the present passing age in which this faultless poet is the flower in most palpable relief. Come, ladies! tell us what Lowell (whose fame is being worked just now) had better thread his inspired needle with! Tell us what Longfellow is out of. Tell us whether Halleck has done enough to cover the pattern, and whether some others hadn't better unravel and work it all over again! At any rate, turn up their frames of immortality and show us the wrong side! Let them mend, if they like,

"Ere the worm pierce their tapestry, and the spider Weave his thin curtain o'er unfinished dreams."

THE UPPER TEN THOUSAND OF NEW YORK CITY.—The first three of the following paragraphs are from the True Sun of November 22, and the last is from the same paper of a day or two previous:—

"Politically, we are all republicans—socially, we are divided into classes on the 'European plan.' There is a certain class, for instance, that takes exercise only on one side of Broadway—the west side. The 'canaille,' to-be-sure, may walk there too, because, fortunately, our aristocracy, with all its pride and vanity, has no power; but what perfumed and ringleted exquisite would ever think of sporting his white kids, mustaches, and goatee, on the east side of our great thoroughfare? That would be literally wasting his sweetness on the desert air. We understand, by-the-by, that Stewart is severely censured for choosing the site of Washington Hall as the location of his new temple of taste and fashion, merely because it is situated on the east side of Broadway. However, if the pavement in front is sprinkled thrice a day with eau de Cologne, and Mr. Stewart doubles the price of his goods, in order to give ton to the location, it may do away with the fashionable prejudice against the promenade of the nobodies, and thereby equalize the value of the property on the two sides of the street. At present there is a very material difference in the price of the brick and mortar which borders the two pavements."

"THE OPERA.—That this is a refined and elegant amusement, no one can doubt; but to exaggerate its consequence, to make it a grand controlling feature in our society, is, in our judgment, giving it undue importance. With regard to its being a very 'aristocratic' affair in New York, we can only say, that a complete refutation of such an idea may be easily had at any time by a glance at the dress-circle habilites."

"THE ARISTOCRACY.—We must confess we do not think that wealth is the only essential necessary to place one in 'good society.' We can imagine many refined, intellectual, and charming people, who do not drive equipages lined with silk, and who have neither coachman nor footman bedizened with lace. What would be thought of the elegance of a leader of the ton, who could take a peculiarly-dressed partridge from a dinner-table, and place it in his hat, in order to carry it home with him? We do not imagine that such an attempt (for it was unsuccessful) marks any very superior degree of refinement!"

"There are some, again, who study a profound reserve, or rather adopt an appearance of hauteur. They are stiff, quiet, and unapproachable. These are the dandies of the cities, who adopt the Horatian sentiment of

"'Odi profanum vulgus,' &c."

You must not come 'between the wind and their nobility.' They wear the last productions of Watson, or Jennings, or Carpenter, and display a clean pair of kid gloves, with the last fashion of wrist-buttons. You might, if uninitiated, suppose them some distinguished foreigners on their travels. In nine cases out of ten they belong to the parvenu order of the aristocracy. Whiskey or codfish has taken a rise, and their honored father has made a fortune. The family-mansion in a back lane has been abandoned for some fashionable quarter, and visits—on one side—have been paid throughout the neighborhood. If they choose, they could astonish, but they would not condescend. The railroad-car does not shake down their consequence. They regret this progress of one art, which makes so many other arts useless. They are delighted when they escape from the crowd and seek the hotel, where the extravagant charges prevent the danger of further collision."

We received yesterday an anonymous letter, reproving us, in sober bad English, for ministering to the vanity of the rich, by an article in the Mirror on the selection of "a promenade drive." This, the reproof also given us a day or two since by a political paper for an article on the prima-donna, and the foregoing paragraphs from a neutral paper, aimed principally at popularity with the working classes, are sufficient indications, we think, that some bitter weed, passing for an aristocracy-nettle, is rolled up in the present cud of the reposing people.

We commence taking exceptions to the tone of these articles, by stating what seems to us a fact of general notoriety—that the ten thousand people uppermost in this city—(aristocrats, if wealth and position make them so)—are the most moral and scrupulous ten thousand in the four hundred thousand of the population. There is probably about this number—ten thousand—who are rich enough, if they choose, to keep a carriage. Two thirds of them, we presume, were poor men a few years ago, and the children of three fourths of them will be obliged to work for a living (a flying-fish aristocracy, who are hardly long enough out of the water, one would think, to give offence by their brief airs to those left in the element below them). There is a smaller class—perhaps two thousand families—who have been respectable and well off for two or more generations. There is a third class, still—perhaps one or two hundred—whose display is offensive, from no one's knowing where their money comes from, or from their being supposed to live dishonestly above their means, or from being notoriously vicious.

Of these three classes—an "aristocracy" of ten thousand—one half, at least, are religious, and the remainder seek refined pleasures, and attend theatres and operas; but, with the exception of the third and smallest class last named, we venture to repeat, that the upper ten thousand are by much the most exacting of moral character in their friends, the most rigid in the support of moral opinions and charities, and the most exemplary in their individual private life. This is true of the upper ten thousand of no other country in the world. It would sound Utopian in England to assert this to be true of the upper classes of any city on the face of the earth. Look at the difference of the standards in ordinary matters. To make a good match, here, it is necessary that a young man should be moral; and if he be of high character in this respect (and the lady willing), public opinion will not suffer his pretensions to be slighted by the richest man! In every other country the lover's morality is altogether a secondary consideration—family and fortune far before it. Morality is a young man's best card in New York; whether his object be influence, matrimony, good business-connexion, appointments from societies, or general position in the best circles. This truth needed only to be put in print to make people wonder it had not been said before!

It is a wretched trick caught from English papers and English plays, to talk of the rich as certainly vicious, and of the poor as necessarily virtuous. We live in a country where the sovereignty (that part of society which vice commonly noses and follows close after) resides at the opposite end from the sovereignty of England. The more virtuous class, here as there, is comparatively powerless at the polls. The rowdy drunkard and the gambler do as much toward president-making and the selection of lawgivers, as the thrifty merchant, and the rich father of a family of virtuous daughters; and, as there are a hundred husbands, of either of the first-named classes, to one of either of the others, virtue and order keep company with sovereignty—in this country as little as in Europe! Power is at the surface of a country, and the scum rises to it. We are quite aware, that the pen and inkstand with which we write these sentiments will not be, to all readers, “a pot of lambative electuary with a stick of licorice.”

RIVALRY AT THE OPERA.—The musical tilt, to decide which was the more prime of the prima-donnas, came off last night, to the very great entertainment of the town's ornamentals. It reminded us very strongly of the contention between the lute and the nightingale, in the old play of the “Lover's Melancholy.” Borghese drops dead in the last act, very soon after a glorious and triumphant outbreak by Pico; and we will quote a passage to show how this resembles the poetic story—premising, by-the-way, that a musician, playing in the woods, is overheard by a bird, who mocks him till the lute-player gets angry at the excellence of the rivalry:—

“To end the controversy, in a rapture,
Upon his instrument he plays so swiftly—

So many voluntaries and so quick—

That there was curiosity and cunning,

Concord in discord, lines of differing method,

Meeting in one full centre of delight.

—the bird (ordained to be Music's first martyr) strove to imitate

These several sounds; which, when her warbling throat

Failed in, for grief down dropped she on his lute,

And broke her heart.”

But, to tell the other story—“after the manner of men.”

The opera was “Lucrezia Borgia.” Signorina Borghese represents (as well as we could understand the story) a bad mother, who, in poisoning a large party of youths, half rakes, half conspirators, for having insulted her sign over the door, poisons one too many—her son. Madame Pico represents the leader of the set, and does the noise and the jollification. She descends upon the stage the first thing after the rising of the curtain, dressed in a very modest suit of male attire, and figures about as a Roman Captain Rynders, bandying dialogue here and there, but with no chance of display in the three or four first acts. Borghese, we began to think, was to have the best of it all the way through. She was exquisitely dressed, sang with as little of the split-straw in her soprano as we ever heard her sing with, and acted to her singing (as she always does) with what the Greeks called onomatopœia—movement linked with sound indivisibly. The applause was pretty well, but not overpowering.

The fourth act represented the youths at the fatal supper, Pico the principal customer. After a little hobnobbing on the other side of the table, she glides round, upon her plumpitudinous locomotives, and dashes into a song, rich, rollicking, and risregliato! Down went the bucket for the first time into her well of contralto, and up came the liquid and golden music, of a round, true fulness, that made the ear's thirst a luxury. It was a passage full of involutions, abrupt, startling, and bacchanal; but her skill in flinging her voice from point to point, with the capricious surprises of the music, was wonderfully subtle. The audience was, for the first time in the evening, fairly lifted clear of the ground. On the part of the stage-company, no encore was looked for at this point of the opera. The closing of Pico's song is the signal for a death-bell and the disclosing of a hearse a-piece for the jolly junketers. The audience were not ready, however. The applause kept on till the hearses backed out, and the song was sung over again. Oh, how deliciously it was sung! No voice, however large its compass, was ever sweeter, rounder, mellow in its quality, than Madame Pico's. The audience murmured, and leaned forward, and ejaculated, and with one unhesitating accord, it seemed to us, gave over the palm to the contralto. The chorus-singers seemed surprised—she herself forgot her male attire, and courted (the first time we ever saw how it was done, by-the-by), a tributary bouquet flew over the footlights, and Lucrezia Borgia rose up once more, like an apparition amid the hearses in waiting.

The last act, like the first three, was all Borghese's. It is deep tragedy, and she played it well. The young man, poisoned by mistake, held his stomach till he was done for, and his letting go was the signal for Borghese to give her “C sharp,” and go after him. The curtain dropped, and the applause rose immediately. Borghese came out and was cheered till she courted out, but still the applause continued. No reply. The canes began to rap, and the audience seemed not beginning to go. “Pico!” shouted somebody. “Pico!” shouted everybody. Still no answer. The deafening uproar at last lifted the curtain, and there was Borghese! led forward by Perozzi, and courtesying again! And presently, all alone, with her hair down her back, her mustache gone, and a loose dressing-gown about her, the real queen by acclamation took the honors there was no longer any denying her. The will of the audience, and the will of the Italian corps, were two entirely different matters.

We really do not see why these fine-throated people can not consent to do their best, and let the public like which they please. The two singers are both admirable, each unrivalled in her way: and, because we admire the new-comer, it is no reason why we should not still appreciate our former favorite. But see how unlike musical people in prose are to musical people in poetry. We will quote the conclusion of the pretty story we began our criticism with, for a lesson of magnanimity, after the bird dropped, broken-hearted, upon the lute.

“It was the quaintest sadness
To see the conqueror, upon her hearse,
Weeping a funeral elegy of tears.
He looks upon the trophies of his art,

Then sighed, then wiped his eyes, then sighed and cried,
 'Alas! poor creature, I will soon revenge
 This cruelty upon the author of it.
 Henceforth this lute, guilty of innocent blood,
 Shall never more betray a harmless peace
 To an untimely end:' and, in that sorrow,
 As he was pushing it against a tree,
 I suddenly stepped in."

Another night we trust to see Borghese submitting resignedly, like the bird, to be beaten; though if the conquering Pico undertakes, in consequence, to "pash herself against a tree," we trust the manager will "suddenly step in."

THE HISTORICAL SOCIETY DINNER.—We went to the dinner of the Historical Society last evening, with a mood in our mental pocket, which was as useless to us as the wrong mask for a night of carnival. We went to indulge in relaxation and gratify curiosity. We decided in the midst of confusing avocations, that it would be delightful to see Mr. Adams and Mr. Galatin, pleasant to listen to the voices whose words we should read in the next morning's papers, and curious to see the first menu of the opening hotel up-town. We presumed there would be some dull talking, which the dinner and the friends around would keep off with the by-play of conviviality, and that we should, at any rate, hear wit, get our cares jostled from astride us, and store up, for illustration to future thought and reading, two pictures of men who are soon to pass over to history.

But—(the two great statesmen) who were to be present set aside for the moment—it is not easy to come at all into the presence of a large number of men of superior intellect, without feeling the dormant thunder of the cloud about us. This is partly a moral magnetism, we presume, but there is a physiognomy in crowds; and, to the eye accustomed to see men "as they come," the look of an assemblage of master-intellects is the laying of a spirit-hand upon the beholder. There were present the leading minds of this great metropolis—able divines, merchant princes, formidable politicians, brilliant lawyers, scheming capitalists, influential citizens, philanthropists, scholars, poets, and journalists—none of them common men, and none without the sympathy-read print upon the forehead—distinction's phylactery of pain.* Seated at table, we looked about upon the men we knew, and followed back into their bosoms the visible thread of which we knew the knot at the heart-strings. We have no time here—(our hasty thoughts going from us, sentence by sentence, into irrevocable print, as we record them)—no time to separate and describe the crowding influences that changed our careless preparatory mood into an overshadowed and attentive silence. We passed an evening of resistless revery—much of it homage, much of it quickening to ambition, and in part a coveting of fellowship and sympathy. But we can not go on with this misplaced record of emotions.

There are weighty and wide influences exercised by an historical society, which, again, we can only hint at, far too hastily. Historical record is the paymaster of the immortality toiled for by greatness; and it is vital to the existence of great motives, that this treasurer's trust should be faithfully discharged, and his accounts chronicled in blazon. Affecting mention was drawn from Mr. Adams of his coming reward from history—the reward of justificatory triumph—for having passed through the fire of calumny. It was over these heated plough-shares that he has walked to the luminous door by which he is about to pass from the world; and if he could be sure of no brother-spirits left behind, to see the truth written in characters legible to the world, he would have done his great services to his country, by sufferings, indeed, mournfully thankless. In a republic, especially in an age of free-thinking and irreverence for usage, like ours—the influence of a society which brightens and keeps manifest the coolly-proved wisdom of the past, is more especially all-needful. History forgotten, the present is a ship without chart or compass, trusting to the stars alone in the clouded storm-nights of politics. Ambition, with that watchful dragon asleep—no record to be dreaded beyond the memory of the living—would be a fiend loosed upon the world. History is our citadel of safety.

* We may say, in passing, that we have seen the first men of their time in many countries, and many assemblages of distinguished men, but it struck us that we had never seen either a finer collection of intellectual heads, or finer individual specimens, than this occasion had brought together.

NEW KIND OF HOTEL UP-TOWN.—We have thought that it would, perhaps, interest our readers to go into a detail of the differences between the popular hotel (like the Astor, the American, Howard's, &c.) and what is understood in Europe as the hotel-garni—of which the up-town hotel is the new example in this country.

The hotel-garni is a furnished house, in which the lodging is the only charge not variable at the option of the guest. A certain price is charged for the rooms occupied, and the other expenses are according to what is ordered. A popular bachelor, for example, makes a great economy of this. He pays for his rooms and his breakfast; and, if invited out to dine five times in the week, saves the corresponding items in his bill—five dinners and five bottles of wine. This, in Europe, is considered a fair offset against patent blacking, white gloves, and hack-hire; and puts society on a level with health, sunshine, reputation, and other plain matters-of-course. A common table and a restaurant are not necessary parts of a hotel-garni, but they serve to increase its eligibility. There is a certain price for a dinner at the table d'hôte, charged separately every day; but in Europe few dine at the common table except strangers in town. A fashionable man avoids it as an implied confession, 1st, that he has not been invited out that day, and, 2d, that he can content himself with everybody's dinner and company. For families, particularly if there are unmarried daughters, it is irreconcilable with position, if not with propriety, to live at the public table. The rooms in these hotels are arranged so as to unite a drawing-room with each bedroom, and every person, or family, respectfully lodged, has a private parlor for meals and reception of visits. There is no large common drawing-room, of course. The meals are furnished by express order, given each day, to the restaurant below, and sent up with tablecloth, silver, glass, &c.—all at the appointed hour, and all removed together when dinner is over—giving the lodger no trouble, except to wait on himself while dining, or provide a servant to do so. As each dish is for one person only, however (or one family), the expense of such a dinner is much greater than where the dishes are cooked in larger quantities for a hundred people. To dine in private on as many dishes as you may taste for fifty cents at a public table, would cost, probably, from two to five dollars.

The ordinary hotel is, of course, described by specifying the peculiarities of the other. It will be seen at once that the hotel-garni must prevail with the increase of exclusiveness in this country. It is only in new countries that families can do without household gods; and it is only where the whole male society of a country is only unharassed for sleep from the eternal drag of money-making, that the domestic virtues can be left safely without private altars and locked doors, single roof-trees, and four-walled simplicity. Twenty years hence, we venture to say, the Astor's splendid drawing-room will be occupied by some nabob of a lodger—needed no longer as a common parlor—and its long galleries will be but suites of apartments, every third bedroom converted into a cosy saloon, and the occupants seeing as little of each other as neighbors in a "block."

There are some very republican advantages in our present system of hotels, which the country is not yet ready to forego. Tell a country lady in these times that when she comes to New York she must eat and pass the evening in a room by herself, and she would rather stay at home. The going to the Astor, and dining with two hundred well-dressed people, and sitting in full dress in a splendid drawing-room with plenty of company—is the charm of going to the city! The theatres are nothing to that! Broadway, the shopping, and the sights, are all subordinate—poor accessories to the main object of the visit. A large company as cheap as none at all—a hundred dishes as cheap as one—a regal drawing-room at her service, with superb couches, piano, and drapery, and costing no more than if she stayed in her bedroom—plenty of eyes to dress for if not to become acquainted with, and very likely a "hop" and a band of music—bless my soul, says the country lady, I hope they'll never think of improving away all that!

And, there lies the pinch! The senator now on his way to congress, dines with his family at the public table. The gentleman who does not choose to keep house, invites his friends to dine with him at the public table. The man who prefers to dine in a private parlor is satirically made welcome to his own society—if he prefers it! The distinguished, the fashionable, the dressy, and handsome, may all dine, without peril of style, at the public table. But—since so many the opposites of all these, and anybody else who is tolerably dressed and well-behaved—the public table is the tangible republic—the only thing palpable and agreeable that we have to show, in common life, as republican. And when the exclusivism of the hotel-garni draws its dividing line through this promiscuous community of habits, the cords will be cut which will let some people up, out of reach, and drop some people down, out of all satisfactory supposable contact with society.

GROWTH OF WESTERN LITERATURE.—We are happy to notice that seven out of the seventeen articles with the names of the authors, in the last two numbers of the Biblical Repository, are from persons connected with literary institutions west of the mountains. Among the subjects of the western writers are, The Writings of Martin Luther; Evidences from Nature for the Immortality of the Soul; and the Natural History of Man in his Spiritual Relations. Another article contains an able defence of presbyterianism. So far as we can judge from a hasty view, these subjects, some of which are the greatest that can employ the pen anywhere, are treated with tact and ability, and give us a favorable opinion of the condition of our western seminaries of learning. The remaining contributions are from New England, with the exception of one from Virginia. New York does not appear in the list of contributors' names.

THE OPERA.—The "stars" of the opera are just through their night's work and the stars of heaven are half way through theirs. We have not the pleasure of a personal acquaintance with a single individual in either company—knowing neither Venus nor Pico, Lyra nor Borghese, "off the stage." We are about to announce an ASTROLOGICAL CONJUNCTION, however, and, as "many an inhumane thought hath arisen from a man's sitting uncomfortably in his chamber," we have sent for an emollient to our arm chair, in the shape of cold duck and champagne—expecting thereby to achieve our nearest perihelion to the calm clear-sightedness of Copernicus.

Up-town New York, a week ago, was in the situation the starry firmament was in, about two hundred years before the Christian era. Pythagoras recorded his conviction at that time that there were two stars wanting to complete the harmony of a certain portion of the heavens, and, in the very spots named by the great philosopher, Mars and Jupiter did soon after make their first appearance. In like manner a Daily Pythagoras, of this city (we think it was Mr. King of the American), darkly hinted in a late evening paper, that there were two stars necessary—contralto and soprano—to complete harmony of the Palmspheric constellation; and, in that very troop, Pico and Borghese did soon after take their places in similarly harmonious conjunction. We trust history will do us justice for linking together these two marked foreshadowings of stars' "doing something for their families."

And now we have to beg the discreet portion of the public to step with us behind the curtain—not that (representing the rosy dawn) which drops before Mars and Jupiter, but that (representing Jupiter feeling the pulse of Minerva) which drops before Borghese and Pico. There has been a terrible rowdydow in the operatic green-room. Borghese has been hitherto queen of the zodiac, and her orbit was only intersected by nebulae of nameless supernumeraries. The breaking of Pico upon the gaze of the impartial star-worshippers, however, and their undeniable preference, of the star at fifty dollars a night to the star at double the money, sent Borghese sick to her bed; and she is said to have vowed (with the spunk of the Lost Pleiad, who died for jealousy of her six brighter sisters) that she would never rise again—if papa would excuse her.

[Our astronomy is used up, dear reader, but the champagne still holds out. A glass to Borghese's better resignation, and let us go on, in terrestrial phraseology.—M-m-mplek!]

Borghese commenced making position, a year or more ago, and has pursued it very skillfully, and, therefore, very creditably to herself. For a winter, or more, before showing herself as an admirable actress, she revolved in the japonica circles up-town, as a singer at parties, and made acquaintances and friendships exclusively among the forced-plant customers of Hogg and Thorburn. Her manners were of that well-studied, eager unconsciousness, which is the modesty of nature in a hot-house school; and her tact, elegance, and musical science, were leaved like a rose-bud tied up with a string—showing what the prima-donna might be, if the young lady were loosed and expanded. As the parent-stem required to be relieved of her, she prepared to throw herself on the public; and when she did, she was, of course, plucked from neglect, and cherished in the protecting bosom of the society that had secluded her. She has been worn in triumph, as the first flower of the opera, for a couple of seasons—as you know, dear public!

But nature exacts an equilibrium; and where there is more public harmony, there will be more private discord. The children of the "boot on the map," kick against authorities, and every tuneful rehearsal had its offset in a quarrel. Signor Borghese (the star-father), not being of the sect of the Apotactite, who renounce property, took advantage of a tight place in the treasury, and bought in, "for a song," the theatrical weapons and wardrobe. Of course, whatever solvent might separate the other parts of the company, they, crystallized, again, around their only possible nucleus—the prima-donna who had the togger! And, at this stage of the Borghese monarchy—came Pico!

Months passed away. The story of Pico's errand—her husband a political prisoner at Venice, and her voice the only probable conjurer of the gold key to release or relieve him—was told and apparently forgotten. We heard it, and reserved our republican sympathy till she should appear. The Mirror suggested a concert—knowing nothing of her powers—but her friends thought she had better bide her time with the opera. She has done so. At half the pay of Borghese, she played to-night for the second time, in the opera of Lucrezia Borgia.

We have come home from hearing her—"possessed" (as this undevoured cold duck is our witness)—our capacity for delight plummeted—our cistern of unshed tears strangely and pleasurably troubled—our pen as gushing with welcome to Pico as the miraculous oil-spring of old Rome that welcomed home the conquering Augustus.

[Her health in this last glass of champagne—God bless her!]

The house was crowded. Borghese sang beautifully, and played as no other female in America can play. She was heartily applauded—but—as on the last opera night—the tumult of the house was reserved for the drinking song of Pico. It is her first chance to unchain soul and voice after nearly a whole opera of subservient by-play. Oh how the first swooping away into those clear silver caverns of her throat—dropping through unfathomable love-depths with her fearless down-cadences, and turning with an easy up-lift again toward the summit-perch of the careless altissimo—how like an eagle's swoop it careered! overtaking the dew falling, and the perfume rising into the sky, and, with all its fierce swiftness, robbing into the cleft air of nothing but fragrance and softness.

[We are getting poetical—but champagne after Pico, is, as the Venetians say, tanto amorevole! We'll go to bed and sum up in the morning.]

Thursday Morning.—Our friend of the "Morning News," expresses, in his paper of to-day, a regret that "a feeling of rivalry is encouraged between Borghese and Pico." We are surprised at this discouragement, on his knowing part, of the great secret of good opera and good everything else. When are they ever so likely to sing so well, and to draw so well, as when

"their souls come upward to their lips
Like neighboring monarchs at their borders meeting!"

He adds, that "Pico fairly out-Pico'd Pico," and we should say the same of Borghese, if the name would come as pat.

No! no! let them be rivals! What could be prettier?—more gracefully done, and more touchingly enlisting to the feelings—than Borghese's picking up the wreath again, last night, and giving it generously to Pico? We broke a new malacca stick in applauding that action alone. Viva Borghese! Viva Pico! You are two halves of a scissors, dear ladies, and rivalry is your rivet. Divide the public—since both halves are your own, after they are divided!

PICO AND BORGHESE.—These two ladies are certainly most potent commodities, and the town drinks their delicious music with unquestionable intoxication. The crammed opera-house was as breathless with absorbed attention last night as if Pico's rosy-lipped cup ministered to every heart's measure of ful-ness—one palate common to all. For ourself, we confess immeasurable delight in Pico. Her voice has a road to the heart upon which criticism takes no toll—the gate-opening facility of music going home. One listens to it as Shelley seems to have listened to the witch of Atlas—

"Her voice was like the voice of his own soul Heard in the calm of thought,"

—the very inmost tenant of your bosom, somehow, seeming to have "expected it, all along."

Borghese is a treasure to a town—an uncommon creature—such an actress and artist as we shall not see again until we deserve a benefit from the gods—but Pico! oh, Pico is of quite another invoice of goods from paradise. Borghese is the most ingenious harmony-pump that, for many a year, has offered patronage a handle—the other is a natural-well spring of passionate and careless music, that would flow as bountifully, for a bird to drink, as for an emperor to stoop to. Pico's voice would cut up like a polypus—not a fragment without the making of a woman in it. She neither sings, nor moves, nor smiles, as if she remembered ever doing it before; and if she has not the great "art of concealing art" (of which we have had our half a suspicion), she is one of those helpless irresistibles that could as soon become invisible as not bewitch.

The drinking song (Pico's only good chance in the whole opera), was stunningly applauded last night, and, at the close, a wreath was thrown to her from a very select company in a private box, and thrown with a pretty good aim—for she caught it upon her bosom. Out of it—(or the place where she caught it—we could not tell which)—dropped a sealed note, which we trust contained a check payable in favor of the imprisoned husband at Venice.

If we had a moderate thought during the opera of last night, it was that there could be no question of a keen taste for music in New York—for here was a crowded audience, attentive, appreciative, measuring its applause most judiciously, and leaving the house delighted. We are sure a large opera-house would do—with more inducements to foreign subordinates, more enterprise to procure visits from the Parisian and London operatics, better regulations for private boxes, etc., etc. We think, for one, that there is no greater pleasure, away from a man's hearth, than a good opera.

ENVY OF THE RICH, OR, THE FLYING-FISH ARISTOCRACY, AND THE NO. 1 PASSENGER LEFT BEHIND.—In the hurry of composition, yesterday, we stumbled upon a similitude (a "flying-fish aristocracy") which, we think, expresses that transitory duration of American "up-in-the-world," which should make the greater number of rich people looked upon with indulgent affection by those left temporarily below. Of such short-lease wings as most American "first families" fly with, there need be little envy, one would think—in the democratic element they drip with till they drop again. There are families, however—a small number—who hold their own for three or four generations; and, in the "measureless content" of these with their position, the democrats find offence; but one of the most curious social problems we know of, is the manner in which the old families of New York are let alone, and tacitly eclipsed by the more newly prosperous; and we must offer to our readers a descriptive similitude for this also. (Our object, it will be seen, is to take away the offence of aristocracy, if possible, and induce King Public to let us cater for them, as for all other classes, with level editorial republicanism!)

A half hour before the starting of the Oxford night mail, a fat gentleman was discovered fast asleep in the coach, which was still under the shed. He occupied the back seat, and his enormous bulk filled it so completely that there was no room for the usual fourth inside passenger. But four seats were taken and paid for, and the last man booked insisted on his right to a place—fat man, or no fat man! The stout gentleman was waked, and requested to come out till the other three were seated.

"He [however] knew his rights, and knowing dared maintain," and having mentioned his name, and inquired whether it was not first on the book, settled his chin into his cravat, and speedily snored again! "Is this Oxford?—bless me, how I have slept!" said the fat man, rubbing his eyes, when the coach door was opened the next morning—in the same place where it stood when he went to sleep! The driver had hitched his team to another coach, and the three unprivileged customers last booked were probably breakfasting in Oxford!

It strikes us that the people who are last booked, in this community, may very well monopolize the envy—(success in arriving at their destination of conspicuousness being, of course, the chief matter of envy)—and the fat sleepers, upon the usurped seats, once left out of the proscription, the charity for "flying-fish" easily forgives the remainder.

If the above does not please our friend "Cheap Jemmy," we will never do a good-natured thing again as long as we live. If he knew Latin, we should send him in a bill for a diaphoretic.

AFTER THE OPERA.

(Supper in 184's room at the Astor—the brigadier here "on business"—a poulet pique, and a bottle of champagne in silver tissue paper, also here "on business"—Eleven O'clock, Esq., just parting from the bell of St. Paul's, with a promise to be "round in the morning.")

Brig. (nodding, and taking up his glass).—Mi-boy!

184 (laying his hand on the general's arm).—Not in such profane haste, my prompt sodger! That glass of wine is the contemporary of bliss—sent to us to be drank to the health of a bride, now three hours past the irrevocable gate.

Brig. Married at eight? Do you say that? God bless her, in a bumper! (gazes abstractedly into the bottom of the glass, and speaks musingly).—Ten minutes past eleven!—Well, who's the lady, and who the happy man?

184. One of our parish, who, though he does not personally know us, wishes us to be made aware of his happiness. We have written ourselves into his bosom. God bless him for the loving door in his eye—isn't so, my tree-sparer! So may all men take us in! Try a bit of chicken now, general, or that tear in your eye will fall back on an empty stomach!

Brig. And what a difference it makes—what it falls back upon, mi-boy! The salt in a tear is not natural, depend on it, or the in'ards would take to it more kindly. What an etiquette of mercy it would be, now, to make pathos and bad news matters of full-dress—never to be alluded to in good society, till a man has ceased, as Menenius says, "to pout upon the morning!" What's your to-morrow's leader?

184. Not coming to business at the second glass, I hope? Fie on you for a disrespect to the bride. (The brigadier blushes, and covers his confusion by reading the label on the bottle.) How enchantingly old Belisario and his captive sung their vows of friendship to-night! Ah, music and lights!—things are so much finer for embellishing! Our small friendship now, general—brought forward to the prompter's cupboard and foot-lights—do you think it would be en-cored, like that?

Brig. As you don't ask for information, mi-boy, let's proceed to business. Can you give me an idea of your to-morrow's editorial?

184. No!

Brig. And the boy is to come for it at seven!

184 (seizing a pen). What shall it be?

Brig. Why, there's the mud in the streets—and the Bohemian Girl—and the wretched weather—and the menagerie—and Vandenhoff—and Stuart's candy-shop—and Mrs. Coles—

184. By—the—by!—a discovery!—Tryon ought to head his play-bills with the Marsellois war-cry—"to arms!—to arms!" I never saw a pair in my life more exquisitely moulded and polished than Mrs. Coles's, of the Bowery circus—as shown after her third undoing on horseback! It takes a symmetrical woman, of course, to stand tiptoe upon a flying horse, and strip, from a jacketed Cracovienne to a short sleeved evening dress—but ladies of this vocation, well made in all other respects, are usually thin from the elbow to the shoulder. Shall I make a "leader" of Mrs. Coles?

Brig. Certainly not, mi-boy! nor a follower either! Just indicate, as it were—call attention mysteriously—hint somehow—that there is a part of the equestrian performance that reminds you of things you saw in Italy—statuary or something—delicately, mi-boy—very delicately! What else have you got down there in your memorandum-book?

184. Half a dozen topics. Here's a note that smells of "above Bleecker," requesting us to implore of Japonica-dom not to give parties on opera-nights! Really, they should not! The opera is a rare luxury, without which a metropolis is like a saloon without a mirror, and there should be a little combination, among refined people—if not to give it extra support, at least to throw no hindrance in its way. They do this in London—(where, by the way, there are but two operas a week, and it would be quite enough here)—Lady Blessington, for one, never "at home" on opera-nights, and dinner-parties are given at an earlier hour to release people in time. The quality of the opera depends, of course, on its enthusiastic support, and those who can appreciate it can do no less, I think, than to go in full dress, and go habitually. It is far pleasanter than a party, is over at bearable bedtime, and, just now, the company at Palmo's is too good to be slighted. And, by the way, have you thought how gloriously Pico has begged the loud trumpet we blew for her on her first appearance! "Ants," says the old proverb, "live safely till they have gotten wings, and juniper is not thrown away till it hath gotten a high top." She is neither your ant nor your juniper-blossom—is she general?

Brig. (who has been dozing). Not my aunt, mi-boy, whoever you're talking of. I never had one—hope I never shall!

184. What's that note falling out of your pocket, meantime?

Brig. Well thought of—I brought it to you for a paragraph. What do you think it is? A complaint from the ladies that the young men waylay them on the staircases!

184. Heavens and Sabines! wait till I dip my pen in the thunder-stand! Who? How? When? How many?

Brig. At parties—at parties—my dear boy—don't be violent! This lady declares (brigadier opens the note) that it is a "perfect nuisance, the mere descent from the dressing-room to the ball-room"—"a pretty girl has to come down a perfect ladder of boys—every stair an engagement to dance"—"no chance for a pick"—"her mind fatigued with the effort to remember her partners"—"no hope of dancing with a grown-up man from Christmas to April"—"green talk altogether"—"dreadful sense of unripeness"—"no subject but Pico and Polka"—"begs we will write the boys off the staircase," etc., etc. You see your subject.

184. Shall I tell you why that was not written by a woman? Don't you see that if this system of long lists of engagements were done away, a lady would have no escape from a disagreeable partner—no plea of too many engagements—no chance for a lie whiter than many a truth? Don't you see, that (now dwelling is laughed at) a lady can leave out an early partner on the list, or slip a tardy one in, with perfect ease and comfort—distressing nobody's mamma with fears of Hoboken! Leave the ladies alone for putting down troublesome usages! Your letter was written by some old coxcomb going out of fashion, who can get nobody to dance with him, and lays it to the boys on the staircase! Tut!

Brig. Twelve o'clock, and where's your leader? Oh, mi-boy, think of to-morrow's paper!

184. Hang the leader! Let's go without it—once in a way!

Brig. Graciously! no! What will the public say? There goes one o'clock! Bed-time (for me—not for you)—and nothing from you for the boy in the morning! Oh, mi-boy, sit up! Go and wash your face, and feel fresh! Write a paragraph requesting the Mirror brides to send their champagne, hereafter, exclusively to the talking partner! Where's my hat? Get inspired, mi-boy, get inspired! Good night!

184. Stay—stay—stay! Listen to this! (184 reads the foregoing dialogue to the brigadier, whose face gradually reassumes its usual serene placidity. He lays down his hat and picks another wing of the chicken.)

Brig. And you have been writing this down, all the time, with your hand deep in that old cabinet! Bless me, what a boy you are for expedients! I thought you was scratching autographs, or writing "Pico," or sketching Glenmary, or something! But you haven't mentioned the weekly!

184. Poh! it doesn't want mentioning.

Brig. Not more than the sun and moon, and other periodicals—but you trust the world's memory too much, my worky! They'd forget the sun shone if it wasn't down in the almanac! Say something!

184. Well, let's see! It's our diary of the world's goings-on and what we think of it—published every seventh day. It is a week's corn, ground, sifted, and bagged, for those who can't go to mill every day. It is a newspaper without the advertisements and other trumpery—at half price, in consequence of lumber left out and one postage instead of seven. It is edited every day, and other weeklies are edited once a week. It gives the news, the fashions, the fun, the accidents, the operas, and our all-spice to make it keep, in a handsome, preservable shape—bindable for reference and re-reading—"the times" as it were, "boned and potted." Shall I say any more?

Brig. Three dollars a year—

184. Mum, man! Never mention money after midnight! What will the angels say! Go to bed! go to bed! (Exit brigadier, after a silent embrace.)

AFTER THE OPERA.

A FEW GRAVE REMARKS WHILE SUPPER IS COMING.

The Cinderella-tude of Madame Pico's own situation, in the operatic corps, and her still disputed claim to the "glass slipper" of preference, sent us to Palmo's, to-night, with somewhat of an owl upon our shoulder. We dreaded Prince Public's final choice between her and the favorite daughter of Don Magnifico—for the real-life opera had come to its last act, and, as she should or should not, make the most of the opportunity (of which we had done our best to be the "Pilgrim Alidoro"), she would, or would not, wear to-morrow the crown of Palmo-dom. The curtain is down, and—

ENTER SUPPER FOR NO. 184.

Before we grow too enthusiastic for the nice distinctions of criticism, let us say a word of the general performance of the opera. Why the frisky Signor Antognini, whose conceit,

"Ploughed by the sunbeams only, would suffice
For the world's granary," was cast in a part that the unemployed Perozzi would have done so much better, and so much more agreeably to the public, we have no Italian spectacles to see. And—apropos—if it is the object of the company to please and drave, why did not Borghese (except that silver is less tractile than gold) take the second role in this opera, as Pico did in Lucrezia Borgia? The part sustained by Miss Moss has rather more scope in it than that of Orsini, and how vastly more attractive the opera, so cast, would be to the public! Signor Tomasi showed the vertebrae in his voice, to-night, more than he did in Belisario—probably from stooping with difficulty to the comic; but Sanquiro—what shall we say of his admirable personable of Don Magnifico? We'll drink his health by way of answer. (A lei, Sanquiro!) And so ends our fault-finding.

SECOND GLASS.

This glass of purple Tinta, steeped in the latitude of Italy, tastes, of course, of the climate of Pico's voice; and we are glad to vary, with this redolent bumper, the avenue to our heart—so breaking up the ear's monopoly of toll. Health to Cinderella triumphant! Her voice has a flavor—(if this wine be like it—and it is the sun's fault if it is not like it—for the same cupful of his mellow light fed the grape from which gushed the wine and the tip from which poured the melody)—worthy of the immortality of Falernian. (For this discovery of homogeneity of pulp we beg a medal from the Institute.)

We were afraid, as we said before, that Pico, "like a careless farrier, would lame her well-shod glory with the last nail," but she sang throughout with unblemished deliciousness, and the "piu mestar," at the close, fairly took the town! Nothing has been heard like it, in this city, since Malibran, either in voice or execution. We have made up our mind about Pico. Her abandon is like the apparent carelessness of all kinds of genius—fearless trust after finished study. Of that desperate and intoxicating let-go, Borghese has none. She is artistic and careful in the most passionate extremity, dying, even, "with her wits all about her." Pico fastens each link of the composer's melody in her brain, with workmanlike fidelity; but when she comes out from her music-smithy, she brings with her no memory of the clink of hammer and rivet. In that relaying forgetfulness lies the mystery of her charm. It is recognised, by the instinct men have that this is the quality of those who do best—statesmen or soldiers, poets or lovers—the most successful, in all enterprises, throwing themselves on what they have once made up their minds to, as a bird launches from the cliff. Nature prodigally seconds the unhesitating trust of Pico's execution. Her voice follows her concerted thought with the certainty of a shadow and the fulness of a floodtide. The plentitude of every shade and semi-tone, insures, in the first five minutes of hearing her, an absence of all dread of flaw or falling off—an assurance, that whatever height or depth she stoops her neck to swoop for, it will bring, for the listener,

"those music-wings
Lent to exalt us to the seventh sphere."

WE DRINK TO THE JACOB'S LADDER OF MUSIC.

A new light breaks upon us as to the uses of the opera. As (to the wicked) common speech is a convenience and swearing a luxury, so poetry is a convenience to passion, and music its luxury. An unharmonized shout—a succession of cries—may mean anything; but a chorus, or a concerted transition of cries, has a meaning to convey floodtides out of the soul. Poetry may fall cold upon the eye, but music must melt in the ear. These premises allowed, the opera becomes (does it not?) a healthful vent to the passions of a metropolis—a chance (for those who long to swear and do violence), by a more innocent "giving way."

"to wreak
Their thoughts upon expression!"

How common the feeling "to want a spree!" and who that for three hours has choked back tears in his throat, and been enraptured with a contralto across the footlights, is not ready to go to bed like a gentleman? An opera is a blessed succedaneum to the many. To the few it is the loan of a dictionary from Heaven! Thoughts otherwise mute—feelings whose dumbness is the inner man buried alive, leap to free-breathing utterance with music. It is for this reason that an unknown language is the best vehicle for an opera. We wish to hear the harmony, and let our souls furnish the articulation. Don't you see, now, my dear "Bohemian Girl!" the plain reason of the platitudes of English opera! Italian music has words to it, and so has a dancing-girl a carotid artery—but you wish to feel your own heart beat delightfully, and not to count the quickening pulses of Taglionis—you wish to embark your own thoughts in music's enchanted boat, and not see how it was first laden with other people's. A man's soul can have nothing in it unsaid, when he wants a libretto to help him listen understandingly to Pico!

And now, having translated into grammatical English, the inarticulate contents of a chicken's breast, and a pint-bottle of Tinta (for the benefit of a public to whom these eloquent midnight companions would otherwise have spoken in vain), let us to bed—apropos-inously remarking, that, in the paragraph precedent to this, there is a hint as to the uses of an opera, worthy the attention of the society of moral reform. As the clergy are, probably, asleep at this hour (3 o'clock), we say no more.

(Exit "184," with a candle.)

THE MIRROR HELD UP TO THE TIMES.—It is a trick of ours to begin at the other end, when the subject would otherwise open dry—bespeaking attention, as it were, by first naming the inducement. As we have lately been pulled up for not giving credit, we may as well mention, that we took this peculiarity of style from Mother Goose's politic inducement to the five reluctant patrons of the milkpail:—

"Cushy cow bonny, give down your milk,
And I will give you a gown of silk."

Silk gown:—we are about to show how we have arrived at the conclusion, that, in the state of the country now "opening up," it will be necessary for every gentleman to be a pugilist.

We beg to premise, that the state of things we are about to show forth is by no means a sign of republican retrogression. We are about to record no disparagement to the outline of the republic. It is a pyramid, in fair progression, but refinement sits within it like an hourglass. Half-way up the ascent of political perfection, the social diagram within is at its inevitable "tight place;" and while we remember on what a breadth of polite foundation public opinion built up society at the Revolution, and while we believe that, half a century hence, we shall have as refined standards as any country on earth, we believe that, now, there is a squeeze upon good-breeding in this country (less protection for private rights and feelings than there was once, and will be again), and it is as well that those who are to suffer by the tight place should be prepared to stand it.

To protect that upon which the proprietor has a right to put a value, is the object of law and civilization. Five dollars, paid back, will satisfy a man who has been robbed of five dollars; but the thief goes to prison besides. A wound given to a man is soon healed and forgotten, but the assailant is condemned for a felon. A newspaper-attack upon a man, for peculiarities with which the public have no business, may be a deeper offence to him than the loss of half his fortune, yet the attempt at remedy by law is worse than bearing it in silence. The damages given are trifling and nominal, and the prosecution propagates the evil.

The above is a skeleton statement, to which the memory of every newspaper-reader will supply the flesh-and-blood illustrations. A late decision in Massachusetts, justifying an unnecessary libel on the ground of its truth, threw off, to our thinking, the last skin of the metamorphosis. There is left, now, no protection, by law or public opinion, to anything but the pocket and the person of the citizen. His private feelings, his domestic peace, his hard-won respect from other men, his consciousness of respectability abroad—commodities of more value to him than money—are outlawed, and, if wronged, left to his individual avenging.

Few republicans need to be told that the law casts no formidable shadow unless shone upon by public opinion. The law of libel is powerless, because the license of the press is agreeable to the public. If it were not so, the libeller would not find himself, after conviction, still on the sunny side of public favor—nor would judges charge juries with the little emphasis they do—nor would juries give, as they do, damages that turn the plaintiff into ridicule!

There is another thing that republicans need not be told: that where a just remedy is denied by the law, the individual takes the penalty into his own hands—the same public that left him to administer it, kindly warding off the law when he is tried for the retributive assault and battery. A case of this sort lately occurred in the tabernacle city. A family of the most liberal habits and highest private worth—just risen to wealth by two generations of honest industry—chose to marry a daughter with entertainments proportionate to their fortune. A malicious editor, avowedly "to make his paper sell," and for no other reason, came out with a foul-mouthed ridicule of the festivities, that completely destroyed the happiness of the brightest domestic event of their lives. One hundred thousand dollars would have been no inducement to the family to suffer the pain and mortification that were, and will be for years, the consequences of that unprovoked outrage. But where lay the remedy? The law would perpetuate the ridicule, without giving damages that would outweigh the additional sale of the paper. It chanced, in this case, that the injured man was of athletic habits and proportions, and the editor was small and puny. The plaintiff (that would have been, had there been public opinion to give power to the law) called on the defendant (that would have been) and whipped him severely; and when tried for the assault and battery, was punished with a fine next to nothing. The public opinion of the city of "broad philacteries" virtually justified both outrages. But where would have been the remedy, if the physical superiority had been on the other side, or if the popular blight-monger had been an unassailable cripple?

Another case of legal justification of club-law lately occurred in this city. It is so marked an instance, also, of the social impunity of printed injuries (the inflictor, Mr. Gliddon, being still a popular lecturer, and glorified daily by the model family-newspaper of Boston), that we venture to quote three or four passages from the libel. Mr. Cooley, the flogger, had described, with humorous ridicule, some people he saw in Egypt, and Mr. Gliddon takes it for granted (though it is denied by Mr. Cooley) that the ridicule was aimed at himself and his father. A pamphlet of thirty or forty pages of abuse of Cooley is the retort to this supposed allusion, and from a notice of the pamphlet in a daily paper, we copy three or four of its quoted sentences:—

"If, since the publication of 'The American in Egypt,' it be a work of supererogation on his part (Gliddon's) to place upon public record the petulant vagaries of an upstart, to recall the petty shifts of an itinerant miser, to unmask the insidious insipidities of a would-be author, or to refute the falsehoods of a literary abortion, it will be allowed that the deed is none of his seeking, but has been fastened on him, as the only course within the letter of American laws whereby a poltroon can receive chastisement from those who would have gladly vindicated their honor by means to them far more satisfactory."

"Again Mr. Gliddon says: 'I grieved that, not having been gifted with prophetic vision, I neglected to apply it [the corbush] in the Thebaid to Mr. Cooley himself, for I may never have such an eligible chance again.'"

"Had he been in Cairo at the time [of my departure from that city], he should have laid aside all official character, even at the risk of eventual censure, and Mr. Cooley should not have perpetrated his pasquinade in 'Arabia Petrea and Palestine,' before he [Gliddon] had hung a 'cowskin on those recreant limbs!'"

"If he [Gliddon] do not now apply a horsewhip to Mr. Cooley's shoulders, it is solely because, in a community among which both are residing, the satisfaction he should derive from a physical expression of his obligations to Mr. Cooley, might prove more expensive than the pleasure is worth."

"Our relative positions have been, and, so far as may depend on him, will remain perfectly distinct; for possible affluence will never raise Mr. Cooley to the social standing of a gentleman."

"Mr. Cooley's fractiousness is confined to paper pellets. Innate cowardice is a guaranty for his never resorting to a different manifestation of his vicious, though innocuous waspishness."

The first time Mr. Cooley saw Mr. Gliddon after these expressions of restrained warlike impatience, he gave him a beating. Mr. Gliddon prosecuted him for assault and battery, recovered "five dollars damages," and went on lecturing with high popular favor. What was Mr. Cooley's remedy for being published as "no gentlemen," a "miser," and a "coward," who had three times escaped personal chastisement? Mr. Cooley is not the "loafer" these epithets would seem to make him. He is a man of fortune, and a most excellent citizen, with highly-respectable connexions, and a hearth blessed with the presence of beauty and refinement. A duel would have brought upon him a ridicule more formidable than personal danger—the law on the subject is a cipher—and, to remove the pointed finger from waiting on him at his very table, he was obliged to chastise the man who stigmatized him.

One more proof of the same new state of things, though in a different line. A highly-educated young lawyer in this city, in canvassing for the whigs, during the late political contest, was severely whipped by three members of the leading democratic club. He lay a-bed a week, recovering from his bruises, and, at the end of that time, walked into a meeting of the club referred to and demanded a hearing. Order was called, and he stated his case, and demanded of the president of the club that a ring should be formed, and his antagonists turned in to him—one after the other. It was enthusiastically agreed to, and the three bullies being present, were handed over to him and handsomely flogged, one after the other. Of course this is not all we are to hear of such a man; but who will deny, that when he comes to stand for congress, he will not have counterbalanced, by this act, the disadvantage of belonging to one of the most aristocratic families of the city?

We are expressing no discontent with our country. We are playing the Mirror only—showing the public its face, that it may not forget "what manner of man" it is. We have shown by facts, that there is no more remedy among us, for the deepest injuries that can be inflicted, than there is among wild beasts in the forest. Duelling is as good as abolished, we rejoice with all our hearts—but it owes its abolition to the country's having sunk below the chivalric level at which that weed could alone find nourishment. We leave to others to draw conclusions and suggest remedies. We are not reformers. We submit. But we should think a man as improvident, not forthwith to be rubbing up his sparring, as a gentleman would have been in Charles the Second's time, to have walked abroad without his sword. They have a saying in the Mediterranean (from the custom of yoking a hog with a donkey together for draught), "You must plough with a hog if you stay in Minorca!"

Rev. Sidney Smith's description of himself from a letter to a correspondent of the New York American.—"I am seventy-four years old; and being a canon of St. Paul's, in London, and rector of a parish in the country, my time is equally divided between town and country. I am living amidst the best society in the metropolis, am at ease in my circumstances, in tolerable health, a mild whig, a tolerating churchman, and much given to talking, laughing, and noise. I dine with the rich in London, and physic the poor in the country—passing from the sauces of Dives to the sores of Lazarus. I am, upon the whole, a happy man, have found the world an entertaining world, and am heartily thankful to Providence for the part allotted to me in it."

We can add a touch or two to the auto-sketch of the witty prebend, who, we think, is one of the men most thought about just now. He is a fat man, weighing probably between two and three hundred pounds, with a head and stomach very church-man-like—(that is to say in the proportion of a large church with a small belfry)—a most benevolent yet humorous face, and manners of most un-English boisterousness and cordiality. At a party he is followed about, like a shepherd by his sheep, and we remember, once, at his own house, seeing Lord Byron's sister, the Hon. Mrs. LEIGH, one of the laughing flock browsing upon the wit that sprung up around him. One would think, to see him and know his circumstances, that the gods had done their best to make one of the Mr. Smiths perfectly happy.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

(In reply to our respected private correspondent, and the editor with his puddle against every man, and every man's inkstand against him.)

When is a statesman beyond accusation? Not while he is still armed in the arena!—not while he has neither dismounted from the car of ambition, nor, even once, made sign to the world, that he would fain stop and turn his face to his Maker!

We are understood as referring to Mr. Adams. We consider this present active member of congress as, beyond competition, the most potent spirit in America. "Venerable" he is—and "his hand trembles"—but his venerableness is a cavern of power, and his uplifted forefinger

"trembles as the granite trembles

Lashed by the waves."

We know there is a level on the mountain of life, where the air is pure and cold—a height at which impurity can scarce come, more, between the climber and his God—but, it is above where the lightning comes from—it is above the dark cloud where sleeps the thunder, collected from below, and charged with inseparable good and harm. This incurrupt level is, at least, one step above the cloud in which Mr. Adams has pertinaciously lingered; and if his friends insist that he has been long enough lost to common scrutiny to have reached the upper side of the cloud of dangerous power, we must be excused for pointing our conductor till he is done stirring in the thunder.

Persuade us that Mr. Adams is so "venerable" as to have outlived all liability to the license described by the poet:—

"For now, at last, alone, he sees his might!

Out of the compass of respective awe

He now begins to violate all right,

While no restraining fear at hand he saw."

Persuade us that a vindictive man may be safely bowed before, for an angel, with his hand, for the first time, fetterlessly clutched on this world's thunderbolts! Persuade us that Mr. Adams could not stoop his statesmanship to resent, and that he is not one of those dreaders of political extinction, who feel that "not to be at all is worse than to be in the miserable condition of something." Persuade us, in short, that no provocation in argument, no lull of responsibility, no oracular unanswerableness, no appetite for the exercise of power, no

"injury,
The jailer to his pity," could tempt Mr. Adams, with his present undiminished mental vigor, to swerve a hair line from good—by weight thrown upon public measure, or by influence wrongfully exercised over the fair fame of the dead and the private feelings of the living—persuade us of all this, and we will allow that he is beyond—"venerable" beyond—the reminders of human censure!

But now—having arms-lengthed it, in reply to a very formal letter we received last evening condemning the admission into our columns of a communication accusatory of Mr. Adams—let us come closer to the reader with a little of our accustomed familiarity.

We were called upon a day or two since, by one of the first scholars and most intelligent of business-men among us—this communication in his hand. He left us to read it at our leisure. We, at first, were unpleasantly affected by it, and slipped it upon our refusal look—sorry that so great a man as Mr. Adams should have an unbeliever (and so weighty an unbeliever), in greatness so ready for its closing seal. We should have stopped at this regret, probably, and only thought of the subject again when returning the manuscript, but that we had been previously impressed with our friend's courage in historical justice—on a wholly different subject. This brought about the sober second thought, and we turned it over somewhat as follows:—

Of the allowed UPPER TRIUMVIRATE of this country—CLAY, JACKSON, and ADAMS—the peaceful good name of the first is, just now, closed for history, by his willing relinquishment of public action. The world owes him the glorified repose for which he has signified his desire. The second has also retired; and, though he sometimes has sent his invincible banner to wave again in the political field, it would be a harsh pen that would transmute, and make readable by judicious eyes, the silly abuses syringed at the venerable old chieftain by the Bedouin squirt of the "Express."

The third—Mr. Adams—we could not but feel, at once, was off the pedestal where the world had willingly placed him, and had come down, once more

"to dabble in the pettiness of fame."

(We shall be pardoned, by the way, for quoting what is recalled by this chance-sprung quotation—a comparison which seems to us singularly to picture Mr. Clay and Mr. Adams as to loftiness of public life and motive.) Dante says:—

"The world hath left me, what it found me, pure,

And, if I have not gathered yet its praise,

I sought it not by any baser lure.

Man wrongs and time avenges; and my name

May form a monument not all obscure.

Though such was not my ambition's end and aim—

To add to the vain-glorious list of those

Who dabble in the pettiness of fame,

And make men's fickle breath the wind that blows

Their sail."

We felt, at once, that this latter character—this aliquis in omnibus, nihil in singulis—was, as displayed in Mr. Adams's career, rather the mettle of invincible obstinacy and unrest acting upon strong talent, than the ring of the clear metal of human greatness. There was nothing in Mr. Adams's life of toil that had not fed his innate passion for antagonism. He was a born ascetic, in whose nostrils the fiery perils of other men were but offensive smoke—who had no temptation to softer pleasure than a pasquinade against a political rival—who had made the most of the morality which came natural to him, and which, in this land, covers more sins than charity. He was not, like Clay and Jackson, great in spite of the impassioned nature for which we (so inconsistently), love the man and disclaim his greatness. He has been the terror of his time for wounds worse than murder—yet gave no stab that could be "stopped with parsley." He needed no shirt of penance to make him remember that

"The virtues of great men, will only show
Like coy auriculars, in Alpine snow."

He has profited by men's not remembering that (in the zoology of the pleasures), the sin of the sloth were a merit in the armadillo—one hating to move, and the other hating to be still, and both tested by their activity of motion. In short, Mr. Adams—though he has unquestionably walked to the topmost stone of the temple of statesmanship, and is now the third greatest man in the country that shakes under him—has exclusively pampered his own desires, topmost and undermost, by the practice of the virtues that have shielded him. The toils that have advanced him were begun in the pastime of an aristocratic youth; and position, up to quite the end of that "second heat" of his ambition-race, was an inheritance perseveringly thrust on him. Can such a man, while our destiny is still hourly hanging on his lips, be "venerable" beyond the possibility of censure?

With this unwilling mental review of the "boiled peas" of Mr. Adams's pilgrimage to greatness—unwillingly, as it was irresistibly and truthfully disparaging—we reverted to our first picture of his present position. We had been truly, and even tearfully, affected, on seeing the old man, at the late festival of the Historical Society—doubtless very near his grave, but fighting his way determinately backward through the gate of death—and we expressed ourself in terms of high respect and honor, when we wrote of it the morning after. It is a recompensing ordinance of Nature, that the glory and virtues of a great man accompany his person and his sins lie where they first fall—in the furrow of history. It is hard to look upon any man's face, and remember ill of him; and there is many a great man, who has a halo where he comes, and none where he is heard of.

We remembered nothing disparaging to Mr. Adams that evening. But in our office, with a shade drawn over our eyes, to compel a disagreeable decision of duty, we saw that the age and decrepitude, which apparently exacted submission to his will, had left no joint open in his harness, loosened no finger upon his weapons of attack. He can defend himself—he has hundreds to defend him, should he be silent. His much talked-of "diary" lacks no evidence that truth can furnish; and if the charges against him are "mere cobwebs in a church bell," the best of prayers is, that he may burst them with one stroke of living triumph, and not leave even that slight violence to be done by the knell of his departure.

The last thought that came to us, and the only one we thought necessary for a preface to the communication, was, that now would probably be the time chosen by Mr. Adams himself for denying (and they must be denied!) these indictments against his greatness. The five years' silence that will follow his death, had better harden over no ulcer—to be re-opened and cleansed, to the world's offence, hereafter. We took some credit to ourself, for simply saying this, without recording what we have been compelled to record now—the reasons of our thinking gravely of the communication. We would have taken the other side and entered into the defence quite as willingly—but the writer, as well as Mr. Adams, is a man not to be denied a hearing. We may perhaps be permitted to close this article—written in a most unwonted vein, for us—with a little editorial comfort from Shakespeare:—

"What we oft do best,
By sick interpreters, or weak ones, is
Not ours, or not allowed; what worst, as oft,
Hitting a grosser quality, is cried up
For our best act. But if we shall stand still—
For fear our motion will be mocked or carp'd at,
We should take root here where we sit, or sit
For statues only."

"MONEY ARTICLE" ON THE OPERA.—We were delighted to hear it whispered about at the opera, last night, that there is a movement among the people of taste and influence to "set up," by a liberal subscription, the present excellent, but impoverished and struggling operatic company. The first thought that occurs to any one hearing of this, would, probably, be a surprise that, with such full houses as have graced the opera, they have not been thriving to the fullest extent of reasonable expectation. We understand, however, that it is quite the contrary. When the present company commenced their engagement, there was an arrearage of gas expenses to be paid up, the license was to be renewed, at $500; and the house, even when full, gives but a slender dividend over the expenses of the orchestra, scenery, lights, stage properties, and dresses. At the only "division of the spoils" that has yet been made, Madame Pico received but sixty dollars—so insufficient a sum being all that this admirable singer has received for several months' waiting, and one month's playing and singing! Her dresses alone cost her twice the sum! Borghese received twice this amount, but the other performers, of course, much less even than Pico.

In the history of the first introduction of Italian music into England, in 1692, it is stated that the singers (an "Italian lady," a basso, and a soprano) were taken up by two spirited women of fashion, wives of noblemen, who arranged benefit concerts at their own houses, for the "charming foreigners," and inviting their friends as if to a ball—demanding five guineas for each invitation! The rage for these expensive concerts is recorded as a curious event of the time, and it was a grievous mark of unfashionableness not to be honored with a ticket.

The American public is a hard master to these children of the sun. They take no comfort among us, if they lay up no money. Our climate is both dangerous and disagreeable! Our usages, and prejudices, and manner of life, all at variance with theirs! Their hearts are bleak here, and their pockets at least should have a warm lining! And (by the way) see what a difference there is, even between our country and chilly England, in the way society treats them! We chance to possess an autograph letter of JULIA GRISI's, given us by the lady to whom it was addressed—a daughter of Lucien Bonaparte married to an English nobleman. Look at the position this little chance record reveals of a prima donna in England:—

"AIMAËLE ET TRES CHÈRE PRINCESSE!—

"Je suis vraiment désolé de ne pouvoir aller ce soir chez Lady Morgan. Je dine chez le Prince Esterhazy on je dois passer la soirée. Demain au soir, j'ai un concert pour M. Laporte, le reste de la semaine je suis libre et tout à vos ordres. Si vous croyez de combiner quelque-chose avec Lady Morgan, comptez sur moi! Demain je passerai chez Lady Morgan pour faire mes excuses en personne.

"Que dirai-je de ce magnifique voile! La générosité et l'amabilité sont innées dans la grande famille.

"Croyez toujours, madame la princesse, à tout le dévouement de votre servante,
"Milady D— S—."

JULIA GRISI.

We chance to have another dramatic autograph, a note of LEONTINE FAY's, given us by the same noble lady (and we may say here, apropos, that we should be very happy to show these, and others, to persons curious in autographs)—showing the same necessary reliance on special patronage:—

"THEATRE FRANÇAIS.

"Mlle Leontine Fay a l'honneur de présenter ses humbles respects à Lady D—, et de solliciter sa puissante protection pour la soirée qui aura lieu d'un bénéfice Vendredi, 10 Juillet. Le choix des pièces et les noms des artistes qui veulent bien contribuer à son succès lui font espérer que miladi, qui aime à encourager les arts, daignera l'honorer de sa présence."

This is dated from the French theatre in London, but we treasured up the autograph with no little aversion, for Leontine Fay was in the height of her glory, in Paris, when we first went abroad, and, to us, she seemed a new revelation of things adorable. She was made for the stage by nature—as scenery is adapted by coarse lines for distant perspective. Her eyes were dark, luminous, and of a size that gave room for the whole audience to "repose on velvet" in them.—But we wander! We resume our subject, after saying that we never envied prince or king, till we heard, at that time, that Leontine Fay passionately loved the prince royal—the young duke of Orleans. He is dead, she is grown ugly, and we are left to admire Pico. "Much after this fashion," etc., etc.

Grave people (though by no means all grave people) are inclined to bid the opera "stand aside" as a thing unholy. We think this is a mistake. We believe music to be medicinal to body and soul. With entire reverence, we take leave to remind the religious objector of the cure of Saul, and to quote the passage as follows:—

"But the spirit of the Lord departed from Saul, and an evil spirit from the Lord troubled him. And Saul's servants said unto him, Behold now, an evil spirit troubleth thee. Let our Lord now command thy servants which are before thee, to seek out a man who is a cunning player on a harp; and it shall come to pass, when the evil spirit from God is upon thee, that he shall play with his hand, and thou shalt be well. "And it came to pass that when the evil spirit from God was upon Saul, that David took a harp and played with his hand: so Saul was refreshed, and was well, and the evil spirit departed from him."

The medicinal value attached to music by the ancients is also shown in the education of Moses at the court of Pharaoh. Clemens Alexandrinus has recorded that "Moses was instructed by the Egyptians in arithmetic, geometry, rhythm, harmony, but, above all, in medicine and music." Miriam sang and danced in costume, and David "in his linen ephod," and the only reproach made by Laban to Jacob, for carrying off his two daughters, was, that he did not give him the opportunity to send him away "with mirth and with songs, with tabret and with harp." We refer to these historic proofs, to remind the objecting portion of the community that scenic musical representation was a vent for domestic and religious feeling among the ancients, and that, in an opera—particularly one unaccompanied by modern ballet—there is no offence to moral feeling, but, on the contrary, authorized good.

To revert to our purpose, in this article—(chronologically, somewhat spread!)—We do not know what shape the aroused liberality of the wealthy classes of New York will take, but we should think that Madame Pico—as she has given us the most pleasure, at the greatest expense to herself, and is an unprotected and exemplary woman, alone among us—should have a special benefit by subscription concert, or some other means as exclusive to herself. We suggest it—but we presume we are not the first it has occurred to. Will the wealthy gentlemen who are nightly seen in the dress-circles, delighted with her exquisite music, turn the subject over at their luxurious firesides?

TO AND ABOUT OUR CORRESPONDENTS.—We wish to "define our position" with regard to our correspondents and their opinions.

Were an editor to profess an agreement of opinion with every writer for his paper, he would either claim a superhuman power of decision on all possible subjects, at first sight, or he would exclude communications on all subjects, except his own mental hobbies and matters of personal study and acquaintance. To avoid both horns of this fool's dilemma, he opens a correspondence column, in which anything (short of an invasion of a cardinal virtue, or violation of a palpable truth) may very properly and irresponsibly appear. The only questions the editor asks himself are, whether it will interest his readers, and whether it is worth its space in the paper.

But there are people for whom it is necessary that we should go back to the very catechism of political economy, and show upon what principle is founded the expediency of a FREE PRESS—a press untrammelled by a king in a kingdom, and by the sovereign republicans in a republic.

Opinions have been well likened to steam—powerless when diffused abroad, resistless when shut in and denied expansion. The unconscious apostleship of Mr. Adams—procuring an explosion in favor of abolition, by his obstinacy in provoking an undue suppression of the subject—is a striking illustration of this. Nothing makes less impression on the mind than abstract principles to which there is no opposition—nothing is dearer to the heart than opinions for which we have been called on to contend and suffer. A free press, therefore, keeping open gate for all subjects not prohibited by law and morals, is far safer than a press over-guarded in its admissions to the public eye.

Having thus repeated, as it were, a page of the very spelling-book of freedom, let us bespeak, of our subscribers, a let-off, as far as we personally are concerned, for any decent opinions expressed under the head of "correspondence." We throw open that part of our paper. It is interesting to know what people think who do not agree with us. We court variety. We would not (in anything but love) be called a bigot. New opinions, even the truest, are reluctantly received, and, we think, very often culpably distrusted. As far, therefore, as the yea or may may go, on any proper subject, we care not a fig which side writes first to us, and we hereby disclaim responsibility for all articles under "our correspondence," except on the score of morals and readableness.

THE OPERA.—THE PURITANI is one of those operas with which musical criticism has little or nothing to do. If only tolerably sung, the feeling of the audience goes on before—making no stay with fault-finding. The applause last night, after a most limping and ill-paced duet between Tomasi and Valtellina, was tempestuous; and Antognini, in one passage, ran off his voice, and was gone for several notes in some unknown region, and yet, on spreading out his hands immediately after, there was great approbation by the audience! Great effort was made by the audience to encore "Suoni la tromba," but the two bases thought more basely of their bases than the audience, and did not repeat it. Is there no way to implore Valtellina to abate a little of his overreaching of voice, in that superb invocation? He overdoes it terribly.

We are not writing in very good humor, we are afraid—but the enthusiasm of a crammed house needs no propping. We would not find fault if they needed our praise. BORGHESI did well—but will do better at the next representation. She would sing with fuller tone for a little egg beat up with brandy. We longed to unreef her voice—in some way crowd a little more abandon into it. She acted as she always does—to a charm.

Pico was in one of the proscenium boxes, looking very charming, and evidently enjoying the whole opera with un-envious enthusiasm. She went with a bouquet for Borghese—so said a bird in our ear.

OLE BULL'S NIAGARA.

(AN HOUR BEFORE THE PERFORMANCE.)

Saddle, as, of course, we are, under any very striking event, we find ourselves bestridden, now and then, with a much wider occupancy than the plumb-line of a newspaper column. Ole Bull possesses us over our tea-table; he will possess us over our supper-table—his performance of Niagara equi-distant between the two. We must think of him and his violin for this coming hour. Let us take pen and ink into our confidence.

The "origin of the harp" has been satisfactorily recorded. We shall not pretend to put forward a credible story of the origin of the violin; but we wish to name a circumstance in natural history. The house-cricket that chirps upon our hearth, is well known as belonging to the genus Pneumora. Its insect size consists almost entirely of a pellucid abdomen, crossed with a number of transverse ridges. This, when inflated, resembles a bladder, and upon its tightened ridges the insect plays like a fiddler, by drawing its thin legs over them. The cricket is, in fact, a living violin; and as a fiddler is "scarce himself" without his violin, we may call the cricket a stray portion of a fiddler.

Ole Bull "is himself" with his violin before him—but without it, the commonest eye must remark that he is of the invariable build of the restless searchers after something lost—the build of enthusiasts—that is to say, chest enormous, and stomach, if anything, rather wanting! The great musician of Scripture, it will be remembered, expressed his mental affliction by calling out "My bowels! my bowels!" and, after various experiments on twisted silk, smeared with the white of eggs, and on single threads of the silk-worm, passed through heated oil, the animal fibre of cat-gut has proved to be the only string that answers to the want of the musician. Without trying to reduce these natural phenomena to a theory (except by suggesting that Ole Bull may very properly take the cricket as an emblem of his instinctive pursuit), we must yield to an ominous foreboding for this evening. The objection to cat-gut as a musical string is its sensibility to moisture; and in a damp atmosphere it is next to impossible to keep it in tune. The string comes honestly enough by its sensitiveness (as any one will allow who has seen a cat cross a street after a shower)—but, if the cat of Ole Bull's violin had the least particle of imagination in her, can what is left of her be expected to discourse lovingly of her natural antipathy—a water-fall?

But—before we draw on our gloves to go over to Palmo's—a serious word as to what is to be attempted to-night.

Old Bull is a great creature. He is fitted, if ever mortal man was, to represent the attendant spirit in Milton, who

"Well knew to still the wild woods when they roared
And hush the moaning winds;"

but it seems to us that, without a printed programme, showing what he intends to express besides the mere sound of waters, he is trusting far too rashly to the comprehension of his audience and their power of musical interpretation. He is to tell a story by music! Will it be understood?

We remember being very much astonished, a year or two ago, at finding oneself able to read the thoughts of a lady of this city, as she expressed them in an admirable improvisation upon the piano. The delight we experienced in this surprise induced us to look into the extent to which musical meaning had been perfected in Europe. We found it recorded that a Mons. Sudre, a violinist of Paris, had once brought the expression of his instrument to so nice a point that he "could convey information to a stranger in another room," and it is added that, upon the evidence thus given of the capability of music, it was proposed to the French government to educate military bands in the expression of orders and heroic encouragements in battle! Hayden is criticised by a writer on music as having failed in attempting (in his great composition "The Seasons") to express "the dawn of day," "the husbandman's satisfaction," "the rustling of leaves," "the running of a brook," "the coming on of winter," "thick fogs," etc., etc. The same writer laughs at a commentator on Mozart, who, by a "second violin quartette in D minor," imagines himself informed how a loving female felt on being abandoned, and thought the music fully expressed that it was Dido! Beethoven undertook to convey distinct pictures in his famous Pastoral Symphony, but it was thought at the time that no one would have distinguished between his musical sensations on visiting the country and his musical sensations while sitting beside a river—unless previously told what was coming!

Still, Ole Bull is of a primary order of genius, and he is not to wait upon precedent. He has come to our country, an inspired wanderer from a far away shore, and our greatest scenic feature has called on him for an expression of its wonders in music. He may be inspired, however, and we, who listen, still be disappointed. He may not have felt Niagara as we did. He may have been subdued where a meaner spirit would be aroused—as

"Fools rush in where angels fear to tread."

(Seven o'clock, and time to go.)

(AFTER THE PERFORMANCE.)

We believe that we have heard a transfusion into music—not of "Niagara," which the audience seemed bona-fide to expect, but—of the pulses of the human heart at Niagara. We had a prophetic boding of the result of calling the piece vaguely "Niagara"—the listener furnished with no "argument," as a guide through the wilderness of "treatment" to which the subject was open. This mistake allowed, however, it must be said that Ole Bull has, genius-like, refused to mis-interpret the voice within him—refused to play the charlatan, and "bring the house down"—as he might well have done by any kind of "utmost," from the drums and trumpets of the orchestra.

The emotion at Niagara is all but mute. It is a "small, still voice" that replies within us to the thunder of waters. The musical mission of the Norwegian was to represent the insensate element as it was to him—to a human soul, stirred in its seldom-reached depths by the call of power. It was the answer to Niagara that he endeavored to render in music—not the call! We defer attempting to read further, or rightly, this musical composition till we have heard it again. It was received by a crowded audience, in breathless silence, but with no applause.

Miss JULIA NORTALL's first appearance as a public singer was very triumphant. If her heart had not kept beating just under her music-maker, she would have made much better music, however. When we tell the lovely debutante, that persons in besieged fortresses can detect the direction of the enemy's approach under ground, by placing sanded drums on the surface, which betray the strokes of the mining pickaxes by the vibrations of the particles, she will understand how the beating of her heart may disturb the timbre of her voice—to say nothing of the disturbance in the air by the accelerated beating of the anxious hearts of her admirers! She has great advantages—a rich voice deep down with an upper chamber in it (what the musicians call a contralto sfogato), and a kind of personal beauty susceptible of great stage embellishments. "Modest assurance" (with a preponderance of assurance if anything), is her great lack.

Sanquiro sang admirably—but his black coat spoiled it for all but the cognoscenti.

We came out of the opera-house amid a shower of expressions of disappointment, and we beg pardon of "the town" for remembering what Antigones of Athens said to a musical pupil who was once too little applauded. "The next time you play," said Antigones, "shall be to me and the Muses."

THE TWO NEW FASHIONS, WHITE CRAVATS AND LADIES' TARPAULINS.—Here and there a country reader will, perhaps, require to be informed that no man is stylish, now, "out" in the evening, without a white cravat. To those who frequent the opera this will be no news, of course; as no eye could have failed to track the "milky way," around the semi-circle, from stage-box to stage-box. The fact thus recorded, however, we proceed to the diagnosis of the fashion (and of another fashion, of which we shall presently speak)—premising only that we are driven to the discussion of these comparatively serious themes, by the frivolous character of other news, and the temporary public surfeit of politics, scandal, and murder.

The white cravat was adopted two years since, in London, as the mark of a party—"Young England." Our readers know, of course, that for ten years, they have been worn only by servants in that country, and that a black coat and white cravat were the unmistakable uniform of a family butler. The cravat having been first worn as the distinction of a certain reforming club, in Cromwell's parliament, however, the author of Vivian Grey adopted it as the insignium of the new political party, of which he is the acknowledged leader; and, as the king of the white cravats, he has set a fashion for America. The compliment we pay him is the greater, by the way, that we do not often copy the tight-legged nation in our wearables.

It was established in Brummell's time that a white cravat could not be successfully tied, except upon the critical turn preceding the reaction of a glass of champagne and a cup of green tea. A felicitous dash of inspired dexterity is the only thing to be trusted, and failure is melancholy! As to dressiness, a white cravat is an intensifier—making style more stylish, and the lack of it more observable; but artistically it is only becoming to light complexion—by its superior whiteness, producing an effect of warmth on a fair skin, but impoverishing the brilliancy of a dark one. As a sign of the times, the reappearance of the white cravat is the forerunner of a return to old-fashioned showiness in evening dress, and, as the wheel comes round again, we shall revive tights, buckles, and shoes—expelling the levelling costume of black cravat and boots, and making it both expensive and troublesome to look like a gentleman after candlelight. So tilts the plank in republics—aristocratic luxury going up as aristocratic politics are going down!

But what shall we say of trains and tarpaulins for ladies wear! Jack's hat, copied exactly in white satin, is the rage for a head-dress, now—(worn upon the side of the head with a ruinous feather)—and a velvet train is about becoming indispensable to a chaperon! It will be a bold poor man that will dare to marry a lady ere long—what with feathers and trains and pages' wages! We rejoice that we had our fling in the era of indifferent pocket. Keep the aristocracy unemployed on politics for another administration or two, and we shall drive matrimony to the extremities of society—none but the very rich, or very poor, able to afford the luxury!

MERRY CHRISTMAS.—Our paper of this evening—(Christmas eve)—is to be read by the light of the "YULE LOG,"—or whatever else represents the bright centre around which, dear reader! your family does its Christmas assembling. We shall perhaps amuse you by suggesting a comparison between the elegant lamp, which diffuses its light over your apartment, and the expedient resorted to by your English ancestors to brighten the hall for their Christmas evening. "I myself," says an old historian, "have seen tablecloths, napkins, and towels, which being taken foul from the table, have been cast into the fire, and there they burned before our faces upon the hearth." This, of course, was by way of illustrating the greasy habits of our ancestors at table, and gives an amusing piquancy to the injunction of wisdom that we should cherish the "lights of the past."

There are two points of freedom in which we envy the condition of slaves at the south—FREEDOM from responsibility at all times, and FREEDOM from all manner of work from Christmas to New Year. "The negroes" (says a writer on the festivals, games, and amusements, in the southern states), "enjoy a week's recreation every winter, including Christmas and New Year's; during which they prosecute their plays and sports in a very ludicrous and extravagant manner, dressing and masking in the most grotesque style, and having, in fact, a complete carnival." We confess this let-up from the pressure of toil is enviable. The distinction between horse and man, in the latter's requiring mental as well as bodily rest, should be legislated upon—all business barred with penalties, except for the necessities of life, during the Christmas holidays and during another week somewhere in June. We are a monotonous people in this country. The festivals of the Jews occupied a quarter of the year, and eighty days were given to festivals among the ancient Greeks! We do not fairly keep more than one in New York—New Year's day—the only day, except Sundays, when newspapers are not issued and shops are all shut.

We are sorry we can not paragraph America into more feeling for holidays, but we may perhaps prevent a gradual desuetude of even keeping Christmas, by heaping up our regrets when it comes round. We shall join the procession of visitors to the toy-shops and confectioners to-night, and we think, by the way, that these rounds to the gift-venders, might be made exceedingly agreeable. "GUION," "SANDS," "THOMPSON," "TIFFANY & YOUNG," "STUART'S CANDY PALACE," "BONFANTI'S," and "THE ALHAMBRA," are beautiful places for a range of soirees in hat and bonnet, and we went this round last Christmas eve with great amusement. Happy children are beautiful sights, and we can still see bons-bons with their eyes.

READER! a merry Christmas! and let us repeat once more to you the old stanza (rho' old Trinity is no longer what it was when this was written):—

"Hark the merry bells chiming from Trinity,
Charm the ear with their musical din,
Telling all, throughout the vicinity,
Holiday gambols are now to begin!
Friends and relations, with fond salutations,
And warm gratulations, together appear,
While lovers and misses with holiday kisses
Greet merry Christmas and happy New Year."

THE OTHER SIDE OF BROADWAY.—It is time that the decline of the era of shopping a-foot was fairly announced as at its fall—an epoch gone over to history. Washington Hall has been purchased as a property no longer objectionable from its being the other side of mud, and is to be speedily converted into the most magnificent "ladies store" within the limits of silk and calico. We are credibly assured that this last assertion is fully borne out by the plans of Mr. Stuart, the projector. No shop in London or Paris is to surpass it. But the best part of it remains to be told:—The building is to have a court for carriages in the centre, so that shoppers will thunder in at a porte cochère, like visitors to the grand duke of Tuscany! There will of course be a spacious door on the street, for those who can cross Broadway without a carriage—(poor zealous things!)—but the building is contrived for those to whom the crowded side of the street is rather an objection, and who wish their hammercloths to stand out of the spatter of omnibuses while they shop!! There is a comment on "the times" in this plan of Mr. Stuart's which we commend to the notice of some other parish.

Farther down-town, however (156) the shilling side of Broadway has been embellished by a new store, intended for all comers and customers, and certainly an ornament to the town—occupied by BEEBE & COSTAR, hatters. No more showy and sumptuous saloon could possibly be contrived than this “hatter’s shop;” and it is very well that they keep one article of ladies’ wear—(riding-hats)—for it is altogether too pretty a place for a monastery. The specimen hats stand on rows of marble tables, and the room is lined with mirrors and white panels—the effect very much that of a brilliant French café. As to the article of merchandise, Beebe & Costar have made tributary the “lines of beauty” to a degree which gives their hats a most peculiar elegance of shape, and it is worth the while of those of who are nice in their legmen, to “look in.”

Appropos :—The only god who employed a hatter was Mercury—why is not that “English clever” deity, with his winged hat, installed as a hatter’s crest? The propriety of it must have occurred to the hatters. Possibly we are so mercurial a nation, that it was thought impolitic—no man wanting any more mercury in his hat—at least when it is on. We see that the annual hatters’ ball comes off on the 26th. May we venture to suggest as topics of discussion in the quadrilles—1st, Mercury’s claims to the arms of the assembly, and, 2d, what peltry was probably used by the hatter of Olympus, and 3d, whether (as it was a winged hat) it must not have been made of the only quadruped that flies fur, the flying squirrel? “Curious questions, coz !”

FRANCE versus ENGLAND, or the BLACK CRAVAT versus THE WHITE.—We have received, in a very London-club-y handwriting, a warlike reply to the note we published lately from a French gentleman on the subject of the white cravat. The two nations seem to have separated into hostile array on the subject. Our English correspondent certainly brings cogent arguments in favor of the white, and indeed of English costume generally. After asking very naturally what our French correspondent’s phrase, “perfidious Albion,” had to do with it, and suggesting that “black cravat” had better “reflect on the late conduct of the French in the Pacific,” he goes on with the matter in question :—

“The English fashion for gentlemen’s dress is never to sacrifice comfort to appearance, which the French fashion invariably does; the clothes of the English are loosely made, so that every limb of the body is free. You see nothing in the dress that can be called effeminate; they appear to eschew everything that approaches the ‘Miss Nancy school;’ no man with them is considered well-dressed, however costly his attire, if he be not manly in his appearance. Now, a Frenchman’s clothes are made to fit so tight, that it is impossible for him to look at his ease. A Frenchman dressed looks as if he had just come out of a band-box; he looks like a pretty doll which you see in the shop windows in Paris. To hand a lady a chair, he runs the danger of bursting his coat, or cracking his waist-band; he can not stoop to pick up a lady’s fan, without danger to his inexpressibles. The Frenchman dressed is no longer the easy, pliant, laughing man, that we know him to be when in dishabille—but he is stiff, unnatural, and effeminate.

“The English fashion abhors display; the French, on the contrary, invites it. With the Frenchman dress is a great affair, for he intends to make a sensation. With the Englishman it is but secondary, for he does not believe that mere dress can have any influence. You may form an idea of the sentiments of both nations from this national character—the English (and Americans) are proud, but not vain; the French are very vain, but have little pride.

“Again: we like the Englishman’s fondness for white linen, and in this we can not imitate him too closely. It is not only in the evening, as with the Frenchman, that he puts on his fine linen, but at rising he must have it.—Though he may wear a shaggy morning coat, his under garments must be spotless. You may know him when travelling on the continent, by the unrivalled whiteness of his linen. The same cleanliness makes the white cravat preferable. It has its recommendation in being a clean fashion—for no gentleman can wear it more than once; whereas, the black satin cravat, which your correspondent so much extols, is an exceedingly dirty fashion—for, after dancing, the perspiration settles in the satin; and with the dust in the room, &c., it becomes unfit to wear more than twice, whereas the French wear their cravats until they are worn out.”

The sun “kept Christmas” yesterday, by appearing “in his best.” We never saw a more joyous, kindly, holyday quality of sunshine. All who had hearts to go abroad with, went abroad, and a-Broadway was a long aisle of beauty in nature’s roofless cathedral. God help all who were not happy yesterday! We picked up a bit of real-life poetry (by-the-way) in a very unexpected place yesterday—a confectioner’s shop! The circumstance is at such a distance from poetry, that the flash comes before the report—a laugh before the eye is moistened. At Thompson’s, the best confectioner of the city, we saw a large pound-cake, with a figure of a nun standing on it, dressed in white, and we were told that a cake had just gone to the sisters of the Barclay-street convent, with this little figure in mourning instead of white—sent by a young catholic lady who had just lost her mother. As a conveyance of a thought, intended to be entirely between the mourner and the sympathising sisters, we think this was very beautiful. Perhaps we spoil it by giving the coarse-minded a chance to ridicule it.

We wish to introduce to the reader the word tonality. Let us show its availableness at once by using it to express the secret of Pico’s overwhelming effect upon the audience on Saturday evening. As musical people know, melody is the natural “concord of sweet sounds,” and harmony may be tolerably defined as the artificial creation of surprises to vary melody. Malibran saw, for instance, that one of her rustic audiences could feel melody, but was incapable of appreciating harmony, when they tumultuously encored her in “Home, Sweet Home,” and let her “Di tanti palpiti” go by without applause! It takes more than one hearing, for persons not learned in music, to appreciate the harmony of an opera, though if there be in it an air of simple melody, a child will listen to it, for the first time, with delight. But there are operas, much cried up, where the melody and harmony are not in TONE; and though people may be made to like them against nature (as they like olives), the majority of the audience will feel incredulous as to its being “good music.” (We were two or three years opera-going before these unwritten distinctions got through our dura mater, dear reader; and if you are not in a hurry, perhaps you will pay us the compliment of reading them over again, while we mend our pen for a new paragraph.)

Pico sang a part in the opera of Saturday night, which, in our opinion, owed its electric power to three tonalities: tone No. 1, between the harmony and melody of the music—tone No. 2, between the music and her own impression on the public as a woman—and tone No. 3, between the opera and the mood of the public for that evening.

Tone No. 1 is already explained. Tone No. 3 was, perhaps, a combination of pleasurable accidents—both the donnas in one piece, the house crammed with fashion, and graced with more beauty than usual, and (last, not least) the change in the weather. A sudden south wind in December, makes even fashion affectionate, and, with such influences in the air, music that is “the food of love,” may “play on”—with entire confidence as to its reception. Of tone No. 2 (the part in Donizetti's opera) we wish to speak more at large, but we can not trust ourself afloat with it in a paragraph already under headway.

Donizetti is commonly rated as a trite and not very vigorous composer. As a musical convoy, he never drops the slowest sailor below the horizon. But, that he lets his heart steer the music whenever he can persuade science to give up the helm, everybody must have felt who has embarked a thought in one of his operas. The music written down for Orsini (Pico's part) expresses the character that Shakspeare's words give to Mercutio—the prince of thoughtless good fellows, careless, loveable, and amusing. Between this and Pico's personal qualities (as made legible across the footlights), there is a tonality the town has felt—a joyous recognition, by the audience, of a complete correspondence between the good-fellow music she sings and the good fellow nature has made her. There is a class of such women—some of them the most captivating of their sex, and every one of them the acknowledged “best creature in the world” of the circle she lives in. Here and there a person will understand better what we mean if we mention that Pico sat in the proscenium-box on the night of Ole Bull's concert, and, with a full house looking at her with eager curiosity, sat and munched her under-lip most unbecomingly, in perfect unconsciousness of any need of forbearing to do in public what she would have done if she were alone! We must say we like women that forget themselves!

We heard twenty judicious persons comment on the opera of Saturday, and with but one expression of never, in any country, having enjoyed opera more. The universal tonality, to which we have tried to play the interpreter, is partly a matter of coincidence, and may not happen again; but we assure the two donnas and our friend Signor Sacchi, that with the remembrance of it, and with them both in the glorious opera of Semiramide, next week, they will want a larger house than Palmo's.

And, by-the-way, this amiable “Quintius Curtius” of the opera, who has procured us the luxury of a temple of music by jumping into the gulf with his $47,000—excellent Signor Palmo—claims of the public a slight return; no more than that they should acknowledge the fact of his disaster! It has been doubted that he has lost money, and some of the world's cruelty has been dealt out to him in the shape of a sneer at his sincerity. We copy (literally) the explanation sent us on the subject, and bespeak for him present public regard, and some future more tangible demonstration:—

“Being attracted by a statement made in the Mirror in reference to the Italian company at Palmo's opera-house, showing the receipts and disbursements for twelve nights, leaving but a small amount to be divided by the company, after having as good and better houses than when under the auspices of Signor Palmo, whose honesty has been imputed to have made money, and made the public and his creditors believe the contrary, now the mystery is solved, and the public should be satisfied of Signor Palmo's integrity, who is ready to show by bills paid, and his books, that he has lost $47,000 the last four years.”

SUPPER AFTER THE OPERA.

Private room over the Mirror office, corner of Ann and Nassau—Supper on the round table, and brigadier mixing summat and water—Flagg, the artist, fatiguing the salad with a paper-folder—Devil in waiting—Quarter past ten, and enter “Yours Truly” from the opera.

Brig.—Here he comes, like a cloud dropping from Olympus—charged with Pico-tricity! Boy (to the “devil”), stick a steel pen in my hat for a conductor! Now—let him rain!

Flagg.—Echo—let him reign!

Yours Truly—(looking at the salad-dish).—Less gambooge for me, if you please, my dear artist! Be merciful of mustard when you mix for public opinion! But, nay! brigadier!

Brig.—Thank you for not calling on me to bray, mi-boy! What shall I neigh at?

Yours Truly.—How indelicate of you to call on an artist to exercise his profession on a party of pleasure!

Brig.—How?

Yours Truly.—Setting him to grind colors in a salad-dish! What are you tasting with that wooden ladle, my periodical sodger?

Brig.—Two of “illicit” to one of Croton—potheen from a private still in the mountains of Killarny! Knowles sent it to me! You have no idea what a flavor of Kate Kearney there is about it!—(fmff! fmff!)

Flagg.—(absently).—I smell the color of the heath-flowers in it—crocus-yellow on a brown turf!

Brig.—Stick a pin there, mi-boy!—a new avenue to the brain for things beautiful! Down with privileged roads in a republic! Why should the colors mixed for a limitless sense of beauty go in only at the eye?

Flagg.—No reason why. I wish we could hear colors!

Brig.—So you can, my inspired simplicity! and taste them, too! You can hear things that are read, and you can taste the brown in a turkey! (Turning to Yours Truly).—Was that well said, my dear boy?

Yours Truly.—Pardon me if I suggest still an improvement in the aristocracy of the senses! The eye has a double door of fringed lids, and the mouth an inner door of fastidious ivory; and, with the power to admit or exclude at will, these are the exclusive organs! The republicans are the nose and ear—open to all comers, and forced to make the best of them!

Flagg.—A new light, by Jupiter! Let us pamper the aristocracy! An oyster for my ivory gate, if you please, general, and let us spite the ear's monopoly of Pico by drinking her in silence! (—)

Brig.—(—)

Yours Truly.—(—)

Brig.—Touching Pico—is she, or isn't she?—you know what I want to know, my boy! Disembowel your mental oyster! What ails Borghese? What is a “contralto!” Is it anything wrong—or what?

Yours Truly.—A contralto, my particular general, is a voice that touches bottom—rubs your heart with its keel, as it were, while floating through you—comparing with a soprano, as the air on a mountain-top compares with a breeze from lower down.

Brig.—Best possible description of yourself, mi-boy! Go on, my contralto!

Flagg.—Yes—go on about Borghese—what is the philosophy of Borghese's salary being the double of Pico's?

Yours Truly.—Ah! now you touch the weight that keeps Borghese down! The public, like yourself, ask why the prima-donnà who gives them the more pleasure is the poorer paid! Borghese—but first let me tell you what I think of her, comparison apart. (Boy, light a cigar, and keep it going with the bellows, a la pastille! I like the smoke, but to talk with a cigar in the mouth spoils the delicacy of discrimination.)

Brig.—Spare us the scientific, mi-boy!

Yours Truly.—Why, what do you mean? I am as ignorant of music, my dear sodger, as an Indian is of botany—but he knows a weed from a flower, and I talk of music as the audience judge of it—by what I hear, “mark, and inwardly digest.”

Brig.—But the big words, my dear contralto!

Yours Truly.—“Foreign slip-slops,” I grant you—but nothing more!—I lived three years in Italy, and, of course, heard Italian audiences express themselves, and here and there a phrase sticks to me—but if I know “B sharp” from “B flat” (which is more than some musical critics know), it is the extent of my knowledge. No, general! there is no sillier criticism of music than technical criticism. You might as well paint cannon-balls piebald and then judge of their effect by remembering which color showed through the touch-hole before priming! Notes go to the ear; effects shower the nerves. A musician who is a critic, judges of a prima-donna by the accuracy with which she imitates what he (the musician) has played on an instrument—like a tight-rope dancer criticising his brother of the slack-rope, because he don’t swing over the pit! Analyze the applause at an opera! There are, perhaps, ten persons in a Palmo audience who are scientific musicians. These ten admire most what they can most exclusively admire—rapid and difficult passages (what the Italians call fortituri, or “flourishes”) executed with the most skilful muscular effort of the vocal organs. These ten, however, pass over, as very pleasant accidents of the opera, the part which pleases the rest of the audience—the mesa di voce—the tender expression of slower notes which try the sweetness of the voice—the absoluteness of the “art concealing art,” and which, more than all, betrays the personal sensibility and quality of the actress’s mind. My dear brigadier, true criticism travels a circle, and ends where it began—with nature. But as the art of the prima-donna brings her to the same point, the unscientific audience are most with the most skilful prima-donna—nearer to a just appreciation of her than musicians are.

Brig.—Now I see the reason I am so enchanted with Pico, mi-boy! I was afraid I had no business to like her—as I didn’t know Italian music! What a way you have of making me feel pleasant!

Yours Truly.—Pico has enchanted the town, brigadier! and I have endeavored to put the flesh and blood of language to the ghost of each night’s enchantment. That ghost of remembrance sticks by us through the next day, and I thought it would be agreeable to the Mirror readers to have the impression of the music recalled by our description of it. Have I done it scientifically? Taste forbid!—even if I knew how! I interpret for “the million”—not for “the ten.”

Flagg.—But about Borghese!

Yours Truly.—Well—I have a great deal to say about Borghese—I have a great deal of the “flesh and blood” I just spoke of, in reserve for Borghese; but I shall follow a strong public feeling, and not clothe her enchantments with language, till she slacks her hold upon the purse-strings, and shares equally, at least, with the donna whom the public prefer. There goes the brigadier—fast asleep! Good night, gentlemen! (Exit “Yours Truly.”)

OLE BULL’S CONCERT.—We longed last night for one of “Curtis’s acoustic chairs,” by which all the sound that approaches a man is inveigled into his ear and made the most of, for we heard Niagara attentively through, and at every change in the music wished it louder. We thought even the “dying fall” too expiring. It occurred to us, by the way, that if the text of this discoursed music had been one of the psalms instead of God’s less interpretable voice in the cataract, the room for enthusiasm, as well as the preparation for it, on the part of the audience, would have been vastly greater. In a mixed assembly (of the quality of that at Palmo’s last night) no chamber of imagination is furnished or tenanted except that of religion, and the very name of a bible psalm on the violin would have clothed any music of Ole Bull’s performing with the aggrandizing wardrobe of association kept exclusively for “powerful sermons” and “searching prayers.” We rather wonder that this ready access to the excitability of the mass has not been taken advantage of by the violinists.

We confess to a little surprise in Ole Bull’s organization. With the “Bust of a Hercules—waist of a gnat!”—

a superb build for a gladiator or an athlete—his violin is a woman! The music he draws from it is all delicacy, sentiment, pathos, and variable tenderness—never powerful, masculine, or imposing. “The Mother’s Prayer,” and the “Solitude of a Prairie,” are more effective than “Niagara,” for that reason. The audience are prepared for a different sex in a cataract. We know very well that the accordatura of a violin is of all compass, and that Paganini “played the devil” on it, as well as the angel, and we repeat our surprise, that, even in a piece whose name suggests nothing but masculine power, the burthen should be wholly feminine! Fact, as this unquestionably is, we leave it to our readers to reconcile with another fact—that the applause at one of Ole Bull’s concerts bears no proportion to the enthusiasm, as the ladies, without exception, are enchanted with him, and the men (who do the applauding) are, almost without exception, dissatisfied with him.

“Gentle shepherd, tell us why!”

Even at the high price of tickets, nobody draws like the Norwegian. A very sensible correspondent of ours proposed to him (through the Mirror) to lower his price, and allow those who could not afford the dollar to have an opportunity of hearing him. He is the soul of kindness and charity, and we should suppose this would strike him as a felicitous hint.

BATTLE OF THE CRAVATS.—The front row of the opera resembles a pianoforte with its white and black keys—the alternation of black and white cravats is so evenly distributed. The Frenchmen are all in black cravats of course, and the English and Americans in white, and a man might stop his ears and turn his back to the orchestra (when the two donnas are on the stage together) and tell who is singing, Pico or Borghese, by the agitation of the black cravats or the white. It is a strong argument in favor of the white cravats, apropos, that the Americans, whose sympathy is with the French in almost everything, should have joined the English in this division of opinion. We have received two or three most bellicose letters on each side of this weighty argument, and would publish them if we had a spare page.

THE OPERA.—Madame Pico was evidently struggling, last evening, against the effects of her late illness; but she delighted the audience as usual, with her impassioned and effective singing. The opera is a very trying one, and, to us, not the most agreeable in its general character—particularly in the lachrymose tone, throughout, of the part allotted to Pico. Sanquirico was a relief to this ennui, and he so charmed one lady in the house, that she threw him a bouquet! He played capitally well—barring one little touch of false taste in using two English words by way of being funny. It let him down like the falling out of the bottom of a sedan.

Several of our French friends, by the way, have requested us to contradict the on dit we mentioned in the Mirror, touching a "cabal to keep Pico subservient to Borghese." A regularly-formed one there doubtless is not—but the French are zealous allies, and every one of them does as much for Borghese as he can, and, of course, as much as he could do in a cabal. On the contrary, there seems to be no one individual taking any pains about Pico—the general enthusiasm at the opera excepted. Let us state a fact: We have received many visits and more than a dozen letters, to request even our trifling critical preference for Borghese; and no sign has been given, either by Pico or her friends, that our critical preference was wished for, or otherwise than tacitly acknowledged. This being true of a mere newspaper, what must be probably the difference of appeal to more direct sources of patronage? One or two persons have talked feelingly of pity for Borghese's mortification! We are watching to see when her mortification will be so insupportable that she will slacken her grasp upon Pico's just share of the profits! We are not only the true exponent of public opinion in reference to the merits of these ladies, but, if we are not personally impartial, it is because (though we have no acquaintance with either of the two ladies) we chance to know most of Borghese's friends. Pico is evidently a kind-hearted person, indolently careless of her pecuniary interests, and it is impossible to see the shadows of mental suffering in her face and not wish to aid her—but we should not sacrifice critical taste to do even that, and we have not written a syllable that her effect on the public has not more than justified. At the same time we have never said a syllable to disparage Borghese, and have only forborne to say as much of her merits as we should otherwise have done, because she was overpaid and strongly hedged in with supporters.

SERVANTS IN LIVERY, EQUIPAGES, ETC.—There is a stage of civilization at which a country will not—and a subsequent stage at which a country will—tolerate liveried servants. In a savage nation, an able-bodied man who should put on a badge of hopeless and submissive servitude for the mere certainty of food and clothing, would be considered a disgrace to his tribe. The further step of making that badge ornamental to the servile wearer, would probably be resented as an affront to the pre-eminence of display which is the rightful prerogative of chiefs and warriors.

In a crowded and highly-civilized country, it is found convenient for patricians to secure the tacit giving-way of plebeian encounter in thronged places—convenient for them to distinguish their own servants from other people's in a crowd at night—and, more particularly, in large and corrupt cities, it is convenient to have such attendants for ladies as may secure them from insult in public—the livery upon the follower showing that the person he follows is not only respectable, but of too much consequence to be annoyed with impunity. The ostentation of servants in livery is scarce worth a comment, as, unless newly assumed, it is seldom thought of by the owner of the equipage, nor is it offensive to the passer-by, except in a country where it is not yet common.

The question whether a country is ready for liveries—that is to say, whether it has arrived at that stage where the want they imply is felt, and where the distinctions they imply are acknowledged—is the true point at issue. It is a curious point, too, for, in every other nation, liveries may be excused as traditional—as being only modifications of the dresses of feudal retainers—while Americans, without this apology, must defend the abrupt adoption of liveries on the mere grounds of propriety and convenience.

We certainly have not yet arrived at that point of civilization where liveries are needed—as in England—to protect a lady from insult in the street. A female may still walk the crowded thoroughfares of New York by daylight—as she dare not do in London—unattended, either by a gentleman or a servant in livery. (We live in hope of overtaking the civilization of the mother-country!) Neither has a liveried equipage, as yet, the tacit consequence, in America, which secures to it in London the convenient concessions of the highway. We are republican enough, thus far, to allow no privileges to be taken for granted; and he who wishes to ride in a vehicle wholly invisible to omnibus-drivers, and at the same time to have his lineage looked into and perpetuated without the expense of heraldic parchment, has only to appear in Broadway with liveried equipage!

We differ from some of our luxurious friends, by thinking, that, as long as the spending of over five thousand dollars a year makes a gentleman odious in the community, liveries are a little premature. It is a pity to be both virtuous and unpopular. The moving about in a cloud of reminded lordship is a luxury very consistent with high morality, but it comes coldly between republicans and the sun—whatever fire of heaven the offending cloud may embosom. We wonder, indeed, at the remaining in this country, of any persons ambitious of distinctions in the use of which we are thus manifestly "behind the age." It is so easy to leave the lagging American anno domini of aristocracy, and sail for the next century—by the Havre packet!

That Heaven does not disdain such love of each other as is quickened by personal admiration, is proved by the injunctions to the children of Israel to appear in cheerful and becoming dresses on festal days—those days occupying rather more than a quarter of a year. The Jews also ornamented their houses on holidays, not as we do with evergreens (a custom we have taken from the Druid "mistletoe, cut with the golden knife"), but with such ornaments as would best embellish them for the reception of friends. The French nation is to be admired for supremacy, in this age, in the exhibition of the kindly feelings and the brightening of the links of relationship and friendship. It has been stated (among statistics) that for bons-bons alone, in Paris, on new year's day, were expended one hundred thousand dollars! We copy the French with great facility in this country, and (until the proposed "annexation of Paris") we rejoice in the prosperity of STUART'S CANDY QUARRY in New York, and the myriad cobwebs of affection that stick, each by one thread, to the corner of Chambers and Greenwich streets! If not quite a "pilgrimage to Jerusalem," it is a pilgrimage to our best signs and emblems of Jerusalem usages, to go the rounds of the gift-shops during the holidays; and no kindly Christian parent, who wishes to throw out an anchor for his children against the storm of political ruffianism, should neglect to bind friendship and family by a new tie in the holidays! We see a use in the skill at temptation shown by such admirable taste-mongers as TIR-

FANY & YOUNG, WOODWORTH, GUION, and others, which is beyond the gratification of vanity, and far from provocatives to "waste of money." But this is no head under which to write a sermon.

We have (ourselves) a preference among the half dozen curiosity-shops of the city—a preference which may, perhaps, be called professional—springing from love for the memory of a departed poet. The son of Woodworth, the warm-hearted author of the "Old Oaken Bucket" and other immortal embodiments of the affections, in verse, is the present proprietor of the establishment known as Bonfanti's—(by our just mentioned theory of the holy ministration of gifts, employed on somewhat the same errand in life as the bard who went before). It may not be improper to mention here, that the last few painful years of the poet's life were soothed with a degree of filial devotion and tenderness which makes the Woodworths cherished among their friends, and this is a country, thank God, where such virtues bring prosperity in business!

BREAKFAST ON NEW YEAR'S DAY.

Astor house, No. 184—nine o'clock in the morning—breakfast for two on the table—enter the brigadier.

Brig. (Embracing "us").—Mi-boy! GOD BLESS YOU!!!

"We." (With his hand to his forehead.)—With what a sculptured and block-y solidity you hew out your benedictions, my dear general! You fairly knock a man over with blessing him! Sit down and wipe your eyes with that table-napkin!

Brig.—Well—how are you?

"We."—Hungry! I'll take a wing of the chicken before you—killed probably last year. How many "friends, countrymen, and lovers," are you going to call on to day?

Brig.—I wish I knew how many I shall not call on! What is a—(pass the butter if you please)—what is a pat of butter, like me, spread over all the daily bread of my acquaintance?

"We."—

"'Tis Greece—but living Greece no more!"

I'll tell you what I have done, general. Here is a list of all my circle of pasteboard. It begins with those I love, and ends with those with whom I am ceremonious. Those whom I neither love nor am ceremonious with, form a large betwixt of indifference; and though you may come to love those with whom you are ceremonious, you never can love those who are wholly indifferent to. I have crossed out this betwixt. Life is too short to play even a game of acquaintance in which there is no possible stake.

Brig.—How short life is, to be sure!

"We."—Shorter this side the water than the other! In Europe a man is not bowed out till he is ready to go! Here, he is expected to have repented and made his will at thirty-seven! I shall pass my "second childhood" in France, where it will pass for a continuation of the first!

Brig.—My dear boy, don't get angry! Eat your breakfast and talk about New Year's. What did the Greeks used to do for cookies?

"We."—Well thought of—they made presents of dates covered with gold leaf! Who ever gilds a date in this country? No! no! general! You will see dozens of married women to-day who have quietly settled down into upper servants with high-necked dresses—lovely women still—who would be belles for ten years to come, in France! Be a missionary, brigadier! Preach against the unbelievers in muliebrity! It's New Year and time to begin something! Implore your friends to let themselves be beautiful once more! (Breast-bone of that chicken, if you please!) I should be content never to see another woman under thirty—their lovable common-sense comes so long after their other maturities!

Brig.—What common-place things you do say, to be sure! Well, mi-boy, we are going to begin another year!

"We."—Yes—prosperously, thank God! And, oh, after the first in-haul of rent from these well-tenanted columns, what a change we shall make in our paper! Let us but be able to afford the outlay of laborious aid, which other editors pay for, and see how the Mirror will shine all over! I have a system in my brain for a daily paper—the fruit of practical study for the last three months—which I shall begin upon before this month has made all its icicles; and you shall say that I never before found my true vocation! The most industriously edited paper in the country is but the iron in the razor; and though it is not easy to work that into shape, anybody can hire it done, or do it with industry. The steel edge, we shall find time to put on, when we are not, as now, employed in tinkering the iron!

Brig.—Black-and-white-smiths—you and I!

"We."—No matter for the name, my dear general!—one has to be everything honesty will permit, to get over the gulf we have put behind us. Civilized life is full of the most unbridged abysses. Transitions from an old business to a new, or from pleasure to business, or from amusing mankind to taking care of yourself, would be supposed, by a "green" angel, to be good intentions, easy enough carried out, in a world of reciprocal charities. But let them send down the most popular angel of the house of Gabriel & Co., to borrow money for the most brilliant project, without bankable security! And the best of it is, that though your friends pronounce the crossing of a business-gulf, on your proposed bridge of brains, impossible and chimerical, they look upon it as a matter of course when it is done! You and I are poets—if the money and fuss we have made will pass for evidence—yet nobody thinks it surprising that we have taken off our wings, and rolled up our shirt-sleeves to carry the hod! Not to die without having experienced all kinds of sensations, I wish to be rich—though it will come to me like butter when the bread is gone to spread it on. Heigho!

Brig.—How you keep drawing similitudes from what you see before your eyes! Let me eat my breakfast without turning it into poetry! It will sour on my stomach, my dear boy!

"We."—So you are ordered out to smash the Helderbergers, general!

Brig.—Ordered to hold myself in readiness—that's all at present. I wish they'd observe the seasons, and rebel in pleasant weather! Think of the summit of a saddle with the thermometer at zero! Besides, if there is any fighting to do one likes an enemy. This campaign to help the constable, necessary as it is, goes against my stomach.

"We."—Fortify it, poor thing! What say to a drop of curacoa before you begin your New Year's round? (Pouring for the general and himself.) Burke states, in his "Vindication of Natural Society," that your predecessor, Julius Cesar, was the means of killing two millions one hundred thousand men! How populous is Helderberg—women and all?

Brig.—Twelve o'clock, my dear boy, and time to be shaking hands and wishing. Take the first wish off the top of my heart—a happy New Year to you, and—

"We."—Gently with that heavy benediction!

Brig.—GOD BLESS YOU, mi-boy!

(Exit the brigadier, affected.)

THEMES FOR THE TABLE.—Among the “upper ten thousand,” there are, of course, many persons, not only of really refined taste, but of practical common sense, and to them we wish to proffer a hint or two, touching the usages just now in plastic and manageable transition among the better classes. The following note, received a day or two since, suggests one of the improvements that we had marked down for comment:—

“MR. EDITOR: I observe that a ‘bachelor,’ writing in the ‘American,’ recommends to ‘invited’ and ‘invited,’ to send invitations and answers, stamped, through the penny-post. This is a capital idea, and I shall adopt it for one. I perceive that a bachelor in another paper says, ‘it will suit him and his fellow-bachelors,’ for reasons set forth, and that he will adopt the plan. Now, Mr. Editor, I am a housekeeper, and married, and my wife requires the use of all my servants, and can not spare them to be absent three or four days, going round the city, delivering notes, on the eve of a party. These notes could, by the plan suggested, be delivered in three hours, and insure a prompt answer. I can then know exactly who is coming and who is not—a very convenient point of knowledge!

“These reasons induce me to become an advocate of the suggestion. There are other sound arguments that might be urged in its favor, but pray present them in your own fashion to your readers.

There is another very burthensome matter, the annoyance of which might be transferred to the penny-post—card leaving! When men are busy and ladies ill (the business and the illness equally unlikely to be heard of by way of apology) it would often be a most essential relief to commit to envelopes a dozen cards, and, with an initial letter or two in the corner,* expressive of good-will but inability to call in person, make and return visits without moving from counting house or easy-chair. This, in a country where few keep carriages, and where every man worth knowing has some business or profession, should be an easy matter to bring about; and, if established into a usage that gave no offence, would serve two purposes—relieving the ill or busy, and compelling those, who really wish to keep up an acquaintance, at least to send cards once in a while, as reminders.

We wish that common sense could be made fashionable among us—vigorously applied, we mean, to the fashions of the best style of people. Why should not the insufferable nuisance of late parties be put down in this country by a plot between a hundred of our sensible and distinguished families? In England they are at the dinner-table between six and ten; but why should we, who seldom dine later than three or four, yawn through a long unoccupied evening before going out, merely because they go to parties at eleven in London? Why should it not be American, to revise, correct, and adapt to differences of national character, the usages we copy from other countries? The subject of late parties is constantly talked over, however, and as all are agreed as to the absurdity of the fashion, a hint at it, here, is enough.

There are other usages which require remodelling by this standard, but while we defer the mention of them at present, we wish to allude to another argument (in favor of common sense applied to fashion) remoter and perhaps weightier than mere convenience. It is simply, that, if an aristocracy is to be formed in this country, the access to its resorts must be kept convenient for men of sense, or society will be left exclusively to fools. Believers in the eternity of democracy might wish fashion kept inconvenient, for this very purpose; but our belief is, that there is no place like a republic for a positive and even violent aristocracy, and, if inevitable, it is as well to compound it of good elements in the beginning. Simply, then, no intellectual man, past absolute juvenility, would consent to enfeeble his mind by fashionable habits injurious to health. Late hours and late suppers (in a country where we can not well sleep till noon as they do in Europe) are mental suicide. Hours and usages, therefore, which are not accommodated to the convenience of the best minds of the country, will drive those minds from the class to which they form the objection, and the result is easily pictured. We shall resume the topic.

LIVERIES AND OPERA-GLASSES.—There is really no way of foreseeing what the Americans will stand and what they will not. An aristocratic family or two, unwilling to compete with the working-classes in personal attire, choose to transfer the splendors of their condition to the backs of their servants. They dress plainly themselves and set up a liveried equipage—as they have an absolute and (one would think) an unoffending right to do. This, however, the American public will not bear—and the persons so doing are insulted by half the presses in the country.

But what they will bear is much more remarkable. In the immense theatres of Europe, where the upper classes are all in private boxes, with blinds and curtains to shut out observation if they please, the use of opera-glasses has gradually become sanctioned. It is found convenient for those classes to diminish the distance across the house, since they have the choice of seclusion behind curtains—which those in the pit have not. Abstractly, of course, the giving to a vulgarian the power to draw a lady's face close to him for a half-hour's examination, would be permitting a gross license. This being the custom in Europe, however, it is adopted with no kind of comparisons of reasons why, in New York. We build an opera-house, scarce larger than a drawing-room, and light it so well, and so arrange the seats, that people are as visible to each other as they would be in a drawing-room; and in this cosy place, allow people to coolly adjust their opera-glasses and turn them full into the faces of those they wish to scrutinize. So near as the glass is, too, it is utterly impossible not to be conscious of being looked at, and the embarrassment it occasions to very young ladies is easy enough shown. We have used this impertinence ourself (because in Rome we do as Romans do), but we never yet have levelled a glass upon a face without seeing that the scrutiny was at once detected. Since we have preached on the subject, however, we shall “go and sin no more.”

“We ask for information:”—is the difference of reception, for these two European customs, explainable on the ground that opera-glasses are a luxury within the reach of most persons, and liveries are not? Do republicans only object to exclusive impertinences?

OPERA LAST NIGHT.—We presume we are safe in saying that no four inhabitants in New York gave as much pleasure last night as PICO, BORGHESE, PERROZZI, and VALTELLINA. We certainly would not have missed our share for any emotion set down among the pleasures of Wall street—well as we know the let-up of an opportune discount! That emperor of Rome who poisoned Britannicus because he was a better tenor than himself, and slept in his imperial bed with a plate of lead on his stomach to improve his voice, knew where music went to, and of what * T. R. M., for instance (meaning this to remind you of me), written in the corner of a card, might imply that the friendly wish had occurred, though the call was overruled by hindrances.

recesses, within his empire, he was not monarch without it. (We suggest a meeting of gentlemen up-town to erect a monument to Nero, now for the first time appreciated!)

Let us tell the story of Semiramide—and we must take the liberty, for clearness' sake, to use the names of the performers without the Siamese-ry of the names of the characters.

Borghese is queen of Babylon. She and Valtellina, who is an old lover of hers, have killed her former husband, a descendant of Belus by whom she had a child. This child is Pico, rightful heir to the throne. At the time the curtain rises, Borghese and Valtellina suppose that Pico also is killed, and the throne vacant for a new husband to Borghese. Valtellina wishes to be that husband; but Borghese, partly from dislike of him, and partly from having had enough of matrimony, takes advantage of a thunder-storm to put off her expected decision. Meantime Pico arrives (acquainted only with Mr. Meyer, apparently, who is a high-priest of Belus), and Queen Borghese, not knowing that it is her own child, falls in love with him! There is a Miss Phillips who is a descendant of this same Belus, and who is to have the throne if Borghese does not marry Valtellina. Pico loves Miss Phillips for some reason only hinted at, and has come to Babylon to see her. Mr. Meyer, who is the only one aware that Pico is the prince supposed to be lost, takes him down into the tomb of the dead king, tells him who he is, gives him his father's "things" in a box, and leaves him there to have a conversation with his mother who happens to drop in. It is all cleared up between them, and they sing a duet together, and go out for a little fresh air. Valtellina, mousing about after the queen, comes afterward to the tomb and meets the high-priest there; and one after another drops in, till the tomb is full, and the ghost of the old king takes the opportunity to get up and mention what he died of. Great confusion of course; and, soon after, Pico, feeling called upon to kill the murderer of the sleepless old gentleman, stabs at somebody in the dark and kills his mother! Valtellina is led off by the police, Pico faints in the arms of Mr. Meyer, the satraps and Babylonians rush in, and the curtain falls—leaving Pico to marry Miss Phillips and succeed to the throne. All this of course took place in a city built two generations after Ham (brother of Shem and Japhet) but what with the look of the "tombs," and the way people were stabbed and poisoned, it was impossible not to wonder what Justice Matsell would have done in the premises.

We shall hear Semiramide again to-night, and speak more advisably of the music on Monday. At present, we can not convince ourself that Grisi and Persiani sang any better when we heard them in London. We can never hope for—and we need not wish—a better opera. BORGHESI is a most accomplished creature, with (among other things) an intoxicating way of crushing her eyes up to express passion (in a way that none but people of genius do) and she does nothing indifferently. Pico, with her wonderful at-home-attiveness anywhere between the lowest note and the highest, faultless in her science, and personally of the kind of women most lovable, is enough, of herself, to keep a town together. PEROZZI, with his sweet, pure voice, and gentlemanly taste (he was king of Egypt last night, by the way, and a candidate for Borghese's hand), is worthy to be a third star in any such Orion's belt, and the fourth may well be VALTELLINA, whose thorough base, we have no doubt, first suggested the idea of the forty-horse excavator lately patented by congress.

But what shall we say of the scenery? We were taken completely by surprise, with the taste as well as splendor of it, and we think Stanfield himself, the great artist who produces occasionally such marvels in the spectacles of Drury Lane, would have taken a pride in claiming it. Certainly no comparable scenery has been exhibited, to our knowledge, in this country. The costumes were also admirable.

Abstaining as we do, for to-day, from musical criticism, we can not help alluding to the electric effect, upon the audience, of the duet between Pico and Borghese—the well-known "Giorno d'orrore." The house was uncomfortably crammed, but a pin might have been heard to drop, at any moment during the singing of it. It was a case of complete musical intoxication. The applause was boundless, but unluckily the encore (which we trust will not be foiled again to-night) was defeated by an evident fear on the part of the audience of interrupting a part of the duet not yet completed. If you love your public, dear Semiramide, nod, to-night, to the orchestra, after the bouquets have descended!

BEHIND THE CURTAIN.

Editor's room, toward midnight—Enter the brigadier, as the printers go down stairs—The day over, and the shop shut up under—A pen (too tired to be wiped) drying in peace on the editor's table—Newsboys done (thank God!)—Brigadier collapsed into a chair.

Brig.—Oh, mi-boy! To think of the trouble of "getting along," and the very small place in which we sleep, when we get there! I wonder whether a man would be much behind the time at his own funeral if he stopped working! I'm tired, Willis! I'll send my ticket for the afterpiece, and "go home," as the Moravians say.

"We."—You forget! Editors are on the "free list" in the theatre of life, and "not entitled to a check."

Brig.—Talk plain to me, my dear boy, and save your heliographs for the paper! The work I have done this week! Is it you that say somewhere, "there's no poetry in a steamboat?" Think of the blessed cry of "stop her!"

"We."—And so you are fairly fagged, my "martial Pyrrhus!"

Brig.—Fagged and dispirited! Moving the printing office—getting all the advertisements set up in new type—little indispensable nothings plaguing my life out—new arrangements in every corner, and the daily paper going on besides—

"We."—I don't wonder you're dead!

Brig.—That is the least of my trouble. I was going to say—(though, to be sure, what we have done this last week, changing office, and renewing type, without stopping the daily, is very much like shoeing your horse without slacking his trot)—but the "benefit," my dear boy, the benefit.

"We."—So long since you have had any money to lend—is that what you mean? You are afraid you have lost the art of making yourself out poorer than the man who comes to borrow. Why, my poor general!

Brig.—Doesn't it strike you as a dreadful mortification, my dear Willis?

"We."—The whole business?

Brig.—The whole business.

"We."—Inasmuch as for genius to be rich, after being poor, would make a god of the man so enriched (by the intensity of his enjoyment, and his natural inoculation against catching the canker from his money)—it is wisely ordained by Providence that we shall not receive it in sums larger than $3, city bill, without mental agony. We should else be in heaven before our time, my dear general—purgatory omitted!

Brig.—But isn't your pride wounded for me, my dear boy?

"We."—As Cassio says (who, by the way, loved general Othello very much as I do you),

"I do attend here on the general,
And think it no addition, nor my wish,
To have him see me womaned."

I have no tear to shed on the subject. I have thought it all over, and would have stood in your place and received the painful thousands myself, if I had thought it more than you could bear—but let me tell you how I look at it.

Brig.—Do, mi-boy, and don't joke more than you can help!

"We."—Editors are the pump-handles of charity, always helping people to water, and never thought to be thirsty themselves!

Brig.—You funny Willis!—so we are!

"We."—You, particularly, have not only been bolted to the public cistern for every benefit of the last twenty years, the fag and work of every possible charitable committee, but your paper has been called upon (and that people think nothing of) to blow wind into the sail of every scheme of benevolence, every device for the good of individuals or the public. People see your face on every printed note that comes to them. You are the other-folks-beggar of the town. When you die—

Brig.—No painful allusions now, mi-boy!

"We."—I was only going to say, my dear general, that they will wish they had unmuzzled the ox that trod out the corn!

Brig. (swallowing something apparently). But I have had so many misgivings about this benefit concert, my dear Willis!

"We."—The pump-handle changing places with the pail! Well—it will be a shower-bath at first, but you'll be full when it's over!

Brig.—There you go again!

"We."—I was letting that smile trickle off my lips while I fished up, from my practical under-current, another good reason for your benefit. Suffer me to be tedious a moment!

Brig.—Be so, mi-boy—be so! I love you best when you're tedious!

"We."—Well, then! Political economy differs from the common estimates of things, by taking into consideration not only their apparent value at the time of sale, but what it has cost, directly or indirectly, to attain that value. Do you understand me?

Brig.—No.

"We."—For example, then!—a leg of mountain mutton may weigh no more than a leg of lowland mutton—but as the fibre of the meat is finer from being fed on highland grass, it is reasonable to estimate it by something besides its weight—i. e., the shepherd's risk of losing it by wild beasts, and the trouble of driving it up and down the mountain.

Brig.—True.

"We."—Thus, a lawyer charges you fifty dollars for an opinion which it takes him but ten minutes to dictate to his clerk. A savage would laugh at the price, and offer to talk twice the time for half the money—but a civilized man pays it, allowing for the education, study, and talent, which it cost to give the opinion value.

Brig.—True again. Now for our "mutton."

"We."—You and I, my dear general, are brain-mongers—which is an exceedingly ticklish trade. We start with our goods in supposition, like the capital of a western bank—locked up in a safe, that is to say (the skull), to which the "teller" alone has the key. We are never sure, in point of fact, that the specie is there, and we are likely at any moment to be "broke" by the critics "making a run upon the bank."

Brig.—Now that's what I call clear!—

"We."—Don't interrupt me! The risks of success in literature, the outlay for education, the delay in turning it to profit, the endurance of the gauntlets of criticism, and the rarity of the gift of genius from God, should be added to the usually fragile shop in which its wares are embarked for vending. The poet, by constitution least able to endure rude usage, is the common target of coarseness and malice. Here and there, to be sure, a man is born, like me—with brains enough, but more liver than brains—and such men sell thoughts as they would potatoes, and don't break their hearts if customers find specks in them; but the literary profession, generally, is of another make, and "political economy" should compensate proportionally. They do it for clergymen! What clergyman feels it an indignity to be sent abroad by subscription, if his health fails? He considers that he is inadequately paid unless his parish take the risks of his health! And you!—besides the reason you have, wholly apart from our joint business, for needing this benefit—here you are, after passing your life in serving people, with a pair of eyes you can scarce sign your name by, and a prospect of a most purblind view of the City Hall when they make you mayor.

Brig.—Mi-boy! oh!

"We."—There's but one pair of well-endorsed eyes between us, and suppose somebody leaves me money enough to unharness me from this omnibus, and turn me out to grass at Glenmary! What will become of you?

Brig.—Heaven indissolubly Siamese us, my dear boy!

"We."—And I have not even named, yet, the ostensible ground for this concert—the songs you have loaded the women's lips with, and never received even a kiss for your trouble!

Brig.—What a fellow you are for reasons, Willis!

"We."—My dear friend, I am going to state all this to the committee for your benefit! By the way—did you ever hear of Ismenias, the D'Orsay of ancient Corinth?

Brig.—Never.

"We."—Ismenias commissioned a friend to buy a jewel for him. The friend succeeded in purchasing it at a sum below its value. "Fool!" said Ismenias, "you have disgraced the gem!" Did you suppose, general, that I was going to give the public the pleasure of paying you this tribute without taxing their admiration as well as their pockets! No! (Hear him!) No! I trust every woman who has sung, or heard sung, a song of yours, will be there to wave a handkerchief for you! I hope every man who loves literature, and has a corner in his heart for the poet who has pleased him, will be there to applaud you! I hope David Hale will give us gas enough to see you on the platform. I hope—God bless me, twelve o'clock!

OPERATIC PARTY.—As our readers are aware, a private sparkle from the stars of an operatic constellation, is one of the luxuries rated as princely in Europe—a proper fitness in the other circumstances of the entertainment requiring a spaciousness of saloons and a magnificence of menu which only the very wealthiest have to offer. The private dwelling-houses of this city, till within a few years, have been much too small for the introduction of this advanced phase of pleasure. Last night, however, a sumptuous residence, that might compare to advantage with any interior in Europe, was thrown open, and its "wilderness of beauty" delighted with private performances by the operatic company now in such admirable combination. As being the head of a new chapter of national refinement, it would, perhaps, be posthumously worth while to depict the scene—not only as to its sumptuary splendors and costumes, but with a description of the “beauty that bewitched the light”—but however posterity might thank us for such an inky Arethusa, we have too much to do with what is above ground, just now, to bury charms for the future.

Madame Pico remarked, before the commencement of the performance, that it was almost as trying for singers used to a theatre to adapt the voice, impromptu, to a saloon, as for an amateur to calculate, at once, the volume of voice necessary to fill a theatre. The first two or three pieces were, notwithstanding this judicious apprehension, a little too loud. Signor Valtellina must have the credit of having been the first to reduce the “fill of the empyrean” to the capacity of a saloon, and, after the measure was taken, the music was exquisitely enjoyable. After tea (served in an adjoining apartment at the close of the first part) the artists assumed, to a charm, the necessary abandon, and the singing between tea and supper was, to our ear, faultless. The pianist only, M. Etienne seemed lacking in the magnetism to quicken the movement with the acceleration of Pico's climax, and we wished a younger or more sympathetic hand in the accompaniment; but this charming cantatrice has too infallible an ear to outrun the instrument, and the effect was sufficiently enchanting. She and Signorina BORGHESE were rapturously encored, and a laughing terzetto between BORGHESE, SANQUIRICO, and PEROZZI, was called for, a second time, with boundless delight and enthusiasm.

We had never before seen Madame Pico off the stage. Care has left no foot-print on the threshold of the gate of music, and her mouth is infantine in texture and expression; but her eyes have that indefinable look which betrays

“The thieves of joyance that have passed that way.”

Her person shows to more advantage in a drawing-room than on the stage, and her manners, like those of all gifted Italians, are of a natural sculpture beyond the need of artificial chiseling. BORGHESE, too, has charming manners, and we were pleased with the cordial accueil given to the prima-donnas by the ladies of the party. Altogether, the absolute good taste of the entertainment, and the unusually choice mixture of elements, social, sumptuous, and professional, made the evening one of high enchantment.

OPERA SINGERS.—At the benefit of Mademoiselle Borghese, lately, the centre of the ceiling suddenly gave birth (at the close of the first act) to a shower of billets-doux, which, being immediately followed by the descent of the drop-scene, representing Jupiter feeling the pulse of Juno, was understood by the audience “as well as could be expected.” The delivery was rather a relief to the feeling of the house, for the crowd and pressure had been very uncomfortable, and some critical event was needed to relieve the endurance.

We have been pleased at the example, set by the good authority of the party of Monday evening, of giving a cordial, social welcome to distinguished musical strangers. America profits by having two nations marching immediately before her in civilization—each unwilling to imitate the other, but both open to study, by us, with no impediment as to our selection of points for imitation or rejection. The French and English are wholly at variance on the point we have just alluded to—the social position given to celebrated musicians. In the high circles of France, when a party is given at which the operatic singers perform a concert, the reception for the musicians consults only their personal comfort.—Chairs are placed for them, which they rarely leave to mix with the party, and their supper is always separate from that of the guests.

There is no intention shown, of treating them like equals. In England, on the contrary, the operatic company are the pets of society. Pasta, Catalani, Persiani, Grisi, and the male singers, Lablache, Rubini, Ivanhoff, and others, were free of all exclusion on the score of rank, and “dined and tîted” familiarly like noble strangers from other countries. We have seen the duke of Wellington holding the gloves of GRISI, while she pulled to pieces a bunch of grapes at the supper table of Devonshire house; and we have a collection of autographs of public singers (two of which we published the other day), addressed to persons of high rank, and expressed in terms of the most confessed feeling of ease as to relative position.

We repeat that we rejoice in the power to select footsteps to follow in civilization (from those of two nations gone on before), and we take pride, that, in this latest instance, we have copied the more liberal and kindly-hearted usage. These children of a passionate clime are not justly measured by our severe standards; and we should receive them like airs from a southern sky, without cooling them first by a chymical analysis. They are, commonly, ornaments to society—joyous, genial, free from the “finikin” superfineries of some of those inclined to abase them—and the difference of the pleasure they give, when their hearts are in it, is offset enough for any sacrifice made in excusing the “low breeding” of their genius!

BORGHESE, whose benefit came off so triumphantly last night, is a woman of very superior mind, of manners faultlessly distinguished, and (essential praise to a woman) a model of toilet-ability. She is, besides, a remarkable actress, and a very accomplished musician. This is a pretty good description of an agreeable acquaintance; and, if we were to sketch Madame Pico, it would be in terms still more warmly eulogistic. We leave to the ladies who throw bouquets to Sanquirico, to laud the men of the opera, and wind up this essay of political economy, by drawing an instructive example, of the effect of what we preach, from the manufacture of a prima-donna into a queen and goddess, in the days of venerable antiquity.

“Among the female performers of antiquity, LAMIA is certainly the most celebrated; how much her fame may have been aided by her beauty we can not determine. She was everywhere received with honor, and according to Plutarch, equally admired for her wit, beauty, and musical performance. She was a native of Athens, but travelled into Egypt to hear the celebrated flute-players of that country. During her residence at the court of Alexandria, Ptolemy Soter was defeated in a naval engagement by Demetrius, and all his wives and domestics fell into the hands of the conqueror. Lamia was among the number; but Demetrius was so attracted by her beauty and skill, that he raised her to the highest rank, and from her solicitations, conferred such benefits on the Athenians, that they gave him divine honors and dedicated a temple to ‘Venus Lamia.’”

MADAME PICO'S BENEFIT.—We should be happy if Europe would inform us why this remarkable cantatrice comes to us “new as a tooth-pick,” as to fame, and whether (the same lack of previous trumpeting having given us a surprise in Malibran), we are to have the credit also of the eccebbion of Pico! Even without the “deep-sea plummet” of her contralto (which certainly does touch bottom for which most voices lack fathoms of line) she has a compass as a mezzo soprano, which would alone serve for remarkable success in her profession. She is a most correct musician too—the only false note we have heard from her, having been occasioned by her striking her chest too violently while singing defiance to Valtellina)—and, withal, a most gifted and charming woman, every way formed to be an idol for the public. We have written a great deal about Madame Pico, and, her benefit being the last occasion we shall find, to do more than chronicle her movements, we shall send this quill to our friend Kendall of the Picayune (as the Highlanders send the lighted brand), enveloped in a stanza addressed by an Italian poet to Lady Coventry:—

“ Si tutti gli alberi del mondo
Fossero penne,
Il cielo fosse carta,
Il mare inchiostro,
Non basterebbero a distrivere
La minima parte della ”—

We leave the rest to the Picayune's prophetic divination.

Adieu, Pico, l'in-cantatrice! A clear throat and a plethoric pocket to you!

MADAME ARNOULT'S CONCERT.—It looked very queer (and a little wicked withal) to see opera-glasses and ladies with their heads uncovered, in the pews of the Tabernacle; and we are not sure that our “way we should go” did not twitch us for a “departure,” when we found ourselves applauding with kid gloves in the neighborhood of the altar! We were applauding Pico; and the next thought that came to us was, a regret that such voices should not be consecrated to church choirs; for (granting the opera to be a profane amusement, as is thought by the worshippers at the Tabernacle), “it is a pity,” as a celebrated divine once said, “that the devil should have all the good music.” And, apropos—was not this capital remark—(attributed, we believe, to Wesley)—suggested by one, recorded of the pope Gregory of the fifth century? Britain at that time was, to Rome, what Africa is now to us—a savage country they brought slaves from; and the introduction of Christianity into that heathen land is said to have been prompted by the pope's admiration of the beauty of two or three young John Bulls who were for sale in the market-place of Rome. On inquiring of the merchant if they were Christians, and being informed they were pagans, he exclaimed, “Alas, what a pity that the author of darkness should be in possession of men of such fair countenances!” He commissioned Pelagius forthwith to send missionaries to the handsome British pagans, and hence the church of England—probably the only church, the members of which owe their salvation to their personal beauty! (Pardon this historical digression, dear readers!)

MADAME ARNOULT took New York by surprise—she is so much better a singer than was supposed. With less effort, and in a smaller room than the nave of the Tabernacle, she would, however, appear to much more advantage. Her voice, to our ear, lacked hedging, or lining, or something to make it warmer or more downy—but it is a clear and most cultivable soprano, and she manages it with wonderful skill for a beginner at public singing. We predict great popularity for her. Madame Pico sang, with her, the duet from Semiramide, and it was enough to steep even the pulpit cushion in a this world's trance of music.

ARMLETS.—We have observed that there is a late fashionable promotion of the jewels of the arm to the more lovely round above the elbow, where, it must be confessed, a bracelet sits much more enviably imbedded. We rather think this renewal of the fashion of armlets is a clean jump from the rape of Helen to 1845, for the latest mention we can find of it is in the account of the Trojan nymphs, who laid aside their armlets to dance in the choirs on Mount Ida. It takes an arm, plump and not too plump, to wear this clasp with a grace, but where the arm is really beautiful, no ornament could be more fitly and captivatingly located. We were very much struck with the effect upon the dazzling arm on which we lately noticed it.

VIEWS OF MORRIS'S CONCERT.—There are few buttons on the motley coat of human dependance, to which the button-hole is not serviceably correspondent—the button (conferring the favor) commonly drawing the same garment closer by aid of the button-hole (receiving the favor). There is one very striking instance however, of constant services unreciprocated, in what editors do for singers and actors. Our attention has been called to this by a series of paragraphs—(part silly, part malicious)—expressing surprise that Ole Bull and others, who had never been in any way benefited by Gen. Morris, should have been asked to contribute their services gratuitously to his benefit concert.

It is needful, of course, in a newspaper, to make some mention and some critical estimate of all public performers. It may be done favorably or unfavorably; and there is a way of being abundantly paid for either. “BLACK MAIL” is willingly paid where commendation is sold in shambles, but the editor is better paid, still, if, with skillful roasting and dissection of the faults of public performers, he cruelly enriches his paper (like a paté de foie gras with the liver of the goose roasted alive), and so sends it, palatably spiced, to the uninquiring appetite of the public. He who has a hair of his head left undamned, to creep with shame at the “black mail” sale of his approbation—and he who has common human kindness to prevent his murdering the hopes of strangers to make his paper readable—both these are of classes that go unpaid, and commonly unthanked, for services most essential to others, and forbearance most costly to themselves.

The editor's business is to make his paper readable. The most difficult task he has to do is to be readably good-natured. The easiest writing in the world is criticism amusingly severe. If any one doubts, for example, that with the same pains we have taken, glowingly to interpret between Ole Bull and the public, we could have ridiculed him into a comparative failure—sending a laugh before him through the country that would have armed every listener with an impenetrable incredulity—if any one doubts our power to have done this, as easily as we have ushered him into hearts we made ready for a believing reception of his music, he does not know either the press or the public—neither the arbitrary license of the press, nor the public's weak memory for everything but ridicule. Where Ole Bull now stands, the press is comparatively powerless. He is stamped with success. But, when he stood on the threshold of this country's favor—a musician, whose peculiarities at first seemed tricks, and whom few heard for the first time with a confident appreciation—if, then, ridicule had met him, boldly and unsparingly, even though this one paper had alone opened the cry, he would have had us to thank, we believe, for the tide turned back on which he now rides triumphantly onward. Certain as it is that we could not, all alone, have made his present good fortune, it is quite as certain that we could, all alone, have marred it—and that, too, to the profitable spicing of our somewhat praise-ridden columns. We need not stop to tell the reader that we are describing the fiend Siamesed to Liberty—an Irresponsible Press which can not be chained without chaining Liberty too—but we wish to show that there is some merit in not harnessing this fiend to our own slow vehicle of fortune. There never was an opportunity so ready as Ole Bull's advent for amusing ridicule—but we were the first, or among the first, to call for faith in him, and aid in his appreciation. We did it from love of the man and belief in his genius, and would as soon have been marked on the brow with a hot iron as bargain for a syllable of it. But—the unforeseen opportunity presenting itself, when, apparently, he might return our paper's service by a favor to our associate—he was invited without scruple to do so. Suppose he had played ten minutes on the violin for the benefit of the proprietor of a paper devoted, for a year, invariably to his interests? Would it have been the "act of charity" for which a paragraphist says that "Ole Bull was unreasonably called upon?" The high-spirited Norwegian placed his regret, that he could not be here to comply, upon no such footing.

While we are calling things by their real names, we may as well change the label of another matter—the notice of the benefit to Gen. Morris. As the public know, our estimable associate, by twenty years of literary labor, amassed a moderate fortune, which, in the disasters of an era of bankruptcy, he suddenly lost. A part of his property was invested in the beautiful country-seat of Undercliff on the Hudson—the residence of his family for several years. His friends—with a provident hope, looking beyond the clouds that enveloped him—fastened, to the transfer of this lovely spot, a condition by which he might, if able, repurchase it at a certain time, and at its then reduced valuation. He has since been suffered to tenant it for a trifling rent. He has improved it, embellished it, increased its value. His children have grown up in it. But, meantime, the limit came around—(now only a short time off)—when the purchase must be made or the home lost. His old friends came to inquire into the probable result of their forethought for him. We need not give the particulars of our business—General Morris was partly prepared to redeem the property. The lack was a sum that might be covered by a benefit concert—so suggested by one of the parties. It was urged upon him and declined. He was told that Beranger had three subscriptions (one of twenty thousand dollars)—that Campbell had several—that Scott's children were relieved of his debts by a posthumous subscription of two hundred thousand dollars—and that private subscriptions for literary men were of common occurrence in England.

The public know the sequel. He refused, till the concert was agreed upon by his friends without him. The Italians, whom our paper had more especially served, sprang, generously and with acclamation, to reciprocate our constant advocacy of their company's attraction. The musicians resident here were all friends of General Morris, for he alone, more than all other men in New York taken together, had served the dramatic and musical profession. They, too, joyously sprang to the chance of benefiting him. Never was service more eagerly rendered than that by the performers last night at the Tabernacle—never came good purpose before the public, so lamely and disparagingly construed.

In making up our mind to allow the public to be intimate with us, we expect now and then to expose the lining of our gaberdine. We conform to the exigencies of the latitude we live in—but upon dishabille explanations, we hope for dishabille constructions. What we have written here, between five o'clock, A. M., and breakfast (wholly without the knowledge of General Morris), goes to press with the ink undried, and we have no security against errors but that of writing as we would talk to our confessor. If the time should ever arise when really good intentions may be trusted to stand, in public opinion:—

"With that credent bulk
That no unworthy scandal once can touch
But it confounds the breather,"

we may cease to explain "why our stocking is ungartered." Meantime, we expect to die.

THE OPERA BEREAVEMENT.—What is to become of this widower of a town when it has lost its fairly-espoused PICO, we must leave to the survivor's obituary to record. We may as well have our ears boxed and stowed away!—Their vocation is as good as gone! No more Pico? Faith, it will go hard for the first week or two! But—by the way—as those "lost from us" are invariably supposed to be crowned in the next place they go to, and as, of course, Pico will be crowned in the presence of St. Charles and the brunet angels of New Orleans, we must take upon ourselves, as her New York "gold stick in waiting," to summon one at least, of her liege subjects to his duty. (We happen, fortunately, to possess an autograph of George the Fourth, signed to the necessary formula.)

"To G— W— K—, Marquis of 'Picayune:'

"RIGHT TRUSTY AND RIGHT WELL-BELOVED COUSIN.—We greet you well. Whereas, the 1st day of March next (or thereabouts) is appointed for our coronation.—These are to will and command you (all excuses set apart) to make your personal attendance on us at the time above-mentioned, furnished and appointed as to your rank and quality appertaineth.—There to do and perform all such services as shall be required and belong to you.—Whereof you are not to fail.—And so we bid you heartily farewell.

"Given at our court at Palmo's, the 21st day of January, 1845, in the first year of our reign.

"PICO PRIMA (donna)."

STAR RETURNING TO ITS MERIDIAN.—PICO has changed her mind! Jubilate! She has declined to go to New Orleans with the Borgheses, and will remain here to be the nucleus for a new operatic crystallization. We beg New York and Boston to shake hands in felicitation! And now that it is settled (as we understand it was, yesterday, by a decisive letter to Signor Borghese), let us splinter a ray or two of light upon the diamond that has so wisely refused resetting. New Orleans is a French city, with a French opera; and Mademoiselle Borghese is a French woman, with lost laurels to win back from the Italian Pico. This new arena, little likely to have been an impartial one, is a great way off, the journey dangerous and tedious, and, to go there, Madame Pico must abruptly leave a wave of fortune, which she is now riding "at the flood," and give up three admiring cities for one that might be dubious! A new opera-house is about to be built here, of which she will be the first predominant star; her concerts, in the meantime, in the different cities, will profitably employ her; and, as to the company, there is a substitute lying perdu for Borghese, and a tenor might soon be found to replace Perozzi. Out of these facts, the public can pick the good reasons Madame Pico has for abandoning her journey to New Orleans. Let us do our best to show her that she has not made a mistake in preferring us

TAKING THE WHITE VEIL.—The Undine of the Bowling-green (Miss Undine W—g, if named after the gentleman to whose liberality she owes her existence) was shown last evening, with her radiant beauty enveloped in glittering white, to the assembled friends of the author of her being. To alight from the poetry of the matter:—Mr. W—g invited, yesterday, a party of his friends to see an illumination of the superb fountain with which he has embellished that part of the city. The rocky structure through which it leaps, is completely encrusted with ice, and it looked like—like more things than we have room to mention. The colored light covered the fountain first with a suffused blush of the tenderest pink, and this deepened to crimson, and the glow upon ice and water was really superb beyond any effect of the kind we have ever witnessed. It made even a Dry Dock omnibus (which chanced to be passing at the moment), look rosily picturesque and fairy-like. The black sky overhead; the delicate tracery of the naked branches of the trees; the enclosure of architecture with lights in the windows (which seemed completely to shut it in like the court of an illuminated palace), were all striking additions to the effect. We would inquire, by the way, whether this couleur de rose could not be adapted to the brightening of the ice with which the fountains of the mind are sometimes crusted over. Philogistic chymists will please explain.

IMPROVEMENTS ON THE AMERICAN LANGUAGE.—The making an improvement in one's mother's property is, of course, a praiseworthy filial service, and we find that we have succeeded in enriching our "mother language" by successfully breaking, to new and valuable service, a pair of almost useless and refractory terminations. "—Dom" and "—tricity" may now be hitched by a single hyphen to any popular word, name, or phrase, and, without the cumbrous harness of a periphrasis, may turn it out in the full equipage of a collective noun! Our first experiment in this economy of parts of speech was the describing a charming class of society by the single word JAPONICA-DOM. This musical substantive could hardly be displaced by a shorter sentence than "the class up town who usually wear in their hair the expensive exotic commonly called a japonica." The second experiment was the word PICO-TRICITY—a condensation of "the power, brilliancy, and electric effect of the singing of Madame Rosina Pico." We see by the papers that these expediting inventions (for which we liberally refrained from taking out a patent) are freely used already by our brother administrators of the mother language, and we have only respectfully to suggest a proper economy and fitness in their application.

EARLY-HOURS-DOM.—We scarcely need explain, we presume, that we have undertaken the wholesome mission of giving interest, as far as in us lies, to the more refined occupancy of that portion of the day comprised between twilight and go-to-bed time—becoming, so to speak, the apostle of fashionable early-hours-dom. Of course we are entirely too practical to dream of "reforming out," by mere force of argument, the four-hours' unprofitable yawn and the night's restitution-less robbery of sleep. Every one knows that the reasons for the late hours of European fashion are wholly wanting in this country—but every one consents to follow the fashion without the reasons. The only way to diminish the attraction of late amusements is to anticipate them by more attractive early amusements. It will be remembered that we commenced our vigorous support of the opera with this view of the use of it. It was a well-put though unsuspected blow to the habit of late hours, for many gave up parties they would otherwise have gone to, from having been sufficiently amused at the opera; and others found out, practically, that to dress and go to the opera from seven till ten, gave all the relaxation they required, and their natural night's sleep into the bargain! It is with this ultimate view of making a fashionable Kate

"Conformable as other household Kates!"— giving us a substitute that shall make late hours more easily dispensed with—that we look upon the plan of this new opera-house as a national benefit. If built luxuriously, lavishly lighted, made to serve all the purposes of a sumptuous festal saloon, and give exquisite music besides, it will be a preferable resort to a ball-room; and we believe that it is only from the lack of a preferable resort in evening dress, that late parties are any way endurable. Early parties on the off nights of the opera, would soon follow, we think—the habit of early hours of gayety, once relished—and so would creep out this servile and senseless imitation of foreign fashion.

UNTILTED FIELD OF LITERATURE IN NEW YORK.—The one country we have lived in, without loving a native, is the country that, on the whole, gave us the most to admire—FRANCE. We embroidered a year and a half of our memory with the grace and wit of the world's capital of taste, and we have left a heart (travellers' pattern) in every other country between Twenty-second street and the Black sea; but, that we do not even suspect the color of a French heart-ache we solemnly vow—and marvel. We admire the French quite enough, however (perhaps there lies the philosophy of it!) to leave no fuel for sentiment to mourn over as wastage, and now—(apropos des bottes)—why have we no vehicle for French wit in New York—no battery for the friction and sparkle of French electricity? How can the French live without a "Charivari?" Twenty thousand French inhabitants and no savor in the town, as if the gods had "dined below stairs!" Ten thousand French women (probably), and either no celebrity, of wit or beauty, among them, or no needful newspaper-cloud in which the thunder and lightning of such pervading electricities could be collected!

We wonder whether the "Courrier des Etats Unis" (the Anches French paper which we read, as the pious Æneas carried his father on his back, to have something to cherish, out of the city left behind—something French, that is to say)—we wonder whether, on their alternate days, the editors of that sober tri-weekly paper could not give us something spiced à la Parisienne—and whether such a vehicle, for the French wit that must be here, benumbed or hidden, would not be a profitable speculation! The "Courrier" is the best of useful and grave papers, and entirely fulfils its destiny, but it is small pleasure to the ten thousand people in New York, who relish French literature, to re-peruse the matter of the daily papers, rechauffé in a foreign language. If the lack of Parisian material, here, were an apparent objection, what a delightful luxury it would be to have a paper made up, at first, entirely, with the condensed essence of the gay papers of Paris! A feature of New York charivari might be gradually worked in—but, meantime, a well-selected bouquet of the prodigal wit and fun of the capital (made comprehensible by a correspondence kept up with Paris, which should explain allusions, etc.) would be, we should really suppose, most attractive to the better classes of our society, and, to the French of New Orleans and other more remote cities, an indispensable luxury.

There is a natural homeopathy for everything French in this city—much stronger than for the same things a l'Anglaise. We would wish, too, that the barrier of a different language were gradually broken down, so that some of the delightful peculiarities of Paris might ooze into our city manners through a conduit of periodical literature. Heigho!—to think of the brilliant intellectual lamps blazing like noonday in France, while, with the material for the same brightness about us, we sit by the glimmer of fire-light! Oh, Jules Janin! "American in Paris!"—come over with your prodigal brain and be a Parisian in America! Ordain yourself as a missionary of wit, and Janin-ify a continent by a year's exile beyond the Boulevards! You'll laugh at us when you return, but streams chafe the channels they refresh, and we will take you with your murmur!

"L'onda, dal mar divisa,
Bagna la valle e l'monte,
Va passeggiara
In fiume,
Va prigioniera
In fonte,
Mormora sempre e gem
Fin che non torna al mar."

It would hardly be inferred—but we really sat down to write the following paragraph, and not the foregoing one:—

THE PRIMA-DONNAS AT FAULT.—The "Courier des Etats Unis" has now and then an ebullition of national spirituality, in the shape of a half column of theatrical gossip, and we have had on our table, for several days, a cut-out paragraph, very well hit off, touching one or two of the town's pleasure-makers. The editor is, of course, behind the curtain, as the natural centre of the foreign circle of New York, and he writes with knowledge. He gives as a fact that Borghese cleared $550 by her benefit, but he disparages the performance of that evening, and hauls the ladies seriously over the coals for having exhausted themselves at a private party the night before! He detects an anachronism in Semiramide, and calls Pico to account for appearing before the queen (as Arsace) with his mother's crown on, when the good lady had as yet only promised it to him! The first thing in the succeeding duet, says the "Courier," should have been a remark from Semiramide (who has promised him the crown as a lover, not knowing it is her son) to this effect: "Vous êtes un peu pressé, mon bel amoureux!" ou bien, "De quel droit portez-vous cette couronne, que je n'ai fait que vous offrir?" The crown given him by the high-priest, out of the paternal box, was, of course, only symbolic, as the queen was still on the throne.

KORPONAY'S FALL, FROM A FAUX PAS.—Another matter touched in the same paragraph is the non-rising of the new ballet-star promised for that evening. The leader of the constellation chanced to be taken ill (below the horizon) at Philadelphia, but the Courier states that the illness was owing to a fall, from a faux pas, and that the faux pas was an engagement by the tumbler (Korponay) to go to Philadelphia once a week for twenty-four dollars, when his expenses, wife and all, were twenty-six! The Courier does not state, what we think highly probable, that Korponay's blood has come through too many generations of gentlemen to be good at a dancing-master's bargains.

THE NEW DANSEUSE.—A third topic of this same pregnant paragraph is the contention between two dancing-masters, Charruaud and Mons. Korponay, for the honor of having given the finishing grace to the "light fantastic toe" of Miss Brooks, the new wonder. Monsieur Charruaud (Frenchman-like) declares that she is not only his pupil, but by no means the best of his pupils! Monsieur Korponay simply advertises her as his; and the star, and the star's mamma, confess to her Korponay-tivity. But—

("How Alexander's dust may stop a bung!")

What blood does the public think is running in the veins of this same "fantastic toe?"—James Brooks—the "Florio," who, ten years ago, was the poetical passion of this country—was the father of this dancing girl! What would that sensitive poet have written (prophetically) on the first appearance of his daughter in a pas seul!

LONGFELLOW'S WAIF.—A friend, who is a very fine critic, gave us, not long since, a review of this delightful new book. Perfectly sure that anything from that source was a treasure for our paper, we looked up from a half-read proof to run our eye hastily over it, and gave it to the printer—not, however, without mentally differing from the writer as to the drift of the last sentence, as follows:—

"We conclude our notes on the 'Waif' with the observation that, although full of beauties, it is infected with a moral taint—or is this a mere freak of our own fancy? We shall be pleased if it be so—but there does appear, in this exquisite little volume, a very careful avoidance of all American poets who may be supposed especially to interfere with the claims of Mr. Longfellow. These men Mr Longfellow can continuously imitate (is that the word?) and yet never even incidentally commend."

Notwithstanding the haste with which it passed through our attention (for we did not see it in proof), the question of admission was submitted to a principle in our mind; and, in admitting it, we did by Longfellow as we would have him do by us. It was a literary charge, by a pen that never records an opinion without some supposed good reason, and only injurious to Longfellow (to our belief) while circulating, un-replied-to, in conversation-dom. In the second while we reasoned upon it, we went to Cambridge and saw the poet's face, frank and scholar-like, glowing among the busts and pictures in his beautiful library, and (with, perhaps a little mischief in remembering how we have always been the football and hether nosegay of our contemporaries) we returned to our printing-office arguing thus: Our critical friend believes this, though we do not; Longfellow is asleep on velvet; it will do him good to rouse him; his friends will come out and fight his battle; the charge (which to us would be a comparative pat on the back) will be openly disproved, and the acquittal of course leaves his fame brighter than before—the injurious whisper in conversation-dom killed into the bargain!

That day's Mirror commenced its

"Circle in the water
Which only seeketh to expand itself
Till, by much spreading, it expand to naught."

We expected the return mails from Boston to bring us a calmly indignant "Daily Advertiser," a coquetishly reproachful "Transcript," a paternally severe "Courier," and an Olympically-denunciatory "Atlas." A week has elapsed, and we are still expecting. Thunder is sometimes "out to pasture." But, meantime, a friend who thinks it the driver's lookout if stones are thrown at a hackney-coach, but interferes when it is a private carriage—(has loved us these ten years, that is to say, and never objected to our being a target, but thinks a fling at Longfellow is a very different matter)—this friend writes us a letter. He thinks as we do, exactly, and we shall, perhaps, disarm the above-named body-guard of the accused poet by quoting the summing-up of his defence:—

"It has been asked, perhaps, why Lowell was neglected in this collection? Might it not as well be asked why Bryant, Dana, and Halleck, were neglected? The answer is obvious to any one who candidly considers the character of the collection. It professed to be, according to the proem, from the humbler poets; and it was intended to embrace pieces that were anonymous, or which were not easily accessible to the general reader—the waifs and estrays of literature. To put anything of Lowell's, for example, into a collection of waifs, would be a peculiar liberty with pieces which are all collected and christened."

It can easily be seen how Longfellow, and his friends for him, should have a very different estimate from ourself as to the value of an eruption, in print, of the secret humors of appreciation. The transient disfiguring of the skin seems to us better than disease concealed to aggravation. But, apart from the intrinsic policy of bringing all accusations to the light, where they can be encountered, we think that the peculiar temper of the country requires it. Our national character is utterly destitute of veneration. There is a hostility to all privileges, except property in money—to all hedges about honors—to all reserves of character and reputation—to all accumulations of value not bankable. There is but one field considered fairly open—money-making. Fame-making, character-making, position-making, power-making, are privileged arenas in which the "republican many" have no share.

The distrust with which all distinction, except wealth, is regarded, makes a whispered doubt more dangerous to reputation than a confessed defect. The dislike to inheritors of anything—birthrights of anything—family names or individual genius—metamorphoses the first suspicion greedily into a belief. A clearing-up of a disparaging doubt about a man is a public disappointment. "That fellow is all right again, hang him!" is the mental ejaculation of ninety-nine in a hundred of the readers of a good defence or a justification.

P. S. We are not recording this view of things by way of assuming to be, ourself, above this every-day level of the public mind—too superfine to be a part of such a public. Not a bit of it. We can not afford superfinery of any kind. We are trying to make a living by being foremost in riding on a coming turn of the tide in these matters. The country is at the lowest ebb of democracy consistent with its intelligence. The taste for refinements, for distinctions, for aristocratic entrenchments, is moving with the additional momentum of a recoil. We minister to this, in the way of business, as the milliner makes a crown-shaped head-dress for Mrs. President Tyler. It has its penalty, but that was reckoned at starting. We knew, of course, that we could not sell fashionable opinions at our counter without being assailed as assuming to be the representative of fashion—just as if we could not even name a tribute of libertinism to virtue without being sillily called a libertine by the Courier, Commercial, and Express. However, there is some hope, by dint of lifetime fault-culture, that, in the sod over a man's grave, there will be no slander-seed left to flower posthumously undetected.

POPULARITY OF MADAME PICO.—During the past week we received a letter from a serious writer (a lady), confessing to her own great delight in Madame Pico,

* Others have recorded this national habit of attacking the individual instead of the opinion. Dr. Reese, in his "Address in behalf of the Bible in Schools," thus speaks of the manner of opposition to his philanthropic labors:—

"I have learned that to tremble in the presence of popular clamor, or desert the post of duty when it becomes one of danger, is worthy neither of honor nor manhood; else I would have gladly retired from the conflict to which I found my first official act exposed me, and the hostile weapons of which were aimed, not at the law under which I was acting, but hurled only against my humble self."

but wishing us to impress upon our religious readers, by arguments more at length, the sacredness of good music, even by an operatic singer. We remember a passage in Burnet's Records, which shows that even these operatic singers, if enlisted to sing in the choirs of churches, would become the special subjects of prayer. "Also ye shall pray for them that find any light in this church, or give any behests, book, bell, chalice or vestment, surplices, water-cloth or towel, lands, rents, lamp or light, or other aid or service, whereby God's worship is better served, sustained and maintained in reading and singing." It has long been our opinion that to heighten the character of church music would be aiding and giving interest and consequence to religious service, and the inviting of professed singers to the choirs, for the sabbaths they pass in the city, would make them particularly (according to Burnet) special subjects of prayer.

The four-feet precipice between the carriage wheel and the side walk, and the back slope to the range of racing omnibuses and drunken sleigh-riders, prevent ladies from embarking in carriages at present, and this is one thing that reconciles us to the opera people's having chosen to

"fold up their tents like the Arab
And silently steal away."

Madame Pico has found a rich oasis in Boston appreciation, and we trust the snow will have melted away before the Tabernacle so that it will not be an inaccessible desert when she returns. Her concert there will be like a dawn after a month's night of music.

TWO OR THREE NEW FASHIONS IN FRANCE.—In a French pamphlet handed in to our office a few days ago, purporting to be Monsieur Grousset's justification for having been shot down in Broadway by Monsieur Emeric, Mr. Grousset describes a previous affair with the same gentleman, lately, in France. On that occasion, he states, Mr. Emeric went to the field attended by nine persons, one of whom was a lady!

We find, also, by a private letter from a friend in Paris, that the now common FEMALE practice of SMOKING CIGARS is considered (by connoisseurs in knowing-dom) as a most engaging addition to the attractions of some particular styles of beauty! "The play of the mouth upon the cigar, the reddening of the lips by the irritation of the tobacco, and the insouciant air, altogether, which it gives to the smoker, adds to the peculiar quality of a dashing and coquetish woman, as much as it would detract from that of a retiring and timid one." The eyes (he adds) gleam with a peculiar softness, through the smoke. Our correspondent had just returned from a call on a charming American lady, whom he found with a cigar in her rosy mouth!

WELLINGTON BOOTS have been sported during the late bad weather for walking, by some of the fashionable ladies of Paris. They are made of patent leather, reaching to the knee, with a small tassel in front (at least so exhibited in shop-windows) and the leg of the boot rounded and shaped in firm leather, like the fashion of boots twenty years ago. The high heel (keeping the sole of the foot from the wet pavement), is "raved about," in Paris—the ladies wondering how such a sensible thing as a heel should have been so long disused by the sex most in need of its protection. The relief of the ankles from contact with the cold or wet edge of the dress in wet weather is dwelt upon in the description, as is also the increased beauty of the foot from the heightening of the arch of the instep by the high heel.

FASHIONS FOR COUNTRY BELLES.—The following appeal to our gallantry pulls very hard :—

"MR. EDITOR: One of the greatest treats you could give your country lady readers, would be to furnish them from time to time, with brief hints as to the actual style of fashions in the metropolis. We have, all along, depended for information on this important subject, upon the monthly magazines, all of which profess to give the fashions as worn, but we find out to our dismay, that they pick up their fashions from the Paris and London prints at random—some of them adopted by our city ladies, some not! It thus happens that we country people, who like to be in the fashion, are often subjected to great expense and mortification—relying too implicitly upon the magazine reports. We cause a bonnet or a dress to be made strictly in accordance with the style prescribed in the fashion plate of the magazine, and when we hie away to the city with our new finery, we discover that our costume is so outré that every one laughs at us! Now, should there not be some remedy for this evil?

"We ladies hope you will do something for us in the way of remedying this. You can make up a paragraph, every now and then, on the subject without more trouble than it costs you in writing a critique on a much less important matter. Let us know all about the real changes in the 'outer woman' in Broadway and in drawing-rooms. Tell us all about the New York shawls, and New York handkerchiefs, and New York gloves, etc. And, when the fine weather again appears, tell us about the riding-dresses and riding-caps your friends in the city wear, and do not fail to give us an exact account of the kind of sun-defenders in vogue, whether they be parasols, shades, hoods, or anything else. * * * * *

"I subscribe myself, your well-wisher,

"KATE SALISBURY.

"Belle Grange, Jan. 29."

We have omitted the bulk of Miss Kate's letter, giving rather too long an account of two or three expensive disasters from being misguided by magazines as to the fashions—but it is easily to be seen that it is a matter that concerns outlay which "comes home to business and bosom." We shall take it into consideration. Our present impression is, that we shall set apart half a column, weekly, bi-weekly, or tri-weekly, devoted to "the fashions by an eye-witness." This, however, immediately suggests a dilemma: There are two schools of taste among the ladies! Some women dress for men's eyes, and this style is both striking and economical. Other women (most women indeed), dress for ladies' approval only, and this style is studiously expensive, sacrifices becomingness to novelty, and is altogether beyond male appreciation.—Which style should we shape our report for?

CANADIAN GOSSIP.—The chief of the Scotch clan, McNab, has lately emigrated to Canada with a hundred clansman. On arriving at Toronto, he called on his newly illustrious namesake, Sir Allan, and left his card as "The McNab." Sir Allan returned his visit, leaving as his card, "The other McNab." The unusual relish of this accidental bit of fun, has elevated the definite article into a kind of provincial title, and, in common conversation, the leading individual of a family name is regularly the-ified. Among the officers at Montreal there was lately a son of the late celebrated "Jack Mytton," the most game-y sportsman in England. Meeting Sir Allan McNab at a mess-dinner, young Mytton sent wine to him with the message: "The Mytton" would be happy to take wine with "The Other McNab." We should not wonder if this funny use of the definite article became the germ of the first American title. The Tyler! The Mrs. Tyler!

This same young Mytton, by the way, inherited his father's adventurous temper, and though the first favorite of Montreal society, he alone, of all the officers, could find no lady willing to sleigh-ride with him. They openly declared their fear of his pranks of driving. One fine day, however, when all the town was on runners, Mytton was seen with a dashing turn-out, and a lady deeply veiled, sitting beside him, to whose comfort he was continually ministering, and to whom he was talking with the most merry glee. It was, to all appearance, a charming and charmed auditor, at least. The next day, there was great inquiry as to who was driving with Mr. Mytton. The mystery was not solved for a week. It came out at last, that in a certain milliner's shop in Montreal had stood a wooden "lay figure" for the exhibition of caps and articles of dress. The despairing youth had bought this, had it expensively and fashionably dressed, and still keeps it at his lodgings (under the name of "Ma'm'selle Pis-Aller") for his companion in sleigh-riding!

WHO ARE THE UPPER TEN THOUSAND?

(In reply to a question of Fanny Forester's.)

* * * Your postscript, asking "Enlightenment as to the upper ten thousand" can not be answered with a candle-end of attention. From the "sixes and sevens" of our brain, we must draw a whole "dip," new and expensive, to throw light on that matter—expensive, inasmuch as the same length of editorial candle would light us through a paragraph. If adorable "Cousin 'Bel" chance to be leaning over your chair, therefore, beg her to lift the curtain of her auburn tress-aract from your shoulder, and allow the American public to look over while you read.

The upper ten thousand, all told, would probably number one hundred thousand, or more: Not in England, where the upperdom is a matter of ascertained certainty, but in a republic, where every man has his own idea of what kind are uppermost, and where, of course, there are as many "ten thousands" as there are different claims to position. Probably few things would be funnier than for an angel suddenly to request the upper ten thousand of New York to walk up the let-down steps of a cloud, and record their names and residences, for the convenience of the up-town ministering spirits! A hundred thousand, we are sure, would be the least number of autographs left in the heavenly directory!

But, till we arrive at the "red-book" degree of definite aristocracy, a newspaper addressed to the "upper ten thousand" embraces a sufficient bailiwick for the most ambitious circulation. There are all manner of standards for "the best people." The ten thousand who live in the biggest houses would define New York upperdom with satisfactory clearness, to some. The ten thousand "safest" men would satisfy others. The educated ten thousand—the religious ten thousand—the ten thousand who had grandfathers—the ten thousand who go to Saratoga and Newport—the liberal ten thousand—the ten thousand who ride in carriages—the ten thousand who spend over a certain sum—the ten thousand "above Bleeker"—the ten thousand "ever heard of"—are aristocracies as others estimate them. And till the really upper ten thousand are indubitably defined, there are ninety thousand, more or less, who are in the enjoyment of a most desirable illusion.

No! no!—republican benevolence—the "greatest happiness of the greatest number"—would stop the march of civilization as to aristocracy, where it is. Its progress is through a reversed cornucopia, and the extreme end is too small for the comfort of the "nation." Meantime, however, the standard of good manners is rather loosely kept, and though the ten "ten-thousands" are all seen to be tolerable, there is a small class who go wholly unappreciated—those who are unconscious of their own degree from nature, and are only recognisable by the highest standards. We speak of those who have "no manner"—simply because they would be less refined if they had. There are enchanting women in New York—we ourself know a half-dozen—who are wholly unaware themselves, wholly unsuspected by others, of carrying a mark from nature that in Europe would supersede all questions of origin and circumstances.—English aristocratic society is sprinkled throughout with these sealed packets of nobility from God—one of whom I remember inquiring out with great interest, a single lady of thirty-six apparently, but looking like a distilled drop of the "blood of all the Howards." simple as a tulip on the stem, and said, though obscurely connected, to have refused a score of the best matches of England. These "no manners" that are better than "good manners" walk a republic quite undetected as aristocracy; but, as the persons so born are always beloved (losing only the admiration that is due to them) their benighted state scarce calls for a missionary!

We should not be surprised if there were a pair from this Nature's Upper-dom—

"Two trusty turtles, truestest of all true,"
—in your own village, dear Fanny Forester!

THE WEST IN A PETTICOAT.

(By way of declining a communication in hope of a better one.)

We have been for years looking at the western horizon of American literature, for a star to rise that should smack of the big rivers, steamboats, alligators, and western manners. We have the DOWN EAST—embodied in Jack Downing and his imitators. There was wanting a literary embodiment of the OUT WEST—not, a mind shining at it, by ridiculing it from a distance, but a mind shining from it, by showing its peculiar qualities unconsciously. The rough-hewn physiognomy of the west, though showing as yet but in rude and unattractive outline, is the profile of a fine giant, and will chisel down to noble features hereafter; but, meantime, there will be a literary foreshadowing of its maturity—abrupt, confiding, dashing writers, regardless of all trammels and fearless of ridicule—and we think we have heard from one of them.

The letter from which we shall quote presently, is entirely in earnest, and signed with the lady's real name. We at first threw the accompanying communication aside, as very original and amusing, but unfit for print—except with comments which we had no time to make. Taking it up again this morning, we think we see a way to compass the lady-writer's object, and we commence by giving her a fictitious name to make famous (instead of her own), and by interesting our readers in her with showing her character of mind as her letter shows her to us. She is quick, energetic, confident of herself, full of humor, and a good observer, and the "half-horse half-alligator" impulses with which she writes so unconsciously, may be trimmed into an admirable and entirely original style by care and labor.

Miss "Kate Juniper,"* (so we name her), thus

* The word "Juniper" is derived from the Latin words "junior and parere"—descriptive of a fruit which makes its appearance prematurely. We trust Miss Kate Juniper will see the propriety of using this name till she is ripe enough to resume her own.

dashes, western-fashion, in what she has to say to us:—

"I hate formal introductions. I would speak to you now, and I will see you, when I may, in the Palace of Truth. I am in Godey's Lady's Book with decent compensation, but I want to be published faster than they can do it. I want to write for the Mirror without pay, for the sake of 'getting my name up.' I shall ultimately 'put money in my purse' by this course. I have now three manuscript volumes, which good judges tell me are equal to Miss Bremer's. I send you a specimen. I have a series of these sketches, entitled 'The Spirits of the Room.' I can sell them to Godey, but he will be for ever bringing them out. I propose to give them to you, if you like them, in the true spirit of bargain and sale, though not in the letter. I will give you as many as will serve my purpose of getting my name known; and then, if success comes, you will hold me by the chain of gratitude, as you now do by that of reverence and affection.

"Will you write me immediately and tell me your thoughts of this thing? 'Truly your friend.'

We can only give a taste of her literary quality by an extract from her communication, the remainder wanting finish, and this portion sufficing to introduce her to our readers. We give it precisely as written and punctuated. She is describing an interview with a travelling lecturer on magnetism, and gives her own experience in neurological sight-seeing:—

"Mark the sequel. I had, on going into the room, lost my handkerchief. A gentleman famed for his wisdom, his powder of seeing as far into the future without the gift of second sight, as others can with it, lent me his, protem. I heard the wonderful statements of the 'New School in Psychology' relative to sympathies established by means of magnetized or neurologized handkerchiefs, letters, etc. I determined to keep the handkerchief and see if there were enough of the soul aura of my wise-acre friend imprisoned in it, to affect me. I did so; I returned to my home in the hotel—to my lonely room; evening shut in; the waiter did not bring me a light; my anthracite burned blue and dimly enough; I bound the magic handkerchief about my brow and invoked the sight of my friend to aid my own. What I saw shall be told in the next chapter.

CHAPTER I.

"I gazed into the dimness and vacancy that surrounded me—I conjured the guardian spirit of the room to come before me, and communicate some of the secrets of his wards. How many hearts, thought I, have beat with joy and sorrow, with hope, and with anguish unutterable in this room. But no guardian spirit appeared, and I began to think that the tee-total pledge of this hotel had really banished all sorts of spirits, neurology to the contrary notwithstanding. I closed my eyes, laid my hand on the bewitching point in my forehead, and lo! my eyes were opened, not literally but neurologically. At first a figure was revealed dimly and indistinctly—gradually its outlines grew more defined, and a graceful young man stood before me. He was enveloped in the folds of an ample cloak, a jewelled band held it in front, and he stood as if waiting to be known and noted. While gazing on him I found myself endowed with new and marvellous powers—every line of his face had its language, and told me a broad history. His attitude, his hand, the manner in which the folds of his cloak fell about him, constituted a library that I was skilled to read, if I would. Here was the signatura rerum. I looked and looked—it was like looking into a library and determining what you shall read, and what you shall leave unread. Some one has said that 'the half is greater than the whole.' This may be a physical, yet not a metaphysical paradox. Here I saw the last occupant of my room standing before me. I said I will first look at one week of his life. In a moment I beheld him pacing fitfully the room—his thoughts came before me—they were such as these," &c., &c.

Miss Juniper goes on with an account of half a dozen different characters, who (by a very natural vein of revery) she imagines may have occupied the room before her. The specimen we have given simply shows the free dash of his pen, and we think we see in it the capability of better things.

FEMALE STOCK BROKERS, ETC.—A letter from Paris to the London Times describes the stock exchange of Paris (the Bourse) as thronged by female speculators—not less than a hundred in attendance on any one day. To do this, too, they are obliged to stand in the open square in front of the building, as they have been excluded from the interior by a special regulation! Every five minutes during the sale of stocks, two or three bareheaded agents rush down the steps of the Bourse to announce to the fair speculators the state of the market; and they buy and sell accordingly.

Fancy a few of the customs of the "most polite nation" introduced into New York! What would "Mrs. Grundy" say of a hundred ladies standing about on the sidewalk in Wall street, speculating in stocks, and excluded by a vote of the stock-brokers from the floor of the Exchange! When will the New York ladies begin to smoke in their carriages, as they do in Paris? When will they wear Wellington boots with high heels? When will they frequent the billiard-rooms and public eating-houses? When will those who are not rich enough to keep house, use "home" only as birds do their nests, to sleep in—breakfasting, dining, and amusing themselves, at all other hours, out of doors, or in cafes and restaurants? When will the more fashionable ladies receive morning calls in the prettiest room in the house—their bed-room—their selves in bed, with coquettish caps and the most soignée demi-toilet any way contrivable? Funny place, France! Yet in no country that we were ever in, seemed woman so insincerely worshipped—so mocked with the shadow of power over men. We should think it as great a curiosity to see a well-bred Frenchman love-sick (when he supposed himself alone) as to see an angel tipsy, or a marble bust in tears. This condition of the "love of the country," and the dissipation of female habits, are mutual consequences—so to speak. Men are constituted by nature to love women, and in proportion as women become manifested they feel toward them as men do to each other—selfish and unimpressible. We remember once asking a French nobleman who was very fond of London, what was the most marked point of difference which he (as a professed love-maker) found between French and English women. The reply was an unfeeling one, but it will be a guide to an estimate of the effect of the different national manners on female character. "The expense of a love affair," said he, "falls on the man in France, and on the woman in England. English women make you uncomfortable by the quantity of presents they give you, and French women quite as uncomfortable by the quantity they exact from you." We only quote this remark as made by a very great beau and a very keen observer—the fact that a high-bred man weighed women at all in such abominable scales being a good argument (at least) against inviting the ladies to Wall street and the billiard-rooms!

And now let us say a word of what made the letter in the Times more suggestive than it otherwise would have been—Miss Fuller's book on "WOMAN IN THE NINETEENTH CENTURY."

This book begins with an emblematic device resembling, at first view, the knightly decoration called by our English neighbors a star. On further examination, a garter seems to be included in the figure; but upon still closer view, we discover, within the rays which form the outer border, first an eternal serpent—then the deeper mystery of two triangles—one of light, the other of darkness and shadow. We should not have been thus particular in describing a new decoration, but we conceive that the figure is very significant of the tone and design of the book. It belongs to what is called the transcendental school—a school which we believe to have mixed up much of what is noble and true with much of what is merely imaginary and fantastic. Truth, freedom, love, light—these are high and holy objects; and though they may be sought, sometimes, by modes which we may think susceptible of improvement, we honor those who propose to themselves such objects, according to their aims and not according to their ability of accomplishment. The character and rights of woman form naturally the principal subject of Miss Fuller's book; and we hope it may have an influence in convincing, if not "man," at least some men, that woman was born for better things than to "cook him something good."

THE ENGLISH PREMIER.—We see a text for the least-taste-in-life of a sermon, in the following touch-up of Sir Robert Peel by the London Examiner:—

"WANTED, A PREMIER'S ASSISTANT.—Our friend Punch, who has written some excellent lessons for ministers, 'suited to the meanest capacity,' in words from one syllable to three, by easy upward ascent, should take Sir Robert Peel's education in hand, and teach him how to write a decent note.

"Notwithstanding the proverb to the contrary, a man may do a handsome thing in a very awkward way.

"It was quite becoming and right to give a pension of £20 a year to Miss Brown, but what a note about it is this, with its parenthetical dislocations, and its atrocious style as stiff as buckram:—

"Whitehall, Dec. 24.

"MADAM: There is a fund applicable, as vacancies may occur, to the grant of annual pensions of very limited amount, which usage has placed at the disposal of the lady of the first minister. On this fund there is a surplus of £20 per annum.

"Lady Peel has heard of your honorable and successful exertions to mitigate, by literary acquirements, the effects of the misfortune by which you have been visited; and should the grant of this pension for your life be acceptable to you, Lady Peel will have great satisfaction in such an appropriation of it.

"I am, &c. ROBERT PEEL."

"If Punch had been over Sir Robert Peel when he wrote this, he would have hit him several sharp raps on the knuckles with his baton, we are quite certain. The model of the note may be in Dilworth, very probably, or even in the Complete Letter-Writer, by the retired butler; but, nevertheless, it is not a true standard of taste.

"Not to mention the clumsy parenthetical clauses so much better omitted, or the long-tailed words so out of place in a note about a matter of £20 a year, Sir Robert Peel has to learn that none but he-milliners and haberdashers talk of their "ladies." Sir Robert Peel, as a gentleman and a prime minister, needs not be ashamed of writing of his wife. He may rest quite assured that the world will know that his wife is a lady without his studiously telling it so.

"Foreigners will ask what is the distinction between a gentleman's lady and his wife; whether they are convertible terms; whether there are minister's wives who are not ladies; or whether there are ladies who are not wives; and why the equivocal word is preferred to the distinct one; and why the wife is treated if it were the less honorable.

"Formerly men used to have wives, not ladies; but in the announcement of births it has seemed finer to Mr. Spruggins and Mr. Wiggins to say that his lady has been delivered than his wife, the latter sounding homely and low.

"But Sir Robert Peel should not be led away by these examples. He is of importance enough in the world to afford to mention his wife in plain, honest, homely old English.

"Any one who is disposed to give lessons in letter-writing can not do better than collect Sir Robert Peel's notes as warning examples. From the Velve-teens to Miss Brown's £20 a year, they have all the same atrocious offences of style and taste. It is another variety of the Yellow Plush school.

"It distresses us to see it. We should like to see Miss Brown's £20 a year rendered into plain, gentlemanly English.

"As prizes are the fashion, perhaps some one will give a prize for the best translation of Sir Robert Peel's notes into the language of ease, simplicity, and with them, good taste."

Sir Robert's cockery note proves, not that his premiership still shows the lint of the spinning-jenny, but that he employed one of his clerks (suitably impressed with his duty to Lady Peel) to write the letter. We wish to call attention, however, to the superior simplicity of the taste contended for by the critic, and to the evidence it gives that extremes meet in the usages of good breeding as in other things—the highest refinement fairly lapping over upon what nature started with. The application of this is almost universal, but perhaps we had better particularize at once, and confess to as much annoyance as we have a right to express (in "a free country") at the affected use of the word lady in the United States, and the superfine shrinking from the honest words wife and woman. Those who say "this is my lady, sir!" instead of "this is my wife, sir!" or those who say "she is a very pretty lady," instead of "she is a very pretty woman," should at least know what the words mean, and what they convey to others.

In common usage, to speak of one's wife as one's lady, smacks of low-breeding, because it expresses a kind of announcement of her rank, as if her rank would not otherwise be understood. It is sometimes used from a dread of plain-spoken-ness, by men who doubt their own manners—but, as it always betrays the doubt, it is in bad taste. The etymology of the plainer words is a better argument in their favor, however. In the Saxon language from which they are derived, woefman signifies that one of the conjugal pair who employed the weapons necessary for the defence of the family, and wif-man signified the one who was employed at the woof, clothing the family by her industry. (The terms of endearment, of course, were "my fighter," and "my weaver!") Instead of this honestly derived word (wife), meaning the one who has the care of the family, the word lady is used, which (also by derivation from the Saxon) signifies one who is raised to the rank of her conjugal mate! But, in this country, where the males invariably burrow in trade, while the females as invariably soar out of their reach in the sunshine of cultivation, few women are raised to the rank of their husbands. It is an injustice to almost any American woman to say as much—by calling her a lady.

It is one part, though ever so small a part, of patriotism, to toil for improving the manners of the country. If we can avoid the long round of affectations, and make a short cut to good taste by at once submitting every question of manners to the three ultimate standards of high-breeding—simplicity, disinter- estedness, and modesty, it might save us the century or two of bad taste through which older countries have found their way to refinement. Amen!

LETTER TO FANNY FORESTER.

DEAR FANNY: Would your dark eyes vouchsafe to wonder how I come to write to you? Thus it befell:—

You live in the country and know what log-hauling is like—over the stumps in the woods. You have, many a time, mentally consigned, to condign axe and fire, the senseless trunk that, all its life, had found motion enough to make way for every silly breeze that flirted over it, but lay in unyielding immovableness when poor oxen and horses were tortured to make it stir! If you knew what a condition Broadway is in—what horses have to suffer to draw omnibuses—and how many pitiless human trunks are willing doggedly to sit still to be drawn home to the fire by brute agony—you would see how, while walking in Broadway, I was reminded of log-hauling—then of the country—and then, of course, of Fanny Forester.

Before setting the news to trickle from my full pen let me quote from a book (one that is my present passion), a fine thought or two on the cruelty to animals that has, this day, in Broadway, made me—no better than Uncle Toby in Flanders!

"Shame upon creation's lord, the fierce unsanguined despot: What! art thou not content thy sin hath dragged down suffering and death
Upon the poor dumb servants of thy comfort, and yet must thou rack them with thy spite?
For very shame be merciful, be kind unto the creatures thou hast ruined;
Earth and her million tribes are cursed for thy sake;
Liveth there but one among the million that shall not bear witness against thee,
A pensioner of land or air or sea, that hath not wherewithal it will accuse thee?
From the elephant toiling at a launch, to the shrew-mouse in the harvest-field,
From the whale which the harpooner hath stricken, to the minnow caught upon a pin,
From the albatross wearied in its flight, to the wren in her covered nest,
From the death-moth and the lacc-winged dragon-fly, to the lady-bird and the gnat,
The verdict of all things is unanimous, finding their master cruel:
The dog, thy humble friend, thy trusting, honest friend,
The horse, thy uncomplaining slave; drudging from morn to even,
The lamb, and the timorous hare, and the laboring ox at plough,
And all things that minister alike to thy life and thy comfort and thy pride,
Testify with one sad voice that man is a cruel master.
The galled ox can not complain, nor supplicate a moment's respite;
The spent horse hideth his distress, till he panted out his spirit at the goal;
Behold, he is faint with hunger; the big tear standeth in his eye;
His skin is sore with stripes, and he tottereth beneath his burden;
His limbs are stiff with age, his sinews have lost their vigor,
And pain is stamped upon his face, while he wrestleth unequally with toil;
Yet once more mutely and meekly endureth he the crushing blow;
That struggle hath cracked his heart-strings—the generous brute is dead!"

I doubt whether fifty years of jumping toothache would not be a lesser evil, hereafter, than the retribution charged this day against each passenger from Wall street to Bleecker. And, as if to aggravate the needlessness of the sin, the sidewalk was like the sidewalks in June—dry, sunny, and besprinkled with adorable shoppers. With the sides of the street thus clean and bright, the middle with a succession of pits, each one of which required the utmost strength of a pair of horses to toil out of—the wheels continually cutting in to the axletrees, each sinking of the wheels bringing down the whip on the guilty horses, and, with all the lashing, cursing, toiling and breaking of harness, people (with legs to carry them) remaining heartlessly inside the omnibuses. Oh, for one hour's change of places—horses inside and passengers in harness!

But why break your country heart for sins in Broadway? Think rather of the virtues and the fashions. Large parasols (feminized, from male umbrellas, only by petticoats of fringe and the changeableness of the silk) are now carried between heaven and bright eyes, to the successful banishment of the former. Ladies sit in the shops smoking camphor cigars while their daughters buy ribands. French lap-dogs, with maids to lead them, are losing singularity, as pairs of spectacles. People in the second story are at the level of very fine weather. Literature is at a dead stand-still. The "father of evil" has not yet told us what the next excitement is to grow out of; and meantime (to-night) we are to have an English song from Madam Pico at the Tabernacle.

So you have been ill and are mortal after all! Well! I presume—whatever stays to keep the violets company—"Fanny Forester" goes to Heaven; so you must have your reminders, like the rest of us, that the parting guest is to be looked after. What a to-morrow-dom life is! Eve's fault or Adam's—to-day was left in Eden! we live only for what is to come. I am, for one, quite sick of hoping; and if I could put a sack of money at my back to keep my heels from tripping, I would face about and see nothing but the to-day of the children behind me. (Bless me, how grave I am getting to be!)

Write to me, dear Fanny! As I go to market on this river of ink, write me such a letter as will ride without damage in the two-penny basket that brings this to you.

And now adieu—or rather au soin de Dieu—for I trust that the first lark that goes up with the spring news will bid the angels not to expect you, yet awhile. Take care of your health. Yours always.

MADAME PICO'S CONCERT.—We should guess that between two and three thousand persons were listeners in the vast hall of the Tabernacle at the concert. The five hundred regular opera-goers, who were apparently all there, were scattered among a mass of graver countenances, and Madame Pico saw combined her two bailiwicks of fashion and seriousness. She seems to be equally popular with both, and her "good-fellow" physiognomy never showed its honest beauty to more advantage. She wore a Greek cap of gold braid on the right-side organ of conscientiousness, and probably magnetized very powerfully the large gold tassel that fell from it over her cheek. The English song was the qui-vive-ity of the evening, however, and English, from a tongue cradled in a gondola, is certainly very peculiar! But, preserve us, Rossini-Bellini! After hearing exclusively Italian music from a songstress, the descent to Balfie is rather intolerable. A lark starting for its accustomed zenith with "chicken fixings" would represent our soul as it undertook to soar last night with Balfathered Pico!—What should make that same song popular is beyond our divining. Most of its movement works directly in the joint between the comfortable parts of the voice, and nobody ever tilted through its see-saw transitions, in our hearing, without apparent distress.

Madame Arnoult made a very strong impression on the audience last night. She sang with more dew in her throat than when we heard her before, and we fancy that the hard enamel of her tones, at that time, was from the bracing up against timidity, and not from the quality of the organ. She has only to draw a check for what popularity she wants, we presume.

TOWN-HUNGER FOR POETS.—The appetite for live bards (like other scarce meats, commonly liked best when pretty well gone) is probably peculiar to old countries. We have stumbled lately on the following letter touching Petrarch, written in 1368, by the Seigneurie of Florence, to Pope Urban V. :—

"The celebrity and talent of our fellow-citizen, M. Francesco Petrarca, inspire us with a great desire to attract him back to reside in Florence, for the honor of the city and for his own tranquillity; for he has greatly harassed himself by bodily fatigues and scientific pursuits in various countries. But as he has here no patrimony nor means of support, and little fancy for a secular life, be pleased to grant him the favor of the first canonry vacant in Florence; and this notwithstanding any previous promise, so that no one may be appointed canon in preference to him. And you will ascertain from Pitti in what manner this appointment may be obtained for him in the most ample manner."

How long it will be before Newburyport will send to the governor of Arkansas for ALBERT PIKE—before New Haven will send to Mayor Harper for Mr. HAL-LECK—before Portland will send to President Quincy for LONGFELLOW—before other great cities will send for the now peripatetic ashes of their future honorary urns, and confer on them "appointments in the most ample manner"—we are not prophet enough to know—nor do we know what the locofocos would say to such appointments. We suggest, however, that the poets should combine to vote for Mayor Harper on condition that he inquire what poets New York needs to have back "for the honor of the city and their own tranquillity."

JAPONICA-DOM IN ITALY.—We have often thought that it would amuse, and possibly instruct, New-Yorkers, to know exactly what class of Europeans have, as nearly as possible, their own pretensions to aristocracy, and where such persons "stand," in the way of go-to-the-devil-dom, from the titled classes. There is scarce a man of fortune or fashion in New York who is not what they call in Europe a roturier—a man, that is to say, whose position is made altogether by his money. The treatment which a roturier gets, therefore, from those above him, presents a fair opportunity for contrasting his value (measured by this scale) with that of a rich, but grandfatherless New-Yorker. Besides other profit in the comparison, it is as well, perhaps, to form a guess as to what sort of a sore the upper ten thousand will make, when they come to a head in Manhattan.

A letter to the Foreign Quarterly Review from a correspondent in Italy, gives an account of the celebration of a scientific anniversary which draws together the accessible celebrities of Europe, and which was held this year in Milan. Incidentally the writer speaks of Milanese society—thus :—

"Yes! the congress, whatever its other claims to consideration may have been, was deficient in 'quarterings,' and was therefore, no company for Milanese noblesse. Nowhere, in Europe, is the effete barbarism of 'castes' more in vigor than at Milan. The result of course, and of necessity, is, that the exclusive there are the least advanced in social and moral civilization of all the great cities of Italy. Will it be believed that these noble blockheads have a Casino for themselves and their females, to whose festivities the more distinguished of their non-noble fellow-citizens are invited—after what manner does the civilized nineteenth century Englishman think? Thus: A gallery has been constructed, looking from above into the ball-room. There such more distinguished roturiers (men of low descent), with their families, as the privileged caste may condescend to invite—not to share—but to witness their festivities, being duly fenced in with an iron grating, may gaze through the bars at the paradise that they can never enter. It is at least something! They may there see what it is to be "noble!" The happy ones, thus permitted to feast their eyes, may, at least, boast to their less fortunate fellow-citizens, of the condescension with which they have been honored, and thus propagated, in some degree the blessings of exclusiveness among the ranks of the swinish multitude! In their happy gallery, at the top of the noble ball-room, they may at least inhale the refuse breath streaming up from noble lungs—delicious gales from Araby the blest. Surely this is something. The wealthy citizens of Milan feel that it is; and they value the so-condescendingly-granted privilege accordingly.

"Yes! the roturier citizens of Milan—incredible as it may seem to those whose more civilized social system has given them the feelings of men in the place of those of slaves—do gratefully and gladly accept these invitations. Yes! for one of the curses most surely attendant on the undue separation of a privileged caste, is the degradation of both parties—the real abasement of the pariah, as well as the fancied exaltation of the noble."

Our readers' imaginations will easily transfer this state of things to New York (fancying one class of rich men inviting another class of men, quite as rich, but with not the same sort of grandfathers, to look at a ball through an iron grating!) but, leaving our friends to pick out the "customers" for the two sides of the grate, we turn to another difference still, between the nether-graters and the mechanics. There is even a more impassable barrier between these, and it is almost as impassable in England and France as in the more monarchical portions of Europe. A letter from abroad in the Ledger of yesterday, states this phase of social distinction very clearly:—

"The present state of society in France presents, therefore, a new and almost incurable evil—the entire separation of the capitalists, the merchants and manufacturers, from the laboring portion of the community; and what is worse, a hostile attitude of these social elements to each other. In Germany, and partly even in England, the interests of the manufacturers and capitalists are parallel with those of the laborers, and kept so by the pressure of a wealthy overbearing aristocracy in Great Britain; while on the continent the industrious pursuits are not yet sufficiently developed to effect the separation. Whenever the laborers (the pariahs) of England make common cause with their employers, or rather, whenever their demands coincide with those of their masters, the aristocracy is generally obliged to yield: but whenever, as in the case of the chartists, the laborers or inferior orders of the industrious section of society demand anything for itself which does not agree with the views of their employers, they are perfectly powerless—a mere play-ball, tossed to and fro between the landlords and the cotton-lords.

"In France, as I have observed, the separation of the higher bourgeoisie from those who help them by their labor to amass wealth, is complete; but so powerless is the latter section that it is not only not represented in the chambers, but not even thought or spoken of, except when it is thought necessary to teach it a lesson by putting it down and teaching it obedience. The misery of the laboring classes has not yet found an orator."

We have given, here-above, an attractive nucleus for table-talk and speculation, and we leave it to our friends.

POETS AND POETRY OF AMERICA.—An hour's lecture on this subject by Mr. Poe is but a "foot of Hercules," and though one can see what would be the proportions of the whole, if treated with the same scope and artistic minuteness, it is a pity to see only the fragment. What we heard last night convinced us, however, that one of the most readable and saleable of books would be a dozen of such lectures by Mr. Poe, and we give him a publisher's counsel to print them.

After some general remarks on poetry and the uses of impartial criticism, Mr. Poe gently waked up the American poetesses. He began with Mrs. Sigourney, whom he considered the best known, and who, he seemed to think, owed her famousness to the same cause as "old boss Richards"—the being "kept before the people." He spoke well of her poetry abstractly, but intimated that it was strongly be-Hemans'd, and that without the Hemanshood and the newspaper iteration, Mrs. Sigourney would not be the first American poetess. He next came to Mrs. Welby as No. 2, and gave her wholesome muse some very stiff laudation. Mrs. Osgood came next, and for her he prophesied a rosy future of increasing power and renown. He spoke well of Mrs. Seba Smith, and he spent some time in showing that the two Miss Davidsons, with all their merit, were afloat "on bladders in a sea of glory." The pricking of these bladders, by-the-way, and the letting out of Miss Sedgwick's breath, and Professor Morse's, and Mr. Southey's, was most artistically well done.

Of the inspired males Mr. Poe only took up the copperplate five—Bryant, Halleck, Longfellow, Sprague, and Dana. These, as having their portraits engraved in the frontispiece of Griswold's "Poets and Poetry of America," were taken to represent the country's poetry, and dropped into the melting-pot accordingly. Mr. Bryant came first as the allowed best poet; but Mr. Poe, after giving him high praise, expressed a contempt for "public opinion," and for the opinion of all majorities, in matters of taste, and intimated that Mr. Bryant's universality of approval lay in his keeping within very narrow limits, where it was easy to have no faults. Halleck, Mr. Poe praised exceedingly, repeating with great beauty of elocution his Marco Bozzaris. Longfellow, Mr. Poe said, had more genius than any other of the five, but his fatal alacrity at imitation made him borrow, when he had better at home. Sprague, but for one drop of genuine poetry in a fugitive piece, was described by Poe as Pope-and-water. Dana found very little favor. Mr. Poe thought his metre harsh and awkward, his narrative ill-managed, and his conceptions eggs from other people's nests. With the copperplate five, the criticisms abruptly broke off, Mr. Poe concluding his lecture with the recitation of three pieces of poetry which he thought had been mistakenly put away, by the housekeeper of the temple of fame, among the empty bottles. Two of them were by authors we did not know, and the third was by an author whom we have been exhorted to know under the Greek name of Seauton ("gnothi seauton")—ourselves! (Perhaps we may be excused for mentioning that the overlooked bottle of us contained "unseen spirits," and that the brigadier, who gave us twenty dollars for it, thought it by no means "small beer!")

Mr. Poe had an audience of critics and poets—between two and three hundred of victims and victimizers—and he was heard with breathless attention. He becomes a desk, his beautiful head showing like a statuary embodiment of discrimination; his accent drops like a knife through water, and his style is so much purer and clearer than the pulpit commonly gets or requires, that the effect of what he says, beside other things, pampers the ear. Poe's late poem of "The Raven," embroidered him at once on the quilt of the poets; but as the first bold traverse thread run across the parallelisms of American criticism, he wants but a business bodkin to work this subordinate talent to great show and profit. We admire him none the less for dissenting from some of his opinions.

ASYLUM FOR INDIGENT WOMEN.—A benevolent friend surprised us, on Saturday, into one of the most agreeable visits we ever made—a visit to an institution of whose existence we were not even aware. We presume that others have shared our ignorance, and that the name we have written above will convey to most readers an idea either vague or entirely novel. Poetry alone would express truly the impression left on our mind by this visit, but we will confine ourselves to a brief description in prose.

Our friend informed us, on the way, that an entrance fee of fifty dollars was required, and that the claims of the proposed inmate (as to respectability and such circumstances as would affect the social comfort of the establishment) were decided upon by the board of management. Once there, she has a home for life, with perfect command of egress, absence for visits, and calls from friends, books, medical attendance, occupation, &c. Each inmate commonly adds some furniture to the simple provision of the room.

We entered a large building, with two spacious wings, standing on Twentieth street, near the East river. Opposite the entrance, the door opened into a cheerful chapel, and we turned to the left into a drawing-room, which had all the appearance of an apartment in the most comfortable private residence. We descended thence through warm corridors, to the refectory in the basement, and here the ladies (between fifty and sixty of them) chanced to be taking their tea. We really never saw a pleasanter picture of comfort. The several tables were scattered irregularly around the room, and each little party had separate teapot and table furniture, the arrangements reminding one of a café in a world grown old. The gay chatting, the passing of cups and plates, the nodding of clean caps, and the really unusual liveliness of the different parties, took us entirely by surprise—took away, in fact, all idea of an asylum for sickness or poverty. What with the fragrant atmosphere of souchong, and the happy faces, it would have been a needlessly fastidious person who would not have sat down willingly as a guest at the meal.

We looked into the kitchen and household arrangements for a few minutes, finding everything the model of wholesome neatness, and then, as the ladies had returned to their rooms, we made a few visits to them, chez elles, introduced by the attendant. Here again, the variety of furniture, the comfortable rocking-chairs, the curtains, and pictures, and ornamental trifles, removed all idea of hospital or asylum-life, and gave us the feeling of visitors in private families. The ladies were visiting from room to room, and those we conversed with assured us that they had everything for their comfort, and were as happy as they well could be—though they laughed very heartily when we expressed some envy of the barrier between them and the vexed world we must return to, and at our wish that we could "qualify" and stay with them. We have rarely had merrier conversation in a call, and we think that this asylum for age holds at least one or two very agreeable women.

But what charity can the angel of mercy so smile upon, as this waiting upon life to its gloomy retiring-door, lighting the dark steps downward, and sending home the weary guest with a farewell, softened and cheerful! God bless the founder of this beautiful charity! Who can hear of it and not wish to aid it? Who has read thus far, our truthful picture, and does not mentally resolve to be one (though by ever so small a gift) among its blest benefactors.

We begged a copy of the last report, and we find that the society, which supports the asylum, has some eighty pensioners out of the house, and that there is some fear entertained, from the low state of the funds, as to the ability to continue these latter charities. We can not conceive the treasury of such an institution in want. We are not authorized to make any appeal to the public, but those who are inclined to give can easily find out the way.

SACRED CONCERT.—We have once or twice, when writing of musical performers, given partial expression to a feeling that has since been very strongly confirmed—the expediency of addressing music, in this country, to the more serious instead of the gayer classes, for its best support and cultivation. The high moral tone, this side the water, of all those strata of society to which refined amusement looks for support, gives music rather an American rebuke than an American welcome—coming as a pleasure in which dissipated fashionables are alone interested. Italian opera, properly labelled and separated from its needless association with ballet, would rise to the unoffending moral level of piano-music, sight-seeing, concert-going, or what the serious commonly call innocent amusements.

Till lately it has been generally understood that the only hope for patronage of fine music, in New York, was the exclusive class which answers to the court circles of Europe; and, so addressed, the opera has very naturally languished.

The truth is, that the great mass of the wealthy and respectable population of New York is at a level of strict morality, or of religious feelings rising still higher, and any amusement that goes by a doubtful name among moralists, is at once excluded. But music need never suffer by this exclusion, and as the favor of these stricter classes, once secured, would be of inexhaustible profit to musicians, it would be worth while for some master-spirit among them to undertake the proper adaptation of music to moral favor.

Why should the best singers be considered almost profane—was the question that naturally enough occurred to us the other night on hearing the Tabernacle fill, to its vast capacity, with the voice of Madame Pico giving entrancing utterance to Scripture! Here were a thousand lovers of music sitting breathless together, with their most hallowed feelings embarked upon a voice usually devoted to profane uses. Many whose tears flow only at hallowed prompting, listened with moist eyes to the new-clad notes of familiar sacred music—perhaps half-sighing with self-reproach that the enchantment of an opera-singer should have reached such sacred fountains of emotion. Why should not the best musical talent, as well as the more indifferent, be made tributary to religion? Why should not sacred operas be written for our country exclusively? Why should not the highly dramatic scenes and events of Scripture be represented on the stage, and seen with reverence by the classes who have already seen them in their imaginations, during perusal of the inspired volume. And why should not the events of human life, as portrayed in unobjectionable operas, be alternated with these, and addressed to the moral approbation of our refined serious classes?

We believe that this (and not this alone of things commonly delivered over to the evil spirit among us) would be willingly taken charge of by the angel of good influences.

We can not give a critical notice of the performances at the sacred concert, as we were unable to remain after the conclusion of the first part, but we heard a single remark which seems to us worth quoting. At the conclusion of Madame Pico's first air, a gentleman, standing near us, observed that it was very odd a foreigner should sing with perfect articulation, while he could scarce understand a word from those who sang in their native tongue! The instrumental music was admirable, and the scenic effect of the female choir (all dressed in white, and getting up with a spontaneous resurrection for the chorus) was at least impressive.

P. S. Just as we are going to press we have received a critique of the concert, speaking very glowingly of Madame Pico, and the

"moist melodious hymn
From her white throat dim,"

"as Aristophanes hath it," of the "deep clear tones of BROUGH, so long lost to us," and "Miss Northall and Mr. Meyer," as having "given full satisfaction."

THE FAMINE AT WASHINGTON.—The city is alive with laughable stories of the distress for bed and provender during the late descent upon the scene of the inauguration.

"As the scorched locusts from the fields retire While fast behind them runs the blaze of fire,"

the belles and beaux, politicians and travellers, are crowding back to the regions of steady population, aghast at the risks of famine run in the capital of a land of proverbial abundance. The stories are mostly such as would easily be imagined taking place in any country, under the circumstances, but we heard of one worth recording—a Yankee variation of an expedient tried some years ago by an Englishman at Saratoga. John Bull, in that instance (it may be remembered), after calling in vain to the flying attendants at the crowded table, splashed a handful of silver into his plate and handed it to a waiter with a request for "a clean plate and some soup." A Massachusetts judge, probably remembering this, drew a gold piece from his pocket last week while sitting hungry at the striped table at Washington, and tapping his tumbler with it till he attracted attention, laid it beside his plate and pointed to it while he mentioned what he wanted. He was miraculously supplied of course, but, when he had nothing more to ask, he politely thanked the waiter and—returned the gold piece to his own pocket!

THE GERMAN CONCERT.—The great wilderness of Pews-y-ism—the boundless Tabernacle—was filled to its remotest "seat for one" on Saturday evening, and a more successful concert could scarcely have been given. The nation cradled away from salt air, showed their naturally fresh enthusiasm for the performances, and it seemed to have an effect upon Madame Pico, for her friends thought she never had sung so enchantingly, as in the second of the pieces set down for her—"la casta Diva." She was applauded to the utmost tension of Mr. Hale's roof and rafters. The German chorus by a score of amateurs was admirably given, and Schaffenburg's piano-music was done to the utmost probable of excellence.

"MINE HOST."—Some time ago, in some speculations on American peculiarities, we commented on the hotel-life so much more popular in this country than elsewhere, and the necessity, bred by the manners and habits of our people, that hotel-keepers should be well-bred men, of high character and agreeable manners. The trusts reposed in them by their guests, and the courtesy they are called on to exercise, make it almost inevitable that such men should alone be encouraged to assume the direction of hotels. This tendency of fitness has lately put the Howard house into the hands of one of our most courteous, capable, and agreeable friends, Capt. Roe, and the public will find that central hotel all that they can require.

THE GEODE.—We remember being pitched for a week into Query-dom, while attending college lectures, by Prof. Silliman's astounding story of the mine in (we think) Meriden, Connecticut—a single cave in which had been found a specimen of almost every known precious stone. It was a kind of omnibus geode, and with a boy's imagination, we speculated endlessly on how so many rare gems could have chanced to have come together in this world of loose distribution. We have come, now, however, to the astounding knowledge of a geode of poetesses—the centre of which is Fanny Forester—and though there are astonishing resemblances between the material and spiritual world, we were not prepared for this! Fanny herself, as a prose writer and poetess, has now an assured fame. But, on St. Valentine's day, we received an original Valentine from one of her intimate friends, which was as beautiful poetry as fame wants in her trumpet, and two or three weeks ago we published a most delicious poem from another friend of Fanny Forester's, and here comes a fourth gem which seems to hint (and this is too sad a possibility to tifle upon) that gifted Fanny Forester is beckoned to, from a better world. God send her health with this coming spring—thousands will pray fervently. Here follows a prayer for it, expressed in touching verse by one who seems a familiar friend:—

"TO 'FANNY FORESTER.'

"BY MISS MARY FLORENCE NOBLE.

"Saw you ever a purer light

More still and fair than the harvest moon
When day has died in a shadowless night?
And the air is still as a summer's noon?
No!—Ah, sweet one, your eyelids shrine
A light far purer, and more divine.

"Heard you ever the silvery gush

Of a brook, far down in its rocky dell;
And stilled your breath with a tremulous hush,
As its mystic murmurs rose and fell?
'Tis thus I list to the liquid flow
Of your silvery accents, soft and low.

"Yet, sweet 'Fanny,' the light that gleams

'Neath the sweeping fringe of your radiant eyes,
Too purely chaste, and too heavenly seems
To dwell in the glare of our earthly skies;
And, too soft and low your tones have birth
To linger long mid the din of earth

"The sweet brow shined in your clustering hair

Has gathered a shadow wan, and deep,
And the veins a darker violet wear,
Which over your hollow temples creep;
And your fairy foot falls faint and slow,
As the feathery flakes of the drifting snow.

"'Tis said the gods send swift decay

To the bright ones they love, of mortal birth;
And your angel 'Dora' passed away
In her youth's sweet spring-time, from the earth,
Yet stay, sweet 'Fanny!' your pinions fold,
'Till the hearts that love you now, are cold."

YANKEE-PARISIAN ARISTOCRACY.—Our agreeable neighbor of the "Etats-Unis" gives a letter from Paris which states that "another rich American is about taking the place of the retiring Col. THORN. Mr. MACNAMARA has opened a superb house in the rue de la Madeleine, and is sending out invitations par milliers. In the commencement of a fashionable career as an entertainer, a thousand invitations will hardly bring persons enough to form a quadrille. Mr. TUDOR, another American, is just now in that stage where he has commenced weeding his saloons!"

The same agreeable letter states that two sisters of the Hon. Mrs. Norton, Lady Seymour (the Queen of Beauty at Eglinton), and Lady Dufferin (the Mrs. Blackwood whose songs are well known in this country), have been playing at the English embassy in private theatricals. The characters were nearly all personated by lords and ladies, yet one Baltimore belle sustained the part of "Mary Cope" in the play of Charles the Second—Miss MACTAVISH. The two sisters of Mrs. Norton and the "Undying One" herself, were by much the three most beautiful women we saw abroad—magnificent graces between whom it was hard to choose the most beautiful.

NEWELL'S PATENT LOCK.—Mr. Newell's wonderful lock (one of which costs as much as a pianoforte) is not wholly original. On the world's first washing-day, Monday No. 1, a human mind was created on precisely the same principle. Without going into the details either of this lock or a human mind (in either of which we should lose ourself of course) we will simply give the principle of Nature's patent and Mr. Newell's, viz: that the lock is constructed not only to be un-openable to all keys but the right one, but to become just what that right one makes it. Newell's lock is a chaos of slides, wards, and joints, till the key turns in it; and it then suddenly springs into order, simplicity, and beauty of construction. Another resemblance to Nature's plastic lock, is this feature of Newell's, that by the slightest change in the key (provided for by bits inserted at will) the whole interior responds differently; so that a bank director, like a mind director, may change his key every day in the year, and (preserving only the harmony between lock and key) will find the lock every day responsive to the change. Fair dealing required, we think, that the proper credit should have been given to the original inventor, and that the patent should be called "Newell's, after Nature."

Having shown the way the invention struck us, however, we copy by request what was said of it by the Journal of Commerce:—

"Mr. Newell denominates this new masterpiece of ingenuity, the Parautoptic Token Permutation Lock. Parautoptic, being a Greek word, signifying preventive of an internal inspection, and token meaning walled, hence the name. This lock has been named after its peculiar properties. Phosphoric or other light may be introduced into it in vain in order to view its interior construction. The tumblers being separated from the essential actional parts of the lock, which constitute its safety, by a perpendicular wall of solid steel forming two distinct and separate chambers in the same, thus counteracting all burglarious designs. The front chamber will, on close inspection, either by phosphoric light or reflection, exhibit nothing but solid walls of steel or iron. This lock is susceptible of an infinity of changes from thousands to millions, enabling the possessor to change or vary it at pleasure, simply by transposing or altering the bits in the key, before using it to lock the door, in a manner which is truly surprising. It therefore follows that a person may make himself a different lock every moment of his life, if such be his disposition, thereby frustrating the skill of the maker, and placing him on a footing with the merest novice. We are, therefore, fully persuaded of its being the ultimatum of lock-making, and sincerely congratulate the inventor of this admirable contrivance, in thus being able to counteract so effectually the various plans and schemes of burglars and pick-locks, and we feel warranted in stating that after due inspection, all those connected with banking institutions, and the public generally, will adopt it at once as preferable to all others, for the safe-keeping and protection of their property."

THE NEW YORK "ROCHER DE CANCALE."—To dine tête-à-tête with a friend, in Paris, or to give a dinner party, you must go to the above-named renowned restaurant, where have dined, probably, all the gentlemen now existing. Private room, faultless dinner, apt and prompt service, and reasonable charges, constitute the charm, and all this we are to have (or so says that communicative "little bird in the air") at the corner of Reade st., in the new Maison Lafarge. That "unrecognised angel," Signor Bardotte, is to be the chef des details, and, in partnership with him, a gentleman well fatigued with travel and experience is to act as partner. Of course we would much rather record the establishment, at the same corner, of an asylum for unavoidable accomplishments, but since luxury will cut its swarth, we like to see the rake with a clean handle.

THE MISSES RICE AND THE BEARS.—The Portland Advertiser states that in a secluded part of Oxford county, called "The Andover Surplus," there reside two female farmers, who occupy a few acres, and "do their own chores," hiring male help only for haying and harvesting. Out in the woods lately with the ox-team, cutting and drawing winter's wood, one of the Misses Rice was attracted by the barking of the dog at a hollow tree. One of the young ladies was absent for the moment, and the other chopped a hole in the tree and came to a bear-skin! Nothing daunted at the sight, she gave a poke, and out scrambled bruin, whom she knocked down and despatched. A second bear immediately made his appearance, and she despatched him! A third bear then crept from the tree, and the same axe finished him! This, Miss Rice considered a good morning's work, for there is a two-dollar bounty on bears, and the skins and grease are worth five dollars, at least. We should like to see Miss Rice, of the "Andover Surplus!"

INCONSTANCY MADE ROMANTIC.—"The Countess Faustina" (the new book now in everybody's hands) is the first novel we remember to have read, the whole burden of which is a glorification of inconstancy in love! The heroine is charmingly drawn—the model of divine women—but after quite innocently using up all that was most loveable in two men and deserting them, she gets tired of a third, and goes into a convent to finish the story! The lovers are all described as worthy of a deathless passion, and the love on both sides, while it lasts, is of the loftiest lift and devotion, but the countess has the little peculiarity of liking no love except love in progress, and she deserts, of course, at the first premonishing of the halt of tranquillity. The following passage, descriptive of her enlightening her last love as to the coming break-off, will show how neatly she wrapped up the bitter pill:—

"Be silent," she exclaimed, when I was about to answer her, 'be silent! Does not the water-lily know its time, rises to blossom from the water, and then returns back into its depths, satisfied, tranquil, with a treasure of sweet recollections? Flowers know when their time is passed, and man tries, all he can, not to be aware of it. This year with you, Mario, was the height of my blossoming!"

"You love me no longer," I exclaimed bitterly.

"Fool!" she replied, with that ecstatic smile which I never saw on any brow but hers, 'have you not touched the tabernacle of my heart? Is not my son yours? No, Mario! I love you; I have loved nothing so much; I shall never love anything after you—but, above you, God! My soul has squandered itself in such transports of love and inspiration with yours, that all it can ever meet in this region will be but a repetition, and perhaps an insipid one. We have so broken up my heart in searching for its treasure, that the gold mines are probably exhausted, before the sad certainty comes upon us.'

"Faustina!" I know not in what tone I said this, but she sank trembling into my arms, and said very, very softly.

"Oh, if you are angry, I shall not have the courage to open my heart to you!"

"I knew I ought not to alarm her, and I embraced her tenderly, and inquired what she thought of doing."

"She replied, 'I will close the mine! If there is any valuable metal within, it may rest quietly in the depths. And above I will plant flowers.'"

"But what can—what would you do?" I inquired with terrible anxiety.

"Belong entirely to God, and enter a convent!" she replied," &c., &c.

Six months of convent-life sufficed to finish the Countess Faustina, who "discovered too late" (says the narrator) "that, during our life, we can but look, like Moses, toward the promised Canaan" (of a man worth being constant to) "but never reach it!" It strikes us this is a naughtyish book—at least, if, as we read in Spenser:—

"there is no greater shame
Than lightness or inconstancy in love."

The book is a mark of the times, however. It makes no mention of Fourierism, but we doubt whether its sentiments would have been ventured upon in print, if Fourier principles had not insensibly opened the gates. It is no sign that principles are not spreading, because everybody writes against them, and because few will acknowledge them. We see by various symptoms in literature, that the mere peep into free-and-easy-dom given by the discussion of Fourier tenets, has left a leaping that way. There is no particular Fourierism, that we know of, in the two following pieces of poetry, but they fell from that same leaning, we rather fancy. We copy the first from our sober and exemplary neighbor, "The Albion":—

"No! the heaven-enfranchised poet
Must have no exclusive home,
But (young ladies, you should know it)
Wives in scores his hair to comb.
When the dears were first invented,
One a-piece Fate only gave us,
Wiser far two kings demented—
Solomon—and Hal Octavus."

"Doctors' Commons judge severely,
My belief to reason stands;
Any dolt can prove it clearly,
With ten fingers on his hands.
Smiles and glances, sighs and kisses
From one wife are sweet—what then?
That amount of wedlock's bliss
Take, and multiply by ten."

"Laughing Jane and sparkling Jessy
Shall the morning's meal prepare,
Brilliant Blanche and bright-eyed Bessy
Mid-day's lunch shall spread and share;

Ann and Fan shall grace my dinner,
Rose and Laura pour my tea;
Sue brew grog, while Kate, sweet sinner,
Lights the bedroom wax for me.

"Monk! within thy lonely cell,
What wouldst give to greet a bride?
Monckton bids thee forth to dwell
With a dozen by thy side.
Poet! in your crown one wife
Shines a jewel, past a doubt,
But in ten times married life,
Mind your jewels don't fall out!"

The next instance comes from the very heart of holier-than-thou-dom—the exemplary state of Maine The St. Louis Reveille declares it to be a "well-authenticated fact which occurred at Holton, in Maine."

"In old New England, long ago,
When all creation travelled slow,
And naught but trackless deserts lay,
Before the early settlers' way,
A youth and damsel, bold and fair,
Had cause to take a journey where
Through night and day, and day and night,
No house would greet their wearied sight;
And, thinking Hymen's altar should
Precede their journey through the wood,
They straightway to a justice went,
By love and circumstances sent!
The justice—good old honest pate—
Said it was quite unfortunate,
But at that time he could not bind
These two young folks of willing mind,
For his commission—sad to say—
Had just expired—but yesterday!
Yet, after all, he would not say
That single they should go away;
And so he bade them join their hands
In holy wedlock's happy bands,
And 'just a little' he would marry—
Enough, perhaps, to safely carry.
As they were in connubial mood—
'Enough to do them through the wood!'"

MISSIONARY EYELIDS.—At No. 75, Fulton street, a large emporium has lately been opened for the sale of the plant propagated from the cut-off eyelids of the first Christian missionary to China—in other words, for the sale of tea! One of the partners of this establishment (the Pekin tea company) has written a charming little pamphlet, called a "Guide to Tea-Drinkers," in which he gives the following true origin of the wakeful properties of tea:—

"Darma, the son of an Indian king, is said to have landed in China in the year 510 of the Christian era. He employed all his care and time to spread through the country a knowledge of God and religion, and, to stimulate others by his example, imposed on himself privations of every kind, living in the open air, in fasting and prayer. On one occasion, being worn out with fatigue, he fell asleep against his will, and that he might thereafter observe his oath, which he had thus violated, he cut off his eyelids, and threw them on the ground. The next day passing the same way, he found them changed to a shrub (tea) which the earth never before produced. Having eaten some of its leaves he felt his spirits much exhilarated, and his strength restored. He recommended this aliment to his disciples and followers. The reputation of tea increased, and from that time it continued to be generally used."

The pamphlet goes on to state the properties of the different kinds of tea, describing Pekoe as the best of teas (qu?—hence the prevailing of the Pico tease over Borghese's), and declares it to be peculiarly agreeable (Pekoe tea) to poets and ladies—as follows:—

"The warmth conveyed to the stomach of man by tea-drinking at his various meals, becomes essential to him, nor would the crystal steam of the poet suffice for the healthy powers of digestion in the artificial state of existence in which we are placed. A learned writer declares that tea is particularly adapted for the ordinary beverage of young women, and the individual who, until the day of her marriage, has never tasted wine or any fermented liquor, is the one who is most likely to fulfil the great end of her existence—the handing down to posterity a strong and well-organized offspring."

A visit to this emporium is well worth curiosity's while, and tea can there be bought in large or small quantities, and in prices much below those of grocers.

WOMEN IN THEIR JUNE.—The early decay of female beauty, consequent on neglect of physical education and the corroding dryness of our climate, has given an American value to the immature April and May of female seasons, and a corresponding depreciation to the ripier June. The article which we copy below, from the Brooklyn Star, expresses, we believe, the opinion of the best judges of these exotics from a better world, and emboldens us to express a long-entertained belief that the most loveable age of unmarried woman's life commences, at the earliest, at twenty-five, and lasts as long after as she shows no diminution of sensibility, and no ravages of time. Women improve so much longer than men (improve by the loving and suffering that spoils men), that we wonder they have never found an historic anatomist of their later stages. We suggest it to pens at a loss. Here follow our contemporary's opinions:—

"My dear sir, if you ever marry, marry an old maid—a good old maid—who is serious, and simple, and true. I hate these double-minded misses, who are all the time hunting after a husband. I tell you that when a woman gets to be twenty-eight, she settles into a calm—rather she "anchors in deep waters, and safe from shore." There never was a set, or class, or community of persons, so belied as these ancient ladies. Look upon it as no reproach to a woman that she is not married at thirty or thirty-five. Above all, fall not into the vulgar notion of romances, and shallow wits—unlearned in women's hearts, because they never had the love of a true woman—that these are continually lying in wait to catch bachelors' hearts. For one woman who has floated into the calm of her years, who is anxious to fix you, I will find you fifty maidens in their teens, and just out, who lay a thousand snares to entrap you, and with more cold-blooded intent—for whether is worse, that one of singleness of purpose should seek to lean on you for life, or that one should seek you as a lover, to excite jealousy in others, or as a last resort.

"Marry a healthy, well-bred woman, between twenty-eight and thirty-five, who is inclined to love you, and never bewilder your brains with suspicions about whether she has intentions on you or not. This is the rock of vanity upon which many a man has wrecked his best feelings and truest inclinations. Our falseness, and the falseness of society, and more than all, the false and hollow tone of language upon this subject, leave very little courage for a straightforward and independent course in the matter. What matter if a woman likes you, and shows that she does, honestly, and wishes to marry you?—the more reason for self-congratulation but not for vanity. What matter if she be young or not, so she be loveable? I won't say what matter if she be plain or not—for everybody knows that is no matter where love is, though it may have some business in determining the sentiment. I don't know what has led me into this course of remark. The last thing I should have expected on sitting down to write, is, that I should have fallen into a lecture on matrimony. I am not an old maid myself, yet; but I have a clearer eye to their virtues than I have had, and begin to feel how dignified a woman may be 'in her loneliness—in her loneliness—and the fairer for that loneliness.' You may think it is bespeaking favor and patience with a vengeance."

REFINED CHARITIES.—Our readers were made aware, a few days since, that we had received very great pleasure from a visit to an institution hitherto unknown to us—the "Asylum for Aged and Indigent Ladies." That so beautiful a charity, conducted with so happy a method, should never have come to our knowledge, struck us as probably a singular chance in our own hearsay—but we find that others, as likely to be interested in it as ourself, were equally in the dark, and one lady (quite the most active Dorcas of our acquaintance) took our account to be an ingenious device to suggest such an institution! That a large two-winged building, with a sculptured tablet set in front, stating its purpose, and so filled that it might be taken up to heaven by its "knit corners," like the sheet full of living things let down to the apostle on the housetop—that such a building, with such a purpose, should exist unsuspected in one of the streets of New York, is somewhat a marvel. But we were not prepared for two such surprises! We have since discovered another charity that was wholly unknown to us, as delicate, if not as poetically beautiful, and we begin to think that the old saying is true—ministering spirits do walk the earth, unrecognized in their tender ministrations, and

"The tears that we forget to note, the angels wipe away."

Our second discovery is of an institution called the "LADIES' DEPOSITORY—intended for the benefit of those persons who have experienced a reverse of fortune, and who can not come before the public, while, at the same time, they may, from necessity, wish to dispose of useful and ornamental work, if it could be done privately, and to advantage." The institution supports a store for the sale of needlework, &c., and any one of its twenty-five managers may receive an application and give a "permit" to the lady in want—this one manager alone the possessor of the secret of the lady's wants and mode of supplying them. Work, drawings, &c., are thus purchased by the society's funds, and sold by the hired saleswoman of the society, and a veil is thus hung between delicacy and the rude contact of open want—a veil which prevents more pain, probably, than the food which prevents only bodily suffering.

This beautiful charity has now been in existence twelve years, and by its tenth report (we have no later one) we find that fourteen hundred dollars were paid out for work in the twelve months preceding. This sum is not large, and it shows that the subscriptions to the funds of the society are less liberal than could be desired. We should think that the bare knowledge of the existence of such societies as this and the one before-mentioned, would start streams of gift-laden sympathy toward them, and we think they but need wider publicity. We are not authorized to mention in print the names of the treasurer or directresses, but the report lies on our table, and we shall be happy to give the information to any individual applying at our office.

We copy the following astounding intelligence from a Montreal paper:—

"ANNEXATION OF THE STATE OF MAINE.—After all that has been said of Texas and Oregon, and the desire entertained by the people of the United States to enlarge their territory by the acquisition of immense tracts, it will surprise many, and add much to the protocols that will be issued, to learn that the state of Maine, disgusted with slavery and repudiation, and feeling a community of interests with those of north of forty-five degrees, has petitioned her majesty Queen Victoria to readmit her to the old family circle of John Bull, where property is respected, and where there is neither vote by ballot, Lynch law, slavery, nor repudiation.

"It is generally surmised that his honor, Judge Preble is charged with this delicate mission, and that the petition will be sent through his excellency Lord Metcalfe, by the next steamer, though the ostensible ground of his honor's visit to Montreal is the railroad to Portland; and it is evident that if the admission is agreed on, and is prompt and immediate, all the stock will be at once subscribed by the home government, and presented to the new confederation.

"Part of New Hampshire, Vermont, and that portion of New York bordering on the St. Lawrence, will, it is thought, follow this laudable example.

"N. B. NO STATE THAT HAS REPUDIATED NEED APPLY."

We were born in Portland, and by annexation, as above, are likely to turn out a "a Britisher from the provinces!" President Polk is to lose us—Queen Victoria is to have us! Lucky we were presented to her majesty while we were a republican court-eligible—before we sank, that is to say, from a "distinguished foreigner" into a provincial editor! We should never have had formal certainty of having lodged exclusively for the space of a minute, in the queen's eye, had Maine annexed herself before we were brought to the notice of "Gold Stick in Waiting." So much, at least, it was better to have been temporarily a Yankee!

There is one other difference to be considered, while we are measuring the matter at the top—we cease to be a competitor for the presidency! Our glorious fifteen millionth of capability for "No. 1" drops from us as treason to Victoria! We are reduced to the prospect of dying the inferior of Louis Philippe (!) without the benefit of a doubt. We become also, doubtless, the inferior of all the titled gentlemen catalogued in the "red book," many of whom, till Maine was annexed, welcomed us to walk into their houses, without mentally seeing us pass under the yoke over the door. We are to unlearn "Yankee Doodle," and learn "God save the Queen." We are to call this half-savage country "The States," and keep the birthdays of the queen's annuals. We are to glory in standing armies, national debt, and London fog and porter, and begin to hesitate in our speech, and wear short whiskers. The change in our prayer-book is not much. We are to do our ciphering in pounds, and that will plague us! We are to be interested in Canada politics and Lord Metcalfe's erysipelas. We are to belong to a country where births are published, as the first sign that people know all about you, and that you must stay put. (This last strikes us as the worst part of it.) We are to pass for an Englishman on our travels, in the states and elsewhere, and that is agreeable, because our suavity will be unexpected. The larger features of our metamorphosis we omit for future consideration—but, as far as these personal ones go, we fear we had a better chance as a Yankee! We were what we could make ourselves—we are to be what others make us. Queen Victoria, on the whole, will oblige us by not laying her hands on our Maine!

poetic feeling, and will do for the heart, what the single japonica does to the dress—give the finishing expression, no way else so felicitously effective. Those who make love before this book gets into use, will work like savages with arrows before the discovery of gunpowder. Those whose best thoughts die in birth, for lack of recognition and ready-made clothing, will wonder how they were ever comfortable without it. Our Cumberland correspondent spent a whole letter, wondering why we, who were constantly quoting the book, had never written a critique upon it. Our reason for not doing so—or rather for first making our readers thoroughly alive to its beauty by extract—is indirectly given in the book itself, in the chapter called "Indirect Influences." See how exquisitely it is done:—

"Behold those broken arches, that oriel all unglazed,
That crippled line of columns creeping in the sun,
The delicate shaft stricken midway, and the flying buttress,
Idly stretching forth to hold up tufted ivy:
Thinkst thou the thousand eyes that shine with rapture on a ruin,
Would have looked with half their wonder on the perfect pile?

And wherefore not—but that light hints, suggesting unseen beauties,
Fill the complacent gazer with self-grown conceits?
And so, the rapid sketch winneth more praise to the painter,
Than the consummate work elaborated on his easel:
And so, the Helvetic lion cavered in the living rock
Hath more of majesty and force, than if upon a marble pedestal.

"Tell me, daughter of taste, what hath charmed thine ear in music?

Is it the labored theme, the curious fugue or cento—
Nay—rather the sparkles of intelligence flashing from some strange note,

Or the soft melody of sounds far sweeter for simplicity?
Tell me, thou son of science, what hath filled thy mind in reading?

Is it the volume of detail where all is orderly set down
And they that read may run, nor need to stop and think;
The book carefully accurate, that counteth thee no better than a fool,

Gorging the passive mind with annotated notes?—
Nay—rather the half-suggested thoughts, the riddles thou mayst solve,

The fair ideas, coyly peeping like young loves out of roses,

The quaint arabesque conceptions, half-cherub and half-flower,

The light analogy, or deep allusion, trusted to thy learning,

The confidence implied in thy skill to unravel meaning mysteries!

*For ideas are oftentimes shy of the close furniture of words,
And thought, wherein only is power, may be best conveyed by a suggestion:*

The flash that lighteth up a valley, amid the dark midnight of a storm,

Coineth the mind with that scene sharper than fifty summers."

The book of which this exquisite passage is a part, is called "proverbial philosophy." It is by Martin Farquhar Tupper, of Christ church, Oxford, and an American edition of it has lain in the bookstores for two years, wholly unsaleable! It can afford to "bide its time," and mean-time, we shall enrich our readers with it, bit by bit.

ARGUMENT FOR SEDAN CHAIRS.

"MR. EDITOR: You stand accredited as the ready friend of luxurious elegance, the happy mingler of those foreign ingredients, the utile with the dulci. My dear sir, why have you never said a word in favor of the SEDAN-CHAIRS? The very name carries one back to the days of Pope and Addison; to the routs,

A FUTURE PASSION, IN THE EGG.—We have had a book for some time, that is destined to be an American passion. Once read, it infatuates—for it expresses in a brief and beautiful figure every possible and masquerades and Ranelagh of London, in the 'reign of wits.' Even Cowper celebrates it:—

"Possess ye therefore, ye who, borne about
In chariot and sedan, know no fatigue
But that of idleness."

"It is an Italian seggiotta; and thus defined by an old writer: 'a kind of chair used in Italy to carry men and women up and downe.' It seems to have emigrated to London from Sedan, the birthplace of Turenne. Dryden used it for the lectica of the Romans:—

"Some beg for absent persons, feign them sick,
Close mew'd in their sedans for want of air,
And for their wives present an empty chair."

"Were you ever in one? Then you will agree that it is as necessary in Broadway as a gondola in Venice. Think of Pope's 'two pages and a chair.' Our thousand and one idlers, who are too ragged to beg, and too poor to keep a cab, might flourish their poles to some purpose in front of St. Paul's—a better class of chairmen than some we wot of.—They need not have so heavy a load, nor so great a peril, as those who, according to Swift, helped in the Trojan horse:—

"Troy chairmen bore the wooden steed,
Pregnant with Greeks, impatient to be freed,
Those bully Greeks, who, as the modems do,
Instead of paying chairmen, run them through."

"The new police would defend the glass from any roystering blood, who, as Prior sings:—

"Breaks watchmen's heads and chairmen's glasses
And thence proceeds to nicking sashes."

Opposition may be expected: there was such at the cab-epocha. But who can even name a cab, without ignominy. Think of a trundling box—a packing-case on wheels—surmounted by a top-heavy Milesian, enthroned on a remnant of Chatham-street-great-coat, forcing you along sideways by a series of thumps, and then, with a paroxysm that tries every ball and socket, dumping you on the trottoir! Our semi-tropical climate demands a protection from the sun: something emulating the oriental palanquin; a parasol which shall preclude fatigue and dust, as well as sunlight—which shall transport the delicate woman with the gentlest conceivable carriage, and into the very hall of the stately mansion. What, prithee, can answer these conditions but the sedan-chair? I already see you in one, peering through the sky-blue curtain, as you swim through your evening survey. The corporation will at once adjust a bill of rates; the thing is done.

"LUNARIUS."

We have been but in one city where sedans were in use—Dublin. What struck us, in using them (and that is what the reader cares most to know, we presume) was the being shut up where it was warm and dry, and let out where it was warm and dry. The sedan is a small close carriage—an easy chair enclosed by windows—carried on poles by two men. They come into your drawing-room if you wish, shut you up in a carriage by the fireside, and carry you, without the slightest jar or contact with out-of-doors, into the house where you are to dine or dance—no wet sidewalk and no gust of cold wind, snow, or rain! They are cheaper than carriages because men are easier kept than horses, and as a sedan-chairman can also follow some other trade in the daytime, we should think it would be good economy to introduce them to New York. Many a delicate woman might then go to parties or theatres with a quarter of the present risk—to lungs or head-dress!

vines, and berries, comprised in this ark of vegetation at Flushing, and we should think from the account of Prince's gardens, and the prodigal variety of this catalogue, that the establishment would be better worth visiting than any object of curiosity in the neighborhood. It is now in the hands of the third generation of descendants from the original founder—no slight marvel of constancy of pursuit in this country!

But we have found a singular pleasure in this catalogue—no less than a perfect feast upon the names and descriptions of the fruits and flowers! It reads like a directory of some city of fairies, with a description of the fairy-citizens written out against their names. We can fancy a delightful visiting-list of people answering to these descriptions of fruits and flowers. Here are a few of the characters:—

Different APPLES are described as—"flesh stained with red, perfumed;" "snow-white flesh, musky sweet;" "fair, beautiful, pleasant flavor, sprightly;" "tender, juicy, keeps well;" "remains juicy till late;" "red flesh, a curiosity," etc., etc. Different PEARS are described as—"rich, sugary, delicious aroma;" "most splendid, extra delicious, none more estimable, grows vigorously, bears soon;" "beautiful, aromatic, bears young, greatly esteemed;" "rich, musky;" "excellent, slow to yield fruit;" "thin skin, sweet, very good;" "new native variety, estimable, handsome;" "very large, skin shining, flesh crisp, agreeable flavor, excellent," &c. Different PEACHES are described as—"oval, splendid, luscious;" "estimable, foliage curled, peculiar;" "waxen appearance, globular, delicious flavor," &c. Different GRAPES are described as—"large, estimable, vigorous;" "sweet, firm, thick skin, hangs long, monstrous clusters;" "monstrous fox variety;" "Willis's large black;" (!) "sprightly, pure for wine," etc. Different ROSES are called by name and described—"formidable red;" "glory of the reds;" "insurmountable beauty;" "new Dutch virgin's blush;" "sombre agreeable;" "Watson's blush;" "red prolific;" "pale rose, deep centre;" "deep rose, very robust;" "bluish violet, superb, singular;" "bright pink, flaked with scarlet;" "pubescent yellow flowering;" "white quilled;" "extra magnificent;" "splendid, full, double-shaded blush, monstrous size," etc., etc.

Such names and definitions, of anything, were enough to bring one to Flushing, and Mr. Prince may look out for us very early in May, catalogue in hand, to see beauties he has described so glowingly! We trust the list of adjectives we have put so venturesomely close together in our cool columns will not explode in type, with spontaneous combustion!

LETTERS OF INTRODUCTION.—The following query may be answered briefly enough by quoting only European usage, but the propriety of an American variation occurs to us, and we will write a line on the subject—first giving the suggestive note:—

"SIR: My friend N., usually a well-informed, though rather an obstinate individual, is about to travel, and asked me for a letter of introduction to a friend abroad. The letter is written, and is submitted to his perusal, after which he hands it back to be sealed, insisting that the rule is inflexible that all letters should be sealed. I refuse to affix the wax, holding that a letter of introduction should be open."

"We leave the question to your decision. As my friend N. can not sail until the question is decided, an early decision will oblige him and your humble servant,"

"B."

PRINCE'S GARDENS.—We have received an immense catalogue of the fruit-trees, plants, flowers,

With very ceremonious people, and ceremonious notes of introduction, it is usual to affix a seal upon the outside of the letter, leaving it to be read and fastened by the bearer, before delivery. If the letter extends beyond the mere stating of who the bearer is, and the desire that he should be kindly received, or if it treats of other matters, it is given sealed. Either mode is perfectly allowable, for if the bearer objects to a sealed letter, he can ask the contents when he receives it. It is more common, however, to give it unsealed.

Briefly, now, to the point we are coming to: letters of introduction, in this country, should be addressed to the women and not to the men, and should go more into details of what the bearer is and what is his errand of travel, and therefore should be sealed. We have long been aware of a prevailing impression that Americans treat letters of introduction with a very uncivilized inattention, and so they do—because the etiquette and hospitable cares of American families are in charge of the wife, and the husband is very likely to stick the letter into a pigeon-hole of his desk, and forget all about it. The wife in America does all the ornamental. To see a rich man come down the steps of his own house (almost anywhere "up town") you would take him to be a tradesman who had been in to collect a bill. To see the wife follow, you would at once acknowledge that she looked as though she lived in the house, and fancy that she was probably annoyed to see that man pass out by the front door! From making himself a slave to keep his wife a goddess, the American loses all idea of the propriety of looking like a mate for his wife, and he unconsciously ceases to take any care of the civilities to which his own manners give so little value, and neglects all persons who have not had the tact to be presented first to the ornamental moiety. It should be an American usage, therefore, growing out of the inferiority of the husband's breeding to the wife's, that letters of introduction should be addressed to the woman.

Of course, as she has no opportunity to inquire into the bearer's position or habits, these should be more minutely set down, and the letter should be sealed.

"FINDINGS."—We see advertised continually certain commodities called "findings," which we understand are what hatters and shoemakers require besides peltry and leather. There are findings for newspapers, too—what the editors require besides leaders and news—and it may gratify our subscribers to know, that out of the weary slip-slop which we commonly scribble after making up the Mirror's leaders and news, our contemporaries supply themselves with the greater part of their ornamental "findings." Like every other editor, we are in the habit of giving a line or two occasionally, in the body of our paper, to the wares of our most liberal advertisers, and it appears that even this wastage of business notices is considered spice enough for other papers to be seasoned with. The Boston Transcript spices its little sheet very often with these parings of our daily apple. Here is part of a letter which contains a touch:—

"The leading articles in the Mirror and Commercial Advertiser for the last day or two have been devoted to the all-engrossing topic, the spring style of hats. After admitting that 'knowingness could no further go' than Beebe & Costar went, Willis winds up thus: 'For ourself and ten thousand other workies whom we could name, the sadder model of Orlando Fish—timid, proper, and thoughtful—is perhaps more appropriate.' This passage has produced a great sensation in dandy-dom. The Fish party are in raptures, and could hug Willis to their very bosoms; 'the opposition' is in a fury. Nobody can tell what the result may be. Willis dare not venture out, it is thought without a body-guard of Fishites. There are, moreover, many surmises with regard to the character of the 'ten thousand other workies' whom Mr. Willis 'could name.' Some think that he means to be witty, and alludes ironically to the "upper ten." This is a great mystery.

"The constituent elements of 'japonica-dom' and 'dandy-dom' may be seen daily in Broadway, between the hours of twelve and three. All the beauty above Bleeker street wanders at that time down as far as the Park, hazarding even the contamination of the vulgar crowd, in the hope of securing an appetite for dinner. The liveried lacqueys, who oscillate upon a black board behind the carriages of our republican nabobs, sport their gayest trappings: I had the pleasure of seeing one yesterday in a drab 'cut-away' with gold lace and yellow facings, and white silk stockings with purple velvet smalls! What is this great country coming to? We Gothamites do sometimes make ourselves ridiculous, by aping what as a people we profess to despise. It is rumored that a deputation of English 'small-potato' baronets may be expected in this city next summer; and that the object of their transatlantic mission is, to establish an aristocratic nucleus among our 'upper ten thousand.' A 'herald's college' has already been set on foot; and I have heard that it enjoys considerable patronage. It is proposed to build wings on either side of 'the up-town opera-house'—the one to be assigned to this 'herald's college,' and the other to the 'university of fashion,' of which Mr. Willis is to be president. Some say that Colonel Webb has applied for the vice-presidency, but I can not vouch for this.

"The chief feature of the Broadway Journal is a defence by Mr. Poe of his attack upon Longfellow, &c. It is as stupid as might be expected from a man who used to 'do up' such very small prosodial criticisms for Graham's Magazine. Mr. Poe comes down rather severely on Willis—he therefore has probably discontinued his services at the Mirror office."

One mistake in the above: Mr. Poe left us some time before writing in the Broadway Journal, and to edit that journal; and he never offended us by a criticism, nor could he, except by personalities, in which he never indulges.

SCHILLER AND GOETHE.—Mr. Calvert of Baltimore has given us, as translator, a most agreeable collection of gossip letters—the undress of two great minds, of the age just closed behind us. What we most wish to comment on, however (the book speaks for itself), is Mr. Calvert's own—the preface, in which he indignantly and most properly rebukes the last orator of the "Phi Beta Kappa Society," for a short-sighted and illiberal attack on the memory of Goethe. We found it difficult, at the time, to restrain an outbreak of disgust, but the oration was not published for some time, and we were unwilling to take ground upon a newspaper report of it. Meantime, our natural alacrity at forgetting disagreeable things dropped it out of memory. We are not sorry that a condemnation of it is now recorded in a book that must live.

Mr. Calvert puts the truth thus forcibly: "How little outward testimony survives about Shakspeare; but whose can read his poetry, may get a knowledge of the man surer and more absolute than could have been gotten even from the fullest contemporaneous opinions. As the tree is known by its fruit, we know that the parent of the Shaksperian progeny must have been a man in whom, in close alliance with a kingly intellect, dwelt, as well the virtues that ennoble, as the graces that beautify and the affections that sweeten life. Into whatever errors an ardent temperament may have drawn him, they dim not the lucid image of him, fixed in our minds by study of his works; nay, we presume not to wish them uncommitted, lest an attempt to better such a bounteous gift from God, should mar, but by a tittle, the original proportions of one, the sum of whose life has been to the world an unmeasurable benefaction. When a bad man's brain shall give birth to an Iphiginea, a Clara, a Mignon, you may pluck pomegranates from Plymouth rock, and reap corn on the sands of Sahara.

"On a formal public occasion (the Phi Beta Kappa oration at Cambridge in 1844), a blind and most rude assault has been made on one of the mightiest of the dead, whose soul lives on earth, and will for ages live in the exaltation of the loftiest minds. Out of stale German gossip, out of shallow wailings of prosaic critics, shallower clamors of pseudopatriots, uncharitable magnification of common failings, were compounded calumny against one of the foremost men of the world, and the most honored man of a people rich in virtue and genius."

Quite aside from the defence of Goethe, we think there is an obvious presentment here of the continual manner of treating all kinds of eminence and celebrity, here, in our own country, and at this present hour. As the proverb says :—

"Thankfully take refuge in obscurity,
For, if thou claimest merit, thy sin shall be proclaimed upon the house-tops !

Consider them of old, the great, the good, the learned ;
Did those speed in favor ? were they loved and admired ?
Was every prophet had in honor ? and every deserving one remembered to his praise ?

It were weariness to count up noble names neglected in their lives,

The scorned, defamed, insulted, but the excellent of the earth.

For good men are the health of the world, valued only when it perisheth.

Living genius is seen among infirmities wherefrom the commoner are free,

And there be many cares, and man knoweth little of his brother !

Feebly by association a motive, and slowly keep pace with a feeling.

Yet, once more, griever at neglect, hear me to thy comfort :
Neglect ? O LIBEL ON A WORLD, WHERE HALF THAT WORLD IS WOMAN !

No man yet deserved, who found not some to love him !
O, woman ! self-forgetting woman ! poetry of human life !
Many a word of comfort, many a deed of magnanimity,
Many a stream of milk and honey pour ye freely on the earth !"

STEWART'S STABLE ECONOMY.—We covet three things in the Arab's condition—his loose trousers, his country without fences, and his freedom to live with his horse. That we have once had the centaur variety in the human race, men-quadrupeds, and have once known horseflesh as "flesh of our flesh," the natural longing to prance, when we first get into the open air after long confinement, is but one of many evidences. In a mere notice of a book, however, we have no leisure to trace back a problem of physiology. We merely wish to convey to such of our enviable readers as can resume the centaur (by loving and living with a horse in the country), the treasure they have in a book which shows them how to make their life (the horse half of it) a luxury instead of an endurance, and to give our own five years' enjoyment in breaking, petting, and improving horses, by aid of this same book, as experienced commendation. We had the English edition of Stewart's books on horses, but the Appletons have republished the "Stable Economy," with "notes adapting it to American food and climate," by Mr. Allen, the able editor of the Agriculturist, and it is now an invaluable vade-mecum, for all men who have the luxury of a stable.

We can not help repeating that a visitable stable, with friends in it in the shape of horses—with horses in it one has himself broken and trained—a stable to which the ladies like to go after breakfast, and where a gentleman can throw on his own saddle and bridle, and gallop off, without needing first to find his groom—that this is the next best luxury our country affords, after ladies' society. (Horses, that is to say, before politics or stocks, under male discussion.)

The stable at Gordon castle (approachable by a covered passage from the principal hall) was a frequent resort for the ladies after breakfast ; and we have seen women, the highest in rank at the English court, going in and out of the stalls, patting the favorites they were to ride later in the day, and discussing their beauty with the simplicity and frankness of Arabs in the desert. While we are building country-houses and forming habits in America, it is well to know all the luxury we can enjoy in rural life, and no one should build stable, or own horse, without consulting the excellent directions for stabling and using the horse, in this book of Stewart's.

GRUND'S LETTERS FROM EUROPE.—In Godey's Lady's Book for April we find one of these best epistles of the day, and (to tell the truth) we read them with very little satisfaction, for they leave us with a want to go where they are written. The April number of Godey is principally the work of unwedded quills (no less than ten misses numbered among the contributors !), but we have read it with great satisfaction, and felicitate our old friend upon the brilliancy of his maiden troop. Godey is the pioneer of magazines, and he has a tact at collection and selection, which has put him where he is—safe at high-water mark in enduring prosperity. Success to him.

By-the-way—though we have no room to expatiate on the several papers in this number—the "Sketch of Joseph Bonaparte" is capital. Is that by a "miss" too ?

And apropos, Godey ! What a vile word "miss" is, to express the sweetest thing in nature ! Why should the idol of mankind be called a "miss" ? Why should the charming word heifer be degraded to the use of kine ? We say "degraded," for it once served ladies as a synonym for the proudest of virgin sweethearts. Ben Jonson, in his play of the "Silent Woman," thus writes a speech for his hero :—
"But heare me, faire lady, I do also love her whom I shall choose for my heifer, to be the first and principal in all fashions."

The derivation of the word heifer is so complimentary ! It comes from two Anglo-Saxon words, which signify "to step superbly," as a young creature who has borne no burthens. With this explanation, we trust our friend Godey will no longer hesitate to advertise his fair contributors as the bright lights of HEIFERDOM—disusing henceforth, for ever, the disparaging epithet of misses.

LETTER FROM THE EDITOR'S ROOM.

NEW YORK, FRIDAY, March 21.

To a lady-friend in the country : I am up to the knees in newspapers, and write to you under the stare of nine pigeon-holes, stuffed with literary portent. Were there such a thing (in this world of everythings) as papal magnetism, you would get a letter, not only typical in itself, but typical of a flood in which my identity is fast drowning. Oh, the drown of news, weighed unceasingly—little events and great ones—against little more than the trouble of snipping round with scissors ! To a horrid death—to a miraculous preservation—to a heart-gush of poesy—to a marriage—to a crime—to the turn of a political crisis—to flashing wit and storied agonies—giving but the one invariable first thought—" Shall I cut it out?" Alas, dear beauty-monarch of all you survey!—your own obituary, were I to read it in a newspaper of to-morrow, would speak scarce quicker to my heart than to those scissors of indiscriminating circum-cision! With the knowledge that the sky above me was enriched, as Florence once was, by the return of its long-lost and best model of beauty, I should ask, with be-paragraphed grief—"will her death do for the Mirror?"

But you are alive to laugh at me—alive to be (is your lip all ready for a curl?) the "straw" for me, drowning, to catch at! I write to you, to-day, to vary routine! Happy they who can see but one face when they write! I am trying hard to see only yours—trying hard, by mental recapitulation of eyes like fringed inkindstands, passionate nostrils, and chin of indomitable calm, to forget the vague features of my many-nosed public. Oh, the dread loss of one-at-a-time-ateness! Oh, the exile to the sad land of nominative plural! Oh, the unprized luxury of seeing but little, and seeing that little for yourself!

But—this is a letter from town, and you want the gossip. Spring is here—getting ready to go into the country. The dust and shutter-banging of the tempestuous equinox, have, for three days, banished the damageables from Broadway, and I know not the complexion of the spring fashions, now four days old. I was in a gay circle last night where some things were talked of—hm!—let me remember—Mrs. Mow-ATT's forthcoming comedy was one topic. Do you know this Corinne of the temperate latitudes? An exact copy, in marble, of her neck and head, would show you a Sapphic bust of most meaning and clear-lined beauty, and there is inspiration in the color of her living eyes and in the prodigal abundance of her floral hair. All this beauty she wastes and thinks nothing of—busied only with the lining of a head, which some tropical angel fashioned as he would have turned out a magnolia. She has genius, and her lamp burns within. But it takes more than genius to write comedy, and more than beauty (though it should not) to give it success, and I tremble for the lovely dramatist. The excitement about it is great—the actors all like their roles—the stage-manager says it is good—the public are wishing to be pleased and will flock to the experiment—and with all my heart, I pray for a "house" continually "brought down." I enclose you a sketch of the plot from the New World of this morning:—

"The subject is well chosen. Fashion—that is, the effort to show off dazzlingly in society—is, in this country, a fact of sufficient body and consistence to afford material for an original comedy—and the incidents and peculiarities of manner and character attending the effort, are often abundantly ludicrous and grotesque to make the comedy laughable. The 'glass of fashion,' held fairly up in New York, will show some amusing scenes, quite new to the stage.

"The characters of the piece are selected and grouped, we think, with character and judgment. An uneducated woman of fashion, driving her husband into dishonesty and crime by her crime and extravagance—a pretended French count, who knows, at least, all the police courts of Europe very thoroughly—a clever French waiting maid, who finds in the said count an old acquaintance—a negro valet of all work rejoicing in a scarlet livery, and much inclined to grandiloquence—a rich old farmer, from Cattaraugus, carrying the moral of the piece, and no small part of its humor, stoutly on upon his broad shoulders—a Fanny-Forester-like country girl, transplanted into the city from Geneva, to work out the plot, and get the good luck of the catastrophe—these are the main personages. An old maid—a small poet—a solemn dandy, styled Fogg—a confidential clerk called Snobson, and clearly belonging to the large family of Snobs—a walking gentleman, and a young coquette, are thrown in as make-weights. Here is certainly a goodly dramatic array.

"The dialogue is written with taste and spirit. It has few passages of what is called 'fine writing,' but it embodies enough of wit, and fancy, and observation, to keep the attention of the reader constantly and pleasurably excited. A rigid criticism, resolved upon fault-finding, might say that the conclusion of this piece is too clearly apparent from its commencement, and that the action moves too slowly through the first three acts. But admitting all this, the comedy certainly has great merit, and, if well brought out, will have a run. We believe that its first night will be greeted by a large audience, and we most cordially bespeak for it the favorable consideration to which it is, in every regard, entitled."

Forrest's fate among the London Philistines is another matter of chat. The Macready critics are down upon him—Foster of the Examiner, Macready's bull-dog, heaviest and foremost. This was to have been expected, of course. The gravely bottom of Macready's throat has been forced upon the English, for so long, as the only sarcophagus of Shakspeare, that the bringing of the dry bones to life, in an open mouth, and the marring of the sexton's vocation, was not submitted to without a grumble. An English critic predicts that Forrest "will play down the grumblers yet," and I trust he will do so. He is the kind of man to say with old Chapman:—

"Give me the spirit that on life's rough sea
Would have his sails filled with lusty wind,
Even till his sail-yards tremble, his masts crack,
And his rapt ship run on her side so low
That she drinks water, and her keel ploughs air."

He is twenty times the man, and the actor, that Macready is, and the English will find out his mark if he stay long enough. Meantime they are enchanted with Miss Cushman, who, the Examiner says, is a "feminized caricature of Macready's physiognomy." I like her, by the way, and rejoice in her success as much as I wish a better appreciation of Forrest.

What else shall I tell you? The Mirror's wondrous "rise and progress," profitably and firmly seated, after less than six months of industrious existence, is a marvel that even your beauty may rejoice in—for it will bring me to your feet (by paying the expenses of transit) when the summer comes over us. Where are you going to Baden this summer? At Saratoga? I like that place, because you can there, and there alone, be an island in a sea of people. Where there are fewer, you are added to the continent of sociability, and have no privileges. Shall we say the last week in August?

Bottom of the page. Scarce room to write myself
Yours.

AN IDEA FOR TATTERSALL'S.—There are luxuries which rich men forego, not for the money but for the mind they cost. Hundreds of people in this city, for instance, could very well afford a carriage, but they can not afford the trouble of buying horses, the care of looking after grooms, nor the anxieties inseparable from horse-owning in this country of perpetual new servants. In England this want is provided for by the system the livery-stable keepers call jobbing. Lady Blessington's two or three different equipages for instance, are allowed to be the prettiest and best appointed in London. Yet she owns neither carriages, horses, nor harness. She pays a certain sum per annum to be provided with what she wants in the way of equipages, and keeps only her own coachman and footmen. A new carriage is furnished whenever wanted, and of whatever style is wanted (the jobber finding no trouble probably in disposing of the one given up) and a sick or lame horse is replaced immediately from a stable where the first blood and shape are alone kept. Her ladyship thus knows precisely what her driving is to cost her for the year, and transfers to the jobber all the risk, anxiety, and trouble.

A wealthy New-Yorker, a day or two since, made a very handsome offer to a livery-stable keeper to furnish him a carriage on this same plan, and the offer was refused. But, though a single customer of this kind might be troublesome, combination (that great secret of luxurious economies) might "make it answer." Twenty nice, carriages, let out to private gentlemen at $1,000, or $1,500 a year each, might be looked after by one jobber well versed in horsemanship, and his taste and experience would turn out better equipages than could be got up by private individuals. The twenty stables now kept up would be combined in one (this in itself, no small saving) and the rich man might be driven in better style, for less money than it now costs him, and—better than all—without the vexatious care, vigilance and anxiety of keeping a private carriage.

P. S. We can safely say that we are entirely disinterested in the proposed arrangement!

GRAHAM FOR APRIL.—The equinox brought us such detestable weather, that instead of our usual two hours' airing of brains under a hat, we lay on our back yesterday afternoon and read "Graham." How does the man get so many good things! Grund, Fanny Forester, Mrs. C. H. Butler, Wm. Lander, Mrs. Embury, Mrs. Osgood, Mr. Peterson—all have written their best for this number. Our friend Fanny's story of "Nickie Ben" seems to us particularly fresh, bright, and original. Mr. Grund's letter from Paris is full of intelligence, and among other things, he thus speaks of Eugene Sue and his two tasters:—

"He lives now, by the product of his industry, in princely style; but his enjoyments are troubled by the constant fear of being poisoned by his political and religious adversaries. He has, therefore, contracted an intimate friendship with two large, beautiful Newfoundland dogs, who are his constant dinner and breakfast companions, and who always eat first of every dish that is brought on the table. If these judges of gastronomy pronounce in favor of it, by first eating a large quantity, with apparent relish, the author of "The Mysteries" and "The Wandering Jew" himself partakes of it without farther scruple. He believes dogs much more faithful than men, and the sagacious instincts of a regular Newfoundlander superior to the science of chymists and physicians."

Poor dogs! Considering that they would doubtless have been wagging their tails in Paradise, but for Adam's transgression, it seems hard to make them die, for a human master, besides!

But, to turn to the first leaf—lo! the brigadier! There he stands, looking as amiable as if he had just nabbed a flying thought for a song, his smile a little more rigid, however, and his phiz a little thinner than his accommodating wont. The picture is enough like him, notwithstanding, for all "business purposes." We think him better looking than the artist has "done" him, and this we request the ladies (who sing his songs) to allow for. The magazine opens with a critical biography, exceedingly well done, and (the brigadier below stairs playing salesman) we see nothing to prevent our quoting a note of our own to the writer:—

NEW YORK, Feb. 1, 1845.

MY DEAR SIR: To ask me for my idea of General Morris is like asking the left hand's opinion of the dexterity of the right. I have lived so long with the "brigadier," known him so intimately, worked so constantly at the same rope, and thought so little of ever separating from him (except by precedence of ferriage over the Styx), that it is hard to shove him from me to the perspective distance—hard to shut my own partial eyes, and look at him through other people's. I will try, however, and as it is done with but one foot off from the treadmill of my censeless vocation, you will excuse both abruptness and brevity.

Morris is the best known poet of the country by acclamation, not by criticism. He is just what poets would be if they sung, like birds, without criticism; and it is a peculiarity of his fame, that it seems as regardless of criticism as a bird in the air. Nothing can stop a song of his. It is very easy to say that they are easy to do. They have a momentum, somehow, that is difficult for others to give, and that speeds them to the far goal of popularity—the best proof consisting in the fact that he can, at any moment, get fifty dollars for a song, unread, when the whole remainder of the American Parnassus could not sell one to the same buyer for a shilling.

It may, or may not, be one secret of his popularity, but it is a truth—that Morris's heart is at the level of most other people's, and his poetry flows out by that door. He stands breast high in the common stream of sympathy, and the fine oil of his poetic feeling goes from him upon an element it is its nature to float upon, and which carries it safe to other bosoms, with little need of deep diving or high flying. His sentiments are simple, honest, truthful, and familiar; his language is pure and eminently musical, and he is prodigally full of the poetry of everyday feeling. These are days when poets try experiments; and while others succeed by taking the world's breath away with flights and plunges, Morris uses his feet to walk quietly with nature. Ninety-nine people in a hundred, taken as they come in the census, would find more to admire in Morris's songs than in the writings of any other American poet; and that is a parish in the poetical episcopate, well worthy a wise man's nurture and prizing.

As to the man—Morris my friend—I can hardly venture to "burn incense on his mustache," as the French say—write his praises under his very nose—but, as far off as Philadelphia, you may pay the proper tribute to his loyal nature and manly excellences. His personal qualities have made him universally popular, but this overflow upon the world does not impoverish him for his friends. I have outlined a true poet, and a fine fellow—fill up the picture to your liking.

Yours, very truly,

N. P. WILLIS.

We get, from literary fledglings, at least one letter per diem, requesting detailed advice on the quo modo of a first flight in prose or poesy. We really suppose we have, or are to have, an end to our life, and we like to economise time. So we publish a letter, which we once had occasion to write, and which must serve as a circular—a letter which we recorded in our diary when it was written—recorded with the following preface:—

There lies before me now, upon my table, a letter of three tolerably compact pages, addressed to a young gentleman of — college, who is "bit by the dipsas" of authorship. His mother, a sensible, plain, farmer's widow, chanced to be my companion for a couple of days, in a stage-coach, and while creeping over the mountains between the Hudson and the Susquehanna, she paid my common sense the compliment of unburthening a very stout heart to me. Since her husband's death, she has herself managed the farm, and by active, personal oversight, has contrived "to make both ends so far lap" (to use her own expression), as to keep her only boy at college. By her description, he is a slenderish lad in his constitution, fond of poetry, and bent on trying his fortune with his pen, as soon as he has closed his thumb and finger on his degree. The good dame wished for the best advice I could give him on the subject, leaving it to me (after producing a piece of his poetry from her pocket, published in one of the city papers) to encourage or dissuade. I apprehended a troublesome job of it, but after a very genial conversation (on the subject of raising turkeys, in which she quite agreed with me, that they were cheaper bought than raised, when corn was fifty cents a bushel—greedy gobblers!), I reverted to the topic of poetry, and promised to write the inspired sophomore my views as to his prospects. Need I record it?—that long letter affects me like an unsigned bank-note—like something which might so easily have been money—like a leak in the beer-barrel—like a hole in the meal-bag! It irks me to lose them—three fair pages—a league's drift to leeward—a mortal morning's work, and no odor lucri thence arising! I can not stand it, Mrs. —, and Mr. Sophomore —! You are welcome to the autograph copy, but faith! I must print it. There is a superfluity of adjectives (intended, as it was, for private perusal), but I will leave them out in the copy.

Thus runs the letter:—

DEAR SIR: You will probably not recognise the handwriting in which you are addressed, but by casting your eye to the conclusion of the letter, you will see that it comes from an old stager in periodical literature; and of that, as a profession, I am requested by your mother to give you, as she phrases it, "the cost and yield." You will allow what right you please to my opinions, and it is only with the authority of having lived by the pen, that I pretend to offer any hints on the subject for your guidance. As "the farm" can afford you nothing beyond your education, you will excuse me for presuming that you need information mainly as to the livelihood to be got from literature.

Your mother thinks it is a poor market for potatoes, where potatoes are to be had for nothing, and that is simply the condition of American literature (as protected by law). The contributors to the numerous periodicals of England, are the picked men of thousands—the accepted of hosts rejected—the flower of a highly-educated and refined people—soldiers, sailors, lords, ladies, and lawyers—all at leisure, all anxious to turn a penny, all ambitious of print and profit; and this great army, in addition to the hundreds urged by need and pure literary zeal—this great army, I say, are before you in the market, offering their wares to your natural customer, at a price for which you can not afford to sell—nothing! It is true that by this state of the literary market, you have fewer competitors among your countrymen—the best talent of the country being driven, by necessity, into less congenial and more profitable pursuits; but even with this advantage (none but doomed authors in the field) you would probably find it difficult, within five years after you graduated, to convert your best piece of poetry into a genuine dollar. I allow you, at the same time, full credit for your undoubted genius.

You naturally inquire how American authors live. I answer, by being English authors. There is no American author who lives by his pen, for whom London is not the chief market. Those whose books sell only in this country, make scarce the wages of a day-laborer—always excepting religious writers, and the authors of school-books, and such works as owe their popularity to extrinsic causes. To begin on leaving college, with legitimate book-making—writing novels, tales, volumes of poetry, &c., you must have at least five years support from some other source, for until you get a name, nothing you could write would pay "board and lodging;" and "getting a name" in America, implies having first got a name in England. Then we have almost no professed, mere authors. They have vocations of some other character, also. Men like Dana, Bryant, Sprague, Halleck, Kennedy, Wetmore, though, no doubt, it is the first wish of their hearts to devote all their time to literature, are kept, by our atrocious laws of copyright, in paths less honorable to their country, but more profitable to themselves, and by far the greatest number of discouraged authors are "broken on the wheel" of the public press. Gales, Walsh, Chandler, Buckingham, and other editors of that stamp, are men driven aside from authorship, their proper vocation.

Periodical writing seems the natural novitiate to literary fame in our country, and I understand from your mother that through this lies your chosen way. I must try to give you as clear an idea as possible of the length and breadth of it, and perhaps I can best do so by contrasting it with another career, which (if advice were not always useless) I should sooner advise.

Your mother's farm, then, consisting of near a hundred acres, gives a net produce of about five hundred dollars a year—hands paid, I mean, and seed, wear and tear of tools, team, &c., first subtracted. She has lived as comfortable as usual for the last three or four years, and still contrived to lay by the two hundred and fifty dollars expended annually on your education. Were you at home, your own labor and oversight would add rather more than two hundred dollars to the income, and with good luck you might call yourself a farmer with five hundred dollars, as the Irish say, "to the fore." Your vocation, at the same time, is dignified, and such as would reflect favorably on your reputation, should you hereafter become in any way eminent. During six months in the year, you would scarce find more than an hour or two in the twenty-four to spare from sleep or labor; but in the winter months, with every necessary attention to your affairs out of doors, still find as much leisure for study and composition as most literary men devote to those purposes. I say nothing of the pabulum of rural influences on your mind, but will just hint at another incidental advantage you may not have thought of, viz.: that the public show much more alacrity in crowning an author, if he does not make bread and butter of the laurels! In other words, if you are a farmer, you are supposed (by a world not very brilliant in its conclusions) to expend the most of your mental energies (as they do) in making your living; and your literature goes for an "aside"—waste-water, as the millers phrase it—a very material premise in both criticism and public estimation.

At your age, the above picture would have been thrown away on myself, and I presume (inviting as it seems to my world-weary eyes) it is thrown away now upon you. I shall therefore try to present to you the lights and shadows of the picture which seem to you more attractive.

Your first step will be to select New York as the city which is to be illustrated by your residence, and to commence a search after some literary occupation. You have a volume of poetry which has been returned to you by your "literary agent," with a heavy charge for procuring the refusal of every publisher to undertake it, and with your pride quite taken out of you, you are willing to devote your Latin and Greek, your acquaintance with prosody and punctuation, and a very middling proficiency in chirography (no offence—your mother showed me your autograph list of bills for the winter term)—all this store of accomplishment you offer to employ for a trifle besides meat, lodging, and apparel. These, you say, are surely moderate expectations for an educated man, and such wares, so cheap, must find a ready market. Of such stuff, you know that editors are made, and in the hope of finding a vacant editorial chair, you pocket your MSS., and commence inquiry. At the end of the month, you begin to think yourself the one person on earth for whom there seems no room. There is no editor wanted, no sub-editor wanted, no reporter, no proof-reader, no poet! There are passable paragraphists by scores—educated young men, of every kind, of promising talent, who, for twenty dollars a month, would joyfully do twice what you propose—give twice as much time, and furnish twice as much “copy.” But as you design, of course, to “go into society,” and gather your laurels as they blossom, you can not see your way very clearly with less than a hay-maker’s wages. You proceed with your inquiries, however, and are, at last, quite convinced that few things are more difficult than to coin uncelebrated brains into current money—that the avenues for the employment of the head, only, are emulously crowded—that there are many more than you had supposed who have the same object as yourself, and that, whatever fame may be in its meridian and close, its morning is mortification and starvation.

The “small end of the horn” has a hole in it, however, and the bitter stage of experience I have just described, might be omitted in your history, if, by any other means, you could be made small enough to go in. The most considerable diminution of size, perhaps, is the getting rid, for the time, of all idea of “living like a gentleman” (according to the common acceptance of the phrase). To be willing to satisfy hunger in any clean and honest way, to sleep in any clean and honest place, and to wear anything clean and honestly paid for, are phases of the crescent moon of fame, not very prominently laid down in our imaginary chart; but they are, nevertheless, the first indication of that moon’s waxing. I see by the advertisements, that there are facilities now for cheap living, which did not exist “when George the Third was king.” A dinner (of beef, bread, and potatoes, with a bottle of wine) is offered, by an advertiser, of the savory name of G— for a shilling, and a breakfast, most invitingly described, is offered for sixpence. I have no doubt a lodging might be procured at the same moderate rate of charge. “Society” does not move on this plane, it is true, but society is not worth seeking at any great cost, while you are obscure, and if you’ll wait till the first moment when it would be agreeable (the moment when it thinks it worth while to caress you), it will come to you, like Mohammed to the mountain. And like the mountain’s moving to Mohammed, you will find any premature ambition on the subject.

Giving up the expectation of finding employment suited to your taste, you will, of course, be “open to offers,” and I should counsel you to take any that would pay, which did not positively shut the door upon literature. At the same wages you had better direct covers in a newspaper office, than contribute original matter which costs you thought, yet is not appreciated; and in fact, as I said before with reference to farming, a subsistence not directly obtained by brain-work, is a material advantage to an author. Eight hours of mere mechanical copying, and two hours of leisurely composition, will tire you less, and produce more for your reputation than twelve hours of intellectual drudgery. The publishers and booksellers have a good deal of work for educated men—proof-reading, compiling, corresponding, &c., and this is a good step to higher occupation. As you moderate your wants, of course you enlarge your chances for employment.

Getting up in the world is like walking through a mist—your way opens as you get on. I should say, that with tolerable good fortune, you might make by your pen, two hundred dollars the first year, and increase your income a hundred dollars annually, for five years. This, as a literary “operative.” After that period, you would either remain stationary, a mere “worky,” or your genius would discover “by the dip of the divining rod,” where, in the well-searched bowels of literature, lay an unworked vein of ore. In the latter case, you would draw that one prize in a thousand blanks of which the other competitors in the lottery of fame feel as sure as yourself.

As a “stock” or “starring” player upon the literary stage, of course you desire a crowded audience, and it is worth your while, perhaps, to inquire (more curiously than is laid down in most advices to authors) what is the number and influence of the judicious, and what nuts it is politic to throw to the groundlings. Abuse is, in criticism, what shade is in a picture, discord in harmony, acid in punch, salt in seasoning. Unqualified praise is the death of Tarpeia, and to be neither praised nor abused is more than death—it is inanition. Query—how to procure yourself to be abused? In your chymical course next year, you will probably give a morning’s attention to the analysis of the pearl, among other precious substances, and you will be told by the professor, that it is the consequence of an excess of carbonate of lime in the flesh of the oyster—in other words, the disease of the sub-aqueous animal who produces it. Now, to copy this politic invalid—to learn wisdom of an oyster—find out what is the most pungent disease of your style, and hug it ‘till it becomes a pearl. A fault carefully studied is the germ of a peculiarity, and a peculiarity is a pearl of great price to an author. The critics begin very justly by hammering at it as a fault, and after it is polished into a peculiarity, they still hammer at it as a fault, and the noise they make attracts attention to the pearl, and up you come from the deep sea of obscurity, not the less intoxicated with the sunshine, because, but for your disease, you would never have seen it.

With one more very plain piece of counsel, I have done. Never take the note of any man connected with literature, if he will cash it for fifty per cent.

BREAKFASTS AND THE QUARTERLY.—Mr. Lockhart can never do harm except indirectly. His assertions and his criticisms are taken with more than the “grain of salt.” Mr. Cooper may have a private quarrel with him for some of his ungentlemanly phraseology, but for the literary part of the criticism on “England,” it will stand in the place of a good advertisement to the book, and there ends all its good and evil. In the following passage, however, a blow (most unwise and most injurious) is struck at one of the pleasantest usages of English hospitality:—

“We suspect that Mr. Cooper will not think Mr. Rogers’s breakfasts quite so admirable, nor the other twenty so transcendently agreeable, when he learns that it is by no means usual to invite strangers to breakfast in London, and that such breakfasts are generally given when the guest is one about whose manners, character, or social position, there is some uncertainty—a breakfast is a kind of mezzo-terme, between a mere visit and the more intimate hospitality of a dinner. It is, as it were, a state of probation.”—Quarterly Review for October.

As the great organ of the tory party in England, the Quarterly might fairly be taken by a foreigner as an authority upon a point of English manners. The consequence follows, that he can not be invited to breakfast without fair ground to presume it an insult. Shots have been exchanged upon slighter ground. At the best, a suspicion is thrown upon this mode of hospitality which deprives it entirely of its easy and confidential character; and that it is an injury to society which could only be corrected by the publication of a correct portrait of Mr. Lockhart. No one after seeing it would credit any assertion he might make upon a subject involving a knowledge of good-fellowship.

The editor of the Quarterly looks his vocation better than any man it has been my fortune to see. In his gait and voice there is a feline resemblance which is remarkable. It is impossible for a human being to be more like a cat. To aid the likeness, he is slightly parry-toed, and when you see him creeping along Pall Mall on his way to the club, you can not avoid the impression that he is mouseing. In his person he is extremely thin, and, but for his mouth, Lockhart would look like a gentleman. In that feature lies a whole epitome of the man. The lips are short, and of barely the thickness of the skin, and habitually drawn in close against the teeth. To this feature, which resembles somewhat the mouth of a small purse, all the countenance seems subordinate. The contraction pulls upon every muscle of his face, and upon every muscle is stamped the malice of which his mouth is the living-and most legible type.

This description of the man is very apropos of his opinions of breakfast. I presume he was never asked to an unceremonious breakfast in his life. Would any one in his senses begin his day by sitting down opposite to such a face for a couple of hours? Not willingly, I should think.

I presume every Englishman except the editor of the Quarterly will agree that to ask a stranger to breakfast is much more flattering than to invite him to dinner. Engagements to breakfast, indeed, are almost always made at dinner. The reply to a letter of introduction is usually a card and an invitation to dine. If your host is pleased with you, nothing is more common than for him to say at parting, "You have been so engrossed that I have scarce spoken to you—come and breakfast with me to-morrow at nine." You accept, and you improve on acquaintance into a friend. In a snug library, all ceremony put off, the mind tranquil and sincere, you enter upon a different class of subjects, more familiar, more confidential. The attention of your host is more undivided, and your conversation leads you to make engagements for the day, or the evening; and thus a man with whom you might have discussed the corn-laws or the new opera, forty times, across the glare of a dinner-table, and only known at last as a talker of commonplaces, becomes a pleasant friend, perhaps an intimate companion.

I have not the Quarterly Review by me at this moment, but, if I do not mistake, the breakfasts with the poet Rogers, described by Mr. Cooper, furnish the text for Mr. Lockhart's "new light" upon this subject. I am happy to have it in my power to set our countrymen right upon the estimation in which Cooper is held by that polished and venerable amphytrion. It was kindly and complementarily done of Mr. Rogers to talk a great deal of a compatriot, of whose talents he justly supposed every American should be proud. I was enjoying (according to Mr. Lockhart) the equivocal honor of breakfasting with him—an honor which, questionable or not, I shared with one of the most distinguished foreigners then in England. This latter gentleman professed the highest enthusiasm for the works of Cooper, and took pains to draw out the venerable poet on the subject of his personal manners, conversation, &c. A handsomer eulogium of an absent author I never heard. Mr. Rogers admired the bold independence of his cast of mind, and spoke in the highest terms of him as a gentleman and a friend. I can not, if it were proper, quote the exact words he used; but, subtract from this praise all you please to fancy might have been said in kindness or compliment to a compatriot, there was still enough left to gratify the self-love of the most exacting.

If Mr. Lockhart had ever been similarly honored, he would have excused Mr. Cooper for dwelling complacently on the "breakfasts in St. James's Place." Rogers has lived in the very core of all that is precious or memorable of two ages of English wit, literature, and politics, himself oftener the bright centre around which it gathered. His manners are amenity itself, his wit is celebrated, his powers of narration delightful. With all this he seems to forget his own fame and himself, and never to have known envy or ill-will. As he sits at that small breakfast-table, his head silvery white, the bland smile of intellectual enjoyment upon his lips, talking or listening with equal pleasure, and with the greatest tact and delicacy, alternately drawing out the resources of his guests, and exhibiting modestly his own, he is a picture of tranquil, dignified, and green old age, which it were a pity to have travelled far and not seen. I felicitate Mr. Cooper on the possession of his esteem and friendship. I please myself with remembering that I have seen him. I pity Mr. Lockhart that the class of entertainments of which this is one, is reserved for those whose faces will not "spoil the cream."

Between butchering for Fraser and dissecting for the Quarterly, Mr. Lockhart may have derived a sufficient revenue to "give dinners;" but he forgets that more amiable literature is not so saleable, and that his brother authors are compelled to entertain strangers at breakfast. Taboo that meal, and, good heavens! what becomes of the "great army of writers" in London, who, over "tea and toast," in their quiet lodgings, give the admiring pilgrim of literature a feast of reason—one alone worth all the dinners of May fair!

What becomes of younger sons, and callow orators, and lawyers in the temple, who, over red herrings and coffee, let the amused guest into the secrets of their menus-plaisirs, and trenching a half-crown, at the most, upon their slender pockets, send him away delighted with their gay hospitality. Breakfasts! What would you know of authors and artists without breakfasts? You see but half the man in his works. Would you rather breakfast with Chantry in his studio, and hear him criticise his own marble, or dine with him at Lord Lansdowne's, and listen to his barardage upon fly-fishing? Would you rather see gentle Barry Cornwall, smothered and silent, among wits and lordlings at "miladi's," or breakfast with him in his crammed library in St. John's Wood, and hear him read one of his unpublished songs, with the tears in his eyes, and the children at his knee, breathless with listening? Would you rather meet Moore, over a cup of tea, in the shop-parlor at Longman's, in Paternoster row, or see him at one of the show-dinners of this publishing Mæcenæ, at his villa in Hampstead? Out upon the malicious hand that would sow distrust and suspicion in these delightful by-paths of hospitality!

An author is always a double existence, and it is astonishing how different may be the intellectual man from his everyday representative. Lockhart, the author of Valerius, Adam Blair, and the Life of Sir Walter Scott, is a splendid and delightful intellect—no one can deny it. Mr. Lockhart, the gentleman who looks as if he had a perpetual inclination to whistle, and who does the bourreau for the Quarterly, is an individual I should rather meet anywhere than—at breakfast. Heaven send him a relaxation of his facial muscles, and a little charity to leave the world with.

A SPRING DAY IN WINTER.—A spring day sometimes bursts upon us in December. One scarcely knows whether the constant warmth of the fire, or the fresh sunny breathings from the open window, are the most welcome. At such a time, the curtains swing lazily to the mild wind as it enters, and the light green leaves of the sheltered flowers stir and erect themselves with an out-of-door vigor, and the shuffled steps and continued voices of the children in the street, have the loitering and summer-like sound of June. I do not know whether it is not a cockney feeling, but with all my love for the country, fixed as it is by the recollections of a life mostly spent in the "green fields" I sometimes "babble of," there is something in a summer morning in the city, which the wet, warm woods, and the solitary, though lonely haunts of the country do not, after all the poetry that has been "spilt upon them" (as Neal would say), at all equal. Whether it is that we find so much sympathy in the many faces that we meet, made happy by the same sweet influences, or whatever else may be the reason, certainly, I never take my morning walk on such a day, without a leaping in my heart, which, from all I can gather by dream or revelation, has a touch in it of Paradise. I returned once, on such a day, from an hour's ramble after breakfast. The air rushed past my temples with the grateful softness of spring, and every face that passed had the open, inhaling expression which is given by the simple joy of existence. The sky had the deep clearness of noon. The clouds were winnowed in light parallel curves, looking like white shells inlaid on the arched heavens; the smooth, glassy bay was like a transparent abyss opening to the earth's centre, and edging away underneath, with a slope of hills, and spires, and leafless woods, copied minutely and perfectly from the upper landscape, and the naked elms seemed almost clothed as the teeming eye looked on them, and the brown hills took a taint of green—so freshly did the summer fancies crowd into the brain with the summer softness of the sunshine and air. The mood is rare in which the sight of human faces does not give us pleasure. It is a curious occupation to look on them as they pass, and study their look and meaning, and wonder at the providence of God, which can provide, in this crowded world, an object and an interest for all. With what a singular harmony the great machine of society goes on! So many thousand minds, and each with its peculiar cast and its positive difference from its fellow, and yet no dangerous interference, and no discord audible above the hum of its daily revolution. I could not help feeling a religious thrill, as I passed face after face, with this thought in my mind, and saw each one earnest and cheerful, each one pressing on with its own object, without waiting or caring for the equally engrossing object of the other. The man of business went on with an absorbed look, caring only to thread his way rapidly along the street. The student strided by with the step of exercise, his lips parted to admit the pleasant air to his refreshed lungs, and his eye wandering with bewildered pleasure from object to object. The schoolboy looked wistfully up and down the street, and lingered till the last stroke of the bell summoned him tardily in. The womanish school-girl, with her veil coquettishly drawn, still flirted with her boyish admirer, though it was "after nine," and the child, with its soiled satchel and shining face, loitered seriously along the sidewalk, making acquaintance with every dog, and picking up every stone on its unwilling way. The spell of the atmosphere was universal, and yet all kept on their several courses, and the busy harmony of employment went steadily and unbrokenly on. How rarely we turn upon ourselves, and remember how wonderfully we are made and governed!

EVANESCENT IMPRESSIONS.—I have very often, in the fine passages of society—such as occur sometimes in the end of an evening, or when a dinner-party has dwindled to an unbroken circle of choice and congenial spirits, or at any of those times when conversation, stripped of all reserve or check, is poured out in the glowing and unfettered enthusiasm to which convivial excitement alone gives the confidence necessary to its flow—I have often wished, at such times, that the voice and manner of the chance and fleeting eloquence about us could be arrested and written down for others beside ourselves to see and admire. In a chance conversation at a party, in the bagatelle rattle of a dance, in a gay hour over coffee and sandwiches en famille, wherever you meet those whom you love or value, there will occur pieces of dialogue, jeux d'esprit, passages of feeling or fun—trifles, it is true, but still such trifles as make ears in the calendar of happiness—which you would give the world to rescue from their ephemeral destiny. They are, perhaps, the soundings of a spirit too deep for ordinary life to fathom, or the gracefulness of a fancy linked with too feminine a nature to bear the eye of the world, or the melting of a frost of reserve from the diffident genius—they are traces of that which is fleeting, or struck out like phosphorus from the sea by irregular chance—and you want something quicker and rarer than formal description to arrest it warm and natural, and detain it in its place till it can be looked upon.

THE FIRST FEELING OF WINTER.—How delightfully the first feeling of winter comes on the mind! What a throng of tranquillizing and affectionate thoughts accompany its first bright fires, and the sound, out of doors, of its first chilling winds. Oh, when the leaves are driven in troops through the streets, at nightfall, and the figures of the passers-by hurry on, cloaked and stooping with the cold, is there a pleasanter feeling in the world than to enter the closed and carpeted room, with its shaded lamps, and its genial warmth, and its cheerful faces about the evening table! I hope that I speak your own sentiment, dear reader, when I prefer to every place and time, in the whole calendar of pleasure, a winter evening at home—the "sweet, sweet home" of childhood, with its unreserved love and its unchanged and unmeasured endearments. We need not love gaiety the less. The light and music and beauty of the dance will always breed a floating delight in the brain that has not grown dull to life's finer influences; yet the pleasures of home, though serene are deeper, and I am sure that the world may be searched over in vain for a sense of joy so even and unmingled. It is a beautiful trait of Providence that the balance is kept so truly between our many and different blessings. It were a melancholy thing to see the summer depart with its superb beauty, if the heart did not freshen as it turned in from its decay to brood upon its own treasures. The affections wander under the enticement of all the outward loveliness of nature, and it is necessary to unwind the spell, that their rich kindness may not become scattered and visionary. I have a passion for these simple theories, which I trust will be forgiven. I indulge in them as people pun. They are too shadowy for logic, it is true—like the wings of the glendoveer, in Kehama, gauze-like and filmy, but flying high withal. You may not grow learned, but you surely will grow poetical upon them. I would as lief be praised by a blockhead as be asked the reason.

THE POET SHELLEY.—Shelley has a private nook in my affections. He is so unlike all other poets that I can not mate him. He is like his own "skylark" among birds. He does not keep ever up in the thin air with Byron, like the eagle, nor sing with Keats low and sweetly like the thrush, nor, like the dove sitting always upon her nest, brood with Wordsworth over the affections. He begins to sing when the morning wakes him, and as he grows wild with his own song, he mounts upward, and it is wonderful how he loses himself, like the delirious bird in the sky, and with a verse which may be well compared for its fine delicacy with her little wings, penetrates its far depths fearlessly and full of joy. There is something very new in this mingled trait of fineness and sublimity. Milton and Byron seem made for the sky. Their broad wings always strike the air with the same solemn majesty. But Shelley, near the ground, is a very "bird in a bower," running through his merry compass as if he never dreamed of the upward and invisible heavens. Withal, Shelley's genius is too fiery to be moody. He was a melancholy man, but it was because he was crossed in the daily walk of life, and such anxieties did not touch his imagination. It was above—far, far above them. His poetry was not, like that of other poets, linked with his common interests; and if it "unbound the serpent of care from his heart," as doubtless it did, it was by making him forget that it was there. He conceived and wrote in a wizard circle. The illiberal world was the last thing remembered, and its annoying prejudices, gall him as they might in the exercise of his social duties, never followed over the fiery limit of his fancy. Never have we seen such pure abstraction from earthliness as in the temper of his poetry. It is the clear, intellectual lymph, unalloyed and unpolluted.

"And singing ever soars, and soaring ever singeth;"

AN AUTHOR'S JUDGMENT OF HIS OWN WORKS.—It is a false notion that the writer is no judge of his own book. Verses in manuscript and verses in print, in the first place, are very different things, and the mood of writing and the mood of reading what one has written, are very different moods. We do not know how it is with others, but we open our own volume with the same impression of strangeness and novelty that we do another's. The faults strike us at once, and so do the beauties, if there are any, and we read coolly in a new garb, the same things which upon paper recalled the fever of composition, and rendered us incapable of judgment. As far as I can discover by others' experience and my own, no writer understands the phenomena of composition. It is impossible to realize, in reading, that which is to him impassioned, the state of feeling which produced it. His own mind is to himself a mystery and a wonder. The thought stands before him, visible to his outward eye, which he does not remember has ever haunted him. The illustration from nature is often one which he does not remember to have noticed—the trait of character, or the peculiar pencilling of a line in beauty altogether new and startling. He is affected to tears or mirth, his taste is gratified or shocked, his fancy amused or his cares beguiled, as if he had never before seen it. It is his own mind, but he does not recognise it. He is like the peasant-child taken and dressed richly; he does not know himself in his new adornments. There is a wonderful metamorphosis in print. The author has written under strong excitement, and with a development and reach of his own powers which would amuse him were he conscious of the process. There are dim and far chambers in the mind which are never explored by reason. Imagination in her rapt phrensy wanders blindly there sometimes, and brings out their treasures to the light—ignorant of their value, and almost believing that the dreams when they glitter are admired. There are phantoms which haunt the perpetual twilight of the inner mind, which are arrested only by the daring hand of an overwrought fancy, and like a need done in a dream, the difficult steps are afterward but faintly remembered. It is wonderful how the mind accumulates by unconscious observation—how the taint of a cloud, or the expression of an eye, or the betrayal of character by a word, will lie for years forgotten in the memory till it is brought out by some searching thought to its owner's wonder.

FROST.—It is winter—veritable winter—with bona-fide frost, and cramping cold, and a sun as clear and powerless as moonlight. The windows glitter with the most fantastic frost-work. Cities, with their spires and turrets, ranks of spears, files of horsemen—every gorgeous and brilliant array told of in romance or song, start out of that mass of silvery tracery, like the processions of a magic mirror. What a miraculous beauty there is in frost! What fine work in its radiant crystals! What mystery in its exact proportions and its manifold varieties! The feathery snow-flake, the delicate rime, the transparent and sheeted ice, the magnificent ice-berg moving down the sea like a mountain of light—how beautiful are they all, and how wonderful is it, that, break and scatter them as you will, you find under every form the same faultless angles, the same crystalline and sparkling radiation. It sometimes grows suddenly cold at noon. There has been a heavy mist all the morning, and as the north wind comes sharply in, the air clears and leaves it frozen upon everything, with the thinness of palpable air. The trees are clothed with a fine white vapor, as if a cloud had been arrested and fixed motionless in the branches. They look, in the twilight, like gigantic spirits, standing in broad ranks, and clothed in drapery of supernatural whiteness and texture. On close examination, the crystals are as fine as needles, and standing in perfect parallelism, pointing in the direction of the wind. They are like fringes of the most minute threads, edging every twig and filament of the tree, so that the branches are thickened by them, and have a shadowy and mysterious look, as if a spirit foliage had started out from the naked limbs. It is not so brilliant as the common rime seen upon the trees after a frozen rain, but it is infinitely more delicate and spiritual, and to me seems a phenomenon of exquisite novelty and beauty.

THE CLOSING YEAR.—It is a melancholy task to reckon with the departed year. To trace back the curious threads of affection through its many-colored woof, and knot anew its broken places—to number the missing objects of interest, the dead and the neglected—to sum up the broken resolutions, the deferred hopes, the dissolved phantoms of anticipation, and the many wanderings from the leading star of duty—this is indeed a melancholy task, but, withal, a profitable, and, it may sometimes be, a pleasant and a soothing one. It is wonderful in what short courses the objects of this world move. They are like arrows feebly shot. A year—a brief year, is full of things dwindled and finished and forgotten. Nothing keeps evenly on. What is there in the running calendar of the year that has departed, which has kept its place and its magnitude? Here and there an aspirant for fame still stretches after his eluding shadow—here and there an enthusiast still clings to his golden dream—here and there (and alas! how rarely) a friend keeps his truth, and a lover his fervor—but how many more, that were as ambitious, as enthusiastic, as loving as these, when this year began, are now sluggish, and cold, and false? You may keep a record of life, and as surely as it is human, it will be a fragmented and disjointed history, crowded with unaccountableness and change. There is nothing constant. The links of life are for ever breaking, but we rush on still. A fellow-traveller drops from our side into the grave—a guiding star of hope vanishes from the sky—a creature of our affections, a child or an idol, is snatched from us—perhaps nothing with which we began the race is left to us, and yet we do not halt. “Onward—still onward” is the eternal cry, and as the past recedes, the broken ties are forgotten, and the present and future occupy us alone.

There are better chapters in the past, however. If our lot is capricious and broken, it is also new and various. One friend has grown cool, but we have won another. One chance was less fortunate than we expected, but another was better. We have encountered one man's prejudices, but, in so doing, we have unexpectedly flattered the partialities of his neighbor. We have neglected a recorded duty, but a deed of charity done upon impulse, has brought up the balance. In an equable temper of mind, memory, to a man of ordinary goodness of heart, is pleasant company. A careless rhymist, whose heart is better than his head, says—

“I would not escape from memory's land,
For all the eye can view;
For there's dearer still in memory's land,
Than the ore of rich Peru.
I clasp the fetter by memory twined,
The wanderer's heart and soul to bind.”

It was a good thought suggested by an ingenious friend of mine, to make one's will annually, and remember all whom we love in it in the degree of their deservings. I have acted upon the hint since, and truly it is keeping a calendar of one's life. I have little to bequeath, indeed—a manuscript or two, some half dozen pictures, and a score or two of much-thumbed and choice authors—but, slight as these poor mementoes are, it is pleasant to rate their difference, and write against them the names of our friends, as we should wish them left if we knew we were presently to die. It would be a satisfying thought in sickness, that one's friends would have a memorial to suggest us when we were gone—that they would know we wished to be remembered by them, and remembered them among the first. And it is pleasant, too, while alive, to change the order of appropriation with the ever-varying evidences of affection. It is a relief to vexation and mortified pride to erase the name of one unworthy or false, and it is delightful, as another gets nearer to your heart, with the gradual and sure test of intimacy, to prefer him in your secret register.

If I should live to be old, I doubt not it will be a pleasant thing to look over these little testaments. It is difficult, now, with their kind offices and pleasant faces ever about one, to realize the changes of feeling between the first and the last—more difficult still to imagine, against any of those familiar names, the significant asterisk which marks the dead—yet if the common chances of human truth, and the still more desperate changes of human life, continue—it is melancholy to think what a miracle it would be if even half this list, brief and youthful as it is, should be, twenty years hence, living and unchanged.

The festivities of this part of the year always seemed to me mistimed and revolting. I know not what color the reflections of others take, but to me it is simply the feeling of escape—the released breath of fear after a period of suspense and danger. Accident, misery, death, have been about us in their invisible shapes, and while one is tortured with pain, and another reduced to wretchedness, and another struck into the grave beside us, we know not why or how, we are still living and prosperous. It is next to a miracle that we are so. We have been on the edge of chasms continually. Our feet have tottered, our bosoms have been grazed by the thick shafts of disease—had our eyes been spirit-keen we should have been dumb with fear at our peril. If every tenth sunbeam were a deadly arrow—if the earth were full of invisible abysses—if poisons were sown thickly in the air, life would hardly be more insecure. We can stand upon our threshold and see it. The vigorous are stricken down by an invisible hand—the active and busy suddenly disappear—death is caught in the breath of the night wind, in the dropping of the dew. There is no place or moment in which that horrible phantom is not gliding among us. It is natural at each period of escape to rejoice fervently and from the heart; but I know not, if others look upon death with the same irrepressible horror that I do, how their joy can be so thoughtlessly trifling. It seems to me, matter for deep, and almost fearful congratulation. It should be expressed in religious places and with the solemn voice of worship; and when the period has thus been marked, it should be speedily forgotten lest its cloud become depressing. I am an advocate for all the gaiety that the spirits will bear. I would reserve no particle of the treasure of happiness. The world is dull enough at the best. But do not mistake its temper. Do not press into the service of gay pleasure the thrilling solemnities of life. I think anything which reminds me of death, solemn; any time, when our escape from it is thrust irresistibly upon the mind, a solemn time; and such is the season of the new year. It should be occupied by serious thoughts. It is the time to reckon with one's heart—to renew and form resolutions—to forgive and reconcile and redeem.

MIDNIGHT.—The bell struck as the word was written! Twelve—and how many-toned in the human ear are the measured strokes that have proclaimed it. The well and contemplative, the sick and restless, the reveller hailing it as the empress of the hours, and the patient and solemn watcher by the dead, counting it on his vigil, and shuddering at the dreadful silence it makes audible—sleepless ambition starting from its waking dream, and sleeping guilt blessedly aroused from its nightmare of detection—with what a different voice and meaning do the tremulous and lengthened cadences of that same bell fall upon the different ears that listen to them! Yet it is so with everything about us—and the boldest and best lesson of philosophy is that which teaches us that outward circumstances have no color of their own—that the universe is within us—that the eye sees no light or shadow, and the ear hears no music or jar, and the senses receive no impression of pain or pleasure, but as the inward eye is light or shaded, the inward ear attuned or discordant, and the inward sense painful or pleasurable. It is a glorious creed—for by it, he who governs his own soul holds the key of the universe. Its colors are put on at his bidding, its music wakes at his desire, and its magnificent changes, arbitrary and omnipotent as they seem, take form and pressure from the small, still thought in his bosom! Yet how difficult it is! How true, that “he who ruleth his own spirit is greater than he that taketh a city.” To put down at will the manifold spectres of thought—to suppress fear and discouragement, and sadness that comes up uncalled—to lay a finger on the lip of complaint, and seal up a tear in its cell, and press down, with a stern fetter, the ungovernable nerve of unrest—to “lay commandment” on a throbbing pulse, and break the wings of a too earnest imagination, and smother, in their first rising, the thousand impatient feelings that come out of time and season—this it is that the anchorite in his cell, and the master spirit in his career, and the student, wasting over his lamp, may pray, and wrestle, and search into many mysteries for—in vain!

In my days of idleness (a habit, by-the-by, which should be put down as a nervous complaint in the books) I occupied, for some nine hours in the day, a window opposite a city-clock. It was a tolerable amusement, between breakfast and recitation, to watch the passing of the hours, "hand over hand." I thought then, as I think now, that the great deficiency in the construction of the human mind, is the want of something on the principle of the stop-watch, to suspend its operations at will—but it is no slight relief, since I must think, to have a dial-plate, or a nail in the wall, or any object that it is no trouble to see, to serve as a nucleus to thought. By-and-by, with the force of habit, the dial became necessary. I could not think tranquilly without it. My pulses beat sixty in the minute. My imagination built by the hour—nine—ten—twelve castles a day, as the lectures interfered more or less with my repose.

In the course of time, I fell into the habit of musing on the circumstances dependant on the arrival of the hours, and as my mood happened to be gay or gloomy, I pondered, with the strong sympathy of unoccupied feelings, on the happiness or misery they brought. If it was a bright sunny forenoon in May, and the eggs had been well boiled at breakfast, the striking of the clock—say twelve—stirred a thousand images of pleasure. The boys just leaping out of school, the laborer released from his toil, the belle stepping forth for a promenade, the patient in the interval of his fever—all came up in my imagination, and their several feelings, with all the heightening of imagination, became my own. If the weather was hot, on the contrary, or the professor had bored me at lecture, or if my claret was pricked at dinner, I suffered the miseries of an hospital. There goes the clock—say four! Some poor fellow now, at this very moment, is baring his limb to the surgeon—the afternoon is at the hottest, and the sick are getting restless and weary—some hectic consumptive, fallen, perhaps, into a chance sleep, is waked, by the troublesome punctuality of his nurse, to take his potion—it is the hour the dying man is told he can not survive. Every misery imaginable under the sun rose in phantoms around me, and I suffered and groaned under the concentrated horrors of them all. It serves to show how the mind is its own slave or its own master. And so, having arrived at the moral, with your leave, dear reader, for it is "past one," I will to bed. Good night!

Snow.—The black, unsightly pavement, every stone of which you know with as cursed a particularity as the chinks in the back of your fireplace, covered with white. The heavy-wheeled carts, which the day before shook the ground under you, and split your ears with their merciless noise, replaced by sleds with musical bells, driven swiftly and skilfully past. The smoked houses, with their provokingly-regular windows and mean doors, that have disturbed the sentiment of grace in your fancy every walk you have taken for months, all laden, and tipped, and frosted into lines and surfaces of beauty; faultless icicles hanging from the eaves of the shutters, and sparkling crystals of snow edging every projecting stone—magic could not exceed it! If the horn of Astolpho had been blown from the cupola of the state-house, and the whole city had run mad, things could not have looked more strangely new and delightful.

And the sleighing—other people like it, and for their sake I blessed Providence for another item. I like it myself—for the first mile. But with the loss of sensation in our feet and hands, I have a trick of growing very unhappy. I am content, after one ride, with seeing a sleigh through a parlor-window.

Eight o'clock—how merrily the sleigh-bells ring to-night! One comes into hearing as another is lost, and the loud, laughing, and merry voices of the gay riders come up to my retired room in the veriest contrast to my own quiet occupation. How more than solitude it separates one from humanity, to live in the midst of the gay world and take no part in its enjoyments! An eremite in the crowd is the only contented solitary. In the midst of the heaviest sadness the heart feels in this wretched world, the form of distant pleasure is beautiful. We must live near that treacherous dame to know how sorrows lurk in her shadow. Break down the imagination as you will, and bind it by the most relentless memories to your sick heart, it will steal away to scenes you had thought forgotten, and come back fired with their false beauty, to tempt you to try their winning flatteries once more. It is only by knowing that you can call gaily at any moment to your side, that you can quite forget it; and the studious tenant of a garret, to whose solitude the mingled murmur of a city comes constantly up—who can abandon his books whenever the fancy takes him, for the crowd, and enter and throng on with it after its fleeting lure—is the only man who, with youth and the common gifts of Providence, can heartily despise it.

And he—if contrast is (as you will deny that has followed after the impossible spirit of contentment, till hope is dead within him)—if contrast is, I say, the only bliss in life—then does he, the scholar in the crowd, live with a most excellent wisdom. He is roused from communion with a spirit whose immortal greatness has outlived twenty generations, by the passing mirth of a fool whose best deed will not live in the world's memory an hour. He sits and pores upon an eternal truth, or fires his fancy with heavenly poetry, or winds about him the enchantments of truth-woven fiction, or searches the depths of his own sufficient heart for the sublime wisdom of human nature, and from the very midst he is plucked back to this every-day world, and compelled to the use of faculties in which a brute animal equals or surpasses him! One moment following the employment of an angel, the next contending with meanness and cunning for his daily bread—now kindled to rapture with some new form of beauty, and now disgusted to loathing with some new-developed and unredeemable baseness in his fellow-men. What contrast is there like this? Who knows so well as a scholar the true sweetness of surprise? the delightful and only spice of this otherwise contemptible life—novel sensation?

CHANGE.—How natural it is, like the host in the rhyme, to "Welcome the coming, speed the parting guest!"

How true a similitude it is of every change, not only of time and season, but of feeling and fancy. I have just walked from the window where I stood looking upon the two elms that have refreshed my eye with their lively verdure the summer long, and the adventurous vine, overtopping our neighbor's chimneys, that was covered but a week ago with masses of splendid crimson and scarlet, and with the irresistible regret I feel always at the decay of nature powerful within me, I have seated myself at the fire, with a gladness in the supplanting pleasures of winter, that brings with it, not only a consolation for the loss, but an immediate forgetfulness of the past. "Nothing," says Goethe, "is more delightful than to feel a new passion rising when the flame that burned before is not quite extinguished, as, when the sun sets, we turn with pleasure to the rising moon." Who would give a fig for friendship! Who would waste golden hours in winning regard! Who, with this lesson before him, would do aught but look well to his reckoning with heaven, and turn in upon his own soul what time and talents are left to him after! It is a bitter philosophy to learn. The outward world is my first love, and, with all my disappointment, it is difficult at first to set up a new altar for the inner. I would not be ascetic; neither would I be so happy that, like Poly-crates, I must throw my ring into the sea that I may have something to lament; but I believe he has the true savoir vivre, who, believing fully in the world's unprofitableness, is willing to be amused by it, and who, conversant with its paths and people, has better places and friends (solitude and his books) to which he can enter and shut the door to be at peace.

WINTER TRIP TO NAHANT.—The old chronicler, Time, strides on over the holyday seasons as if nothing could make him loiter. It may be a hallucination, but a winter's day, spite of the calendar, is as long to me as two summer ones. I do not feel the scene pass. There is no measure kept on my senses by its evenly-told pulse. The damp morning, and the silent noon, and the golden twilight, come and go; and if I breathe the freshness of the one, and sleep under the repose of the other, and gaze upon the beauties of the third, why, the end of existence seems answered. Labor is not in harmony with it. The thought that disturbs a nerve is an intrusion. Life's rapid torrent loiters in a pool, and its bubbles all break and are forgotten. Indolence is the mother of philosophy, and I "let the world slide." I think with Rousseau, that "the best book does but little good to the world, and much harm to the author." I remember Colton's three difficulties of authorship, and Pelham's flattering unction to idleness, that "learning is the bane of a poet." The "mossy cell of peace," with its "Dreams that move before the half-shut eye,

And its gay castles in the clouds that pass,"

is a very Eden; and, of all the flowers of the field, that which has the most meaning is your lily that "toils not, neither does it spin;" and of all the herbs of the valley, the

"Yellow lysimacha that gives sweet rest," has the most medicinal balm. I am of the school of Epicurus. I no longer think the "judicious voluptuousness" of Godwin dangerous. Like the witch of Atlas, I could "pitch my tent upon the plain of the calm Mere," and rise and fall for ever to its indolent swell. And speaking of idleness (I admire Mochingo's talent for digression—"Now thou speakest of immortality, how is thy wife, Andrew?")—one of the pleasantest ways of indulging that cardinal virtue used to be by an excursion to Nahant. Establishing myself unostentatiously upon the windward quarter of the boat, to avoid the vile volatile oils from the machinery—Shelley in one hand, perhaps, or Elia, or quaint Burton—(English editions, redolent in Russia, and printed as with types of silver)—with one of these, I say, to refresh the eye and keep the philosophic vein breathing freely, the panorama of the bay passes silently before my eye—island after island, sail after sail, like the conjurations of a magic mirror. And this is all quiet, let me tell you—all in harmony with the Socratic humor—for the reputable steamer Ous-tonic (it distresses me daily that it was not spelt with an H) is none of your fifteen-milers—none of your high-pressure cut-waters, driving you through the air, breathless with its unbecoming velocity, and with the fear of the boiler before your eyes—but with a dignified moderation, consistent with a rational doubt of the integrity of a copper-kettle, and a natural abhorrence of hot water, she glides safely and softly over her half-dozen miles an hour, and lands you, cool and good-humored, upon the rocky peninsula, for a consideration too trifling to be mentioned in a well-bred period. And then if the fates will me an agreeable companion (I wish we had time to describe my beau-ideal), how delightful, as Apple Island is neared, with its sweep of green banks and its magnificent elms—every foot of its tiny territory green and beautiful—how delightful to speculate upon the character of its eccentric occupant, and repeat the thousand stories told of him, and peer about his solitary cottage to catch a glimpse of his erect figure, and draw fanciful portraits of his daughter, who, the world says, for the sixteen years of her sweet life, has had only the range of those limited lawns, which she may ramble over in an hour—and, as the boat glides by, to watch the fairy isle sleeping, if the bay is calm, with its definite shadow, and looking like a sphere, floating past in the air, covered with luxuriant verdure. It is but a brief twelve miles from Boston to Nahant, and the last four stretch out beyond the chain of islands, upon the open sea. To a city-bred eye and fancy there is a refreshing novelty, added to the expanding influence of so broad a scene, which has in it a vigorous and delightful stimulus. The mind gets out of its old track. The back-ground of the mental picture is changed, and it affects the whole. The illimitable sky and water draw out the imagination to its remotest link, and the far apart and shining sails, each covering its little and peculiar world, and sped with the thousand hopes of those for whom its lonely adventurers are tracking the uncertain sea, win on the mind to follow them upon their perilous way, and breathe for them the "God speed" of unconscious interest. It is a beautiful and magic sight to see them gliding past each other on their different courses, impelled by the same invisible wind, now dark with shadow, and now turning full to the light, and specking the horizon, like the white birds careering along the edge of its definite line. The sea grows upon you as you see it more. The disappointment felt at first in its extent wears away, as you remember its vast stretch under those blue depths, which your eye can not search; and the waste of its "untrampled floor," and the different depths at which the different spoils of the sunk ships have balanced and hung, and the innumerable tribes who range their own various regions of pressure, from the darkest caverns to the thin and lighted chambers at its surface, all come step by step upon the mind, and crowd it with a world of wondering speculation. It is delightful to sit with the agreeable companion spoken of, and with the green waves heaving about us, to indulge in these wayward and unprofitable imaginations. It is a splendid range for a wild-winged thought—that measureless sea! I love to talk of its strange mysteries. I love to go down with one who will not check me with cold objections, and number and shape out its inhabitants. With such a fellow-wanderer, I have found palaces that surpass Aladdin's, and beings to whom the upper and uncondensed water has a suffocating thinness. But these are idle speculations to the world's eye, gentle reader, and should be reserved for your private ear. We will go, some summer afternoon, and talk them over together on the deck of that same deliberate steamer. You have no idea how many things are untold of the deep sea—how many dreams of it an idler man than yourself will weave out of its green depths in his after-dinner musings.

SIR PHILIP SIDNEY.—“Gentle Sir Philip Sidney,” says Tom Nash, in two sweetly-flowing sentences of his Pierce Penniless, “thou knewest what belonged to a scholar; thou knewest what pains, what toil, what travel, conduct to perfection; well couldst thou give every virtue his encouragement, every art his due, every writer his desert, ‘cause none more virtuous, witty, or learned, than thyself. But thou art dead in thy grave, and hast left too few successors of thy glory; too few to cherish the sons of the muses, or water those budding hopes with their plenty, which thy bounty erst planted.”—“He was not only of an excellent wit,” relates, in his own confused and rambling way, the eminent antiquarian John Aubrey, who was born not more than forty years after Sidney’s decease, “but extremely beautiful; he much resembled his sister, but his hair was not red, but a little inclining, viz., a dark amber color. If I were to find fault in it, methinks it is not masculine enough; yet he was a person of great courage.” “He was, if ever there was one,” says another writer, “a gentleman finished and complete, in whom mildness was associated with courage, erudition mollified by refinement, and courtliness dignified by truth. England will ever place him among the noblest of her sons; and the light of chivalry, which was his guide and beacon, will ever lend its radiance to illumine his memory. He died at the age of thirty-two, and if the lives of Milton and Dryden had not been prolonged beyond that period, where would have been their renown?”

Glorious Sidney! It stirs the blood warmly about one’s heart to think of him. It is somewhat late in the day, I know, to eulogize him; but his bright honor and his beautiful career, are among my earliest historical recollections, and I have remembered it since with the passionate interest that in every one’s mind burns in, with an enamel of love, some one of the bright images presented in boyhood. You have some such idol of fancy, I dare answer for it, reader of mine—some young (for young he must be, or affection stiffens into respect)—some young and famous, and withal courtly, and perhaps “beautiful,” winner of a name. It is Gaston de Foix, perhaps, with his fierce thirst for glory (the pictures of him by the old masters are models of manly beauty), or the fourth Henry, with his temper of romance (the handsomest man in his kingdom), or (if you loved your classics) Alcibiades (you forget, of course, that he was a voluptuary), or the generous Antony (“Shakspeare’s” rather than the historian’s), or Hylas, or Endymion, or Phæton (he cleared the first few planets in fine style), or some other formosus puer adored and sung by the glorious old bards upon the shores of Tiber or Ilissus. He rises to your mind as I mention it—a figure of graceful youth, the slight and elegant proportions of the boy, just ripening into the muscular fulness of manhood—his neck rising with a free majesty from his shoulders, and his eye kindling with some passing thought of glory, answered by the proud and deliberate curving of his lip, and the animated expansion of his nostril. You see him with your mind’s eye—the classic model and classic dream of your scholar-days, when the sound of the leaves in the tree over you had the swell of an hexameter in your ear, and your thoughts came in Latin, and a line of Homer sprung to your lips in your involuntary soliloquies. Ah! those were days for dreams! Who would not let slip the straining grasp of manhood—be it at wealth, fame, power—anything for which he is flinging his youth and gladness, and all his best treasures, behind him—to be once more the careless dreamer that he was—to lie once more upon a hill-side, and forget everything in the unquestioned and unshadowed blessedness of a boy!

DEATH-LOVE AND WARNING.—It was getting toward midnight when a party of young noblemen came out from one of the clubs of St. James street. The servant of each, as he stepped upon the pavement, threw up the wooden apron of the cabriolet, and sprang to the head of the horse; but, as to the destination of the equipages for the evening, there seemed to be some dissensions among the noble masters. Between the line of coroneted vehicles, stood a hackney-coach, and a person in an attitude of expectancy pressed as near the exhilarated group as he could without exciting immediate attention.

“Which way?” said he whose vehicle was nearest, standing with his foot on the step.

“All together, of course,” said another. “Let’s make a night of it.”

“Pardon me,” said the clear and sweet voice of the last out from the club; “I secede for one. Go your ways, gentlemen!”

“Now, what the dense is afoot?” said the foremost, again stepping back on the sidewalk. “Don’t let him off, Fitz! Is your cab here, Byron, or will you let me drive you? By Jove, you sha’n’t leave us!”

“But you shall leave me, and so you are not sworn, my friend! In plain phrase, I won’t go with you! And I don’t know where I shall go; so spare your curiosity the trouble of asking. I have a presentiment that I am wanted—by devil or angel—

“I see a hand you can not see.”

“And a very pretty hand it is, I dare swear,” said the former speaker, jumping into his cab and starting off with a spring of his blood horse, followed by all the vehicles at the club-door, save one.

Byron stood looking after them a moment, and raised his hat and pressed his hand hard on his forehead. The unknown person who had been lurking near, seemed willing to leave him for a moment to his thoughts, or was embarrassed at approaching a stranger. As Byron turned with his halting step to descend the steps, however, he came suddenly to his side.

“My lord!” he said, and was silent, as if waiting for permission to go on.

“Well,” replied Byron, turning to him without the least surprise, and looking closely into his face by the light of the street-lamp.

“I come to you with an errand which perhaps—”

“A strange one, I am sure; but I am prepared for it—I have been forewarned of it. What do you require of me? for I am ready!”

“This is strange!” exclaimed the man.—“Has another messenger, then—”

“None except a spirit—for my heart alone told me I should be wanted at this hour. Speak at once.”

“My lord, a dying girl has sent for you!”

“Do I know her?”

“She has never seen you. Will you come at once—and on the way I will explain to you what I can of this singular errand; though, indeed, when it is told you, you know all that I comprehend.”

They were at the door of the hackney-coach, and Byron entered it without further remark.

“Back again!” said the stranger, as the coachman closed the door, “and drive for dear life, for we shall scarce be in time, I fear!”

The heavy tongue of St. Paul’s church struck twelve as the rolling vehicle hurried on through the now lonely street, and though so far from the place whence they started, neither of the two occupants had spoken. Byron sat with bare head and folded arms in the corner of the coach; and the stranger, with his hat crowded over his eyes, seemed repressing some violet emotion; and it was only when they stopped before a low door in a street close upon the river, that the latter found utterance.

"Is she alive?" he hurriedly asked of a woman who came out at the sound of the carriage-wheels.

"She was—a moment since—but he quick!"

Byron followed quickly on the heels of his companion, and passing through a dimly lighted entry to the door of a back-room, they entered. A lamp, shaded by a curtain of spotless purity, threw a faint light upon a bed, upon which lay a girl, watched by a physician and a nurse. The physician had just removed a small mirror from her lips, and holding it to the light, he whispered that she still breathed. As Byron passed the edge of the curtain, however, the dying girl moved the fingers of the hand lying on the coverlet, and slowly opened on him her languid eyes—eyes of inexpressible depth and lustre. No one had spoken.

"Here he is," she murmured. "Raise me, mother, while I have time to speak to him."

Byron looked around the small chamber, trying in vain to break the spell of awe which the scene threw over him. An apparition from the other world could not have checked more fearfully and completely the worldly and scornful under-current of his nature. He stood with his heart beating almost audibly, and his knees trembled beneath him, awaiting what he prophetically felt to be a warning from the very gate of heaven.

Propped with pillows, and left by her attendants, the dying girl turned her head toward the proud, noble poet, standing by her bedside, and a slight blush overspread her features, while a smile of angelic beauty stole through her lips. In that smile the face reawakened to its former loveliness, and seldom had he who now gazed breathlessly upon her, looked on such spiritual and incomparable beauty. The spacious forehead and noble contour, still visible, of the emaciated lips, bespoke genius impressed upon a tablet all feminine in its language; and in the motion of her hand, and even in the slight movement of her graceful neck, there was something that still breathed of surpassing elegance. It was the shadowy wreck of no ordinary mortal passing away—humble as were the surroundings, and strange as had been his summons to her bedside.

"And this is Byron?" she said at last, in a voice bewilderingly sweet even through its weakness. "My lord! I could not die without seeing you—without relieving my soul of a mission with which it has long been burthened. Come nearer—for I have no time left for ceremony, and I must say what I have to say—and die! Beautiful," she said, "beautiful as the dream of him which has so long haunted me! the intellect and the person of a spirit of light! Pardon me, my lord, that, at a moment so important to yourself, the remembrance of an earthly feeling has been betrayed into expression."

She paused a moment, and the bright color that had shot through her cheek and brow faded, and her countenance resumed its heavenly serenity.

"I am near enough to death," she resumed—"near enough to point you almost to heaven from where I am; and it is on my heart like the one errand of my life—like the bidding of God—to implore you to prepare for judgment. Oh, my lord! with your glorious powers, with your wondrous gifts, be not lost! Do not, for the poor pleasures of a world like this, lose an eternity in which your great mind will outstrip the intelligence of angels. Measure this thought—scan the worth of angelic bliss with the intellect which has ranged so gloriously through the universe; do not, on this one momentous subject of human interest—on this alone be not short-sighted!"

"What shall I do?" suddenly burst from Byron's lips in a tone of agony. But with an effort, as if struggling with a death-pang, he again drew up his form and resumed the marble calmness of his countenance.

The dying girl, meantime, seemed to have lost herself in prayer. With her wasted hands clasped on her bosom, and her eyes turned upward, the slight motion of her lips betrayed to those around her that she was pleading at the throne of mercy. The physician crept close to her bedside, but with his hand in his breast, and his head bowed, he seemed but watching for the moment when the soul should take its flight.

She suddenly raised herself on the pillow. Her long brown tresses fell over her shoulders, and a brightness unnatural and almost fearful kindled in her eyes. She seemed endeavoring to speak, and gazed steadfastly at Byron. Slowly, then, and tranquilly she sank back again upon her pillow, and as her hands fell apart, and her eyelids dropped, she murmured, "Come to Heaven!" and the stillness of death was in the room. The spirit had fled.

The breaking of the silver cord is the first tone from the life-strings of genius, which is answered only in vibrations of affection. This truth, indeed, is touchingly shadowed forth in the accompaniments of death. The dark colors in the drapery of life, are dropped in the weaving of the shroud. The discords of music are rejected in the melody of the dirge. The praise upon the marble is the first tribute written without disparagement, and the first suffered without dissent. It is this new relation of the public to a great name—that this completed and lucent phase of a light in literature—which seems to make a posthumous recast of criticism one of the legitimate departments of a review. Like the public feeling, the condition and powers of criticism toward an author's fame, are essentially changed by his death. His personal character, and the events of his life—the foreground, so to speak, in the picture of his mind, are, till this event, wanting to the critical perspective; and when the hand to correct is cold, and the ear to be caressed and wounded is sealed, some of the uses of censure, and all reserve in comparison and final estimate, are done way.

It is time for the reviews to take up, on this ground, the character and writings of Hillhouse. The author of Hadad, the most finished and lofty poem of its time, should have been followed, within a year after his death, by a new and reverential appreciation, and living, as he did, in a learned and literary circle of friends, a biography, at least, was looked for, out of which criticism might shape a fresh monument to his genius. Such men as Hillhouse are not common, even in these days of universal authorship. In accomplishment of mind and person, he was probably second to no man. His poems show the first. They are fully conceived, nicely balanced, exquisitely finished—works for the highest taste to relish, and for the severest student in dramatic style to erect into a model. Hadad was published in 1825, during my second year in college, and to me it was the opening of a new heaven of imagination. The leading characters possessed me for months, and the bright, clear, harmonious language was, for a long time, constantly in my ears. The author was pointed out to me, soon after, and for once, I saw a poet whose mind was well imaged in his person. In no part of the world have I seen a man of more distinguished mien, or of a more inborn dignity and elegance of address. His person was very finely proportioned, his carriage chivalric and high-bred, and his countenance purely and brightly intellectual. Add to this a sweet voice, a stamp of high courtesy on everything he uttered, and singular simplicity and taste in dress, and you have the portrait of one who, in other days, would have been the mirror of chivalry, and the flower of nobles and troubadours. Hillhouse was no less distinguished in oratory. There was still remembered, at the time of the publication of Hadad, an oration pronounced by him at the taking of his second degree—an oration upon "the Education of a Poet," gloriously written, and most eloquently delivered. His poem of "the Judgement," delivered before the "Phi Beta Kappa Society," added in the same way to his renown, as did a subsequent noble effort of eloquence, to which I listened myself, with irresistible enchantment.

Hillhouse had fallen upon days of thrift, and many years of his life which he should have passed either in his study, or in the councils of the nation, were enslaved to the drudgery of business. His constitution seemed to promise him a vigorous manhood, however, and an old age of undiminished fire, and when he left his mercantile pursuits, and retired to the beautiful and poetic home of "Sachem's Wood," his friends looked upon it as the commencement of a ripe and long enduring career of literature. In harmony with such a life were all his surroundings—scenery, society, domestic refinement, and companionship—and never looked promise fairer for the realization of a dream of glory. That he had laid out something of such a field in the future, I chance to know, for, though my acquaintance with him was slight, he confided to me in a casual conversation, the plan of a series of dramas, different from all he had attempted, upon which he designed to work with the first mood and leisure he could command. And with his high scholarship, knowledge of life, taste and genius, what might not have been expected from its fulfilment? But his hand is cold, and his lips still, and his light, just rising to its meridian, is lost now to the world. Love and honor to the memory of such a man.

BACHELOR BOB'S DISCOVERIES.

"Sad were the lays of merry days,
And sweet the songs of sadness."

"Come!" said Bachelor Bob, as he hitched his chair closer to the table, "quite alone, half past twelve, and two tumblers of toddy for heart-openers, what say you to a little friendly inquisition into your mortal felicity? You were the gayest man of my acquaintance ten years ago; you are the gravest now! Yet you swear by your Lares and Penates, that (up to the lips as you are in care and trouble) you never were so happy as in these latter days. Do you swear this to me from a 'way you have' of hanging out trap for the world, or are you under a little innocent delusion?"

Bob's hobby is the theory of happiness. Riches and poverty, matrimony and celibacy, youth and age, are subjects of contemplation to Bob, solely with reference to their comparative capacity for bliss. He speculates and talks about little else, indeed, and his intercourse with his friends seems to have no other end or aim than to collect evidence as to their happiness and its causes. On this occasion he was addressing a friend of mine, Smith, who had been a gay man in his youth (a merry man, truth to say, for he was in a perpetual breeze of high spirits), but who had married, and fallen behindhand in his worldly affairs, and so grown careworn and thoughtful. Smith was rather a poet in a quiet way, though he only used poetry as a sort of longer plummet when his heart got off soundings. I am indebted to Bob for the specimens of his verse-making which I am about to give, as well as for the conversation which brought them to light.

"Why," said Smith, "you have stated a dilemma with two such inevitable horns that argument would scarcely help me out of it. Let me see, what proof can I give you that I am a happier man than I used to be, spite of my chapfallen visage?"

Smith mused a moment, and reaching over to a desk near his elbow, drew from its private drawer a book with locked covers. It was a well-filled manuscript volume, and seemed a collection of prose and verse intermixed. The last page was still covered with blotting-paper, and seemed recently written.

"I am no poet," said Smith, coloring slightly, "but it has been a habit of mine, ever since my calow days, to record in verse all feelings that were too warm for prose; sometimes in the fashion of a soliloquy (scripta verba), sometimes in verses to the dame or damsel to whom I was indebted for my ignition. Let me see, Bob! we met in Florence, I think?"

"For the first time abroad, yes!"

"Well, perhaps that was my gayest time; certainly I do not remember to have been anywhere more gay or reckless. Florence, 1832, um—here are some lines written that summer: do you remember the beautiful Irish widow you saw at one of the casino balls? addressed to her, flirt that she was! But she began all her flirtations with talking of her sorrows, and, if she tried you on, at all—"

"She didn't!" interrupted Bob.

"Well, if she had you would have been humbugged with her tender melancholy, as I was. Here are the verses, and if ever I 'turned out my lining to the moon,' they are true to my inner soul in those days of frolic. Read these, and then turn to the last page and you will find as true a daguerreotype of the inner light of my moping days, written only yesterday."

'Tis late—San Marc is beating three
As I look forth upon the night;
The stars are shining tranquilly,
And heaven is full of silver light;
The air blows freshly on my brow—
Yet why should I be waking now!

I've listened, lady, to thy tone,
Till in my ear it will not die;
I've felt for sorrows not my own,
Till now I can not put them by;
And those sad words and thoughts of thine
Have breathed their sadness into mine.

'Tis long—though reckoned not by years—
Since, with affections chilled and shocked,
I dried a boy's impassioned tears,
And from the world my feelings locked—
The work of but one bitter day,
In which were crowded years of pain;
And then I was as gay, again,
And thought that I should be for aye!
The world lay open wide and bright,
And I became its lightest minion,
And flew the wordling's giddy height
With reckless and impetuous pinion—
Life's tide, with me, had turned from shore
Ere yet my summers told a score.

And years have passed, and I have scemed
Happy to every eye but thine,
And they whom most I loved have deemed
There was no lighter heart than mine;
And, save when some wild passion-tone
Of music reached the sleeping nerve,
Or when in illness and alone
My spirit from its bent would swerve,
My heart was light, my thoughts were free,
I was the thing I seemed to be.

I came to this bright land, and here,
Where I had thought to nerve my wings
To soar to a more lofty sphere,
And train myself for sterner things—
The land where I had thought to find
No spell but beauty breathed in stone—

To learn idolatries of mind,
 And leave the heart to slumber on—
 Here find I one whose voice awakes
 The sad, dumb angel of my breast,
 And, as the long, long silence breaks
 Of a strong inward lip suppressed,
 It seems to me as if a madness
 Had been upon my brain away—
 As if 'twere phrensy to be gay,
 And life were only sweet in sadness !
 Words from my lips to-night have come
 That have for years been sealed and dumb.

It was but yesterday we met,
 We part to-morrow. I would fain
 With thy departing voice forget
 Its low, deep tone, and seal again
 My feelings from the light of day,
 To be to-morrow only gay !
 But days will pass, and nights will creep,
 And I shall hear that voice of sadness
 With dreams, as now, untouched by sleep,
 And spirits out of tune with gladness ;
 And time must wear, and fame spur on ;
 Before that victory is re-won !

And so farewell ! I would not be Forgotten by the only heart
 To which my own breathes calm and free,
 And let us not as strangers part !
 And we shall meet again, perhaps,
 More gayly than we're parting now ;
 For time has, in its briefest lapse,
 A something which clears up the brow,
 And makes the spirits calm and bright—
 And now to my sad dreams ! Good night !

"What a precious hypocrite you were for the merriest dog in Florence !" exclaimed Bob, as he laid the book open on its back, after reading these lines. "You feel that way ! credat Judæus ! But there are some other poetical lies here—what do you mean by 'we met but yesterday, and we part to-morrow,' when I know you dangled after that widow a whole season at the baths ?"

"Why," said Smith, with one of his old laughs, "there was a supplement to such an outpouring, of course. The reply to my verses was an invitation to join their party the next morning in a pilgrimage to Vallambrosa, and once attached to that lady's suite—va pour toujours ! or as long as she chose to keep you. Turn to the next page. Before coming to the verses of my more sober days, you may like to read one more flourish like the last. Those were addressed to the same belle dame, and under a continuance of the same hallucination."

Bob gravely read :—

My heart's a heavy one to-night,
 Dear Mary, thinking upon thee—
 I know not if my brain is right,
 But everything looks dark to me !
 I parted from thy side but now,
 I listened to thy mournful tone,
 I gazed by starlight on thy brow,
 And we were there unseen—alone—
 Yet proud as I should be, and blest,
 I can not set my heart at rest !

Thou lov'st me. Thanks, oh God, for this !
 If I should never sleep again—
 If hope is all a mock of bliss—
 I shall not now have lived in vain !
 I care not that my eyes are aching
 With this dull fever in my lids—
 I care not that my heart is breaking
 For happiness that Fate forbids—
 The one sweet word that thou hast spoken,
 The one sweet look I met and blessed,

Would cheer me if my heart were broken—
 Would put my wildest thoughts to rest !
 I know that I have pressed thy fingers
 Upon my warm lips unforbid—
 I know that in thy memory lingers
 A thought of me, like treasure hid—
 Though to my breast I may not press thee,
 Though I may never call thee mine,
 I know—and, God, I therefore bless thee !—
 No other fills that heart of thine !
 And this shall light my shadowed track !
 I take my words of sadness back !

"What had that flirting widow to do with the gentle name of Mary ?" exclaimed Bob, after laughing very heartily at the point blank take-in confessed in these very solemn verses. "Enough of love-melancholy, however, my dear Smith ! Let's have a look now at the poetical side of care and trouble. What do you call it ?"—

THE INVOLUNTARY PRAYER OF HAPPINESS.

I have enough, oh God ! My heart, to-night,
 Runs over with the fullness of content ;
 As I look out on the fragrant stars,
 And from the beauty of the night take in
 My priceless portion—yet myself no more
 Than in the universe a grain of sand—
 I feel His glory who could make a world,
 Yet, in the lost depths of the wilderness
 Leave not a flower imperfect !

Rich, though poor !

My low-roofed cottage is, this hour, a heaven !
 Music is in it—and the song she sings,
 That sweet-voiced wife of mine, arrests the ear
 Of my young child, awake upon her knee ;
 And, with his calm eye on his master's face,
 My noble hound lies couchant ; and all here—
 All in this little home, yet boundless heaven—
 Are, in such love as I have power to give,
 Blessed to overflowing !

Thou, who look'st

Upon my brimming heart this tranquil eve,
 Knowest its fullness, as thou dost the dew
 Sent to the hidden violet by Thee !
 And, as that flower from its unseen abode
 Sends its sweet breath up duly to the sky,
 Changing its gift to incense—so, oh God !
 May the sweet drops that to my humble cup
 Find their far way from Heaven, send back, in prayer,
 Fragrance at thy throne welcome !

Bob paused a moment after reading these lines.

"They seem in earnest," he said, "and I will sooner believe you were happy when you wrote these, than that you were sad when you wrote the others. But one thing I remark," added Bob, "the devout feeling in these lines written when you are happiest ; for it is commonly thought that tribulation and sadness give the first religious tinge to the imagination. Yours is but the happiness of Christian resignation, after all."

"On the contrary," said Smith, "nothing makes me so wicked as care and trouble. I always had, from childhood, a disposition to fall down on my knees and thank God for everything which made me happy, while sorrows of all descriptions stir up my antagonism, and make me feel rather like a devil than a Christian."

"In that case," said Bob, taking up his hat, "good night, and God prosper you ! And as to your happiness ?"

"Well, what is the secret of my happiness, think you ?"

"Matrimony," replied Bob.

LECTURE ON FASHION:

DELIVERED BEFORE THE NEW YORK LYCEUM,

I HAD thought—as is thought, perhaps, by many who are now before me—that the subject of fashion was one susceptible only of very light handling—to be treated with humor, anecdote, satire, and possibly some moralizing upon its whims and follies. I commenced the preparation of my lecture with scarce more design than this.

It was suggested, very sensibly, I thought, by one of the gentlemen who waited on me with the invitation to lecture, that the subjects were usually too dry;—that it would be worth while to start a new range of popular addresses—if not upon trifling topics, at least upon such, as, conveying information, would still bear embroidering with trifles.

The subject of fashion was instanced and approved. I thought I might easily entertain an audience with a history of the follies of fashion in different countries and times, and that in the hearer's keener appreciation of the absurdity of fashionable extremes, from seeing them in the ludicrous light of disuse and distance, might lie the utility of such a lecture. Those who are familiar with the literature of the sixteenth century will remember that the fashions were, at that day, the great target of pulpit eloquence—that, with a vein half humorous, though with violent denunciation, the clergy detailed the follies of fashion, and dwelt upon their sinfulness; and that more particularly in New England, in the Puritan days of Cotton Mather, this great Divine, and others, held forth on this subject with the very extremity of wrathful fervor.

A reference to the serious books and to the sermons of that period would sufficiently show, that, had I followed out my original intention, and taken the fashions themselves for the text and burthen of my lecture, I should not have lacked for grave precedent, nor for material and inference, worth the while of both speaker and hearer. The fashions are not my theme, however. Fashion is—and between fashion and the fashions you will at once comprehend the distinction. Of the importance of the subject, in the light in which I view it, you will be the judges when you have heard me to the end—but I may say, by way of bespeaking your favorable attention, that I am inclined to believe few topics—short of religion and constitutional law—to be, at this period of our country's history, of greater importance to us. Before entering upon this generalizing view, however, let me say a few words on the fashions, as to the degree with which they affect the standard of true taste—in this same degree, giving weight and color to fashion, in which taste and elegance are of course prominent features.

The origin of fashion would probably start even with the history of taste. The first hour of a community's existence—if created full grown, like the family of Deucalion and Pyrrha—would betray differences in the demeanor of men; and the most graceful and showy would probably be “the fashion," by acclamation. Taste is instinctive, and homage is paid irresistibly, by all human beings, to supremacy in elegance. The rise and progress of fashion up to its present condition, however, is not uniformly a history of taste. What are more contradictory than the caprices of fashion? There are certain standards of beauty, decided upon by the common instinct—standards which artists irresistibly follow, and which the eye invariably acknowledges true, and these standards are as often violated as adhered to, by the votaries of fashion. The ladies very well know, that, be their faces long or short—be their forms queenly or fairy-like,—there is but one inexorable size and shape for a fashionable bonnet; and, of course, if one style of beauty is favored, all others are unbecomingly marred. The male figure, it has been decided by centuries of progressive art, has its laws of beauty,—but in the fashions, of what age of civilized Europe have not these laws been violated.

Strange to say, and worth speculating on, if we had time for a digression, it is only in the semi-barbarous nations—in modern Greece and Turkey, and among the indolent and unthinking tribes of the Asiatics, that costume, once regulated by art, remains in unchangeable good taste—comfortable and convenient, as well as picturesque and becoming. But look at the fashions of Europe. Positively the most incredible true books with which I am acquainted are the amusing records of the fashions of the last two hundred years in England. White periwigs of enormous bulk, were, for instance, the fashion for ladies in the beginning of the seventeenth century. It is an accredited fact, that there died in London in 1756, a white-headed old woman of great age, whose hoary hair, cut off after her death, sold for fifty pounds to a ladies' perwig maker. Black patches on the faces of court beauties were the fashion in the same age, and hoops and high heels—utter destruction to grace of form and movement—were worn by all ladies with any pretension to quality. It is a rule of art that, in the male figure, the shoulders should be broad, for beauty, and the hips narrow, and it has been said in support of this standard that it is an aristocratic formation—as those whose ancestors had carried burthens would naturally have large hips, while those whose forefathers had been of warlike habits and taken exercise principally in the saddle, would be more developed in the chest and shoulders. In the teeth of the arts, however, and of these aristocratic objections, padded hips were the fashion in King James's time, while the collarless coat, with seams converging to the throat, narrowed the chest and shoulders and gave to the male figure the outline of the female.

Ridiculous as most fashions, when not based upon legitimate principles of art, seem at a distance, however, it is astonishing how unaware the excesses creep upon us, and how easily and unsuspectingly men of sense pass, from ridiculing a new fashion, to approving and adopting it. It would puzzle any one present, except perhaps an artist, to tell, in a moment, what are the absurdities of the present fashions. Yet absurdities there are, that will be laughed at fifty years hence, and you can easily detect them, by applying to the present modes the severe test of their utility as heighteners of natural beauty. And here let me, in passing, throw a pebble into the scale of art—hinting at the importance of keeping in view the principles of art and true elegance in adopting the changes of the fashions. If the portraits of men of mark and women of great beauty, in our age, are to be painted for posterity, let it be within the painter's power to make an artistic disposition of drapery, without painting his sitters in the unfitting costume of a classic age, floating them in clouds, or disguising them with cloaks and mantles. We have all laughed at the portraits that have descended to us from the days of periwigs and red-heeled shoes. There have been celebrated painters, who have followed the fashions of the time even in historical pictures—gravely representing the apostles and martyrs in bag-wigs, and the Virgin Mary in hoop and farthingale. There is no knowing how far the habituation of monstrosities in common wear may corrupt the taste even of artists. I am not sure, by the way, that the national style of dress may not have something to do with the heroic in national character. There was pride of country in a Roman toga, that hardly appertains to a hat and frock coat; and Cesar's death might not have descended so dramatically to posterity, if, instead of wrapping his head majestically in his mantle, he had fallen at the base of Pompey's statue—with his overcoat pulled over him!

Leaving the fashions with thus much of notice, I come now to the subject of FASHION—a term of most elusive and changeable import, and expressive of a condition of life, which it is next to impossible to analyze or define. Fashion is a position in society—attained by different avenues in different countries—but, however arrived at, giving its possessor consequence in common report, value in private life, authority in all matters of taste, and influence in every thing. Rightly to appreciate what fashion is, or rather what it is likely to be hereafter in our own country, let us, without defining it further, look a little into what it is abroad. Let us see what fashion is in France, and what it is in England—for it is from these two countries, only, that we borrow any thing in the way of social distinctions—and by contrast with our future models, we can the more easily make out what fashion is in the great metropolis of our own country, if not as to which way it is tending.

There is wonderful activity of amusement in all the grades of society in Paris, and no one class, or grade, wastes much time in thinking about the other—differing in this respect, (I may say in passing), from England, where all classes that pretend to society at all, occupy themselves to any uncomfortable degree with gazing enviously at the highest. Of necessity, in a monarchical country, rank has its weight, and the ancient nobility of France can scarcely be said to be out of fashion, though the verbal homage and high consideration with which persons of noble family are invariably named, is merely nominal and ceremonious, and the old families, unless fashionable from intrinsic causes, are practically shelved and forgotten in the celebrated Faubourg where they reside. Wealth, too, as in all countries, has its weight, and the rich man in Paris may soar, on wings of lavish expense, to the acquaintance of fashionable people; though, like Icarus with his wings of wax, he drops like a clod when his wings are melted. The court-circle—those who are officially or amicably in habits of intercourse with the family of the king, are not necessarily, the fashion. But beyond the control of either of these three powerful grades of society,—rank, wealth and court favor—there exists in Paris a sphere of fashion; and whatever else may purchase admission to it by outlay of splendor, or come into temporary contact with it by caprice or accident, there is but one homogeneous and predominating principle in it—but one invariable “open sesame,” and that is, INTELLECT! Personal beauty goes far in France, but it must be accompanied by the tact of being agreeable, or, if it were Venus herself, the beauty would soon be ridiculed and neglected. Celebrity, of every description, is a passport to fashion. Celebrated players and singers, travellers, soldiers, artists, scholars, statesmen and diplomatists, range freely through the penetralia of Parisian fashion. Nothing is excluded that is eminent—that is distinguished, that can amuse. All manner of mental superiority is unhesitatingly acknowledged. And, intellect being the constituency of this legislature of fashion, who are its leaders. The manifest controllers of the tide of thought and of the great interests of the present hour—the living authors, the editors of newspapers, active politicians, resident diplomatists, and talented clergy—these are the influential leaders of fashionable society in Paris, and the indispensable guests at all fashionable entertainments. With all the French passion for dress and elegance, they exact nothing ornamental in the persons of their intellectual favorites—in their admired poets, and artists. They appreciate eminence in dress and personal accomplishment, for it is a shape of talent, and the consummate dandy has commonly a passport in his tact and wit—but the lions of Paris are as often ill-dressed and awkward as the contrary, and the mere exteriors of men have little to do with making them permanently fashionable. A sphere of society so constituted is teeming with power, for, besides standing at the very fountain of respect, which is intellect, it is contributed to by all the different levels of life in that great metropolis—taking to itself the ambitious core and spirit of every class, rank and condition. Its power, too, goes farther than mere opinion. The most conspicuous members of the present government of France, were first the idols of its fashionable society—as editors of newspapers, poets and men of science. Intellect like theirs, however manifested, is the road to fashion, and, driven onward by fashionable influence and eclat, it is the easy and flowery road to every thing desirable in position and power. Without digressing to look for the causes of this in the political and moral revolutions of France, let me say simply of the present hour, that if there be in the world an indisputable republic of intellect, it is the fashionable society of witty and giddy Paris!

Let us glance now at fashion in England—differing from that of France in some very essential particulars. Rank, is more highly prized in England. A man who is noble-born is already three fourths fashionable—the remaining fourth depending not at all on his fortune, but wholly on his appearance and manners. A clownish young lord, or a girl who is Right Honorably plain and awkward, though presentable at court, and invited for form's sake to the sweeping entertainments which embrace the giver's entire acquaintance, can never be fashionable, and is pointedly overlooked in the invitations to parties more select, and very soon discouraged and mortified out of society. Wealth has much less influence than in France, in making its possessor fashionable. A person who is merely wealthy—not ornamental to society in his own person, is hopelessly shut out from the sphere of the exclusives. A certain competency, it is true, is necessary to fashion. A stylish man in London must spend three times as much as would serve his purpose in France, in having about him the appointments of a gentleman, including an equipage. But, beyond what is necessary for his own personal elegance, and convenience, he requires no riches to pass freely through all the favoritism of fashion. The immense number of wealthy people in England has neutralized the distinction of wealth; and money, nowhere in the world, I think, goes so little way as in that country, beyond providing for personal luxury and comfort.

Rank and wealth, then, not being inviolable passports to fashion in London, we come next to the third social estate—that of intellect. Your mind immediately passes in review the politicians, the men of science, the authors, dramatists, artists—whose names—written at the height they have attained to, are legible at the distance at which we read them—the breadth of the Atlantic! You ask—has the genius that makes these men immortal, made them the favorites of the hour they illuminate—the fashion in the country on which they shed lustre! When they are down from the height of inspiration in which their wings were visible to the universe, do the choicest of fair women and noble men, contend, as in France, to do them honor and give them pleasure? No! The exclusive sphere in England has no such class in its confidence, as men of genius. A man whose star has culminated—who has forced the world to hear of him by some undeniable burst of intellect—finds his way open, it is true, into the houses of the nobility, and into the more common resorts of the fashionables. He is the “lion of the season”—and what the position is, of the merely intellectual lion in the fashionable circle of England, English writers have honestly enough put down! It is a hell of invisible humiliations! Not to offend any living author by sketching his position, suppose Keats, the apothecary's boy, to have returned from Italy, where he died; and, having outlived the sneer of the high-born critic who counselled him to "return to his gallipots," to have become a lion in London society. He had nothing in birth, or personal appearance, to give him value—nothing but incomparable genius—that which, in all theories and essays on the distinctions of life, is put down as the noblest aristocracy. He would have been invited every where! He would have dined and supped and danced, if he liked, in every nobleman's house in London, and would have been, for a season or two, constantly in the presence of the exclusives, male and female. But the entrance to the nobleman's house, and the nobleman's condescension at dinner, and the attentive listening of the entire company to his eloquent conversation, would never have broken down the wall of glass between him and the ladies of his host's family and circle! The belles of Almack's would never have known Mr. Keats. The beauties familiar with the dandies of St. James street, would as soon have thought of feeling a tenderness for a Chinese juggler who had amused them, as for the literary lion they had listened to at dinner. There is an invariable manner of uninterested and polite suffering, cultivated for the express use of a non-conductor between the exclusives and the unprivileged who may have access to their resorts. This has been felt by every self-made celebrated man in England, and as most of them have been content with one or two seasons of such life, men of genius, unless newly risen, are seldom to be found in vogue among the exclusives.

But the sphere exists—powerful, splendid, and dazzling to all eyes,—the sphere of high fashion in England,—and what is the key to it, and for whom are its intoxicating triumphs?

In civilization, as in many other things, extremes meet. The highest possible cultivation approaches nearest to the simplicity of nature, and England, which, at this moment, probably, is at a higher point of civilization than was ever before attained, shows, in its most accomplished circle, the nearest approach to nature. The passport to fashion in England is that which would be a passport to pre-eminence in an Indian tribe—beauty of person combined with assurance and a natural air of superiority. With a mien of graceful boldness, and such a face and form as would suit a sculptor, or grace a chief, the son of a country curate in England may pluck fashion from an earl. And the same with the other sex. With no pretension to parentage or position, above respectability, a girl of remarkable beauty, let it be only such beauty as would sit gracefully upon title, and bear itself proudly among the proud, is marked from her childhood for high connection. She attracts the regard of her titled neighbors, is taken up as a guest to London, and made the belle of the season, and, if an attachment spring up between her and a man of rank, the passion is fanned and favored by generous acclamation. The exclusives rejoice in an addition of beauty to their set, and the coronet is more graced from being worn even by plebeian blood, more gracefully.

I am not sure that this is not a commendable aristocracy—at least not sure that the acknowledging and adopting of nature's stamp of superiority is not the best secret for the securing of power and influence to the most elevated class. The finest race in the eastern hemisphere—the most gallant and manly in its men, and the most beautiful and high-born looking in its women—is the fashionable aristocracy of England. The requisite loftiness of bearing which accompanies the beauty admired by this class, is not attained without superiority in the natural character, and the successful fashionables of England are the best stuff, I believe—the men for action, and the women for the maternity of nature's noblemen. I am inclined to think, I repeat, that nature's mark of superiority is well and wisely acknowledged. The balance of the physical and intellectual endowments—the power of bold action on a level with other men, and with a superiority that all men can appreciate—may be, to the eye of nature, superior to what we call genius—superior to the concentration of the whole force upon particular qualities of the brain. There are, doubtless, many men, wholly undistinguished, who yet, in the harmonious proportion of their persons and character—in their sufficiency of brain for all the exigences of action, and of spirit and dignity to carry out all the desirable purposes of the brain, are superior to geniuses, born for nothing but to write books of fancy, or made immortal by a disproportioned development of one faculty only. Upon such men,—upon poets and novelists, artists and musicians—nature has rarely put her legible stamp of “first quality.” It has been the complaint of genius, through all ages, that its superiority has not been acknowledged; and it seems to be an invariable instinct in human nature not to acknowledge it, where the writer and his personal qualities are known. May it not be natural therefore, to revolt against disproportion in endowment—and may not our great admiration for authors at a distance, and our diminished homage when we know them, lie in the disappointment we feel that they are not as remarkable in other respects as in power of fancy—an instinctive feeling that the excess of this quality is at the expense of others as desirable?

This is something of a digression—but before leaving the subject of English fashion, let me remark upon the prodigious influence of the fashionable class in England, and the likelihood that it works as an important weight in the balance of power in that country. It is time, I think, that like the addition in France, of the Tiers Etat to the political divisions of Church and State. Fashion, in England, should be named as a power, after King, Lords and Commons. It is a combination—a class—an order—formed exclusively from no other class—capable, as was shown in Brummel’s time, of giving a slight to the blood royal, and in the constant habit of putting down rank that does not look like rank, and selecting nature’s favorites from the people. The Queen fears it—the nobility courts it—the people worship it. It makes and unmakes popular idols. It rules the stage. It puts down pretension. It is always elegant and lofty, even in its oppressions. It fosters taste. It maintains the beautiful against the costly,—and it has for its exclusive use, and with power to direct them alike against overbearing authority and vulgar wealth, the formidable weapons of contempt and ridicule. In all monarchies that ever existed before, the aristocracy have dwindled in mind and person by the exclusive intermarriage of noble blood. England is the first that has made tributary the nobility of nature, taking grafts from the strong and beautiful, wherever grew strength and beauty in the capricious garden of superiority. A revolution cannot put down such a class! There is a natural homage in the high and low-born alike, paid, without stint or scruple, to the stamp of God. The aristocracy of England, with all their pride and superciliousness towards those who crowd upon their skirts, is acknowledged and admired, by the mass of the people, as was never another aristocracy by its plebeian countrymen. The existence of such a class, I repeat, is important to the balance of power in England. The tides of opinion, that would meet, embattled in opposing floods—the arbitrary dictates of the court on the one hand, and the rebellious spirit of a people never consulted, on the other,—find, in this intermediate class, a breakwater, that is a continual check to overflow and devastation.

The next step in my argument is to get, if possible, the same generalizing view of the great metropolis of this country—to see what it is that gives fashion and consequence in New York. Let me premise, however, that my remarks will apply to no other city in this country, nor would they have been true of New York forty years ago. In cities of a certain size—cities with the population of Boston, Philadelphia and Albany—the natural claims to aristocracy have, at least, a hearing; and combined with wealth and personal worth, they take rank with little opposition. In a metropolis of four hundred thousand inhabitants, these same distinctions are lost in the number of claimants; and, in what I have to say of New York, I confine myself to the period since this state of things has existed—the last fifteen or twenty years, during which the old aristocracy of the Knickerbockers has been shoved aside, by the enormous increase of wealthy and pretentious population.

In the particular period at which we live, our country differs from all the nations of the earth in one remarkable feature—that of being in a state of social transition unexampled for extent and rapidity—passing, that is to say, by lightning leaps of ambitious imitation, from plain to sumptuous, from primitive to luxurious. Study the progress of innovations upon the manners of older countries. See with what reluctant advance, one by one, the few foreign usages that prevail in England and France have crept respectively upon those complacent countries. How little that is French there is in England—how little that is English in France! And with what an unnaturalized strangeness these few outlandish features are incorrigibly worn. Here, on the contrary, in the cities of America, customs that would be twenty years obtaining foothold in Europe, are adopted at sight—domesticated and made universal in a single season. Our commerce is on the alert, our merchants are novelty-seeking travellers, ready to freight ships with any thing they find that would be new at home, and we have not a single prejudice in our national character which shuts the door upon an innovation. Nothing appears abroad—in dress, equipage, usage of society, style of furniture or mode of amusement, that is not conjured over the water with aerial quickness, copied with marvellous fidelity in New York, and incorporated at once into national habituation. The drawing-rooms of our wealthy classes are types, neither faint nor imperfect, of the sumptuous interiors of May Fair, and of the exclusive saloons of France. Our ladies are scarce thirty days behind the fashions of Paris. A change in men's dress in St. James street, is adopted in New York before it is detected east of Temple Bar. The stained glass of Bohemia, while still a curiosity in England, had grown common upon our dinner-tables. The toys of the age of Louis the Fourteenth, Egyptian couches, and the carved furniture of the age of Elizabeth, have been in turn the fashion abroad, and, of either style, there were profuse specimens in common wear among us, while the novelty was still fresh in the capitals of Europe. We copy every thing we can hear of—import and imitate instantly every new model of equipage—follow every whim of society, take the new dance, the new by-word, the new public amusement,—and enter heart and soul into every rage that is handed over to us, dramatic, operatic, sumptuary, and literary. This daguerreotype imitation is no less improving in its results, however, than it is miraculous for its facile rapidity. We have beaten England and France in progressive civilization and elevation, three centuries in one. At this rate, and with the increasing facilities of commerce, we shall soon have nothing to learn from Europe, but what transpires between the traverses of packets—and when that period arrives, we shall be, of all countries the most cosmopolite—comparing with other nations as the enlightened and liberal traveller compares with the home-keeping villager. I am anticipating, however. Before saying more of the future, let us take our proposed view of the present—as shown in the fashion of this great metropolis.

Though there is probably a greater market for the fashions in New-York than in any other capital in the world, (from the fact that all classes, above the lowest, dress as extravagantly here as only the first class does abroad) there is still very little of what can be fairly fixed upon as fashion. No one circle confessedly holds the power. Of rank, we can hardly name the value in

New York, for, coming to us from abroad, it has the exaggerated value of an exotic—much more worshipped here than where it comes from. It does not strike me, however, that we show any symptoms of relish for the indigenous rank that would naturally be now taking root in the families among us most honorably descended. It would require some research to discover, in New York, even the residences of those whose fathers' names are in the page of our history. Wherever they are, they get little position, consequence, or fashion, from the mere eminence of their forefathers—few of them it is certain, being even what the most conspicuous people would call “in society.” I think this will bear putting still more strongly, and that I may venture to say there is an instinctive hostility to the assumption of consequence by old families and somewhat, perhaps, from a feeling on the part of the undistinguished, that there is still a chance for competition with dignities of so recent date, but more from the application of that exacting standard, by which merit in the inheritor alone makes valid an inheritance of glory.

In the absence of rank, and particularly in a republic, you would naturally suppose that official power—the appointment by public honor to the highest dignities of the State—would give, to the family of the holder, a deference that would make them the fashion. Yet you all know the value of this claim to consequence! The Governor, Secretary, Treasurer of the State, the Senators and Representatives of the Sovereign People, come and go with no more eclat than other men, and their families are no more sought, imitated or caressed, for their official dignity. It neither makes a man nor his family particularly the fashion in New York, if he be Mayor of the city; though, in the administration of his office, he exercises a sway as powerful for the time being, as many a crowned head of feudal Europe. Instead of fashionable homage, paid to such dignity as we had a hand in making, we seem on the contrary to feel for it a fashionable indifference.

Is it here as in France, and does intellect give consequence in New York? Does wit in man, or conversational talent in woman, make the possessor an indispensable acquaintance to all givers of fashionable parties. Are the powerful controllers of public opinion, the gentlemen of the press—keepers as they are, or might be, of the key of each momentous to-morrow—are they, in a country where the press, far more than in France, is the citadel of power—are they, as in France, courted for their intellect, and for the influence they could give to the class they particularly belonged to. Are the gentlemen of the bar—the gladiators of intellect—who, in society, as in courts of justice, have on their armor of wit, and in the absence of any class possessing the leisure to be conversationists only, are the most amusing as well as the most improving members of society—are they sought for by the ambitious, and are their houses and resorts made fashionable by their intellect? Are men of science, distinguished artists, poets, authors, politicians and native celebrities generally—is this varied body of men, representing certainly the intellect of the day, sought out for fashionable entertainments, courted, and made friends and favorites of, by fashionable women? These questions are answered by the reasonableness of a doubt—whether one in ten of the most pretentious fashionables of New York, have any definite idea who are the intellectual masters and controllers of that grand vehicle of society to which they themselves are—the incomparable varnish!

Is it then as in England? Does fashionable society take pains to secure to itself Nature's mark of aristocracy? Are the rare accidents of mingled grace and beauty—the lovely and admirable women who do live sometimes in unfashionable neighborhoods, and do belong to families that are only respectable,—are such ornaments of their sex sought out for embellishment to fashionable parties, or would they find the way easy if they attempted to rise, by their own exertions, to spheres more suitably ornamental? Is masculine beauty—combined with a look of spirit, and a mien of natural chivalry and superiority—are these attractions, in a youth of unknown family and of no fortune, sufficient to give him, in New York as in England, easy access to fashionable circles, and consequence and influence, the town over, in all matters of taste and elegance? These questions, too, are easily answered by a reasonable doubt—whether a well-bred stranger, thrown into a mixed assembly in New York, would not make blunders, (as he hardly could do in England), in an attempt to pick out the fashionables by their look of aristocracy.

Nature's stamp of nobility, then, not being a passport to fashion in New York—nor family name and descent—nor intellect—nor that official dignity, which in theory, you would say, should give rank in a republic—what is the predominating principle of fashion? What is it that gives consequence and enviable station?

There is a condition of life in that city, which without forming a definite and combined class, as in France and England, may still be called “the fashion”—a kind of quicksand of conspicuousness and consequence, stable hitherto for no footing, but crowded successively by exclusives, few of whom have ever kept their place long enough to be identified by public rumor. The uncertainty as to who the fashionables are, is somewhat increased, too, by their great number, as no recognizable circle ever comes twice together, and no twenty fashionables would agree as to the fashionableness of twenty more. The great secret of vogue in this upper sphere—the passport to its conspicuousness and consequence,—is not exactly money—not exactly the being rich—but expense, and the dressing, driving and entertaining with lavish expensiveness. Extravagance, here, takes the place that, in France, is given to intellect, and in England, to the nobility of nature. It is true, that even under this dynasty, it has not invariably been as difficult as now to tell who were the leading fashionables of New York. Fashion, from time to time, has made head and taken a stand, and within my own memory of New York society, fifteen or twenty years, there have been eight or ten confident and established aristocracies. They have risen and fallen, duly, with “the stocks”—but never before, after the break up of a Board of Fashionable Directors, has there been so prolonged a state of anarchy as exists at this moment. The great convulsion in Wall street in '36, scattered the last definite combination of “people necessary to know;” and since that time there has never been a circle that was not rivalled by twenty others, nor have there been any leaders of fashion, nameable without a smile to two consecutive believers. Fashion there is—the fashion as I said before of conspicuousness in expense—but it is a commonwealth without government or centre—without limits or barriers. Any body belongs to it who spends up to the mark, and if there are any two who have combined to be exclusive, or make “a set”—it is by no means generally suspected!

This state of promiscuous pomp, however, cannot long exist. It would not have existed till now, if money alone could make, again, a potentate among fashionables. The ambition to be, as the French say, “the cream of the cream” is not wanting. It never sleeps. But money—mere money—is omnipotent no more! The setting up of an equipage, the adopting of crest and livery, and the giving of balls and dinners, can but make a man—now—one of five hundred. Not till this five hundred is decimated to fifty, by some other superiority, that, with the aid of money, can make itself paramount, and not till that fifty is decimated, still again, to five, who, by the consent of the fifty, shall be their leaders and rulers, will there be a fashion in New York, worth courting or fearing. Is this a consummation to be wished? I think I can show you that it is!

The very core and essence of that which constitutes a republic is the first principle in fashion—rebellion against unnatural authority. What would be the state of England at this enlightened day, with no coun-

terpoise to that nobility which is an accident of birth, and no asylum in society from the overbearing haughtiness of official and court privilege? There would be a tyranny of ill-endowed aristocrats—the more tyrannical in proportion as they were more brutal;—and a chasm between them and the people—between them and humble-born merit, which, if not crossed by the bridge of a revolution, would engulf them in the darkness of feudal barbarism. Now, there is a republic in the heart of monarchical England—fashion, ruled by the manifest stamp of superiority. There is a republic in the heart of monarchical France—fashion, ruled by wit and intellect. These are intermediate powers inseparable from a state of high civilization, let the government be what it will. Under the two hoary monarchies just named, they are a check to the tyranny of rank, the insolence of wealth and the pomposity of the court—to all of which intolerable evils the smile or frown of fashion is wholesomely and triumphantly paramount. But have we no work for Fashion to do in America? Are there no monsters to be put down by a combination of refinement and intellect? Have we no evils in our system of society, no oppressions, likely to get the upper hand of a republic, and for which we need therefore the well-tryed countercheck of fashion?

Rank—we have none to contend against. Court favor, as dispensed at Washington, makes no man formidable. The influence of mere wealth, as I have already said, is evidently on the wane—though were it not so, the tyranny of a sordid aristocracy of money might indeed call for a well-armed antagonist. A monster there is, however, reigning over this country, strange to say, in the shape of its greatest blessing—a monster it would scarce be safe to name, without first unmasking and showing his deformity, and, for this monster, we require the check that can alone be given by the combination I speak of as fashion, for it is the only shape and mouth-piece he will not himself usurp and turn to his tyrannical uses. Look a little into his anatomy. To how many men in a hundred, taken indiscriminately from the miscellaneous population of New York, would you entrust a decision upon any question that affected your personal position or happiness. Count among them the vicious, the wilful, the ignorant and short-sighted,—who are, and must necessarily be, in a great metropolis like this, the majority in numbers. In the capitals of other countries the ignorant and vicious classes have little or no moral power—no power at all, except in the hand to hand conflict of a revolution. In this country every one of them forms part of the constituency of a newspaper and has a voice as loud as your own on all questions that can come to the threshold of public notice. With such a population as America had in '76, this level suffrage of opinion was the heaven of liberty. Taking the country, now, from ocean to ocean, it is so still. But in our great cities—more especially in our greatest city—the proportion of evil in the population gives danger to its sovereign impulse. Free discussion and the vigilance of patriots, may control it on great questions, and if every so-called popular impulse were fairly dragged to light, and known by honest counting to be the wish of the majority, it would be still more effectually bridled. But no! The oracle of the people finds utterance when the people are asleep. The monster I have not yet named is enthroned within it, and it is he, and not the people, speaking oftenest in its voice of thunder. The laws are palsied by his threat—private character trembles in its sanctuary—the arts and all the interests of taste and elegance are benumbed and discouraged, and while the public is a “chartered libertine,” the individual is a slave, for no man dare do otherwise than as the mass approve, for fear of detraction and outcry. It is in this monster that envy and ill-will, and the natural hatred of the low and vicious for those above them, find a ready weapon for their malice. Desperate men who have seen better days, and tyrants without thrones, of whom there is never a lack in any community of the earth, are the ready trumpeters of the will of this many-eyed monster. And now shall I tell you his false name? Shall I tell you what lurks in the shadow of liberty, like oppression behind a throne of a monarch? You have anticipated it by my description. It is unexamined, unauthorized, uncontrolled PUBLIC OPINION—the monster whose false throat claims utterance for the people. The judge on the bench thinks of him in his verdict. The criminal at the bar trusts him more than his lawyer. He points his finger, and the representative of the people turns bully in the halls of legislation. *He stands before the statesman—hiding from him the page of history and posterity's contempt. Women dreads him on her pillow—for detraction is his most appetizing food. Religion trembles at her altar—for, on the ashes of the house of God he avenges an insult to his myrmidons.

But it is not alone in shapes so palpable to view that this black shadow of freedom stalks through a republic. There is a tyranny of public opinion, in every grade and hiding-place of this country—worn so habitually as to be thought an inseparable evil of human society—worn like the hair shirt of penance till its irritation has become a habit of second nature. It takes twice as bold a man here as in Europe, to be economical—twice as bold a man to prefer paying a debt to putting his name to a subscription. We put ourselves to twice the inconvenience here, that people in Europe do, to seem what we are expected to be by our neighbors. The pain and mortification of reducing our style of living to suit a reduced prosperity in business, is twice, here, what it is abroad—thrice what it need be. And on the other hand, look at the invidious criticism and malice drawn upon men or women, by any step, however well it can be afforded, toward embellishing their condition of life. We do not live in liberty, here—we do not spend our money or enjoy our firesides in rational freedom. The country is free, the press is free, religion is free, and public opinion remarkably free—but the individual is a slave! The stab of Brutus was struck at nothing half so tyrannical in the bosom of Cesar as our despotism—despotism of the public of which we, who suffer, severally make one. Since government was first invented, the most dreaded evil has been tyranny in the sovereign power. In a monarchy the king holds the power, and the people and private life are to be protected against the king. In a republic the people are the sovereign, and the laws and private life are to be protected against the people. The President is but the subservient prime minister of the sovereign people. His many-headed master never loses him from his sight one hour: and while in a monarchy there is an appeal, from the oppression of the king to the vengeance of the people, in a republic there is no appeal from oppression but to God—for who can impeach the sovereign people!

You may think, if you have not given me your close attention that I have wandered from my subject. But no. It is in my subject—in the influence of a circle of acknowledged fashion—that I see a release from this invisible monster. As Leatherstocking said when the Prairie was burning, "fire shall fight fire." Opinion from a more authentic source, shall stem and countercheck opinion. We are awed, now, by what we vaguely suppose the public to think. Give us a class whose opinion is entitled to undeniable weight—a class whose judgment is made up from elevated standards—a class whose favor is alike valuable to the ambitious of both sexes—a class it is important to know and propitiate if possible, but at any rate to quote as unquestionable authority—and the evil is at once abated. The most radiant feature as well as the most salutary principle of modern civilization is the organizing in France and England of the classes I have described—umpires between tyranny and the people,—arbiters, that with right on their side are stronger than the despot. As I have endeavored to show, this umpire in England is fashion, made potent by the upholding of nature's aristocracy. In France it is fashion, made all but sovereign in its influence, by the enlisting of intellect. In our country, as you all know, the class that is destined to protect us against our shape of the tyranny universal on earth, is still unorganized, and the locum tenens, the temporary key of fashionable superiority, is showy expensiveness. But this anarchy is not to last—nor, (I trust you are prepared to agree with me,) is it desirable that it should. I may venture, I think, to predict, by shadows cast before, that it is on the eve, now, of a new and lasting formation.

But, of what stuff is to be built our inner republic? Who, in our great metropolis, is to be eligible to that privileged class whose judgment shall rebuke the unweighed opinions of the mass, as well as the insolence of overbearing wealth and authority. The material lies about us in prodigal abundance. We have intellect, of God's purest kindling, burning before our eyes like stars before our closed windows in the last watch before morning. We have nature's nobility—men of such spirit and bearing, and women of such talent and beauty, as would draw homage alike from the Indian on the Prairie, or the exclusives at Almack's. We have master-spirits—men who possess the unaccountable, but lordly, power of control over popular masses—capable of swaying the most important flood-tides of the political sea, yet not capable of giving influence or fashion to their families, or the circles they live in. We have every degree, range, and quality, of material for fashion, in as great abundance as any country on earth. And now, of what stuff, I ask again, is to be moulded our fashionable republic—what class of superiority is to be set up for our umpire—counterpoise, to protect the subject individual against the sovereign people?

In this question the whole country has a voice. With the rapid and facile intercourse between our cities, and with our singularly gregarious habits—the distinguished of all the cities of the union, coming frequently together—every society in the country can influence the character of aristocracy in the metropolis. That metropolis is the great throbbing heart in whose pulsations the distant hand and foot have sympathy and influence. It was time—high time—that attention was called to the quality of the blood at this heart of our country. We have kept our vigils on all other subjects—we have slept at our watch over this! The first beat of this chronic pulse may be regulated, easily and irresistibly, by public volition. The fear is that the wrong elements may creep insensibly uppermost, and ossify into power without moulding or controlling! It was time, I say, that it should become a question of lively agitation,—in the metropolis and in every city in the Union—of what stuff is to be formed the coming American aristocracy? Discussion, enquiry, active ridicule of false pretension, and generous approbation of that which is truly admirable, are means—ample means—in our hands, to make it what we will. Let us beware, however—for, choose what we will—do homage to what we may, as worthy of privilege and distinction—whatever we do choose—whatever becomes the fashion, with the consequence that fashion is destined to have,—accumulates power from the moment of taking the lead, and is elevated in character, as well as hedged about with protection and aggrandizement! It is for the general vigilance—for you, on your part—to say, whether high morality shall be indispensable to fashion. It is for you to say, (and these are important questions) whether political rectitude shall give consequence to a man in the highest circle, or whether men who value consequence and position, shall dare to meddle with politics at all. In short, whether the “almighty dollar”—whether intellect, as shown in wit or conversation, or as shown in the arts, the press and the professions—whether official rank, or manifest superiority, as stamped by nature on strength and beauty—whether one, or any combination of these, is to be the confessed title to American aristocracy, is yet to be decided.

I have discoursed more gravely of fashion than was perhaps anticipated—less amusingly and more gravely than I might have done, it is certain. Fashion is a trifling word, and there are those to whom words never change meaning or value. Important as it may become, too, in the aggregate, fashion is known, and contributed to, by what the wise call trifles. Trifles they are—and so are the foam-bubbles on the advancing wave! But that glittering crest is no more certain to be the rider upon a tide, fetterless and resistless, than are the trifles of fashion the precursors of a powerful element, surging in, at this hour, upon the yet incomplete character of our country. Shall we be indifferent to the beauty or the deformity, the viciousness or the healthfulness of this impending aristocracy? Is it not worth while—momentously worth while—to arrest its presuming avatar, outside the citadel of power, and challenge its authority from God and reason! I may give it you as my opinion, that aristocracy in a republic must needs be more powerful than those of monarchies, limited or despotic—for it must fight the whole battle of superiority, unaided by rank, prejudice or long usage. Its formation were inevitable at this stage of our progress, even were we alone in the world—for there is no high civilization without it—but we are borrowing, as I said before, the social usages, as well as the fashions and luxuries, of the countries over the water—borrowing forms and laws of aristocracy faster than fashions or luxuries. And is not this a matter of interest to the public? “Where lies power?” “Where are the combinations that hold power?” are questions for the patriot and statesman—questions answered, wide of the mark, by the hackneyed divisions of political economy. “Church and state,” “rich and poor,” “King, Lords and Commons,” give no clue to the power paramount in England—the well-organized mastery of fashion! Let no man think it impossible that a class designated by so trifling a word as fashion, may soon crowd mammon from our altars, and become the antagonists of ill-begotten, public opinion, and the oracle of all that affects the individual. This, I repeat again, is the coming epoch in our social history. Thus far—to this level of preparation for an aristocracy—America has built her pyramid of civilization—overtaking astonished Europe, centuries in a day. To top this pyramid—to complete our broad-based and towering republic, we have a class to create—a summit-stone to lay—to which we can point without shame or hesitation, when it is lifted to the scrutiny of the world. Thank God, we have yet the time and opportunity to decide, from what quarry it shall be hewn, and to what mortar of public sentiment it shall owe its stability!

NOTE.

It may amuse the reader to quote a chapter from one of the serious works on the fashions referred to in the beginning of the Lecture. “THE SIMPLE COBBLER OF AGAWAM,” the work from which it was taken, was a classic of the sixteenth century, written by a New England emigrant clergyman, Rev. Nathaniel Ward. He thus discourses of the lady-fashions of New-England of that day:—

“Should I not keepe promise in speaking a little to Womens fashions, they would take it unkindly: I was loath to pester better matter with such stuffe; I rather thought it meet to let them stand by themselves, like the Quæ Genus in the Grammar, being Deficients, or Redundants, not to be brought under any Rule: I shall therefore make bold for this once, to borrow a little of their loose tongued Liberty, and mispend a word or two upon their long-wasted, but short-skirted patience : a little use of my stirrup will do no harme.

He that to Parrots speaks, must parrotize :
He that instructs a foole, may act th' unwise.

It is known more then enough that I am neither Nigard, nor Cinick, to the due bravery of the true Gentry : if any man mislikes a bully mong drossock more then I, let him take her for his labour : I honour the woman that can honour her selfe with her attire ; a good Text alwayes deserves a fair Margent : I am not much offended if I see a trimme, far trimmer than she that wears it : in a word, whatever Christianity or Civility will allow, I can afford with London measure : but when I heare a nugiperous Gentle-dame inquire what dresse the Queen is in this week : what the nudiustertian fashion of the Court is ; I meane the very newest : with egge to be in it in all haste, what ever it be ; I look at her as the very gizzard of a trifle, the product of a quarter of a cypher, the epitome of nothing, fitter to be kickt, if shee were of a kickable substance, than either honour'd or humour'd.

To speak moderately, I truly confesse, it is beyond the ken of my understanding to conceive, how those women should have any true grace, or valuable vertue, that have so little wit, as to disfigure themselves with such extotick garbes, as not only dismantles their native lovely lustre, but transclouts them into gant bar-geese, ill-shapen-shotten-shell-fish, Egyptian Hyeroglyphicks, or at the best into French flurts of the pastery, which a proper English woman should scorne with her heels : it is no marvell they weare drailes on the hinder part of their heads, having nothing as it seems in the fore-part, but a few Squirrils brains to help them frisk from one ill-favour'd fashion to another.

These whimm' Crown'd shees, these fashion-fancying wits,
Are empty thin brain'd shells, and fiddling Kits.

The very troublers and impoverishers of mankind, I can hardly forbear to commend to the world a saying of a Lady living sometime with the Queen of Bohemia, I know not where shee found it, but it is pitty it should be lost.

The World is full of care, much like unto a bubble,
Women and care, and care and women, and women and care and trouble.

The Verses are even enough for such odde pegma's. I can make my selfe sicke at any time, with comparing the dazling splendor wherewith our Gentlewomen were embellished in some former habits, with the gut-foundred goosdom, wherewith they are now surcingle and debauched. Wee have about five or six of them in our Colony : if I see any of them accidentally, I cannot cleanse my phansie of them for a moneth after. I have been a solitary widdower almost twelve yeares, purposed lately to make a step over to my Native Country for a yoke-fellow : but when I consider how women there have tripe-wifed themselves with their cladments, I have no heart to the voyage, least their nauseous shapes and the Sea, should work too sorely upon my stomach. I speak sadly ; me thinkes it should breake the hearts of Englishmen to see so many goodly English-women imprisoned in French Cages, peering out of their hood-holes for some men of mercy to help them with a little wit, and no body relieves them.

It is a more common then convenient saying, that nine Taylors make a man : it were well if nineteene could make a woman to her minde : if Taylors were men indeed, well furnished but with meer morall principles, they would disdain to be led about like Apes, by such mymick Marmosets. It is a most unworthy thing, for men that have bones in them, to spend their lives in making fidle-cases for futilous womens phansies ; which are the very pettitoes of infirmity, the gyblets of perquisquilian toys. I am so charitable to think, that most of that mystery would worke the cheerfuller while they live, if they might bee well discharged of the tying slavery of mis-tyring women : it is no little labour to be continually putting up English-women into Out-landish casques : who if they be not shifted anew, once in a few moneths, grow too sowre for their Husbands. What this Trade will answer for themselves when God shall take measure of Taylors consciences is beyond my skill to imagine. There was a time when

The joyning of the Red-Rose with the White,
Did set our State into a Damask plight.

But now our Roses are turned to Flore de lices, our Carnations to Tulips, our Gilliflowers to Dayzes, our City-Dames, to an indenominable Quæmalry of overturcas'd things. Hee that makes Coates for the Moone, had need take measure every noone; and he that makes for women, as often, to keepe them from Lunacy.

I have often heard divers Ladies vent loud feminine complaints of the wearisome varieties and chargable changes of fashions: I marvell themselves preferre not a Bill of redresse. I would Essex Ladies would lead the Chore, for the honour of their County and persons; or rather the thrice honourable Ladies of the Court, whom it best be- seemes: who may well presume of a Le Roy le veult from our sober King, a Les Seigneurs ont Assentus from our prudent Peers, and the like Assentus from our considerate, I dare not say wife-worne Commons: who I believe had much rather passe one such Bill, than pay so many Taylors Bills as they are forced to doe.

Most deare and unparallel'd Ladies, be pleased to attempt it: as you have the pre- cency of the women of the world for beauty and feature; so assume the honour to give, and not take Law from any, in mat- ter of attire: if ye can transact so faire a motion among yourselves unanimously, I dare say, they that most renite, will least repent. What greater honour can your Honors desire, then to build a Promontory president to all foraigne Ladies, to deserve so eminently at the hands of all the English Gentry present and to come: and to confute the opinion of all the wise men in the world; who never thought it possible for women to doe so good a work?

If any man think I have spoken rather merrily than seriously he is much mistaken, I have written what I write with all the indignation I can, and no more than I ought.

I confesse I veer'd my tongue to this kinde of Language de industria though unwillingly, supposing those I speak to are unca- pable of grave and rationall arguments.

I desire all Ladies and Gentlewomen to understand that all this while I intend not such as through necessary modesty to avoyd morose singularity, follow fashions slowly, a flight shot or two off, shewing by their mo- deration, that they rather draw counter- mont with their hearts, then put on by their examples.

I point my pen only against the light- heel'd beagles that lead the chase so fast, that they run all civility out of breath, against these Ape-headed pullets, which invent Antique foole-fangles, meerly for fashion and novelty sake.

In a word, if I begin once to declaime against fashions, let men and women look well about them, there is somewhat in the businesse; I confesse to the world, I never had grace enough to be strict in that kinde; and of late years, I have found syrope of pride very wholesome in a due Dos, which makes mee keep such a store of that drugges by me, that if any body comes to me for a question-full or two about fashions, they never complain of me for giving them hard measure, or under-weight.

But I addresse my selfe to those who can both hear and mend all if they please: I seriously feare, if the pious Parliament doe not find a time to state fashions, as ancient Parliaments have done in some part, God will hardly finde a time to state Religion or Peace: They are the surquedryes of pride, the wantonnesse of idlenesse, provoking sins, the certain prodormies of assured judge- ment, Zeph. 1. 7, 8.

It is beyond all account, how many Gen- tlemens and Citizens estates are depulmed by their feather-headed wives, what usefull supplies the pannage of England would afford other Countries, what rich returns to it selfe, if it were not slic'd out into male and female fripperies: and what a multi- tude of misemploy'd hands, might be better improv'd in some more manly Manufactures for the publike weale: it is not easily credible, what may be said of the preterpluralities of Taylors in London : I have heard an honest man say, that not long since there were numbered between Temple-barre and Charing-Crosse, eight thousand of that Trade : let it be conjectured by that proportion how many there are in and about London, and in all England, they will appeare to be very numerous. If the Parliament would please to mend women, which their Husbands dare not doe, there need not so many men to make and mend as there are. I hope the present dolefull estate of the Realme, will perswade more strongly to some considerate course herein, than I now can.

Knew I how to bring it in, I would speak a word to long haire, whereof I will say no more but this : if God proves not such a Barbor to it as he threatens, unlesse it be amended, Esa. 7. 20. before the Peace of the State and Church be well settled, then let my prophesie be scorned, as a sound minde scornes the ryot of that sin, and more it needs not. If those who are termed Rattle-heads and Impuritans, would take up a Resolution to begin in moderation of haire, to the just reproach of those that are called Puritans and Round-heads, I would honour their manlinesse, as much as the others godlinesse, so long as I knew what man or honour meant : if neither can find a Barbours shop, let them turne in, to Psal. 68. 21. Jer. 7. 29. 1 Cor. 11. 14. if it be thought no wisdom in men to distinguish themselves in the field by the Scissers, let it bee thought no injustice in God, not to distinguish them by the Sword. I had rather God should know me by my sobriety, than mine enemy not know me by my vanity. He is ill kept, that is kept by his owne sin. A short promise is a farre safer guard than a long lock : it is an ill distinction which God is loth to looke at, and his Angels cannot know his Saints by. Though it be not the mark of the Beast, yet it may be the mark of a beast prepared to slaughter. I am sure men use not to weare such manes ; I am also sure Souldiers use to weare other marklets or notadoes in time of battell.

SACRED POEMS.

PREFACE.

THE author puts these poems to press with the knowledge that they should all be rewritten, and with a painful regret that he has no leisure to rewrite them before extending their publicity in a new reprint. The subjects of the poems, and the feelings expressed in them, have given them a popularity independent of criticism, and to that tide he again commits them—to flow as far as they will. He rests his hope of reputation on having the leisure to overtake and pass them at some future day.

THE HEALING OF THE DAUGHTER OF JAIRUS.

FRESHLY the cool breath of the coming eve
Stole through the lattice, and the dying girl
Felt it upon her forehead. She had lain
Since the hot noontide in a breathless trance—
Her thin pale fingers clasp'd within the hand
Of the heart-broken Ruler, and her breast,
Like the dead marble, white and motionless.
The shadow of a leaf lay on her lips,
And, as it stirr'd with the awakening wind,
The dark lids lifted from her languid eyes,
And her slight fingers moved, and heavily
She turned upon her pillow. He was there—
The same loved, tireless watcher, and she look'd
Into his face until her sight grew dim
With the fast-falling tears; and, with a sigh
Of tremulous weakness murmuring his name,
She gently drew his hand upon her lips,
And kiss'd it as she wept. The old man sunk
Upon his knees, and in the drapery
Of the rich curtains buried up his face;
And when the twilight fell, the silken folds
Stirr'd with his prayer, but the slight hand he held
Had ceased its pressure—and he could not hear,
In the dead, utter silence, that a breath
Came through her nostrils—and her temples gave
To his nice touch no pulse—and, at her mouth,
He held the lightest curl that on her neck
Lay with a mocking beauty, and his gaze
Ached with its deathly stillness. * * * * *

* * * * * It was night—
And, softly, o'er the Sea of Galilee,
Danced the breeze-ridden ripples to the shore,
Tipp'd with the silver sparkles of the moon.
The breaking waves play'd low upon the beach
Their constant music, but the air beside
Was still as starlight, and the Saviour's voice,
In its rich cadences unearthly sweet,
Seem'd like some just-born harmony in the air,
Waked by the power of wisdom. On a rock,
With the broad moonlight falling on his brow,

He stood and taught the people. At his feet
Lay his small scrip, and pilgrim's scallop-shell,
And staff—for they had waited by the sea
Till he came o'er from Gadarene, and pray'd
For his wont teachings as he came to land.
His hair was parted meekly on his brow,
And the long curls from off his shoulders fell,
As he lean'd forward earnestly, and still
The same calm cadence, passionless and deep—
And in his looks the same mild majesty—
And in his mien the sadness mix'd with power—
Fill'd them with love and wonder. Suddenly,
As on his words entrancedly they hung,
The crowd divided, and among them stood
JAIRUS THE RULER. With his flowing robe
Gather'd in haste about his loins, he came,
And fix'd his eyes on Jesus. Closer drew
The twelve disciples to their Master's side;
And silently the people shrunk away,
And left the haughty Ruler in the midst
Alone. A moment longer on the face
Of the meek Nazarene he kept his gaze,
And, as the twelve look'd on him, by the light
Of the clear moon they saw a glistening tear
Steal to his silver beard; and, drawing nigh
Unto the Saviour's feet, he took the hem
Of his coarse mantle, and with trembling hands
Press'd it upon his lips, and murmur'd low,
“Master! my daughter!”— * * * * *

* * * * * The same silvery light,
That shone upon the lone rock by the sea,
Slept on the Ruler's lofty capitals,
As at the door he stood, and welcomed in Jesus and his disciples. All was still.
The echoing vestibule gave back the slide
Of their loose sandals, and the arrowy beam
Of moonlight, slanting to the marble floor,
Lay like a spell of silence in the rooms,
As Jairus led them on. With hushing steps
He trod the winding stair; but ere he touch'd
The latchet, from within a whisper came,
“Trouble the Master not—for she is dead!”

And his faint hand fell nerveless at his side,
And his steps falter'd, and his broken voice
Choked in its utterance;—but a gentle hand
Was laid upon his arm, and in his ear
The Saviour's voice sank thrillingly and low,
“She is not dead—but sleepeth.”

They pass'd in.
The spice-lamps in the alabaster urns
Burn'd dimly, and the white and fragrant smoke
Curl'd indolently on the chamber walls.
The silken curtains slumber'd in their folds—
Not even a tassel stirring in the air—
And as the Saviour stood beside the bed,
And pray'd inaudibly, the Ruler heard
The quickening division of his breath
As he grew earnest inwardly. There came
A gradual brightness o'er his calm, sad face;
And, drawing nearer to the bed, he moved
The silken curtains silently apart,
And look'd upon the maiden.

Like a form
Of matchless sculpture in her sleep she lay—
The linen vesture folded on her breast,
And over it her white transparent hands,
The blood still rosy in their tapering nails.
A line of pearl ran through her parted lips,
And in her nostrils, spiritually thin,
The breathing curve was mockingly like life;
And round beneath the faintly tinted skin
Ran the light branches of the azure veins;
And on her cheek the jet lash overlay,
Matching the arches pencill'd on her brow.
Her hair had been unbound, and falling loose
Upon her pillow, hid her small round ears
In curls of glossy blackness, and about
Her polish'd neck, scarce touching it, they hung,
Like airy shadows floating as they slept.
’Twas heavenly beautiful. The Saviour raised
Her hand from off her bosom, and spread out
The snowy fingers in his palm, and said,
“Maiden! Arise!”—and suddenly a flush
Shot o'er her forehead, and along her lips
And through her cheek the rallied color ran;
And the still outline of her graceful form
Stirr'd in the linen vesture; and she clasp'd
The Saviour's hand, and fixing her dark eyes
Full on his beaming countenance—AROSE!

THE LEPER.

“Room for the leper! Room!” And, as he came,
The cry pass'd on—“Room for the leper! Room!”
Sunrise was slanting on the city gates
Rosy and beautiful, and from the hills
The early risen poor were coming in,
Duly and cheerfully to their toil, and up
Rose the sharp hammer's clink, and the far hum
Of moving wheels and multitudes astir,
And all that in a city murmur swells—
Unheard but by the watcher's weary ear,
Aching with night's dull silence, or the sick
Hailing the welcome light and sounds that chase
The death-like images of the dark away.
“Room for the leper!” And aside they stood—
Matron, and child, and pitiless manhood—all
Who met him on his way—and let him pass.
And onward through the open gate he came,
A leper with the ashes on his brow,
Sackcloth about his loins, and on his lip
A covering, stepping painfully and slow,
And with a difficult utterance, like one
Whose heart is with an iron nerve put down,
Crying, “Unclean! Unclean!”

’Twas now the first
Of the Judean autumn, and the leaves,
Whose shadows lay so still upon his path,
Had put their beauty forth beneath the eye
Of Judah's loftiest noble. He was young,

And eminently beautiful, and life
Mantled in eloquent fulness on his lip,
And sparkled in his glance; and in his mien
There was a gracious pride that every eye
Followed with benisons—and this was he!
With the soft airs of summer there had come
A torpor on his frame, which not the speed
Of his best barb, nor music, nor the blast
Of the bold huntsman's horn, nor aught that stirs
The spirit to its bent, might drive away.
The blood beat not as wont within his veins;
Dimness crept o'er his eye; a drowsy sloth
Fetter'd his limbs like palsy, and his mien,
With all its loftiness, seem'd struck with eld.
Even his voice was changed—a languid moan
Taking the place of the clear silver key;
And brain and sense grew faint, as if the light
And very air were steep'd in sluggishness.
He strove with it a while, as manhood will,
Ever too proud for weakness, till the rein
Slackened within his grasp, and in its poise
The arrowy jereed like an aspen shook.
Day after day, he lay as if in sleep.
His skin grew dry and bloodless, and white scales,
Circled with livid purple, covered him,
And then his nails grew black, and fell away
From the dull flesh about them, and the hues
Deepen'd beneath the hard unmoisten'd scales,
And from their edges grew the rank white hair,
—And Helon was a leper!

Day was breaking,
When at the altar of the temple stood
The holy priest of God. The incense lamp
Burn'd with a struggling light, and a low chant
Swell'd through the hollow arches of the roof
Like an articulate wail, and there, alone,
Wasted to ghastly thinness, Helon knelt.
The echoes of the melancholy strain
Died in the distant aisles, and he rose up,
Struggling with weakness, and bow'd down his head
Unto the sprinkled ashes, and put off
His costly raiment for the leper's garb;
And with the sackcloth round him, and his lip
Hid in a loathsome covering, stood still,
Waiting to hear his doom:

Depart! depart, O child
Of Israel, from the temple of thy God!
For He has smote thee with his chastening rod;
And to the desert-wild,
From all thou lov'st, away thy feet must flee,
That from thy plague His people may be free.

Depart! and come not near
The busy mart, the crowded city, more;
Nor set thy foot a human threshold o'er;
And stay thou not to hear
Voices that call thee in the way; and fly
From all who in the wilderness pass by.

Wet not thy burning lip
In streams that to a human dwelling glide;
Nor rest thee where the covert fountains hide,
Nor kneel thee down to dip
The water where the pilgrim bends to drink,
By desert well or river's grassy brink;

And pass thou not between
The weary traveller and the cooling breeze;
And lie not down to sleep beneath the trees
Where human tracks are seen;
Nor milk the goat that browseth on the plain,
Nor pluck the standing corn, or yellow grain.

And now depart! and when
Thy heart is heavy, and thine eyes are dim,
Lift up thy prayer beseechingly to Him
Who, from the tribes of men,
Selected thee to feel His chastening rod.
Depart! O leper! and forget not God!

And he went forth—alone! not one of all
The many whom he loved, nor she whose name
Was woven in the fibres of the heart

Breaking within him now, to come and speak
Comfort unto him. Yea—he went his way,
Sick, and heart-broken, and alone—to die!
For God had cursed the leper!

It was noon,
And Helon knelt beside a stagnant pool
In the lone wilderness, and bathed his brow,
Hot with the burning leprosy, and touch'd
The loathsome water to his fever'd lips,
Praying that he might be so blest—to die!
Footsteps approach'd, and, with no strength to flee,
He drew the covering closer on his lip,
Crying, "Unclean! unclean!" and in the folds
Of the coarse sackcloth shrouding up his face,
He fell upon the earth till they should pass.
Nearer the Stranger came, and bending o'er
The leper's prostrate form, pronounced his name—
"Helon!" The voice was like the master-tone
Of a rich instrument—most strangely sweet;
And the dull pulses of disease awoke,
And for a moment beat beneath the hot
And leprous scales with a restoring thrill.
"Helon! arise!" and he forgot his curse,
And rose and stood before Him.

Love and awe
Mingled in the regard of Helon's eye
As he beheld the Stranger. He was not
In costly raiment clad, nor on his brow
The symbol of a princely lineage wore;
No followers at His back, nor in His hand
Buckler, or sword, or spear,—yet in his mien
Command sat throned serene, and if He smiled,
A kingly condescension graced His lips,
The lion would have crouch'd to in his lair.
His garb was simple, and His sandals worn;
His stature modell'd with a perfect grace;
His countenance the impress of a God,
Touch'd with the opening innocence of a child;
His eye was blue and calm, as is the sky
In the serenest noon; His hair unshorn
Fell to His shoulders; and His curling beard
The fulness of perfected manhood bore.
He look'd on Helon earnestly awhile,
As if His heart were moved, and, stooping down,
He took a little water in His hand
And laid it on his brow, and said, "Be clean!"
And lo! the scales fell from him, and his blood
Coursed with delicious coolness through his veins,
And his dry palms grew moist, and on his brow
The dewy softness of an infant's stole.
His leprosy was cleansed, and he fell down
Prostrate at Jesus' feet and worshipp'd Him.

DAVID'S GRIEF FOR HIS CHILD.

'Twas daybreak, and the fingers of the dawn
Drew the night's curtain, and touch'd silently
The eyelids of the King. And David woke,
And robed himself, and pray'd. The inmates, now,
Of the vast palace were astir, and feet
Glided along the tessellated floors
With a pervading murmur, and the fount
Whose music had been all the night unheard,
Play'd as if light had made it audible;
And each one, waking, bless'd it unaware.
The fragrant strife of sunshine with the morn
Sweeten'd the air to ecstasy! and now
The king's wont was to lie upon his couch
Beneath the sky-roof of the inner court,
And, shut in from the world, but not from heaven,
Play with his loved son by the fountain's lip;
For, with idolatry confess'd alone
To the rapt wires of his reproofless harp,
He loved the child of Bathsheba. And when
The golden selvedge of his robe was heard
Sweeping the marble pavement, from within Broke forth a child's laugh suddenly, and words—
Articulate, perhaps, to his heart only—
Pleading to come to him. They brought the boy—
An infant cherub, leaping as if used

To hover with that motion upon wings,
And marvellously beautiful! His brow
Had the inspired up-lift of the king's,
And kingly was his infantine regard;
But his ripe mouth was of the ravishing mould
Of Bathsheba's—the hue and type of love,
Rosy and passionate—and oh, the moist
Unfathomable blue of his large eyes
Gave out its light as twilight shows a star,
And drew the heart of the beholder in!—
And this was like his mother.

David's lips
Moved with unutter'd blessings, and awhile
He closed the lids upon his moisten'd eyes,
And, with the round cheek of the nestling boy
Press'd to his bosom, sat as if afraid
That but the lifting of his lids might jar
His heart's cup from its fullness. Unobserved
A servant of the outer court had knelt
Waiting before him; and a cloud the while
Had rapidly spread o'er the summer heaven;
And, as the chill of the withdrawing sun
Fell on the king, he lifted up his eyes
And frown'd upon the servant—for that hour
Was hallow'd to his heart and his fair child,
And none might seek him. And the king arose.
And with a troubled countenance look'd up
To the fast-gathering darkness; and, behold,
The servant bow'd himself to earth, and said,
"Nathan the prophet cometh from the Lord!"
And David's lips grew white, and with a clasp
Which wrung a murmur from the frightened child,
He drew him to his breast, and cover'd him
With the long foldings of his robe, and said,
"I will come forth. Go now!" And lingeringly,
With kisses on the fair uplifted brow,
And mingled words of tenderness and prayer
Breaking in tremulous accents from his lips,
He gave to them the child, and bow'd his head
Upon his breast with agony. And so,
To hear the errand of the man of God,
He fearfully went forth. * * * * *

It was the morning of the seventh day.
A hush was in the palace, for all eyes
Had woke before the morn; and they who drew
The curtains to let in the welcome light,
Moved in their chambers with unslipper'd feet,
And listen'd breathlessly. And still no stir!
The servants who kept watch without the door
Sat motionless; the purple casement-shades
From the low windows had been roll'd away.
To give the child air; and the flickering light
That, all the night, within the spacious court,
Had drawn the watcher's eyes to one spot only,
Paled with the sunrise and fled in.

And hush'd
With more than stillness was the room where lay
The king's son on his mother's breast. His locks
Slept at the lips of Bathsheba unstirr'd—
So fearfully, with heart and pulse kept down,
She watch'd his breathless slumber. The low moan
That from his lips all night broke fitfully,
Had silenced with the daybreak; and a smile—
Or something that would fain have been a smile—
Play'd in his parted mouth; and though his lids
Hid not the blue of his unconscious eyes,
His senses seem'd all peacefully asleep,
And Bathsheba in silence bless'd the morn—
That brought back hope to her! But when the kin
Heard not the voice of the complaining child,
Nor breath from out the room, nor foot astir—
But morning there—so welcomeless and still—
He groan'd and turn'd upon his face. The nights
Had wasted; and the mornings come; and days
Crept through the sky, unnumber'd by the king,
Since the child sicken'd; and, without the door,
Upon the bare earth prostrate, he had lain—
Listening only to the moans that brought
Their inarticulate tidings, and the voice
Of Bathsheba, whose pity and caress,

In loving utterance all broke with tears,
Spoke as his heart would speak if he were there,
And fill'd his prayer with agony. Oh God!
To thy bright mercy-seat the way is far!
How fail the weak words while the heart keeps on!
And when the spirit, mournfully, at last,
Kneels at thy throne, how cold, how distantly
The comforting of friends falls on the ear—
The anguish they would speak to, gone to Thee!

But suddenly the watchers at the door
Rose up, and they who minister'd within Crept to the threshold and look'd earnestly
Where the king lay. And still, while Bathsheba
Held the unmoving child upon her knees,
The curtains were let down, and all came forth,
And, gathering with fearful looks apart,
Whisper'd together.

And the king arose
And gazed on them a moment, and with voice
Of quick, uncertain utterance, he ask'd,
"Is the child dead?" They answer'd, "he is dead."
But when they look'd to see him fall again
Upon his face, and rend himself and weep—
For, while the child was sick, his agony
Would bear no comforters, and they had thought
His heartstrings with the tidings must give way—
Behold! his face grew calm, and, with his robe
Gather'd together like his kingly wont,
He silently went in.

And David came,
Robed and anointed, forth, and to the house
Of God went up to pray. And he return'd,
And they set bread before him, and he ate—
And when they marvel'd, he said, "Wherefore mourn?
The child is dead, and I shall go to him—
But he will not return to me."

THE SACRIFICE OF ABRAHAM.

MORN breaketh in the east. The purple clouds
Are putting on their gold and violet,
To look the meeter for the sun's bright coming.
Sleep is upon the waters and the wind;
And nature, from the wavy forest-leaf
To her majestic master, sleeps. As yet
There is no mist upon the deep blue sky,
And the clear dew is on the blushing bosoms
Of crimson roses in a holy rest.
How hallow'd is the hour of morning! meet—
Av, beautifully meet—for the pure prayer.
The patriarch standeth at his tented door,
With his white locks uncover'd. 'Tis his wont
To gaze upon that gorgeous Orient;
And at that hour the awful majesty
Of man who talketh often with his God,
Is wont to come again, and clothe his brow
As at his fourscore strength. But now, he seemeth
To be forgetful of his vigorous frame,
And boweth to his staff as at the hour
Of noontide sultriness. And that bright sun—
He looketh at his pencil'd messengers,
Coming in golden raiment, as if all
Were but a graven scroll of fearfulness.
Ah, he is waiting till it herald in
The hour to sacrifice his much-loved son!

Light poureth on the world. And Sarah stands
Watching the steps of Abraham and her child
Along the dewy sides of the far hills,
And praying that her sunny boy faint not.
Would she have watch'd their path so silently,
If she had known that he was going up,
E'en in his fair-hair'd beauty, to be slain
As a white lamb for sacrifice? They trod
Together onward, patriarch and child—
The bright sun throwing back the old man's shade
In straight and fair proportions, as of one
Whose years were freshly number'd. He stood up,
Tall in his vigorous strength; and, like a tree
Rooted in Lebanon, his frame bent not.

His thin white hairs had yielded to the wind,
And left his brow uncover'd; and his face,
Impress'd with the stern majesty of grief,
Nerved to a solemn duty, now stood forth
Like a rent rock, submissive, yet sublime.
But the young boy—he of the laughing eye
And ruby lip—the pride of life was on him.
He seem'd to drink the morning. Sun and dew,
And the aroma of the spicy trees,
And all that giveth the delicious East
Its fitness for an Eden, stole like light
Into his spirit, ravishing his thoughts
With love and beauty. Every thing he met,
Buoyant or beautiful, the lightest wing
Of bird or insect, or the palest dye
Of the fresh flowers, won him from his path;
And joyously broke forth his tiny shout,
As he flung back his silken hair, and sprang
Away to some green spot or clustering vine,
To pluck his infant trophies. Every tree
And fragrant shrub was a new hiding-place;
And he would crouch till the old man came by,
Then bound before him with his childish laugh,
Stealing a look behind him playfully,
To see if he had made his father smile.

The sun rode on in heaven. The dew stole up
From the fresh daughters of the earth, and heat
Came like a sleep upon the delicate leaves,
And bent them with the blossoms to their dreams
Still trod the patriarch on, with that same step,
Firm and unfaltering; turning not aside
To seek the olive shades, or lave their lips
In the sweet waters of the Syrian wells,
Whose gush hath so much music. Weariness
Stole on the gentle boy, and he forgot
To toss his sunny hair from off his brow,
And spring for the fresh flowers and light wings
As in the early morning; but he kept
Close by his father's side, and bent his head
Upon his bosom like a drooping bud,
Lifting it not, save now and then to steal
A look up to the face whose sternness awed
His childishness to silence.

It was noon—
And Abraham on Moriah bow'd himself,
And buried up his face, and pray'd for strength
He could not look upon his son, and pray;
But, with his hand upon the clustering curls
Of the fair, kneeling boy, he pray'd that God
Would nerve him for that hour. Oh! man was made
For the stern conflict. In a mother's love
There is more tenderness; the thousand chords,
Woven with every fibre of her heart,
Complain, like delicate harp-strings, at a breath;
But love in man is one deep principle,
Which, like a root grown in a rifted rock,
Abides the tempest. He rose up, and laid
The wood upon the altar. All was done.
He stood a moment—and a deep, quick flush
Pass'd o'er his countenance; and then he nerved
His spirit with a bitter strength, and spoke—
"Isaac! my only son!"—The boy look'd up,
And Abraham turn'd his face away, and wept.
"Where is the lamb, my father?"—Oh the tones
The sweet, the thrilling music of a child!—
How it doth agonize at such an hour!—
It was the last deep struggle. Abraham held
His loved, his beautiful, his only son,
And lifted up his arm, and call'd on God—
And lo! God's angel staid him—and he fell
Upon his face, and wept.

THE SHUNAMITE.

It was a sultry day of summer time.
The sun pour'd down upon the ripen'd grain
With quivering heat, and the suspended leaves
Hung motionless. The cattle on the hills
Stood still, and the divided flock were all
Laying their nostrils to the cooling roots,

And the sky look'd like silver, and it seem'd
As if the air had fainted, and the pulse
Of nature had run down, and ceased to beat

"Haste thee, my child!" the Syrian mother said,
"Thy father is athirst"—and, from the depths
Of the cool well under the leaning tree,
She drew refreshing water, and with thoughts
Of God's sweet goodness stirring at her heart,
She bless'd her beautiful boy, and to his way
Committed him. And he went lightly on,
With his soft hands press'd closely to the cool
Stone vessel, and his little naked feet
Lifted with watchful care; and o'er the hills,
And through the light green hollows where the lambs
Go for the tender grass, he kept his way,
Wiling its distance with his simple thoughts,
Till, in the wilderness of sheaves, with brows
Throbbing with heat, he saw his burden down.

Childhood is restless ever, and the boy
Stay'd not within the shadow of the tree,
But with a joyous industry went forth
Into the reaper's places, and bound up
His tiny sheaves, and plaited cunningly
The pliant withs out of the shining straw—
Cheering their labor on, till they forgot
The heat and weariness of their stooping toil
In the beguiling of his playful mirth.
Presently he was silent, and his eye
Closed as with dizzy pain, and with his hand
Press'd hard upon his forehead, and his breast
Heaving with the suppression of a cry,
He utter'd a faint murmur, and fell back
Upon the loosened sheaf, insensible

They bore him to his mother, and he lay
Upon her knees till noon—and then he died!
She had watch'd every breath, and kept her hand
Soft on his forehead, and gazed in upon
The dreamy languor of his listless eye,
And she had laid back all his sunny curls
And kiss'd his delicate lip, and lifted him
Into her bosom, till her heart grew strong—
His beauty was so unlike death! She lean'd
Over him now, that she might catch the low
Sweet music of his breath, that she had learn'd
To love when he was slumbering at her side
In his unconscious infancy—

"—So still!

'Tis a soft sleep! How beautiful he lies,
With his fair forehead, and the rosy veins
Playing so freshly in his sunny cheek!
How could they say that he would die! Oh God!
I could not lose him! I have treasured all
His childhood in my heart, and even now
As he has slept, my memory has been there
Counting like treasures all his winning ways—
His unforgotten sweetness:—

"—Yet so still!

How like this breathless slumber is to death!
I could believe that in that bosom now
There were no pulse—it beats so languidly!
I cannot see it stir; but his red lip!
Death would not be so very beautiful!
And that half smile—would death have left that there!

—And should I not have felt that he would die?
And have I not wept over him?—and pray'd
Morning and night for him? And could he die?

No—God will keep him! He will be my pride
Many long years to come, and his fair hair
Will darken like his father's, and his eye
Be of a deeper blue when he is grown;
And he will be so tall, and I shall look
With such a pride upon him!—He to die!"
And the fond mother lifted his soft curls,
And smiled, as if 'twere mockery to think
That such fair things could perish—

—Suddenly

Her hand shrunk from him, and the color fled
From her fix'd lip, and her supporting knees
Were shook beneath her child. Her hand had touch'd
His forehead, as she dallied with his hair—

And it was cold—like clay! Slow, very slow,
Came the misgiving that her child was dead.
She sat a moment, and her eyes were closed
In a dumb prayer for strength, and then she took
His little hand and press'd it earnestly—
And put her lip to his—and look'd again
Fearfully on him—and, then bending low,
She whisper'd in his ear, "My son!—my son!"
And as the echo died, and not a sound
Broke on the stillness, and he lay there still—
Motionless on her knee—The truth would come!
And with a sharp, quick cry, as if her heart
Were crush'd, she lifted him and held him close
Into her bosom—with a mother's thought—
As if death had no power to touch him there!

The man of God came forth, and led the child
Unto his mother, and went on his way.
And he was there—her beautiful—her own—
Living and smiling on her—with his arms
Folded about her neck, and his warm breath
Breathing upon her lips, and in her ear
The music of his gentle voice once more!

JEPHTHAH'S DAUGHTER.

SHE stood before her father's gorgeous tent,
To listen for his coming. Her loose hair
Was resting on her shoulders, like a cloud
Floating around a statue, and the wind,
Just swaying her light robe, reveal'd a shape
Praxiteles might worship. She had clasp'd
Her hands upon her bosom, and had raised
Her beautiful, dark, Jewish eyes to heaven,
Till the long lashes lay upon her brow.
Her lip was slightly parted, like the cleft
Of a pomegranate blossom; and her neck,
Just where the cheek was melting to its curve
With the unearthly beauty sometimes there,
Was shaded, as if light had fallen off,
Its surface was so polish'd. She was stilling
Her light, quick breath, to hear; and the white rose
Scarce moved upon her bosom, as it swell'd,
Like nothing but a lovely wave of light,
To meet the arching of her queenly neck.
Her countenance was radiant with love.
She look'd like one to die for it—a being
Whose whole existence was the pouring out
Of rich and deep affections. I have thought
A brother's and a sister's love were much;
I know a brother's is—for I have been
A sister's idol—and I know how full
The heart may be of tenderness to her!
But the affection of a delicate child
For a fond father, gushing, as it does,
With the sweet springs of life, and pouring on,
Through all earth's changes, like a river's course—
Chasten'd with reverence, and made more pure
By the world's discipline of light and shade—
'Tis deeper—holier.

The wind bore on
The leaden tramp of thousands. Clarion notes
Rang sharply on the ear at intervals;
And the low, mingled din of mighty hosts
Returning from the battle, pour'd from far,
Like the deep murmur of a restless sea.
They came, as earthly conquerors always come,
With blood and splendor, revelry and woe.
The stately horse treads proudly—he hath trod
The brow of death, as well. The chariot-wheels
Of warriors roll magnificently on—
Their weight hath crush'd the fallen. Man is there—
Majestic, lordly man—with his sublime
And elevated brow, and godlike frame;
Lifting his crest in triumph—for his heel
Hath trod the dying like a wine-press down!

The mighty Jephthah led his warriors on Through Mizpeh's streets. His helm was proudly set,
And his stern lip curl'd slightly, as if praise
Were for the hero's scorn. His step was firm,
But free as India's leopard; and his mail,

Whose shekels none in Israel might bear,
 Was like a cedar's tassel on his frame.
 His crest was Judah's kinglyest; and the look
 Of his dark, lofty eye, and bended brow,
 Might quell the lion. He led on; but thoughts
 Seem'd gathering round which troubled him. The veins
 Grew visible upon his swarthy brow,
 And his proud lip was press'd as if with pain.
 He trod less firmly; and his restless eye
 Glanced forward frequently, as if some ill
 He dared not meet, were there. His home was near;
 And men were thronging, with that strange delight
 They have in human passions, to observe
 The struggle of his feelings with his pride.
 He gazed intensely forward. The tall firs
 Before his tent were motionless. The leaves
 Of the sweet aloe, and the clustering vines
 Which half conceal'd his threshold, met his eye,
 Unchanged and beautiful; and one by one,
 The balsam, with its sweet-distilling stems,
 And the Circassian rose, and all the crowd
 Of silent and familiar things, stole up,
 Like the recover'd passages of dreams.
 He strode on rapidly. A moment more,
 And he had reach'd his home; when lo! there sprang
 One with a bounding footstep, and a brow
 Of light, to meet him. Oh how beautiful!—
 Her dark eye flashing like a sun-lit gem—
 And her luxuriant hair!—'twas like the sweep
 Of a swift wing in visions. He stood still,
 As if the sight had wither'd him. She threw
 Her arms about his neck—he heeded not.
 She call'd him "Father"—but he answer'd not.
 She stood and gazed upon him. Was he wroth?
 There was no anger in that blood-shot eye.
 Had sickness seized him? She unclasp'd his helm,
 And laid her white hand gently on his brow,
 And the large veins felt stiff and hard, like cords.
 The touch aroused him. He raised up his hands,
 And spoke the name of God, in agony.
 She knew that he was stricken, then; and rush'd
 Again into his arms; and, with a flood
 Of tears she could not bridle, sobb'd a prayer
 That he would breathe his agony in words.
 He told her—and a momentary flush
 Shot o'er her countenance; and then the soul
 Of Jephthah's daughter waken'd; and she stood
 Calmly and nobly up, and said 'twas well—
 And she would die.

The sun had well nigh set.
 The fire was on the altar; and the priest
 Of the High God was there. A pallid man
 Was stretching out his trembling hands to Heaven,
 As if he would have pray'd, but had no words—
 And she who was to die, the calmest one
 In Israel at that hour, stood up alone,
 And waited for the sun to set. Her face
 Was pale, but very beautiful—her lip
 Had a more delicate outline, and the tint
 Was deeper; but her countenance was like
 The majesty of angels.

The sun set—
 And she was dead—but not by violence.

ABSALOM.

THE waters slept. Night's silvery veil hung low
 On Jordan's bosom, and the eddies curl'd
 Their glassy rings beneath it, like the still,
 Unbroken beating of the sleeper's pulse.
 The reeds bent down the stream; the willow leaves,
 With a soft cheek upon the lulling tide,
 Forgot the lifting winds; and the long stems,
 Whose flowers the water, like a gentle nurse,
 Bears on its bosom, quietly gave way,
 And lean'd, in graceful attitudes, to rest.
 How strikingly the course of nature tells,
 By its light heed of human suffering,
 That it was fashion'd for a happier world!
 King David's limbs were weary. He had fled
 From far Jerusalem; and now he stood.

With his faint people, for a little rest
 Upon the shore of Jordan. The light wind
 Of morn was stirring, and he bared his brow
 To its refreshing breath; for he had worn
 The mourner's covering, and he had not felt
 That he could see his people until now.
 They gather'd round him on the fresh green bank,
 And spoke their kindly words; and, as the sun
 Rose up in heaven, he knelt among them there,
 And bow'd his head upon his hands to pray.
 Oh! when the heart is full—when bitter thoughts
 Come crowding thickly up for utterance,
 And the poor common words of courtesy
 Are such a very mockery—how much
 The bursting heart may pour itself in prayer!
 He pray'd for Israel—and his voice went up Strongly and fervently. He pray'd for those Whose love had been his shield—and his deep tones
 Grew tremulous. But, oh! for Absalom—
 For his estranged, misguided Absalom—
 The proud, bright being, who had burst away
 In all his princely beauty, to defy
 The heart that cherish'd him—for him he pour'd,
 In agony that would not be controll'd,
 Strong supplication, and forgave him there,
 Before his God, for his deep sinfulness.

The pall was settled. He who slept beneath
 Was straighten'd for the grave; and, as the folds
 Sunk to the still proportions, they betray'd
 The matchless symmetry of Absalom.
 His hair was yet unshorn, and silken curls
 Were floating round the tassels as they sway'd
 To the admitted air, as glossy now
 As when, in hours of gentle dalliance, bathing
 The snowy fingers of Judea's daughters.
 His helm was at his feet: his banner, soil'd
 With trailing through Jerusalem, was laid,
 Reversed, beside him: and the jewell'd hilt,
 Whose diamonds lit the passage of his blade,
 Rested, like mockery, on his cover'd brow.
 The soldiers of the king trod to and fro,
 Clad in the garb of battle; and their chief,
 The mighty Joab, stood beside the bier,
 And gazed upon the dark pall steadfastly,
 As if he fear'd the slumberer might stir.
 A slow step startled him. He grasp'd his blade
 As if a trumpet rang; but the bent form
 Of David enter'd, and he gave command,
 In a low tone, to his few followers,
 And left him with his dead. The king stood still Till the last echo died; then, throwing off
 The sackcloth from his brow, and laying back
 The pall from the still features of his child,
 He bow'd his head upon him, and broke forth
 In the resistless eloquence of woe:

"Alas! my noble boy! that thou should'st die!

Thou, who wert made so beautifully fair!
 That death should settle in thy glorious eye,
 And leave his stillness in this clustering hair!
 How could he mark thee for the silent tomb!

My proud boy, Absalom!

"Cold is thy brow, my son! and I am chill.

As to my bosom I have tried to press thee!

How was I wont to feel my pulses thrill,
 Like a rich harp-string, yearning to caress thee,
 And hear thy sweet 'my father!' from these dumb
 And cold lips, Absalom!

"But death is on thee. I shall hear the gush

Of music, and the voices of the young;
 And life will pass me in the mantling blush,
 And the dark tresses to the soft winds flung;
 But thou no more, with thy sweet voice, shalt come
 To meet me, Absalom!

"And oh! when I am stricken, and my heart,

Like a bruised reed, is waiting to be broken,
 How will its love for thee, as I depart,
 Yearn for thee ear to drink its last deep token!
 It were so sweet, amid death's gathering gloom,
 To see thee, Absalom!

"And now, farewell! 'Tis hard to give thee up,
With death so like a gentle slumber on thee;—
And thy dark sin!—Oh! I could drink the cup,
If from this wo its bitterness had won thee.
May God have call'd thee, like a wanderer, home,
My lost boy Absalom!"

He cover'd up his face, and bow'd himself
A moment on his child: then, giving him
A look of melting tenderness, he clasp'd
His hands convulsively, as if in prayer;
And, as if strength were given him of God,
He rose up calmly, and composed the pall
Firmly and decently—and left him there—
As if his rest had been a breathing sleep.

CHRIST'S ENTRANCE INTO JERUSALEM

He sat upon the "ass's foal" and rode Toward Jerusalem. Beside him walk'd,
Closely and silently, the faithful twelve,
And on before him went a multitude
Shouting Hosannas, and with eager hands
Strewing their garments thickly in his way.
Th' unbroken foal beneath him gently stepp'd,
Tame as its patient dam; and as the song
Of "welcome to the Son of David" burst
Forth from a thousand children, and the leaves
Of the waved branches touch'd its silken ears,
It turn'd its wild eye for a moment back,
And then, subdued by an invisible hand,
Meekly trode onward with its slender feet.

The dew's last sparkle from the grass had gone
As he rode up Mount Olivet. The woods
Threw their cool shadows freshly to the west,
And the light foal, with quick and toiling step,
And head bent low, kept its unslacken'd way
Till its soft mane was lifted by the wind
Sent o'er the mount from Jordan. As he reach'd
The summit's breezy pitch, the Saviour raised
His calm blue eye—there stood Jerusalem!
Eagerly he bent forward, and beneath
His mantle's passive folds, a bolder line
Than the wonted slightness of his perfect limbs
Betray'd the swelling fulness of his heart.
There stood Jerusalem! How fair she look'd—
The silver sun on all her palaces,
And her fair daughters 'mid the golden spires
Tending their terrace flowers, and Kedron's stream
Lacing the meadows with its silver band,
And wreathing its mist-mantle on the sky
With the morn's exhalations. There she stood—
Jerusalem—the city of his love,
Chosen from all the earth; Jerusalem—
That knew him not—and had rejected him;
Jerusalem—for whom he came to die!
The shouts redoubled from a thousand lips
At the fair sight; the children leap'd and sang
Loudly Hosannas; the clear air was fill'd
With odor from the trampled olive-leaves—
But "Jesus wept." The loved disciple saw
His Master's tears, and closer to his side
He came with yearning looks, and on his neck
The Saviour leant with heavenly tenderness,
And mourn'd—"How oft, Jerusalem! would I
Have gather'd you, as gathereth a hen
Her brood beneath her wings—but ye would not!"

He thought not of the death that he should die—
He thought not of the thorns he knew must pierce
His forehead—of the buffet on the cheek—
The scourge, the mocking homage, the foul scorn!—
Gethsemane stood out beneath his eye
Clear in the morning sun, and there, he knew,
While they who "could not watch with him one hour"
Were sleeping, he should sweat great drops of blood,
Praying the "cup might pass." And Golgotha
Stood bare and desert by the city wall,
And in its midst, to his prophetic eye,
Rose the rough cross, and its keen agonies
Were number'd all—the nails were in his feet—
Th' insulting sponge was pressing on his lips—

The blood and water gushing from his side—
The dizzy faintness swimming in his brain—
And, while his own disciples fled in fear,
A world's death-agonies all mix'd in his!
Ay!—he forgot all this. He only saw
Jerusalem,—the chosen—the loved—the lost!
He only felt that for her sake his life
Was vainly giv'n, and, in his pitying love,
The sufferings that would clothe the Heavens in black
Were quite forgotten. Was there ever love,
In earth or heaven, equal unto this?

BAPTISM OF CHRIST.

It was a green spot in the wilderness,
Touch'd by the river Jordan. The dark pine
Never had dropp'd its tassels on the moss
Tufting the leaning bank, nor on the grass
Of the broad circle stretching evenly
To the straight larches, had a heavier foot
Than the wild heron's trodden. Softly in Through a long aisle of willows, dim and cool,
Stole the clear waters with their muffled feet,
And, hushing as they spread into the light,
Circled the edges of the pebbled tank
Slowly, then rippled through the woods away
Hither had come th' Apostle of the wild,
Winding the river's course. 'Twas near the flush
Of eve, and, with a multitude around,
Who from the cities had come out to hear,
He stood breast-high amid the running stream,
Baptizing as the Spirit gave him power.
His simple raiment was of camel's hair,
A leathern girdle close about his loins,
His beard unshorn, and for his daily meat
The locust and wild honey of the wood—
But like the face of Moses on the mount
Shone his rapt countenance, and in his eye
Burn'd the mild fire of love—and as he spoke
The ear lean'd to him, and persuasion swift
To the chain'd spirit of the listener stole.

Silent upon the green and sloping bank
The people sat, and while the leaves were shook
With the birds dropping early to their nests,
And the gray eve came on, within their hearts
They mused if he were Christ. The rippling stream
Still turn'd its silver courses from his breast
As he divin'd their thought. "I but baptize,"
He said, "with water; but there cometh One,
The latchet of whose shoes I may not dare
E'en to unloose. He will baptize with fire
And with the Holy Ghost." And lo! while yet
The words were on his lips, he raised his eyes,
And on the bank stood Jesus. He had laid
His raiment off, and with his loins alone
Girt with a mantle, and his perfect limbs,
In their angelic slightness, meek and bare,
He waited to go in. But John forbade,
And hurried to his feet and stay'd him there,
And said, "Nay, Master! I have need of thine,
Not thou of mine!" And Jesus, with a smile
Of heavenly sadness, met his earnest looks,
And answer'd, "Suffer it to be so now;
For thus it doth become me to fulfil
All righteousness." And, leaning to the stream,
He took around him the Apostle's arm,
And drew him gently to the midst. The wood
Was thick with the dim twilight as they came Up from the water. With his clasped hands
Laid on his breast, th' Apostle silently
Follow'd his Master's steps—when lo! a light,
Bright as the tenfold glory of the sun,
Yet lambent as the softly burning stars,
Envelop'd them, and from the heavens away
Parted the dim blue ether like a veil;
And as a voice, fearful exceedingly,
Broke from the midst, "THIS IS MY MUCH LOVED SON
IN WHOM I AM WELL PLEASED," a snow-white dove,
Floating upon its wings, descended through;
And shedding a swift music from its plumes,
Circled, and flutter'd to the Saviour's breast

SCENE IN GETHSEMANE.

THE moon was shining yet. The Orient's brow,
 Set with the morning-star, was not yet dim;
 And the deep silence which subdues the breath
 Like a strong feeling, hung upon the world
 As sleep upon the pulses of a child.
 'Twas the last watch of night. Gethsemane,
 With its bathed leaves of silver, seem'd dissolved
 In visible stillness; and as Jesus' voice,
 With its bewildering sweetness, met the ear
 Of his disciples, it vibrated on
 Like the first whisper in a silent world.
 They came on slowly. Heaviness oppress'd
 The Saviour's heart, and when the kindnesses
 Of his deep love were pour'd, he felt the need
 Of near communion, for his gift of strength
 Was wasted by the spirit's weariness.
 He left them there, and went a little on,
 And in the depth of that hush'd silence,
 Alone with God, he fell upon his face,
 And as his heart was broken with the rush
 Of his surpassing agony, and death,
 Wrung to him from a dying universe,
 Was mightier than the Son of man could bear,
 He gave his sorrows way—and in the deep
 Prostration of his soul, breathed out the prayer,
 "Father, if it be possible with thee,
 Let this cup pass from me." Oh, how a word,
 Like the forced drop before the fountain breaks,
 Stilleth the press of human agony!
 The Saviour felt its quiet in his soul;
 And though his strength was weakness, and the light
 Which led him on till now was sorely dim,
 He breathed a new submission—"Not my will,
 But thine be done, oh Father!" As he spoke,
 Voices were heard in heaven, and music stole
 Out from the chambers of the vaulted sky
 As if the stars were swept like instruments.
 No cloud was visible, but radiant wings
 Were coming with a silvery rush to earth,
 And as the Saviour rose, a glorious one,
 With an illumined forehead, and the light
 Whose fountain is the mystery of God,
 Encalm'd within his eye, bow'd down to him,
 And nerv'd him with a ministry of strength.
 It was enough—and with his godlike brow
 Re-written of his Father's messenger,
 With meekness, whose divinity is more
 Than power and glory, he return'd again
 To his disciples, and awaked their sleep,
 For "he that should betray him was at hand."

THE WIDOW OF NAIN.

THE Roman sentinel stood helm'd and tall
 Beside the gate of Nain. The busy tread
 Of comers to the city mart was done,
 For it was almost noon, and a dead heat
 Quiver'd upon the fine and sleeping dust,
 And the cold snake crept panting from the wall,
 And bask'd his scaly circles in the sun.
 Upon his spear the soldier lean'd, and kept
 His idle watch, and, as his drowsy dream
 Was broken by the solitary foot
 Of some poor mendicant, he raised his head
 To curse him for a tributary Jew,
 And slumberously dozed on.

'Twas now high noon.
 The dull, low murmur of a funeral
 Went through the city—the sad sound of feet
 Unmix'd with voices—and the sentinel
 Shook off his slumber, and gazed earnestly
 Up the wide streets along whose paved way
 The silent throng crept slowly. They came on,
 Bearing a body heavily on its bier,
 And by the crowd that in the burning sun,
 Walk'd with forgetful sadness, 'twas of one
 Mourn'd with uncommon sorrow. The broad gate
 Swung on its hinges, and the Roman bent
 His spear-point downwards as the bearers pass'd,
 Bending beneath their burden. There was one—

Only one mourner. Close behind the bier,
 Crumpling the pall up in her wither'd hands,
 Follow'd an aged woman. Her short steps
 Falter'd with weakness, and a broken moan
 Fell from her lips, thicken'd convulsively
 As her heart bled afresh. The pitying crowd
 Follow'd apart, but no one spoke to her.
 She had no kinsmen. She had lived alone—
 A widow with one son. He was her all—
 The only tie she had in the wide world—
 And he was dead. They could not comfort her.

Jesus drew near to Nain as from the gate
 The funeral came forth. His lips were pale
 With the noon's sultry heat. The beaded sweat
 Stood thickly on his brow, and on the worn
 And simple latchets of his sandals lay,
 Thick, the white dust of travel. He had come
 Since sunrise from Capernaum, staying not
 To wet his lips by green Bethsaida's pool,
 Nor wash his feet in Kishon's silver springs,
 Nor turn him southward upon Tabor's side
 To catch Gilboa's light and spicy breeze.
 Genesareth stood cool upon the East,
 Fast by the Sea of Galilee, and there
 The weary traveller might bide till eve;
 And on the alders of Bethulia's plains
 The grapes of Palestine hung ripe and wild;
 Yet turn'd he not aside, but, gazing on,
 From every swelling mount he saw afar,
 Amid the hills, the humble spires of Nain,
 The place of his next errand; and the path
 Touch'd not Bethulia, and a league away
 Upon the East lay pleasant Galilee.

Forth from the city-gate the pitying crowd
 Follow'd the stricken mourner. They came near
 The place of burial, and, with straining hands,
 Closer upon her breast she clasp'd the pall,
 And with a gasping sob, quick as a child's,
 And an inquiring wildness flashing through
 The thin gray lashes of her fever'd eyes,
 She came where Jesus stood beside the way.
 He look'd upon her, and his heart was moved.
 "Weep not!" he said; and as they stay'd the bier,
 And at his bidding laid it at his feet,
 He gently drew the pall from out her grasp,
 And laid it back in silence from the dead.
 With troubled wonder the mute throng drew near,
 And gazed on his calm looks. A minute's space
 He stood and pray'd. Then, taking the cold hand,
 He said, "Arise!" And instantly the breast
 Heaved in its cerements, and a sudden flush
 Ran through the lines of the divided lips,
 And with a murmur of his mother's name,
 He trembled and sat upright in his shroud.
 And, while the mourner hung upon his neck,
 Jesus went calmly on his way to Nain.

HAGAR IN THE WILDERNESS.

THE morning broke. Light stole upon the clouds
 With a strange beauty. Earth received again
 Its garment of a thousand dyes; and leaves,
 And delicate blossoms, and the painted flowers,
 And every thing that bendeth to the dew,
 And stirreth with the daylight, lifted up
 Its beauty to the breath of that sweet morn.

All things are dark to sorrow; and the light
 And loveliness, and fragrant air were sad
 To the dejected Hagar. The moist earth
 Was pouring odors from its spicy pores,
 And the young birds were singing as if life
 Were a new thing to them; but oh! it came Upon her heart like discord, and she felt
 How cruelly it tries a broken heart,
 To see a mirth in any thing it loves.
 She stood at Abraham's tent. Her lips were press'd
 Till the blood started; and the wandering veins
 Of her transparent forehead were swell'd out,
 As if her pride would burst them. Her dark eye
 Was clear and tearless, and the light of heaven,
 Which made its language legible, shot back,

From her long lashes, as it had been flame.
Her noble boy stood by her, with his hand
Clasp'd in her own, and his round, delicate feet,
Scarce train'd to balance on the tented floor,
Sandall'd for journeying. He had look'd up
Into his mother's face until he caught
The spirit there, and his young heart was swelling
Beneath his dimpled bosom, and his form
Straighten'd up proudly in his tiny wrath,
As if his light proportions would have swell'd,
Had they but match'd his spirit, to the man.

Why bends the patriarch as he cometh now
Upon his staff so wearily? His beard
Is low upon his breast, and his high brow,
So written with the converse of his God,
Beareth the swollen vein of agony.
His lip is quivering, and his wonted step
Of vigor is not there; and, though the morn
Is passing fair and beautiful, he breathes
Its freshness as it were a pestilence.
Oh! man may bear with suffering: his heart
Is a strong thing, and godlike, in the grasp
Of pain that wrings mortality; but tear
One chord affection clings to—part one tie
That binds him to a woman's delicate love—
And his great spirit yieldeth like a reed.

He gave to her the water and the bread,
But spoke no word, and trusted not himself
To look upon her face, but laid his hand
In silent blessing on the fair-hair'd boy,
And left her to her lot of loneliness.

Should Hagar weep? May slighted woman turn,
And, as a vine the oak hath shaken off,
Bend lightly to her leaning trust again?
O no! by all her loveliness—by all
That makes life poetry and beauty, no!
Make her a slave; steal from her rosy cheek
By needless jealousies; let the last star
Leave her a watcher by your couch of pain;
Wrong her by petulance, suspicion, all
That makes her cup a bitterness—yet give
One evidence of love, and earth has not
An emblem of devotedness like hers.
But oh! estrange her once—it boots not how—
By wrong or silence—any thing that tells
A change has come upon your tenderness,—
And there is not a feeling out of heaven
Her pride o'er-mastereth not.

She went her way with a strong step and slow—
Her press'd lip arch'd, and her clear eye undimmd,
As if it were a diamond, and her form
Borne proudly up, as if her heart breathed through.
Her child kept on in silence, though she press'd
His hand till it was pain'd; for he had caught,
As I have said, her spirit, and the seed
Of a stern nation had been breathed upon.

The morning pass'd, and Asia's sun rode up
In the clear heaven, and every beam was heat.
The cattle of the hills were in the shade,
And the bright plumage of the Orient lay
On beating bosoms in her spicy trees.
It was an hour of rest! but Hagar found
No shelter in the wilderness, and on
She kept her weary way, until the boy
Hung down his head, and open'd his parch'd lips
For water; but she could not give it him.
She laid him down beneath the sultry sky,—
For it was better than the close, hot breath
Of the thick pines,—and tried to comfort him;
But he was sore athirst, and his blue eyes
Were dim and blood-shot, and he could not know
Why God denied him water in the wild.
She sat a little longer, and he grew
Ghastly and faint, as if he would have died.
It was too much for her. She lifted him,
And bore him further on, and laid his head
Beneath the shadow of a desert shrub;
And, shrouding up her face, she went away,
And sat to watch, where he could see her not,
Till he should die; and, watching him, she mourn'd:—

"God stay thee in thine agony, my boy!
I cannot see thee die; I cannot brook
Upon thy brow to look,
And see death settle on my cradle joy.
How have I drunk the light of thy blue eye!
And could I see thee die?"

"I did not dream of this when thou wast straying,
Like an unbound gazelle, among the flowers;
Or wiling the soft hours,
By the rich gush of water-sources playing,
Then sinking weary to thy smiling sleep,
So beautiful and deep.

"Oh no! and when I watch'd by thee the while,
And saw thy bright lip curling in thy dream,
And thought of the dark stream
In my own land of Egypt, the far Nile,
How pray'd I that my father's land might be
An heritage for thee!

"And now the grave for its cold breast hath won thee!
And thy white, delicate limbs the earth will press;
And oh! my last caress
Must feel thee cold, for a chill hand is on thee.
How can I leave my boy, so pillow'd there
Upon his clustering hair!"

She stood beside the well her God had given
To gush in that deep wilderness, and bathed
The forehead of her child until he laugh'd
In his reviving happiness, and hiss'd
His infant thought of gladness at the sight
Of the cool plashing of his mother's hand.

RIZPAH WITH HER SONS,

(The day before they were hanged on Gibeah.)

"BREAD for my mother!" said the voice of one
Darkening the door of Rizpah. She look'd up—
And lo! the princely countenance and mien
Of dark-brow'd Armoni. The eye of Saul—
The very voice and presence of the king—
Limb, port, and majesty,—were present there,
Mock'd like an apparition in her son.
Yet, as he stoop'd his forehead to her hand
With a kind smile, a something of his mother
Unbent the haughty arching of his lip,
And, through the darkness of the widow's heart
Trembled a nerve of tenderness that shook
Her thought of pride all suddenly to tears.

"Whence comest thou?" said Rizpah.

"From the house
Of David. In his gate there stood a soldier—
This in his hand. I pluck'd it, and I said,
'A king's son takes it for his hungry mother'
God stay the famine!"

* * * * * As he spoke, a step,
Light as an antelope's, the threshold press'd,
And like a beam of light into the room
Enter'd Mephibosheth. What bird of heaven
Or creature of the wild—what flower of earth—
Was like this fairest of the sons of Saul!
The violet's cup was harsh to his blue eye.
Less agile was the fierce barb's fiery step.
His voice drew hearts to him. His smile was like
The incarnation of some blessed dream—
Its joyousness so sunn'd the gazer's eye!
Fair were his locks. His snowy teeth divided
A bow of Love, drawn with a scarlet thread.
His cheek was like the moist heart of the rose;
And, but for nostrils of that breathing fire
That turns the lion back, and limbs as lithe
As is the velvet muscle of the pard,
Mephibosheth had been too fair for man
As if he were a vision that would fade,
Rizpah gazed on him. Never, to her eye,
Grew his bright form familiar; but, like stars,
That seem'd each night new lit in a new heaven,
He was each morn's sweet gift to her. She loved
Her firstborn, as a mother loves her child,
Tenderly, fondly. But for him—the last—

What had she done for heaven to be his mother!
 Her heart rose in her throat to hear his voice;
 She look'd at him forever through her tears;
 Her utterance, when she spoke to him, sank down,
 As if the lightest thought of him had lain
 In an unfathom'd cavern of her soul.
 The morning light was part of him, to her—
 What broke the day for, but to show his beauty?
 The hours but measured time till he should come;
 Too tardy sang the bird when he was gone;
 She would have shut the flow'rs—and call'd the star
 Back to the mountain-top—and bade the sun
 Pause at Eve's golden door—to wait for him!
 Was this a heart gone wild?—or is the love
 Of mothers like a madness? Such as this
 Is many a poor one in her humble home,
 Who silently and sweetly sits alone,
 Pouring her life all out upon her child.
 What cares she that he does not feel how close
 Her heart beats after his—that all unseen
 Are the fond thoughts that follow him by day,
 And watch his sleep like angels? And, when moved
 By some sore needed Providence, he stops
 In his wild path and lifts a thought to heaven,
 What cares the mother that he does not see
 The link between the blessing and her prayer!

He who once wept with Mary—angels keeping
 Their unthank'd watch—are a foreshadowing
 Of what love is in heaven. We may believe
 That we shall know each other's forms hereafter,
 And, in the bright fields of the better land,
 Call the lost dead to us. O conscious heart!
 That in the lone paths of this shadowy world
 Hast bless'd all light, however dimly shining,
 That broke upon the darkness of thy way—
 Number thy lamps of love, and tell me, now,
 How many canst thou re-light at the stars
 And blush not at their burning? One—one only—
 Lit while your pulses by one heart kept time,
 And fed with faithful fondness to thy grave—(Tho' sometimes with a hand stretch'd back from heaven.)

Steadfast thro' all things—near, when most forgot—
 And with its finger of unerring truth
 Pointing the lost way in thy darkest hour—
 One lamp—thy mother's love—amid the stars
 Shall lift its pure flame changeless, and, before
 The throne of God, burn through eternity—
 Holy—as it was lit and lent thee here.

The hand in salutation gently raised
 To the bow'd forehead of the princely boy,
 Linger'd amid his locks. "I sold," he said,
 "My Lybian barb for but a cake of meal—
 Lo! this—my mother! As I pass'd the street,
 I hid it in my mantle, for there stand
 Famishing mother's, with their starving babes,
 At every threshold; and wild, desperate men
 Prowl, with the eyes of tigers, up and down,
 Watching to rob those who, from house to house,
 Beg for the dying. Fear not thou, my mother!
 Thy sons will be Elijah's ravens to thee!"

[UNFINISHED.]

LAZARUS AND MARY.

Jesus was there but yesterday. The prints
 Of his departing feet were at the door;
 His "Peace be with you!" was yet audible
 In the rapt porch of Mary's charmed ear;
 And, in the low rooms, 'twas as if the air,
 Hush'd with his going forth, had been the breath
 Of angels left on watch—so conscious still
 The place seem'd of his presence! Yet, within,
 The family by Jesus loved were weeping,
 For Lazarus lay dead.

And Mary sat
 By the pale sleeper. He was young to die.
 The countenance whereon the Saviour dwelt
 With his benignant smile—the soft fair lines

Breathing of hope—were still all eloquent,
 Like life well mock'd in marble. That the voice,
 Gone from those pallid lips, was heard in heaven,
 Toned with unearthly sweetness—that the light,
 Quench'd in the closing of those stirless lids,
 Was veiling before God its timid fire,
 New-lit, and brightening like a star at eve—
 That Lazarus, her brother, was in bliss,
 Not with this cold clay sleeping—Mary knew.
 Her heaviness of heart was not for him!
 But close had been the tie by death divided.
 The intertwining locks of that bright hair
 That wiped the feet of Jesus—the fair hands
 Clasp'd in her breathless wonder while He taught—
 Scarce to one pulse thrill'd more in unison,
 Than with one soul this sister and her brother
 Had lock'd their lives together. In this love,
 Hallow'd from stain, the woman's heart of Mary
 Was, with its rich affections, all bound up.
 Of an unblemish'd beauty, as became
 An office by archangels fill'd till now,
 She walk'd with a celestial halo clad;
 And while, to the Apostles' eyes, it seem'd
 She but fulfill'd her errand out of heaven—
 Sharing her low roof with the Son of God—
 She was a woman, fond and mortal still;
 And the deep fervor, lost to passion's fire,
 Breathed through the sister's tenderness. In vain
 Knew Mary, gazing on that face of clay,
 That it was not her brother. He was there—
 Swathed in that linen vesture for the grave—
 The same lov'd one in all his comeliness—
 And with him to the grave her heart must go.
 What though he talk'd of her to Angels? nay—
 Hover'd in spirit near her?—'twas that arm,
 Palsied in death, whose fond caress she knew!
 It was that lip of marble with whose kiss,
 Morning and eve, love hemm'd the sweet day in
 This was the form by the Judean maids
 Prais'd for its palm-like stature, as he walk'd
 With her by Kedron in the eventide—
 The dead was Lazarus! * * * * *
 The burial was over, and the night
 Fell upon Bethany—and morn—and noon.
 And comforters and mourners went their way—
 But death stay'd on! They had been oft alone
 When Lazarus had follow'd Christ to hear
 His teachings in Jerusalem; but this
 Was more than solitude. The silence now
 Was void of expectation. Something felt
 Always before, and lov'd without a name,
 Joy from the air, hope from the opening door,
 Welcome and life from off the very walls,
 Seem'd gone—and in the chamber where he lay
 There was a fearful and unbreathing hush,
 Still than night's last hour. So fell on Mary
 The shadows all have known, who, from their hearts,
 Have released friends to heaven. The parting soul
 Spreads wing betwixt the mourner and the sky!
 As if its path lay, from the tie last broken,
 Straight through the cheering gateway of the sun;
 And, to the eye strain'd after, 'tis a cloud
 That bars the light from all things.

Now as Christ
 Drew near to Bethany, the Jews went forth
 With Martha, mourning Lazarus. But Mary
 Sat in the house. She knew the hour was nigh
 When He would go again, as He had said,
 Unto his Father; and she felt that He,
 Who loved her brother Lazarus in life,
 Had chose the hour to bring him home thro' Death
 In no unkind forgetfulness. Alone—
 She could lift up the bitter prayer to heaven,
 "Thy will be done, O God!"—but that dear brother
 Had fill'd the cup and broke the bread for Christ;
 And ever, at the morn, when she had knelt
 And wash'd those holy feet, came Lazarus
 To bind his sandals on, and follow forth
 With dropp'd eyes, like an angel, sad and fair—
 Intent upon the Master's need alone.
 Indissolubly link'd were they! And now,

To go to meet him—Lazarus not there—
And to his greeting answer "It is well!"
And without tears, (since grief would trouble Him Whose soul was always sorrowful,) to kneel
And minister alone—her heart gave way!
She cover'd up her face and turn'd again
To wait within for Jesus But once more
Came Martha, saying, "Lo! the Lord is here
And calleth for thee, Mary!" Then arose
The mourner from the ground, whereon she sat
Shrouded in sackcloth, and bound quickly up
The golden locks of her dishevell'd hair,
And o'er her ashy garments drew a veil
Hiding the eyes she could not trust. And still,
As she made ready to go forth, a calm
As in a dream fell on her.

At a fount
Hard by the sepulchre, without the wall,
Jesus awaited Mary. Seated near
Were the way-worn disciples in the shade;
But, of himself forgetful, Jesus lean'd
Upon his staff, and watch'd where she should come
To whose one sorrow—but a sparrow's falling—
The pity that redeem'd a world could bleed!
And as she came, with that uncertain step,—
Eager, yet weak,—her hands upon her breast,—
And they who follow'd her all fallen back
To leave her with her sacred grief alone,—
The heart of Christ was troubled. She drew near,
And the disciples rose up from the fount,
Moved by her look of woe, and gather'd round;
And Mary—for a moment—ere she look'd
Upon the Saviour, stay'd her faltering feet,—
And straighten'd her veil'd form, and tighter drew
Her clasp upon the folds across her breast;
Then, with a vain strife to control her tears,
She stagger'd to their midst, and at His feet
Fell prostrate, saying, "Lord! hadst thou been here,
My brother had not died!" The Saviour groan'd
In spirit, and stoop'd tenderly, and raised
The mourner from the ground, and in a voice,
Broke in its utterance like her own, He said,
"Where have ye laid him?" Then the Jews who came,
Following Mary, answer'd through their tears,
"Lord! come and see!" But lo! the mighty heart
That in Gethsemane sweat drops of blood,
Taking for us the cup that might not pass—
The heart whose breaking cord upon the cross
Made the earth tremble, and the sun afraid
To look upon his agony—the heart
Of a lost world's Redeemer—overflow'd,
Touch'd by a mourner's sorrow! Jesus wept.

Calm'd by those pitying tears, and fondly brooding
Upon the thought that Christ so loved her brother,
Stood Mary there; but that lost burden now
Lay on His heart who pitied her; and Christ,
Following slow, and groaning in Himself,
Came to the sepulchre. It was a cave,
And a stone lay upon it. Jesus said,
"Take ye away the stone!" Then lifted He
His moisten'd eyes to heaven, and while the Jews
And the disciples bent their heads in awe,
And trembling Mary sank upon her knees,
The Son of God pray'd audibly. He ceased,
And for a minute's space there was a hush,
As if th' angelic watchers of the world
Had stay'd the pulses of all breathing things,
To listen to that prayer. The face of Christ
Shone as He stood, and over Him there came Command, as 'twere the living face of God,
And with a loud voice, He cried, "Lazarus!
Come forth!" And instantly, bound hand and foot,
And borne by unseen angels from the cave,
He that was dead stood with them. At the word
Of Jesus, the fear-stricken Jews unloos'd
The bands from off the foldings of his shroud;
And Mary, with her dark veil thrown aside,
Ran to him swiftly, and cried, "Lazarus!
My brother, LAZARUS!" and tore away
The napkin she had bound about his head—
And touch'd the warm lips with her fearful hand—

And on his neck fell weeping. And while all
Lay on their faces prostrate, Lazarus
Took Mary by the hand, and they knelt down
And worshipp'd Him who loved them.

THOUGHTS WHILE MAKING THE GRAVE OF A NEW-BORN CHILD.

Room, gentle flowers! my child would pass to heaven:
Ye look'd not for her yet with your soft eyes,
O watchful ushers at Death's narrow door!
But lo! while you delay to let her forth,
Angels, beyond, stay for her! One long kiss
From lips all pale with agony, and tears,
Wrung under anguish had dried up with fire
The eyes that wept them, were the cup of life
Held as a welcome to her. Weep! oh mother!
But not that from this cup of bitterness
A cherub of the sky has turn'd away.

One look upon thy face ere thou depart!
My daughter! It is soon to let thee go!
My daughter! With thy birth has gush'd a spring
I knew not of—filling my heart with tears,
And turning with strange tenderness to thee—
A love—oh God! it seems so—that must flow
Far as thou fleest, and 'twixt heaven and me,
Henceforward, be a bright and yearning chain
Drawing me after thee! And so, farewell!
'Tis a harsh world, in which affection knows
No place to treasure up its loved and lost
But the foul grave! Thou, who so late wast sleeping
Warm in the close fold of a mother's heart,
Scarce from her breast a single pulse receiving
But it was sent thee with some tender thought,
How can I leave thee—here! Alas for man!
The herb in its humility may fall
And waste into the bright and genial air,
While we—by hands that minister'd in life
Nothing but love to us—are thrust away—
The earth flung in upon our just cold bosoms,
And the warm sunshine trodden out forever!

Yet have I chosen for thy grave, my child,
A bank where I have lain in summer hours,
And thought how little it would seem like death
To sleep amid such loveliness. The brook,
Tripping with laughter down the rocky steps
That lead up to thy bed, would still trip on,
Breaking the dread hush of the mourners gone;
The birds are never silent that build here,
Trying to sing down the more vocal waters:
The slope is beautiful with moss and flowers,
And far below, seen under arching leaves,
Glitters the warm sun on the village spire,
Pointing the living after thee. And this Seems like a comfort; and, replacing now
The flowers that have made room for thee, I go
To whisper the same peace to her who lies—
Robb'd of her child and lonely. 'Tis the work
Of many a dark hour, and of many a prayer,
To bring the heart back from an infant gone.
Hope must give o'er, and busy fancy blot
The images from all the silent rooms,
And every sight and sound familiar to her
Undo its sweetest link—and so at last
The fountain—that, once struck, must flow forever—
Will hide and waste in silence. When the smile
Steals to her pallid lip again, and spring
Wakens the buds above thee, we will come,
And, standing by thy music-haunted grave,
Look on each other cheerfully, and say:
*A child that we have loved is gone to heaven,
And by this gate of flowers she pass'd away!*

ON THE DEPARTURE OF REV. MR. WHITE

FROM HIS PARISH, WHEN CHOSEN PRESIDENT OF WARASH COLLEGE

LEAVE us not, man of prayer! Like Paul, hast thou
"Serv'd God with all humility of mind,"
Dwelling among us, and "with many tears,"

"From house to house," "by night and day not ceasing,"

Hast pleaded thy blest errand. Leave us not!
Leave us not now! The Sabbath-bell, so long
Link'd with thy voice—the prelude to thy prayer—
The call to us from heaven to come with thee
Into the house of God, and, from thy lips,
Hear what had fall'n upon thy heart—will sound
Lonely and mournfully when thou art gone!
Our prayers are in thy words—our hope in Christ
Warm'd on thy lips—our darling thoughts of God
Follow'd thy loved call upward—and so knit
Is all our worship with those outspread hands,
And the imploring voice, which, well we knew,
Sank in the ear of Jesus—that, with thee,
The angel's ladder seems removed from sight,
And we astray in darkness! Leave us not!
Leave not the dead! They have lain calmly down—
Thy comfort in their ears—believing well
That when thine own more holy work was done,
Thou wouldst lie down beside them, and be near
When the last trump shall summon, to fold up
Thy flock affrighted, and, with that same voice
Whose whisper'd promises could sweeten death,
Take up once more the interrupted strain,
And wait Christ's coming, saying, "Here am I,
And those whom thou hast given me!" Leave not
The old, who, 'mid the gathering shadows, cling
To their accustom'd staff, and know not how
To lose thee, and so near the darkest hour!
Leave not the penitent, whose soul may be
Deaf to the strange voice, but awake to thine!
Leave not the mourner thou hast sooth'd—the heart
Turns to its comforter again! Leave not
The child thou hast baptized! another's care
May not keep bright, upon the mother's heart,
The covenant seal; the infant's ear has caught
Words it has strangely ponder'd from thy lips,
And the remember'd tone may find again,
And quicken for the harvest, the first seed
Sown for eternity! Leave not the child!

Yet if thou wilt—if, "bound in spirit," thou
Must go, and we shall see thy face no more,
"The will of God be done!" We do not say
Remember us—thou wilt—in love and prayer!
And thou wilt be remember'd—by the dead,
When the last trump awakes them—by the old,
When, of the "silver cord" whose strength thou knowest,

The last thread fails—by the bereav'd and stricken,
When the dark cloud, wherein thou found'st a spot
Broke by the light of mercy, lowers again—
By the sad mother, pleading for her child,
In murmurs difficult, since thou art gone—
By all thou leavest, when the Sabbath-bell
Brings us together, and the closing hymn
Hushes our hearts to pray, and thy loved voice,
That all our wants had grown to, (only thus,
'Twould seem, articulate to God,) falls not Upon our listening ears—remember'd thus—
Remember'd well—in all our holiest hours—
Will be the faithful shepherd we have lost!
And ever with one prayer, for which our love
Will find the pleading words,—that in the light
Of heaven we may behold his face once more!

BIRTH-DAY VERSES.

"The heart that we have lain near before our birth, is the only one that cannot forget that it has loved us."—PHILIP SLINGSBY.

My birth-day!—Oh beloved mother!
My heart is with thee o'er the seas.
I did not think to count another
Before I wept upon thy knees—
Before this scroll of absent years
Was blotted with thy streaming tears.

My own I do not care to check.
I weep—albeit here alone—

As if I hung upon thy neck,
As if thy lips were on my own,
As if this full sad heart of mine,
Were beating closely upon thine.

Four weary years! How looks she now?

What light is in those tender eyes?
What trace of time hath touch'd the brow
Whose look is borrow'd of the skies
That listen to her nightly prayer?
How is she changed since he was there
Who sleeps upon her heart always—

Whose name upon her lips is worn—
For whom the night seems made to pray—
For whom she wakes to pray at morn—
Whose sight is dim, whose heart-strings stir,
Who weeps these tears—to think of her!

I know not if my mother's eyes

Would find me changed in slighter things;
I've wander'd beneath many skies,
And tasted of some bitter springs;
And many leaves, once fair and gay,
From youth's full flower have dropp'd away—
But, as these looser leaves depart,

The lessen'd flower gets near the core,
And, when deserted quite, the heart
Takes closer what was dear of yore—
And yearns to those who lov'd it first—

The sunshine and the dew by which its bud was nursed.

Dear mother! dost thou love me yet?

Am I remember'd in my home?
When those I love for joy are met,
Does some one wish that I would come!
Thou dost—I am beloved of these!

But, as the schoolboy numbers o'er
Night after night the Pleiades

And finds the stars he found before—
As turns the maiden off her token—
As counts the miser aye his gold—
So, till life's silver cord is broken,

Would I of thy fond love be told.

My heart is full, mine eyes are wet—

Dear mother! dost thou love thy long-lost wanderer yet?

Oh! when the hour to meet again

Creeps on—and, speeding o'er the sea,

My heart takes up its lengthen'd chain,

And, link by link, draws nearer thee—

When land is hail'd, and, from the shore,

Comes off the blessed breath of home,

With fragrance from my mother's door

Of flowers forgotten when I come—

When port is gain'd, and, slowly now,

The old familiar paths are pass'd,

And, entering—unconscious how—

I gaze upon thy face at last,

And run to thee, all faint and weak,

And feel thy tears upon my cheek—

Oh! if my heart break not with joy,

The light of heaven will fairer seem;

And I shall grow once more a boy:

And, mother!—'twill be like a dream

That we were parted thus for years—

And once that we have dried our tears,

How will the days seem long and bright—

To meet thee always with the morn,

And hear thy blessing every night—

Thy "dearest," thy "first-born!"—

And be no more, as now, in a strange land, forlorn

TO MY MOTHER FROM THE APPENINES

Mother! dear mother! the feelings nurt
As I hung at thy bosom, clung round thee first.
'Twas the earliest link in love's warm chain—
'Tis the only one that will long remain:
And as year by year, and day by day,
Some friend still trusted drops away,
Mother! dear mother! oh dost thou see
How the shorten'd chain brings me nearer thee!

EARLY POEMS.

'Tis midnight the lone mountains on—
The East is fleck'd with cloudy bars,
And, gliding through them one by one,
The moon walks up her path of stars—
The light upon her placid brow
Received from fountains unseen now

And happiness is mine to-night,
 Thus springing from an unseen fount;
 And breast and brain are warm with light,
 With midnight round me on the mount—
 Its rays, like thine, fair Dian, flow
 From far that Western star below.
 Dear mother! in thy love I live;
 The life thou gav'st flows yet from thee—
 And, sun-like, thou hast power to give
 Life to the earth, air, sea, for me!
 Though wandering, as this moon above,
 I'm dark without thy constant love.

LINES ON LEAVING EUROPE.

BRIGHT flag at yonder tapering mast!
 Fling out your field of azure blue;
 Let star and stripe be westward cast,
 And point as Freedom's eagle flew!
 Strain home! oh lithe and quivering spars!
 Point home, my country's flag of stars!
 The wind blows fair! the vessel feels
 The pressure of the rising breeze,
 And, swiftest of a thousand keels,
 She leaps to the careering seas!
 Oh, fair, fair cloud of snowy sail,
 In whose white breast I seem to lie,
 How oft, when blew this eastern gale,
 I've seen your semblance in the sky,
 And long'd with breaking heart to flee
 On cloud-like pinions o'er the sea!
 Adieu, oh lands of fame and eld!
 I turn to watch our foamy track,
 And thoughts with which I first beheld
 Yon clouded line, come hurrying back;
 My lips are dry with vague desire,—
 My cheek once more is hot with joy—
 My pulse, my brain, my soul on fire!—
 Oh, what has changed that traveller-boy!
 As leaves the ship this dying foam,
 His visions fade behind—his weary heart speeds home!
 Adieu, oh soft and southern shore,
 Where dwelt the stars long miss'd in heaven!—
 Those forms of beauty seen no more,
 Yet once to Art's rapt vision given!
 Oh, still th' enamored sun delays,
 And pries through fount and crumbling fane,
 To win to his adoring gaze
 Those children of the sky again!
 Irradiate beauty, such as never
 That light on other earth hath shone,
 Hath made this land her home for ever;
 And could I live for this alone—
 Were not my birthright brighter far
 Than such voluptuous slaves' can be—Held not the West one glorious star
 New-born and blazing for the free—
 Soar'd not to heaven our eagle yet—
 Rome, with her Helot sons, should teach me to forget!
 Adieu, oh fatherland! I see
 Your white cliffs on th' horizon's rim,
 And though to freer skies I flee,
 My heart swells, and my eyes are dim!
 As knows the dove the task you give her,
 When loosed upon a foreign shore—
 As spreads the rain-drop in the river
 In which it may have flowed before—
 To England, over vale and mountain,
 My fancy flew from climes more fair—
 My blood, that knew its parent-fountain,
 Ran warm and fast in England's air.
 Dear mother! in thy prayer, to-night,
 There come new words and warmer tears!
 On long, long darkness breaks the light—
 Comes home the loved, the lost for years!
 Sleep safe, oh wave-worn mariner!
 Fear not, to-night, or storm or sea!
 The ear of heaven bends low to her!
 He comes to shore who sails with me!

The spider knows the roof untriven,
 While swings his web, though lightning blaze
 And by a thread still fast on Heaven,
 I know my mother lives and prays!
 Dear mother! when our lips can speak
 When first our tears will let us see—
 When I can gaze upon thy cheek,
 And thou, with thy dear eyes, on me—
 'Twill be a pastime little sad
 To trace what weight time's heavy fingers
 Upon each other's forms have had—
 For all may flee, so feeling lingers!
 But there's a change, beloved mother!
 To stir far deeper thoughts of thine,
 I come—but with me comes another
 To share the heart once only mine!
 Thou, on whose thoughts, when sad and lonely,
 One star arose in memory's heaven—
 Thou, who hast watch'd one treasure only—
 Watered one flower with tears at even—
 Room in thy heart! The hearth she left
 Is darken'd to lend light to ours!
 There are bright flowers of care bereft,
 And hearts—that languish more than flowers!
 She was their light—their very air—
 Room, mother! in thy heart! place for her in thy prayer!

A TRUE INCIDENT.

UPON a summer's morn, a southern mother
 Sat at the curtain'd window of an inn.
 She rested from long travel, and with hand
 Upon her cheek in tranquil happiness,
 Look'd where the busy travellers went and came
 And, like the shadows of the swallows flying
 Over the bosom of unruffled water,
 Pass'd from her thoughts all objects, leaving there,
 As in the water's breast, a mirror'd heaven—
 For, in the porch beneath her, to and fro,
 A nurse walk'd singing with her babe in arms
 And many a passer-by look'd on the child
 And praised its wondrous beauty, but still on
 The old nurse troll'd her lullaby, and still,
 Blest through her depths of soul by light there shining,
 The mother in her reverie mused on
 But lo! another traveller alighted!
 And now, no more indifferent or calm,
 The mother's breath comes quick, and with the blood
 Warm in her cheek and brow, she murmurs low
 "Now, God be praised! I am no more alone
 In knowing I've an angel for my child,— Chance he to look on't only!" With a smile—
 The tribute of a beauty-loving heart
 To things from God new-moulded—would have pass'd
 The poet, as the infant caught his eye;
 But suddenly he turn'd, and, with his hand
 Upon the nurse's arm, he stay'd her steps,
 And gazed upon her burthen. 'Twas a child
 In whose large eyes of blue there shone, indeed,
 Something to waken wonder. Never sky
 In noontide depth, or softly-breaking dawn—
 Never the dew in new-born violet's cup,
 Lay so entranced in purity! Not calm,
 With the mere hush of infancy at rest,
 The ample forehead, but serene with thought;
 And by the rapt expression of the lips,
 They seem'd scarce still from a cherubic hymn,
 And over all its countenance there breath'd
 Benignity, majestic as we dream
 Angels wear ever, before God. With gaze
 Earnest and mournful, and his eyelids warm
 With tears kept back, the poet kiss'd the child;
 And chasten'd at his heart, as having pass'd
 Close to an angel, went upon his way.
 Soon after, to the broken choir in heaven
 This cherub was recalled, and now the mother
 Bethought her, in her anguish, of the bard—
 (Herself a far-off stranger, but his heart
 Familiar to the world.)—and wrote to tell him,
 The angel he had recognized that morn,
 Had fled to bliss again. The poet well

Remember'd that child's ministry to him;
And of the only fountain that he knew
For healing, he sought comfort for the mother.
And thus he wrote:—

Mourn not for the child from thy tenderness riven, Ere stain on its purity fell!

To thy questioning heart, lo! an answer from heaven:

"IS IT WELL WITH THE CHILD?" "IT IS WELL!"

THE MOTHER TO HER CHILD.

THEY tell me thou art come from a far world,
Babe of my bosom! that these little arms,
Whose restlessness is like the spread of wings,
Move with the memory of flights scarce o'er—
That through these fringed lids we see the soul
Steeped in the blue of its remembered home;
And while thou sleep'st come messengers, they say,
Whispering to thee—and 'tis then I see
Upon thy baby lips that smile of heaven!

And what is thy far errand, my fair child?
Why away, wandering from a home of bliss,
To find thy way through darkness home again!
Wert thou an untried dweller in the sky?
Is there, betwixt the cherub that thou wert,
The cherub and the angel thou mayst be,
A life's probation in this sadder world?
Art thou, with memory of two things only,
Music and light, left upon earth astray,
And, by the watchers at the gate of heaven,
Looked for with fear and trembling?

God! who gavest

Into my guiding hand this wanderer,
To lead her through a world whose darkling paths
I tread with steps so faltering—leave not me
To bring her to the gates of heaven, alone!
I feel my feebleness. Let these stay on—
The angels who now visit her in dreams!
Bid them be near her pillow till in death
The closed eyes look upon Thy face once more!
And let the light and music, which the world
Borrowed of heaven, and which her infant sense
Hails with sweet recognition, be to her
A voice to call her upward, and a lamp
To lead her steps unto Thee!

THIRTY-FIVE.

"The years of a man's life are threescore and ten."

Oh, weary heart! thou'rt half way home!

We stand on Life's meridian height—

As far from childhood's morning come,

As to the grave's forgetful night.

Give Youth and Hope a parting tear—

Look onward with a placid brow—

Hope promised but to bring us here,

And Reason takes the guidance now—

One backward look—the last—the last!

One silent tear—for Youth is past!

Who goes with Hope and Passion back?

Who comes with me and Memory on?

Oh, lonely looks the downward track—

Joy's music hush'd—Hope's roses gone!

To Pleasure and her giddy troop

Farewell, without a sigh or tear!

But heart gives way, and spirits droop,

To think that Love may leave us here!

Have we no charm when Youth is down—

Midway to death left sad and lone!

Yet stay!—as 'twere a twilight star

That sends its thread across the wave,

I see a brightening light, from far,

Steal down a path beyond the grave!

And now—bless God!—its golden line

Comes o'er—and lights my shadowy way—

And shows the dear hand clasp'd in mine!

But list! what those sweet voices say!

The better land's in sight,

And, by its chastening light,

All love from life's midway is driven

Sane hers whose clasped hand will bring thee on to Heaven!

A THOUGHT OVER A CRADLE.

I SADDEN when thou smilest to my smile
Child of my love! I tremble to believe
That o'er the mirror of that eye of blue
The shadow of my heart will always pass;—
A heart that from its struggle with the world,
Comes nightly to thy guarded cradle home,
And, careless of the staining dust it brings,
Asks for its idol! Strange, that flowers of earth
Are visited by every air that stirs,
And drink in sweetness only, while the child
That shuts within its breast a bloom for heaven,
May take a blemish from the breath of love,
And bear the blight for ever.

I have wept

With gladness at the gift of this fair child!
My life is bound up in her. But, oh God!
Thou knowest how heavily my heart at times
Bears its sweet burthen; and if thou hast given
To nurture such as mine this spotless flower,
To bring it unpolluted unto thee,
Take thou its love, I pray thee! Give it light—
Though, following the sun, it turn from me!—
But, by the chord thus wrung, and by the light
Shining about her, draw me to my child!
And link us close, oh God, when near to heaven!

CONTEMPLATION.

"THEY are all up—the innumerable stars—
And hold their place in Heaven. My eyes have been Searching the pearly depths through which they spring
Like beautiful creations, till I feel
As if it were a new and perfect world,
Waiting in silence for the word of God
To breathe it into motion. There they stand,
Shining in order, like a living hymn
Written in light, awaking at the breath
Of the celestial dawn, and praising Him
Who made them, with the harmony of spheres.
I would I had an angel's ear to list
That melody. I would that I might float
Up in that boundless element, and feel
Its ravishing vibrations, like the pulse
Beating in Heaven! My spirit is athirst
For music—rarer music! I would bathe
My soul in a serener atmosphere
Than this; I long to mingle with the flock
Led by the 'living waters,' and to stray
In the 'green pastures' of the better land!
When wilt thou break, dull fetter! When shall I Gather my wings, and like a rushing thought
Stretch onward, star by star, up into Heaven!"
Thus mused Alethe. She was one to whom
Life had been like the witching of a dream,
Of an untroubled sweetness. She was born
Of a high race, and lay upon the knee,
With her soft eyes perusing listlessly
The fretted roof, or, on Mosaic floors,
Grasped at the tessellated squares inwrought
With metals curiously. Her childhood passed
Like faery—amid fountains and green haunts—
Trying her little feet upon a lawn
Of velvet evenness, and hiding flowers
In her sweet breast, as if it were a fair
And pearly altar to crush incense on.
Her youth—oh! that was queenly! She was like
A dream of poetry that may not be Written or told—exceeding beautiful!
And so came worshippers; and rank bowed down
And breathed upon her heart strings with the breath
Of pride, and bound her forehead gorgeously
With dazzling scorn, and gave unto her step
A majesty as if she trod the sea,
And the proud waves, unbidden, lifted her!
And so she grew to woman—her mere look
Strong as a monarch's signet, and her hand
The ambition of a kingdom. From all this Turned her high heart away! She had a mind,
Deep, and immortal, and it would not feed
On pageantry. She thirsted for a spring

Of a serener element, and drank
Philosophy, and for a little while
She was allayed,—till, presently, it turned Bitter within her, and her spirit grew
Faint for undying waters. Then she came
To the pure fount of God, and is athirst
No more—save when the fever of the world
Falleth upon her, she will go, sometimes,
Out in the star-light quietness, and breathe
A holy aspiration after Heaven.

ON THE DEATH OF A MISSIONARY.

How beautiful it is, for man to die
Upon the walls of Zion! to be call'd,
Like a watch-worn, and weary sentinel,
To put his armour off, and rest—in heaven!
The sun was setting on Jerusalem,
The deep blue sky had not a cloud, and light
Was pouring on the dome of Omar's mosque,
Like molten silver. Everything was fair;
And beauty hung upon the painted fanes;
Like a grieved spirit, lingering ere she gave
Her wing to air, for heaven. The crowds of men
Were in the busy streets, and nothing look'd
Like woe or suffering, save one small train
Bearing the dead to burial. It pass'd by,
And left no trace upon the busy throng.
The sun was just as beautiful; the shout
Of joyous revelry, and the low hum
Of stirring thousands rose as constantly!
Life look'd as winning; and the earth and sky,
And everything, seem'd strangely bent to make
A contrast to that comment upon life.
How wonderful it is that human pride
Can pass that touching moral as it does—
Pass it so frequently, in all the force
Of mournful and most simple eloquence—
And learn no lesson! They bore on the dead,
With the slow step of sorrow, troubled not
By the rude multitude, save, here and there,
A look of vague inquiry, or a curse
Half-muttered by some haughty Turk whose sleeve
Had touch'd the tassel of the Christian's pall.
And Israel too passed on—the trampled Jew!
Israel!—who made Jerusalem a throne
For the wide world—pass'd on as carelessly;
Giving no look of interest to tell
The shrouded dead was anything to her.
Oh that they would be gather'd as a brood
Is gather'd by a parent's sheltering wings!—
They laid him down with strangers; for his home
Was with the setting sun, and they who stood
And look'd so steadfastly upon his grave,
Were not his kindred; but they found him there,
And lov'd him for his ministry of Christ.
He had died young. But there are silver'd heads,
Whose race of duty is less nobly run.
His heart was with Jerusalem; and strong
As was a mother's love, and the sweet ties
Religion makes so beautiful at home,
He flung them from him in his eager race,
And sought the broken people of his God,
To preach to them of Jesus. There was one,
Who was his friend and helper. One who went
And knelt beside him at the sepulchre
Where Jesus slept, to pray for Israel.
They had one spirit, and their hearts were knit
With more than human love. God call'd him home.
And he of whom I speak stood up alone,
And in his broken-heartedness wrought on Until his Master call'd him.
Oh is it not a noble thing to die
As dies the Christian with his armour on!—
What is the hero's clarion, tho' its blast
Ring with the mastery of a world, to this?—
What are the searching victories of mind—
The lore of vanish'd ages?—What are all
The trumpetings of proud humanity,
To the short history of him who made
His sepulchre beside the King of kings?

ON THE PICTURE OF A "CHILD TIRED OF PLAY"

Tired of play! Tired of play!
What hast thou done this livelong day?
The birds are silent, and so is the bee;
The sun is creeping up steeple and tree;
The doves have flown to the sheltering eaves,
And the nests are dark with the drooping leaves;
Twilight gathers, and day is done—
How hast thou spent it—restless one!

Playing? But what hast thou done beside
To tell thy mother at even tide?
What promise of morn is left unbroken?
What kind word to thy playmate spoken?
Whom hast thou pitied, and whom forgiven?
How with thy faults has duty striven?
What hast thou learned by field and hill,
By greenwood path, and by singing rill?

There will come an eve to a longer day,
That will find thee tired—but not of play!
And thou wilt lean, as thou leanest now,
With drooping limbs and aching brow,
And wish the shadows would faster creep,
And long to go to thy quiet sleep.
Well were it then if thine aching brow
Were as free from sin and shame as now!
Well for thee, if thy lip could tell
A tale like this, of a day spent well.
If thine open hand hath reliev'd distress—
If thy pity hath sprung to wretchedness—
If thou hast forgiven the sore offence,
And humbled thy heart with penitence—
If Nature's voices have spoken to thee
With their holy meanings eloquently—
If every creature hath won thy love,
From the creeping worm to the brooding dove—
If never a sad, low-spoken word
Hath plead with thy human heart unheard—
Then, when the night steals on, as now,
It will bring relief to thine aching brow,
And, with joy and peace, at the thought of rest,
Thou wilt sink to sleep on thy mother's breast.

A CHILD'S FIRST IMPRESSION OF A STAR

SHE had been told that God made all the stars
That twinkled up in heaven, and now she stood
Watching the coming of the twilight on,
As if it were a new and perfect world,
And this were its first eve. She stood alone
By the low window, with the silken lash
Of her soft eye upraised, and her sweet mouth
Half-parted with the new and strange delight
Of beauty that she could not comprehend,
And had not seen before. The purple folds
Of the low sunset clouds, and the blue sky
That looked so still and delicate above,
Filled her young heart with gladness, and the eve
Stole on with its deep shadows, and she still Stood looking at the west with that half-smile,
As if a pleasant thought were at her heart
Presently, in the edge of the last tint
Of sunset, where the blue was melted in
To the faint golden mellowness, a star
Stood suddenly. A laugh of wild delight
Burst from her lips, and putting up her hands,
Her simple thought broke forth expressively—
"Father! dear father! God has made a star!"

ON WITNESSING A BAPTISM.

SHE stood up in the meekness of a heart
Resting on God, and held her fair young child
Upon her bosom, with its gentle eyes
Folded in sleep, as if its soul had gone
To whisper the baptismal vow in heaven.
The prayer went up devoutly, and the lips
Of the good man glowed fervently with faith
That it would be, even as he had pray'd,
And the sweet child be gather'd to the fold
Of Jesus. As the holy words went on

Her lips mov'd silently, and tears, fast tears,
Stole from beneath her lashes, and upon
The forehead of the beautiful child lay soft
With the baptismal water. Then I thought
That, to the eye of God, that mother's tears
Would be a deeper covenant—which sin
And the temptations of the world, and death,
Would leave unbroken—and that she would know
In the clear light of heaven, how very strong
The prayer which press'd them from her heart had been
In leading its young spirit up to God.

REVERY AT GLENMARRY.

I HAVE enough, O God! My heart to-night
Runs over with its fullness of content;
And as I look out on the fragrant stars,
And from the beauty of the night take in
My priceless portion—yet myself no more
Than in the universe a grain of sand—
I feel His glory who could make a world,
Yet in the lost depths of the wilderness
Leave not a flower unfinish'd!

Rich, though poor!
My low-roof'd cottage is this hour a heaven.
Music is in it—and the song she sings,
That sweet-voic'd wife of mine, arrests the ear
Of my young child awake upon her knee;
And, with his calm eyes on his master's face,
My noble hound lies couchant—and all here—
All in this little home, yet boundless heaven—
Are, in such love as I have power to give,
Blessed to overflowing.

Thou, who look'st
Upon my brimming heart this tranquil eve,
Knowest its fullness, as thou dost the dew
Sent to the hidden violet by Thee;
And, as that flower, from its unseen abode,
Sends its sweet breath up, duly, to the sky,
Changing its gift to incense, so, oh God,
May the sweet drops that to my humble cup
Find their far way from heaven, send up to Thee
Fragrance at thy throne welcome!

THE BELFRY PIGEON.

On the cross beam under the Old South bell
The nest of a pigeon is builded well.
In summer and winter that bird is there,
Out and in with the morning air:
I love to see him track the street,
With his wary eye and active feet;
And I often watch him as he springs,
Circling the steeple with easy wings,
Till across the dial his shade has passed,
And the belfry edge is gained at last.
'Tis a bird I love, with its brooding note,
And the trembling throb in its mottled throat;
There's a human look in its swelling breast,
And the gentle curve of its lowly crest;
And I often stop with the fear I feel—
He runs so close to the rapid wheel.

Whatever is rung on that noisy bell—
Chime of the hour or funeral knell—
The dove in the belfry must hear it well.
When the tongue swings out to the midnight moon—
When the sexton cheerily rings for noon—
When the clock strikes clear at morning light—
When the child is waked with "nine at night"—
When the chimes play soft in the Sabbath air,
Filling the spirit with tones of prayer—
Whatever tale in the bell is heard,
He broods on his folded feet unstirred,
Or rising half in his rounded nest,
He takes the time to smooth his breast,
Then drops again with filmed eyes,
And sleeps as the last vibration dies.
Sweet bird! I would that I could be
A hermit in the crowd like thee!

With wings to fly to wood and glen,
Thy lot, like mine, is cast with men;
And daily, with unwilling feet,
I tread, like thee, the crowded street;
But, unlike me, when day is o'er,
Thou canst dismiss the world and soar,
Or, at a half felt wish for rest,
Canst smooth the feathers on thy breast,
And drop, forgetful, to thy nest.

I would that in such wings of gold
I could my weary heart unfold;
And while the world throngs on beneath,
Smooth down my cares and calmly breathe;
And only sad with others' sadness,
And only glad with others' gladness,
Listen, unstirred, to knell or chime,
And, lapt in quiet, bide my time.

THE SABBATH.

It was a pleasant morning, in the time
When the leaves fall—and the bright sun shone out
As when the morning stars first sang together—
So quietly and calmly fell his light
Upon a world at rest. There was no leaf
In motion, and the loud winds slept, and all
Was still. The lab'ring herd was grazing
Upon the hill-side quietly—uncall'd
By the harsh voice of man, and distant sound,
Save from the murmuring waterfall, came not
As usual on the ear. One hour stole on,
And then another of the morning, calm
And still as Eden ere the birth of man,
And then broke in the Sabbath chime of bells—
And the old man, and his descendants, went Together to the house of God. I join'd
The well-apparell'd crowd. The holy man
Rose solemnly, and breath'd the prayer of faith—
And the gray saint, just on the wing for heaven—
And the fair maid—and the bright-haired young man—
And child of curling locks, just taught to close
The lash of its blue eye the while;—all knelt
In attitude of prayer—and then the hymn,
Sincere in its low melody, went up
To worship God.

The white-haired pastor rose
And look'd upon his flock—and with an eye
That told his interest, and voice that spoke
In tremulous accents, eloquence like Paul's,
He lent Isaiah's fire to the truths
Of revelation, and persuasion came
Like gushing waters from his lips, till hearts
Unus'd to bend were soften'd, and the eye
Unwont to weep sent forth the willing tear.
I went my way—but as I went, I thought
How holy was the Sabbath-day of God

DEDICATION HYMN.

[Written to be sung at the consecration of Hamover-street Church,
Boston.]

THE perfect world by Adam trod,
Was the first temple—built by God—
His fiat laid the corner stone,
And heav'd its pillars, one by one

He hung its starry roof on high
The broad limitless sky;
He spread its pavement, green and bright,
And curtain'd it with morning light.

The mountains in their places stood—
The sea—the sky—and "all was good;"
And, when its first pure praises rang,
The "morning stars together sang."

Lord! 'tis not ours to make the sea
And earth and sky a house for thee;
But in thy sight our offering stands—
A humbler temple, "made with hands"

POEMS OF PASSION.

THE DYING ALCHEMIST.

THE night wind with a desolate moan swept by;
And the old shutters of the turret swung
Screaming upon their hinges; and the moon,
As the torn edges of the clouds flew past,
Struggled aslant the stained and broken panes
So dimly, that the watchful eye of death
Scarcely was conscious when it went and came.

The fire beneath his crucible was low;
Yet still it burned; and ever as his thoughts
Grew insupportable, he raised himself
Upon his wasted arm, and stirred the coals
With difficult energy, and when the rod
Fell from his nerveless fingers, and his eye
Felt faint within its socket, he shrunk back
Upon his pallet, and with unclosed lips
Muttered a curse on death! The silent room,
From its dim corners, mockingly gave back
His rattling breath; the humming in the fire
Had the distinctness of a knell; and when Duly the antique horologe beat one,
He drew a phial from beneath his head,
And drank. And instantly his lips compressed,
And, with a shudder in his skeleton frame,
He rose with supernatural strength, and sat
Upright, and communed with himself:—

I did not think to die
Till I had finished what I had to do;
I thought to pierce th' eternal secret through
With this my mortal eye;
I felt—Oh God! it seemeth even now
This can not be the death-dew on my brow!

And yet it is—I feel,
Of this dull sickness at my heart, afraid;
And in my eyes the death-sparks flash and fade;
And something seems to steal
Over my bosom like a frozen hand—
Binding its pulses with an icy band.

And this is death! But why
Feel I this wild recoil? It can not be
Th' immortal spirit shuddereth to be free!
Would it not leap to fly,
Like a chained eagle at its parent's call?
I fear—I fear—that this poor life is all!

Yet thus to pass away!—
To live but for a hope that mocks at last—
To agonize, to strive, to watch, to fast,
To waste the light of day,
Night's better beauty, feeling, fancy, thought—
All that we have and are—for this—for naught!

Grant me another year
God of my spirit!—but a day—to win
Something to satisfy this thirst within!
I would know something here!
Break for me but one seal that is unbroken!
Speak for me but one word that is unspoken!

Vain—vain!—my brain is turning
With a swift dizziness, and my heart grows sick,
And these hot temple-throbs come fast and thick,
And I am freezing—burning—

Dying! Oh God! if I might only live!
My phial—Ha! it thrills me—I revive.

Ay—were not man to die
He were too mighty for this narrow sphere!
Had he but time to brood on knowledge here—
Could he but train his eye—
Might he but wait the mystic word and hour—
Only his Maker would transcend his power!

Earth has no mineral strange—
Th' illimitable air no hidden wings—
Water no quality in covert springs,
And fire no power to change—
Seasons no mystery, and stars no spell,
Which the unwasting soul might not compel.

Oh, but for time to track
The upper stars into the pathless sky—
To see th' invisible spirits, eye to eye—
To hurl the lightning back—
To tread unhurt the sea's dim-lighted halls—
To chase Day's chariot to the horizon-walls—

And more, much more—for now
The life-sealed fountains of my nature move—
To nurse and purify this human love—
To clear the god-like brow
Of weakness and mistrust, and bow it down
Worthy and beautiful, to the much-loved one:

This were indeed to feel
The soul-thirst slaken at the living stream—
To live—Oh God! that life is but a dream!
And death—Aha! I reel—
Dim—dim—I faint—darkness comes o'er my eye—
Cover me! save me!—God of heaven! I die!

'Twas morning, and the old man lay alone.
No friend had closed his eyelids, and his lips,
Open and ashy pale, th' expression wore
Of his death-struggle. His long silvery hair
Lay on his hollow temples thin and wild,
His frame was wasted, and his features wan
And haggard as with want, and in his palm
His nails were driven deep, as if the throes
Of the last agony had wrung him sore.

The storm was raging still. The shutters swung
Screaming as harshly in the fitful wind,
And all without went on—as aye it will,
Sunshine or tempest, reckless that a heart
Is breaking, or has broken, in its change.

The fire beneath the crucible was out;
The vessels of his mystic art lay round,
Useless and cold as the ambitious hand
That fashioned them, and the small rod,
Familiar to his touch for threescore years,
Lay on th' alembic's rim, as if it still Might vex the elements at its master's will.

And thus had passed from its unequal frame
A soul of fire—a sun-bent eagle stricken
From his high soaring down—an instrument
Broken with its own compass. Oh how poor
Seems the rich gift of genius, when it lies,

Like the adventurous bird that hath out-flown
His strength upon the sea, ambition-wrecked—
A thing the thrush might pity, as she sits
Brooding in quiet on her lowly nest.

PARRHASIUS.

"Parrhasius, a painter of Athens, among those Olynthian captives Philip of Macedon brought home to sell, bought one very old man; and when he had him at his house, put him to death with extreme torture and torment, the better, by his example, to express the pains and passions of his Prometheus, whom he was then about to paint."
—Burton's Anat. of Mel.

THERE stood an unsold captive in the mart,
A grayhaired and majestic old man,
Chained to a pillar. It was almost night,
And the last seller from his place had gone,
And not a sound was heard but of a dog
Crunching beneath the stall a refuse bone,
Or the dull echo from the pavement rung,
As the faint captive changed his weary feet.
He had stood there since morning, and borne
From every eye in Athens the cold gaze
Of curious scorn. The Jew had taunted him
For an Olynthian slave. The buyer came,
And roughly struck his palm upon his breast,
And touched his unhealed wounds, and with a sneer
Passed on; and when, with weariness o'erspent,
He bowed his head in a forgetful sleep,
Th' inhuman soldier smote him, and, with threats
Of torture to his children, summoned back
The ebbing blood into his pallid face.

'Twas evening, and the half-descended sun
Tipped with a golden fire the many domes
Of Athens, and a yellow atmosphere
Lay rich and dusky in the shaded street
Through which the captive gazed. He had borne up
With a stout heart that long and weary day,
Haughtily patient of his many wrongs;
But now he was alone, and from his nerves
The needless strength departed, and he leaned
Prone on his massy chain, and let his thoughts
Throng on him as they would. Unmarked of him,
Parrhasius at the nearest pillar stood,
Gazing upon his grief. Th' Athenian's cheek
Flushed as he measured with a painter's eye
The moving picture. The abandoned limbs,
Stained with the oozing blood, were laced with veins
Swollen to purple fullness; the gray hair,
Thin and disordered, hung about his eyes;
And as a thought of wilder bitterness
Rose in his memory, his lips grew white,
And the fast workings of his bloodless face
Told what a tooth of fire was at his heart.

The golden light into the painter's room
Streamed richly, and the hidden colors stole
From the dark pictures radiantly forth,
And in the soft and dewy atmosphere
Like forms and landscapes magical they lay.
The walls were hung with armor, and about
In the dim corners stood the sculptured forms
Of Cytheris, and Dian, and stern Jove,
And from the casement soberly away
Fell the grotesque long shadows, full and true,
And, like a veil of filmy mellowness,
The lint-specks floated in the twilight air.
Parrhasius stood, gazing forgetfully
Upon his canvass. There Prometheus lay,
Chained to the cold rocks of Mount Caucasus—
The vulture at his vitals, and the links
Of the lame Lemnian festering in his flesh;
And, as the painter's mind felt through the dim,
Rapt mystery, and plucked the shadows forth
With its far-reaching fancy, and with form
And color clad them, his fine earnest eye
Flashed with a passionate fire, and the quick curl
Of his thin nostril, and his quivering lip,
Were like the winged God's, breathing from his flight.

"Bring me the captive now!
My hands feel skilful, and the shadows lift
From my waked spirit airily and swift,
And I could paint the bow

Upon the bended heavens—around me play
Colors of such divinity to-day.

"Ha! bind him on his back!
Look!—as Prometheus in my picture here!
Quick—or he faints!—stand with the cordial near!
Now—bend him to the rack!
Press down the poisoned links into his flesh!
And tear agape that healing wound afresh!

"So—let him writhe! How long
Will he live thus? Quick, my good pencil, now!
What a fine agony works upon his brow!
Ha! grayhaired and so strong!
How fearfully he stifles that short moan!
Gods! if I could but paint a dying groan!

"'Pity' thee! So I do!
I pity the dumb victim at the altar—
But does the robbed priest for his pity falter?
I'd rack thee though I knew
A thousand lives were perishing in thine—
What were ten thousand to a fame like mine?

"'Hereafter!' Ay—hereafter!
A whip to keep a coward to his track!
What gave death ever from his kingdom back
To check the skeptic's laughter?
Come from the grave to-morrow with that story,
And I may take some softer path to glory.

"No, no, old man! we die
E'en as the flowers, and we shall breathe away
Our life upon the chance wind, even as they!
Strain well thy fainting eye—
For when that bloodshot quivering is o'er,
The light of heaven will never reach thee more.

"Yet there's a deathless name!
A spirit that the smothering vault shall spurn,
And like a steadfast planet mount and burn;
And though its crown of flame
Consumed my brain to ashes as it shone,
By all the fiery stars! I'd bind it on!

"Ay—though it bid me rifle
My heart's last fount for its insatiate thirst—
Though every life-strung nerve be maddened first—
Though it should bid me stifle

The yearning in my throat for my sweet child,
And taunt its mother till my brain went wild—

"All—I would do it all—
Sooner than die, like a dull worm, to rot—
Thrust foully into earth to be forgot!
Oh heavens—but I appal
Your heart, old man! forgive—ha! on your lives
Let him not faint!—rack him till he revives!

"Vain—vain—give o'er! His eye
Glazes apace. He does not feel you now—
Stand back! I'll paint the death-dew on his brow!
Gods! if he do not die
But for one moment—one—till I eclipse
Conception with the colors of those calm lips!

"Shivering! Hark! he mutters
Brokenly now—that was a difficult breath—
Another? Wilt thou never come, oh Death!
Look! how his temple flutters!
Is his heart still? Aha! lift up his head!
He shudders—gasps—Jove help him!—so—he's dead."

How like a mounting devil in the heart
Rules the unreined ambition! Let it once
But play the monarch, and its haughty brow
Glow with a beauty that bewilders thought
And unthrones peace for ever. Putting on
The very pomp of Lucifer, it turns
The heart to ashes, and with not a spring
Left in the bosom for the spirit's lip,
We look upon our splendor and forget
The thirst of which we perish! Yet hath life
Many a falselier idol. There are hopes
Promising well, and love-touched dreams for some,
And passions, many a wild one, and fair schemes
For gold and pleasure—yet will only this

Balk not the soul—Ambition only, gives,
 Even of bitterness, a beaker full!
 Friendship is but a slow-awaking dream,
 Troubled at best—Love is a lamp unseen,
 Burning to waste, or, if its light is found,
 Nursed for an idle hour, then idly broken—
 Gain is a grovelling care, and Folly tires,
 And Quiet is a hunger never fed—
 And from Love's very bosom, and from Gain,
 Or Folly, or a Friend, or from Repose—
 From all but keen Ambition—will the soul
 Snatch the first moment of forgetfulness
 To wander like a restless child away.
 Oh, if there were not better hopes than these—
 Were there no palm beyond a feverish fame—
 If the proud wealth flung back upon the heart
 Must canker in its coffers—if the links
 Falsehood hath broken will unite no more—
 If the deep-yearning love, that hath not found
 Its like in the cold world, must waste in tears—
 If truth, and fervor, and devotedness,
 Finding no worthy altar, must return
 And die of their own fulness—if beyond
 The grave there is no heaven in whose wide air
 The spirits may find room, and in the love
 Of whose bright habitants the lavish heart
 May spend itself—what thrice-mocked fools are we!

I.

Night in Arabia. An hour ago,
 Pale Dian had descended from the sky,
 Flinging her cestus out upon the sea,
 And at their watches now the solemn stars
 Stood vigilant and lone; and, dead asleep,
 With not a shadow moving on its breast,
 The breathing earth lay in its silver dew,
 And, trembling on their myriad viewless wings,
 Th' imprisoned odors left the flowers to dream,
 And stole away upon the yielding air.
 Ben Khorat's tower stands shadowy and tall
 In Mecca's loneliest street; and ever there,
 When night is at the deepest, burns his lamp
 As constant as the Cynosure, and forth
 From his looped window stretch the brazen tubes,
 Pointing for ever at the central star
 Of that dim nebula just lifting now
 Over Mount Arafat. The sky to-night
 Is of a clearer blackness than is wont,
 And far within its depths the colored stars†
 Sparkle like gems—capricious Antares!†
 Flushing and paling in the southern arch;
 And azure Lyra, like a woman's eye,
 Burning with soft blue lustre; and away
 Over the desert the bright Polar-star,
 White as a flashing icicle; and here,
 Hung like a lamp above th' Arabian sea,
 Mars with his dusky glow; and, fairer yet,
 Mild Sirius,§ tinted with dewy violet,
 Set like a flower upon the breast of Eve;
 And in the zenith the sweet Pleiades,||

* A famous Arabian astrologer, who is said to have spent forty years in discovering the motion of the eighth sphere. He had a scholar, a young Bedouin Arab, who, with a singular passion for knowledge, abandoned his wandering tribe, and, applying himself too closely to astrology, lost his reason and died.

† Even to the naked eye, the stars appear of palpably different colors; but when viewed with a prismatic glass, they may be very accurately classed into the red, the yellow, the brilliant white, the dull white, and the anomalous. This is true also of the planets, which shine by reflected light; and of course the difference of color must be supposed to arise from their different powers to absorb and reflect the rays of the sun. The original composition of the stars, and the different dispersive powers of their different atmospheres, may be supposed to account also for this phenomenon. ‡ This star exhibits a peculiar quality—a rapid and beautiful change in the color of its light: every alternate twinkling being of an intense reddish crimson color, and the answering one of a brilliant white.

|| The Pleiades are vertical in Arabia.

(Alas—that ev'n a star may pass from heaven
 And not be missed!)—the linked Pleiades
 Undimmed are there, though from the sister band
 The fairest has gone down; and, south away,
 Hirundo* with its little company;
 And white-browed Vesta, lamping on her path
 Lonely and planet-calm, and, all through heaven,
 Articulate almost, they troop to-night,
 Like unrobed angels in a prophet's trance.

Ben Khorat knelt before his telescope,†
 Gazing with earnest stillness on the stars.
 The gray hairs, struggling from his turban folds,
 Played with the entering wind upon his cheeks,
 And on his breast his venerable beard
 With supernatural whiteness loosely fell.
 The black flesh swelled about his sandal thongs,
 Tight with his painful posture, and his lean
 And withered fingers to his knees were clenched,
 And the thin lashes of his straining eye
 Lay with unwinking closeness to the lens,
 Stiffened with tense up-turning. Hour by hour,
 Till the stars melted in the flush of morn,
 The old astrologer knelt moveless there,
 Ravished past pain with the bewildering spheres,
 And, hour by hour, with the same patient thought,
 Pored his pale scholar on the characters
 Of Chaldee writ, or, as his gaze grew dim
 With weariness, the dark-eyed Arab laid
 His head upon the window and looked forth
 Upon the heavens awhile, until the dews
 And the soft beauty of the silent night
 Cooled his flushed eyelids, and then patiently
 He turned unto his constant task again.

The sparry glinting of the Morning Star
 Shot through the leaves of a majestic palm
 Fringing Mount Arafat; and, as it caught
 The eye of the rapt scholar, he arose
 And clasped the volume with an eager haste,
 And as the glorious planet mounted on,
 Melting her way into the upper sky,
 He breathlessly gazed on her;—

"Star of the silver ray!
 Bright as a god, but punctual as a slave—
 What spirit the eternal canon gave
 That bends thee to thy way?
 What is the soul that on thine arrowy light
 Is walking earth and heaven in pride to-night?"

"We know when thou wilt soar
 Over the mount—thy change, and place, and time—
 'Tis written in the Chaldee's mystic rhyme
 As 'twere a priceless lore!
 I knew as much in my Bedouin garb—
 Coursing the desert on my flying barb!"

"How oft amid the tents
 Upon Sahara's sands I've walked alone,
 Waiting all night for thee, resplendent one!
 With what magnificence,
 In the last watches, to my thirsting eye,
 Thy passionate beauty flushed into the sky!"

"Oh, God! how flew my soul
 Out to thy glory—upward on thy ray—
 Panting as thou ascendedst on thy way,
 As if thine own control—
 This searchless spirit that I can not find—
 Had set its radiant law upon my mind!"

"More than all stars in heaven
 I felt thee in my heart! my love became
 A phrensy, and consumed me with its flame.
 Ay, in the desert even—
 My dark-eyed Abra coursing at my side—
 The star, not Abra, was my spirit's bride!"

* An Arabic constellation placed instead of the Piscis Australis, because the swallow arrives in Arabia about the time of the heliacal rising of the Fishes.

† An anachronism, the author is aware. The telescope was not invented for a century or two after the time of Ben Khorat.

"My Abra is no more !
My "desert-bird" is in a stranger's stall—
My tribe, my tent—I sacrificed them all
For this heart-wasting lore !—
Yet, than all these, the thought is sweeter far—
Thou wert ascendant at my birth, bright star !

"The Chaldee calls me thine—
And in this breast, that I must rend to be
A spirit upon wings of light like thee,
I feel that thou art mine !
Oh, God ! that these dull fetters would give way
And let me forth to track thy silver ray !"

* * * Ben Khorat rose
And silently looked forth upon the East.
The dawn was stealing up into the sky
On its gray feet, the stars grew dim apace,
And faded, till the Morning Star alone,
Soft as a molten diamond's liquid fire,
Burned in the heavens. The morn grew fresher—
The upper clouds were faintly touched with gold ;
The fan palms rustled in the early air ;
Daylight spread cool and broadly to the hills ;
And still the star was visible, and still
The young Bodouin with a straining eye
Drank its departing light into his soul.
It faded—melted—and the fiery rim
Of the clear sun came up, and painfully
The passionate scholar pressed upon his eyes
His dusky fingers, and with limbs as weak
As a sick child's, turned fainting to his couch,
And slept.

II.

* * * It was the morning watch once more,
The clouds were drifting rapidly above,
And dim and fast the glimmering stars flew through ;
And as the fitful gust sighed mournfully,
The shutters shook, and on the sloping roof
Plashed, heavily, large, single drops of rain—
And all was still again. Ben Khorat sat
By the dim lamp, and, while his scholar slept,
Pored on the Chaldee wisdom. At his feet,
Stretched on a pallet, lay the Arab boy,
Muttering fast in his unquiet sleep,
And working his dark fingers in his palms
Convulsively. His hollow lips were pale,
And, as they moved, his teeth showed ghastly through,
White as a charnel bone, and—closely drawn
Upon his sunken eyes, as if to press
Some frightful image from the bloodshot balls—
His lids a moment quivered, and again
Relaxed, half open, in a calmer sleep.

Ben Khorat gazed upon the dropping sands
Of the departing hour. The last white grain
Fell through, and with the tremulous hand of age
The old astrologer reversed the glass ;
And, as the voiceless monitor went on,
Wasting and wasting with the precious hour,
He looked upon it with a moving lip,
And, starting, turned his gaze upon the heavens,
Cursing the clouds impatiently.

"'Tis time !"
Muttered the dying scholar, and he dashed
The tangled hair from his black eyes away,
And, seizing on Ben Khorat's mantle-folds,
He struggled to his feet, and falling prone
Upon the window-ledge, gazed steadfastly
Into the East :—

"There is a cloud between—
She sits this instant on the mountain's brow,
And that dusk veil hides all her glory now—
Yet floats she as serene
Into the heavens !—Oh, God ! than even so
I could o'er mount my spirit cloud, and go !

"The cloud begins to drift !
Aha ! Fling open ! 'tis the star—the sky !
Touch me, immortal mother ! and I fly !
Wider ! thou cloudy rift !

Let through !—such glory should have radiant room !
Let through !—a star-child on its light goes home !

"Speak to me, brethren bright !
Ye who are floating in these living beams !
Ye who have come to me in starry dreams !
Ye who have winged the light
Of our bright mother with its thoughts of flame—
(I knew it passed through spirits as it came)—

"Tell me ! what power have ye ?
What are the heights ye reach upon your wings ?
What know ye of the myriad wondrous things
I perish but to see ?
Are ye thought-rapid ?—Can ye fly as far—
As instant as a thought, from star to star ?

"Where has the Pleiad gone ?
Where have all missing stars' found light and home ?
Who bids the Stella Miraf go and come ?
Why sits the Pole-star lone ?
And why, like banded sisters, through the air
Go in bright troops the constellations fair ?

"Ben Khorat ! dost thou mark ?
The star ! the star ? By heaven ! the cloud drifts o'er !
Gone—and I live ! nay—will my heart beat more ?
Look ! master ! 'tis all dark !
Not a clear speck in heaven ?—my eye-balls smother !
Break through the clouds once more ! oh, starry mother !

"I will lie down ! Yet stay,
The rain beats out the odor from the gums,
And strangely soft to-night the spice-wind comes !
I am a child alway
When it is on my forehead ! Abra sweet !
Would I were in the desert at thy feet !

"My barb ! my glorious steed !
Methinks my soul would mount upon its track
More fleetly, could I die upon thy back !
How would thy thrilling speed
Quicken my pulse !—Oh, Allah ! I get wild !
Would that I were once more a desert-child !

"Nay—nay—I had forgot !
My mother ! my star mother !—Ha ! my breath
Stifles !—more air !—Ben Khorat ! this is death !
Touch me !—I feel you not !
Dying !—Farewell ! good master !—room ! more room !
Abra ! I loved thee ! star—bright star ! I—come !"

How idly of the human heart we speak,
Giving it gods of clay ! How worse than vain
Is the school homily, that Eden's fruit
Can not be plucked too freely from "the tree
Of good and evil." Wisdom sits alone,
Topmost in heaven ;—she is its light—its God !
And in the heart of man she sits as high—
Though grovelling eyes forget her oftentimes,
Seeing but this world's idols. The pure mind
Sees her for ever : and in youth we come
Filled with her sainted ravishment, and kneel,
Worshipping God through her sweet altar-fires,
And then is knowledge "good." We come too oft—
The heart grows proud with fulness, and we soon
Look with licentious freedom on the maid
Throned in celestial beauty. There she sits,
Robed in her soft and seraph loveliness,
Instructing and forgiving, and we gaze
Until desire grows wild, and, with our hands
Upon her very garments, are struck down,
Blasted with a consuming fire from heaven !

* "Missing stars" are often spoken of in the old books of astronomy. Hipparchus mentions one that appeared and vanished very suddenly ; and in the beginning of the sixteenth century Kepler discovered a new star near the heel of the right foot of Serpentarius, "so bright and sparkling that it exceeded anything he had ever seen before." He "took notice that it was every moment changing into some of the colors of the rainbow, except when it was near the horizon, when it was generally white." It disappeared in the following year, and has not been seen since.

† A wonderful star in the neck of the Whale, discovered by Fabricius in the fifteenth century. It appears and disappears seven times in six years, and continues in the greatest lustre for fifteen days together.

Yet, oh! how full of music from her lips
 Breathe the calm tones of wisdom! Human praise
 Is sweet—till envy mars it, and the touch
 Of new-won gold stirs up the pulses well;
 And woman's love, if in a beggar's lamp
 'Twould burn, might light us clearly through the world;
 But Knowledge hath a far more 'wildering tongue,
 And she will stoop and lead you to the stars,
 And witch you with her mysteries—till gold
 Is a forgotten dross, and power and fame
 Toys of an hour, and woman's careless love,
 Light as the breath that breaks it. He who binds
 His soul to knowledge steals the key of heaven—
 But 'tis a bitter mockery that the fruit
 May hang within his reach, and when, with thirst
 Wrought to a maddening phrensy, he would taste—
 It burns his lips to ashes!

THE WIFE'S APPEAL.

"Love borrows greatly from opinion. Pride above all things strengthens affection."—E. L. Bulwer.

He sat and read. A book with silver clasps,
 All gorgeous with illuminated lines
 Of gold and crimson, lay upon a frame
 Before him. 'Twas a volume of old time;
 And in it were fine mysteries of the stars
 Solved with a cunning wisdom, and strange thoughts,
 Half prophecy, half poetry, and dreams
 Clearer than truth, and speculations wild
 That touched the secrets of your very soul,
 They were so based on Nature. With a face
 Glowing with thought, he pored upon the book.
 The cushions of an Indian loom lay soft
 Beneath his limbs, and, as he turned the page,
 The sunlight, streaming through the curtain's fold,
 Fell with a rose-teint on his jewelled hand;
 And the rich woods of the quaint furniture
 Lay deepening their veined colors in the sun,
 And the stained marbles on the pedestals
 Stood like a silent company—Voltaire,
 With an infernal sneer upon his lips;
 And Socrates, with godlike human love
 Stamped on his countenance; and orators,
 Of times gone by that made them; and old bards,
 And Medicean Venus, half divine.
 Around the room were shelves of dainty lore,
 And rich old pictures hung upon the walls
 Where the slant light fell on them; and wrought gems,
 Medallions, rare mosaics, and antiques
 From Herculaneum, the niches filled;
 And on a table of enamel, wrought
 With a lost art in Italy, there lay
 Prints of fair women, and engravings rare,
 And a new poem, and a costly toy;
 And in their midst a massive lamp of bronze
 Burning sweet spices constantly. Asleep
 Upon the carpet couched a graceful hound,
 Of a rare breed, and, as his master gave
 A murmur of delight at some sweet line,
 He raised his slender head, and kept his eye
 Upon him till the pleasant smile had passed
 From his mild lips, and then he slept again.
 The light beyond the crimson folds grew dusk,
 And the clear letters of the pleasant book
 Mingled and blurred, and the lithe hound rose up,
 And, with his earnest eye upon the door,
 Listened attentively. It came as wont—
 The fall of a light foot upon the stair—
 And the fond animal sprang out to meet
 His mistress, and caress the ungloved hand,
 He seemed to know was beautiful. She stooped
 Gracefully down and touched his silken ears
 As she passed in—then, with a tenderness,
 Half playful and half serious, she knelt
 Upon the ottoman and pressed her lips
 Upon her husband's forehead.

She rose and put the curtain-folds aside
 From the high window, and looked out upon
 The shining stars in silence. "Look they not Like Paradises to thine eye?" he said—

But, as he spoke, a tear fell through the light—
 And—starting from his seat—he folded her
 Close to his heart, and—with unsteady voice—
 Asked—if she was not happy. A faint smile
 Broke through her tears; and pushing off the hair
 From his broad forehead, she held back his head
 With her white hand, and, gazing on his face,
 Gave to her heart free utterance:—

Happy?—yes, dearest!—blest
 Beyond the limit of my wildest dream—
 Too bright indeed, my blessings ever seem;
 There lives not in my breast,
 One of Hope's promises by Love unkept,
 And yet—forgive me, Ernest—I have wept.

How shall I speak of sadness,
 And seem not thankful to my God and thee?
 How can the lightest wish but seem to be
 The very whim of madness?
 Yet, oh, there is a boon thy love bestows—
 And I will ask it of thee—in my pride!

List, while my boldness lingers!
 If thou hadst won you twinkling star to hear thee—
 If thou couldst bid the rainbow's curve bend near thee—

If thou couldst charm thy fingers
 To weave for thee the Sunset's tent of gold—
 Wouldst in thine own heart treasure it untold?

If thou hadst Ariel's gift,
 To course the veined metals of the earth—
 If thou couldst wind a fountain to its birth—

If thou couldst know the drift
 Of the lost cloud that sailed into the sky—
 Wouldst keep it for thine own unanswered eye?

It is thy life and mine!
 Thou, in thyself—and I, in thee—misprison
 Gifts like a circle of bright stars unrisen—
 For thou whose mind should shine,
 Eminent as a planet's light, art here—
 Moved with the starting of a woman's tear!

I have told o'er thy powers
 In secret, as a miser tells his gold;
 I know thy spirit calm, and true and bold:
 I've watched thy lightest hours,
 And seen thee, in the wildest flush of youth,
 Touched with the instinct ravishment of truth.

Thou hast the secret strange
 To read that hidden book, the human heart;
 Thou hast the ready writer's practised art;
 Thou hast the thought to range
 The broadest circles Intellect hath ran—
 And thou art God's best work—an honest man!

And yet thou slumberest here
 Like a caged bird that never knew its pinions,
 And others track in glory the dominions
 Where thou hast not thy peer—
 Setting their weaker eyes upon the sun,
 And plucking honor that thou shouldst have won.

Oh, if thou lovedst me ever,
 Ernest, my husband! If th' idolatry
 That lets go heaven to fling its all on thee—
 If to dismiss thee never
 In dream or prayer, have given me aught to claim—
 Heed me—oh, heed me! and awake to Fame!

Her lips
 Closed with an earnest sweetness, and she sat
 Gazing into his eyes as if her look
 Searched their dark orbs for answer. The warm blood
 Into his temples mounted, and across
 His countenance the flush of passionate thoughts
 Passed with irresolute quickness. He rose up
 And paced the dim room rapidly awhile,
 Calming his troubled mind; and then he came
 And laid his hand upon her orbéd brow,
 And in a voice of heavenly tenderness
 Answered her:—

Before I knew thee, Mary,
Ambition was my angel. I did hear
For ever its witch'd voices in mine ear;
My days were visionary—
My nights were like the slumbers of the mad—
And every dream swept o'er me glory clad.

I read the burning letters
Of warlike pomp, on History's page, alone;
I counted nothing the struck widow's moan;
I heard no clank of fetters;
I only felt the trumpet's stirring blast,
And lean-eyed Famine stalked unchallenged past!

I heard with veins of lightning,
The utterance of the Statesman's word of power—
Binding and loosing nations in an hour—
But, while my eye was brightening,
A masked detraction breathed upon his fame,
And a curst serpent slined his written name.

The poet rapt mine ears
With the transporting music that he sung,
With fibres from his life his lyre he strung,
And bathed the world in tears—
And then he turned away to some muse apart,
And Scorn stole after him—and broke his heart!

Yet here and there I saw
One who did set the world at calm defiance.
And press right onward with a bold reliance;
And he did seem to awe
The very Shadows pressing on his breast,
And, with a strong heart, held himself at rest.

And then I looked again—
And he had shut the door upon the crowd,
And on his face he lay and groaned aloud—
Wrestling with hidden pain;
And in her chamber sat his wife in tears,
And his sweet babes grew sad with whispered fears.

And so I turned sick-hearted
From the bright cup away, and, in my sadness,
Searched mine own bosom for some spring of gladness;
And lo! a fountain started
Whose waters even in death flow calm and fast,
And my wild fever-thirst was slaked at last.

And then I met thee, Mary,
And felt how love may into fulness pour,
Like light into a fountain running o'er:
And I did hope to vary
My life but with surprises sweet as this—
A dream—but for thy waking—filled with bliss.

Yet now I feel my spirit
Bitterly stirred, and—nay, lift up thy brow!
It is thine own voice echoing to thee now,
And thou didst pray to hear it—
I must unto my work and my stern hours!
Take from my room thy harp, and books, and flowers!

• • • • • A year—

And in his room again he sat alone.
His frame had lost its fulness in that time;
His manly features had grown sharp and thin,
And from his lips the constant smile had faded.
Wild fires had burned the languor from his eye:
The lids looked fevered, and the brow was bent
With an habitual frown. He was much changed.
His chin was resting on his clenched hand,
And with his foot he beat upon the floor,
Unconsciously, the time of a sad tune.
Thoughts of the past preyed on him bitterly.
He had won power and held it. He had walked
Steadily upward in the eye of Fame,
And kept his truth unsullied—but his home
Had been invaded by envenomed tongues;
His wife—his spotless wife—had been assailed
By slander, and his child had grown afraid
To come to him—his manner was so stern.
He could not speak beside his own hearth freely.
His friends were half estranged, and vulgar men

Presumed upon their services and grew
Familiar with him. He'd small time to sleep,
And none to pray; and, with his heart in fetters,
He bore deep insults silently, and bowed
Respectfully to men who knew he loathed them!
And, when his heart was eloquent with truth,
And love of country, and an honest zeal
Burned for expression, he could find no words
They would not misinterpret with their lies.
What were his many honors to him now?
The good half doubted, falsehood was so strong—
His home was hateful with its cautious fears—
His wife lay trembling on his very breast
Frighted with calumny!—And this is FAME.

MELANIE.

I.

I stood on yonder rocky brow,*
And marvelled at the Sibyl's fane,
When I was not what I am now.
My life was then untouched of pain;
And, as the breeze that stirred my hair,
My spirit freshened in the sky,
And all things that were true and fair
Lay closely to my loving eye,
With nothing shadowy between—
I was a boy of seventeen.

Yon wondrous temple crests the rock—
As light upon its giddy base,
As stirless with the torrent's shock,
As pure in its proportioned grace,
And seems a thing of air—as then,
Afloat above this fairy glen;

But though mine eye will kindle still
In looking on the shapes of art,
The link is lost that sent the thrill,
Like lightning, instant to my heart.
And thus may break before we die,
Th' electric chain 'twixt soul and eye!

Ten years—like yon bright valley, sown
Alternately with weeds and flowers—
Had swiftly, if not gayly, flown,
And still I loved the rosy Hours;
And if there lurked within my breast
Some nerve that had been overstrung
And quivered in my hours of rest,
Like bells by their own echo rung,
I was with hope a masquer yet,
And well could hide the look of sadness;
And, if my heart would not forget,
I knew, at least, the trick of gladness;
And when another sang the strain,
I mingled in the old refrain.

'Twere idle to remember now,
Had I the heart, my thwarted schemes.
I bear beneath this altered brow
The ashes of a thousand dreams—
Some wrought of wild Ambition's fingers,
Some colored of Love's pencil well—
But none of which a shadow lingers,
And none whose story I could tell.
Enough, that when I climbed again
To Tivoli's romantic steep,
Life had no joy, and scarce a pain,
Whose wells I had not tasted deep;
And from my lips the thirst had passed
For every fount save one—the sweetest—and the last.

The last—the last! My friends were dead,
Or false; my mother in her grave;
Above my father's honored head
The sea had locked its hiding wave;
Ambition had but foiled my grasp,
And love had perished in my clasp;
And still, I say, I did not slack
My love of life, and hope of pleasure,
But gathered my affections back;
And, as the miser hugs his treasure
When plague and ruin bid him flee,
I closer clung to mine—my loved, lost Melanie!

* The story is told during a walk around the Cascatelles of Tivoli.

The last of the De Brevorn race,
 My sister claimed no kinsman's care;
 And, looking from each other's face,
 The eye stole upward unaware—
 For there was naught wherewith to lean
 Each other's heart and heaven between—
 Yet that was world enough for me;
 And, for a brief but blessed while,
 There seemed no care for Melanie
 If she could see her brother smile!
 But life with her was at the flow,
 And every wave went sparkling higher,
 While mine was ebbing, fast and low,
 From the same shore of vain desire;
 And knew I, with prophetic heart,
 That we were wearing, aye, insensibly apart.

II.

We came to Italy. I felt
 A yearning for its sunny sky;
 My very spirit seemed to melt
 As swept its first warm breezes by.
 From lip and cheek a chilling mist,
 From life and soul a frozen rime,
 By every breath seemed softly kissed—
 God's blessing on its radiant clime!
 It was an endless joy to me
 To see my sister's new delight;
 From Venice in its golden sea
 To Pæstum in its purple light—
 By sweet Val d'Arno's teinted hills—
 In Vallombrosa's convent gloom—
 Mid Terni's vale of singing rills—
 By deathless lairs in solemn Rome—
 In gay Palermo's "Golden Shell"—
 At Arethusa's hidden well—
 We loitered like th' impassioned sun
 That slept so lovingly on all,
 And made a home of every one—
 Ruin, and fane, and waterfall—
 And crowned the dying day with glory
 If we had seen, since morn, but one old haunt of story.

We came with Spring to Tivoli.
 My sister loved its laughing air
 And merry waters, though, for me,
 My heart was in another key;
 And sometimes I could scarcely bear
 The mirth of their eternal play,
 And, like a child that longs for home
 When weary of its holiday,
 I sighed for melancholy Rome.
 Perhaps—the fancy haunts me still—
 'Twas but a boding sense of ill.

It was a morn, of such a day
 As might have dawned on Eden first,
 Early in the Italian May.
 Vine-leaf and flower had newly burst,
 And on the burthen of the air
 The breath of buds came faint and rare;
 And far in the transparent sky
 The small, earth-keeping birds were seen
 Soaring deliriously high;
 And through the clefts of newer green
 Yon waters dashed their living pearls;
 And with a gayer smile and bow
 Trooped on the merry village-girls;
 And from the contadino's brow
 The low-slouched hat was backward thrown,
 With air that scarcely seemed his own;
 And Melanie, with lips apart,
 And clasped hands upon my arm,
 Flung open her impassioned heart,
 And blessed life's mere and breathing charm;
 And sang old songs, and gathered flowers,
 And passionately blessed once more life's thrilling hours.

In happiness and idleness
 We wandered down yon sunny vale—
 Oh mocking eyes!—a golden tress
 Floats back upon this summer gale!

A foot is tripping on the grass!
 A laugh rings merry in mine ear!
 I see a bounding shadow pass!—
 O God! my sister once was here!
 Come with me, friend.—We rested yon!
 There grew a flower she plucked and wore!
 She sat upon this mossy stone—
 That broken fountain running o'er
 With the same ring, like silver bells.
 She listened to its babbling flow,
 And said, "Perhaps the gossip tells
 Some fountain-nymph's love-story now!"
 And as her laugh ran clear and wild,
 A youth—a painter—passed and smiled.

He gave the greeting of the morn
 With voice that lingered in mine ear.
 I knew him sad and gentle born
 By those two words—so calm and clear.
 His frame was slight, his forehead high
 And swept by threads of raven hair,
 The fire of thought was in his eye,
 And he was pale and marble fair,
 And Grecian chisel never caught
 The soul in those slight features wrought.
 I watched his graceful step of pride,
 Till hidden by yon leaning tree,
 And loved him ere the echo died;
 And so, alas! did Melanie!

We sat and watched the fount awhile
 In silence, but our thoughts were one;
 And then arose, and, with a smile
 Of sympathy, he sauntered on;
 And she by sudden fits was gay,
 And then her laughter died away,
 And in this changefulness of mood
 (Forgotten now those May-day spells)
 We turned where Varro's villa stood,
 And gazing on the Cascatelles,
 (Whose hurrying waters wild and white Seemed maddened as they burst to light,)
 I chanced to turn my eyes away,
 And lo! upon a bank, alone,
 The youthful painter, sleeping, lay!
 His pencils on the grass were thrown
 And by his side a sketch was flung,
 And near him as I lightly crept,
 To see the picture as he slept,
 Upon his feet he lightly sprang;
 And, gazing with a wild surprise
 Upon the face of Melanie,
 He said—and dropped his earnest eyes—
 "Forgive me! but I dreamed of thee!"
 His sketch, the while, was in my hand,
 And, for the lines I looked to trace—
 A torrent by a palace spanned,
 Half-classic and half fairy-land—
 I only found—my sister's face!

III.

Our life was changed. Another love
 In its lone woof began to twine:
 But ah! the golden thread was wove
 Between my sister's heart and mine!
 She who had lived for me before—
 She who had smiled for me alone—
 Would live and smile for me no more!
 The echo to my heart was gone!
 It seemed to me the very skies
 Had shone through those averted eyes;
 The air had breathed of balm—the flower
 Of radiant beauty seemed to be—
 But as she loved them, hour by hour,
 And murmured of that love to me!
 Oh, though it be so heavenly high
 The selfishness of earth above,
 That, of the watchers in the sky,
 He sleeps who guards a brother's love—
 Though to a sister's present weal
 The deep devotion far transcends
 The utmost that the soul can feel
 For even its own higher ends—

Though next to God, and more than heaven
 For his own sake, he loves her, even—
 'Tis difficult to see another,
 A passing stranger of a day
 Who never hath been friend or brother,
 Pluck with a look her heart away—
 To see the fair, unsullied brow
 Ne'er kissed before without a prayer,
 Upon a stranger's bosom now,
 Who for the boon took little care—
 Who is enriched, he knows not why—
 Who suddenly hath found a treasure
 Golconda were too poor to buy,
 And he perhaps, too cold to measure—
 (Albeit, in her forgetful dream,
 Th' unconscious idol happier seem),
 'Tis difficult at once to crush
 The rebel mourner in the breast,
 To press the heart to earth and hush
 Its bitter jealousy to rest—
 And difficult—the eye gets dim,
 The lip wants power—to smile on him!

I thank sweet Mary Mother now,
 Who gave me strength those pangs to hide—
 And touched mine eyes and lit my brow
 With sunshine that my heart belied.
 I never spoke of wealth or race
 To one who asked so much from me—
 I looked but in my sister's face,
 And mused if she would happier be;
 And hour by hour, and day by day,
 I loved the gentle painter more,
 And, in the same soft measure, wore
 My selfish jealousy away:
 And I began to watch his mood,
 And feel, with her, love's trembling care,
 And bade God bless him as he wooed
 That loving girl so fond and fair.
 And on my mind would sometimes press
 A fear that she might love him less.

But Melanie—I little dreamed
 What spells the stirring heart may move—
 Pygmalion's statue never seemed
 More changed with life, than she with love!
 The pearl teint of the early dawn
 Flushed into day-spring's rosy hue—
 The meek, moss-folded bud of morn
 Flung open to the light and dew—
 The first and half-seen star of even Waxed clear amid the deepening heaven—
 Similitudes perchance may be!
 But these are changes oftener seen,
 And do not image half to me
 My sister's change of face and mein.
 'Twas written in her very air
 That Love had passed and entered there.

IV.

A calm and lovely paradise
 Is Italy, for minds at ease.
 The sadness of its sunny skies
 Weighs not upon the lives of these.
 The ruined aisle, the crumbling fane,
 The broken column, vast and prone—
 It may be joy—it may be pain—
 Amid such wrecks to walk alone!
 The saddest man will sadder be,
 The gentlest lover gentler there—
 As if, whate'er the spirit's key,
 It strengthened in that solemn air.

The heart soon grows to mournful things,
 And Italy has not a breeze
 At comes on melancholy wings;
 Had And even her majestic trees
 His and ghost-like in the Caesars' home,
 By sl's if their conscious roots were set
 To c'he old graves of giant Rome,
 He c'd drew their sap all kingly yet!
 His fr

And every stone your feet beneath
 Is broken from some mighty thought;
 And sculptures in the dust still breathe
 The fire with which their lines were wrought;
 And sundered arch, and plundered tomb,
 Still thunder back the echo, "Rome!"
 Yet, gayly o'er Egeria's fount
 The ivy flings its emerald veil,
 And flowers grow fair on Numa's mount,
 And light-sprung arches span the dale;
 And soft, from Caracalla's Baths,
 The herdsman's song comes down the breeze
 While climb his goats the giddy paths
 To grass-grown architrave and frieze;
 And gracefully Albano's hill
 Curves into the horizon's line;
 And sweetly sings that classic rill;
 And fairly stands that nameless shrine;
 And here, oh, many a sultry noon
 And starry eve, that happy June,
 Came Angelo and Melanie!
 And earth for us was all in tune—
 For while Love talked with them, Hope walked apart with me!

V.

I shrink from the embittered close
 Of my own melancholy tale.
 'Tis long since I have waked my woes—
 And nerve and voice together fail,
 The throb beats faster at my brow,
 My brain feels warm with starting tears,
 And I shall weep—but heed not thou!
 'Twill sooth awhile the ache of years!
 The heart transfixed—worn out with grief—
 Will turn the arrow for relief.

The painter was a child of shame!
 It stirred my pride to know it first,
 For I had questioned but his name,
 And, thought, alas! I knew the worst,
 Believing him unknown and poor.
 His blood, indeed, was not obscure;
 A high-born Conti was his mother,
 But, though he knew one parent's face,
 He never had beheld the other,
 Nor knew his country or his race.
 The Roman hid his daughter's shame
 Within St. Mona's convent wall,
 And gave the boy a painter's name—
 And little else to live withal!
 And with a noble's high desires
 For ever mounting in his heart,
 The boy consumed with hidden fires,
 But wrought in silence at his art;
 And sometimes at St. Mona's shrine,
 Worn thin with penance harsh and long,
 He saw his mother's form divine,
 And loved her for their mutual wrong.
 I said my pride was stirred—but no!
 The voice that told its bitter tale
 Was touched so mournfully with wo,
 And, as he ceased, all deathly pale,
 He loosed the hand of Melanie,
 And gazed so gaspingly on me—
 The demon in my bosom died!
 "Not thine," I said, "another's guilt;
 I break no hearts for silly pride;
 So, kiss yon weeper if thou wilt!"

VI.

St. Mona's morning mass was done,
 The shrine-lamps struggled with the day;
 And rising slowly, one by one,
 Stole the last worshippers away.
 The organist played out the hymn,
 The incense, to St. Mary swung,
 Had mounted to the cherubim,
 Or to the pillars thinly clung;
 And boyish chorister replaced
 The missal that was read no more,
 And closed, with half irreverent haste,
 Confessional and chancel door;

And as, through aisle and oriel pane,
The sun wore round his slanting beam,
The dying martyr stirred again,
And warriors battled in its gleam;
And costly tomb and sculptured knight
Showed warm and wondrous in the light.

I have not said that Melanie
Was radiantly fair—

This earth again may never see
A loveliness so rare!
She glided up St. Mona's aisle
That morning as a bride,
And, full as was my heart the while,
I blessed her in my pride!
The fountain may not fail the less
Whose sands are golden ore,
And a sister for her loveliness,
May not be loved the more;
But as, the fount's full heart beneath,
Those golden sparkles shine,
My sister's beauty seemed to breathe
Its brightness over mine!

St. Mona has a chapel dim
Within the altar's fretted pale,
Where faintly comes the swelling hymn,
And dies half lost the anthem's wail.
And here, in twilight meet for prayer,
A single lamp hangs o'er the shrine,
And Raphael's Mary, soft and fair,
Looks down with sweetness half divine,
And here St. Mona's nuns always
Through latticed bars are seen to pray.
Avé and sacrament were o'er,
And Angelo and Melanie
Still knelt the holy shrine before:

But prayer, that morn was not for me!
My heart was locked! The lip might stir,
The frame might agonize—and yet,
Oh God! I could not pray for her!

A seal upon my brow was set—
My brow was hot—my brain oppress—
And fiends seemed muttering round, "Your bridal is unblest!"

With forehead to the lattice laid,
And thin, white fingers straining through,
A nun the while had softly prayed.
Oh, even in prayer that voice I knew!
Each faltering word—each mournful tone—
Each pleading cadence, half-suppressed—
Such music had its like alone
On lips that stole it at her breast!
And ere the orison was done
I loved the mother as the son!

And now, the marriage vows to hear,
The nun unveiled her brow—
When, sudden, to my startled ear,
There crept a whisper, hoarse like fear,
"De Brevern! is it thou!"
The priest let fall the golden ring,
The bridegroom stood aghast,
While, like some weird and frantic thing,
The nun was muttering fast;
And as, in dread, I nearer drew,
She thrust her arms the lattice through,
And held me to her straining view—
But suddenly begun

To steal upon her brain a light
That staggered soul, and sense, and sight,
And, with a mouth all ashy white,
She shrieked, "It is his son!"

The bridegroom is thy blood—thy brother!
Rodolph de Brevern wronged his mother!

And, as that doom of love was heard,
My sister sunk—and died—without a sign or word!

• • • • •

I shed no tear for her. She died
With her last sunshine in her eyes.
Earth held for her no joy beside
The hope just shattered—and she lies

In a green nook of yonder dell;
And near her, in a newer bed,
Her lover—brother—sleeps as well!
Peace to the broken-hearted dead!

LORD IVON AND HIS DAUGHTER.

"Dost thou despise
A love like this! A lady should not scorn
One soul that loves her, howe'er lowly it be."

LORD IVON.

How beautiful it is! Come here, my daughter!
Is't not a face of most bewildering brightness?

ISIDORE.

The features are all fair, sir, but so cold—
I could not love such beauty!

LORD IVON.

Yet, e'en so
Looked thy lost mother, Isidore! Her brow
Lofty like this—her lips thus delicate,
Yet icy cold in their slight vermeil threads—
Her neck thus queenly, and the sweeping curve
Thus matchless, from the small and "pearl round ear"
To the o'er-polished shoulder. Never swan
Dreamed on the water with a grace so calm!

ISIDORE.

And was she proud, sir?

LORD IVON.

Or I had not loved her.

ISIDORE.

Then runs my lesson wrong. I ever read
Pride was unlovely.

LORD IVON.

Dost thou prate already
Of books, my little one? Nay, then, 'tis time
That a sad tale were told thee. Is thy bird
Fed for the day? Canst thou forget the rein
Of thy beloved Arabian for an hour,
And, the first time in all thy sunny life,
Take sadness to thy heart? Wilt listen, sweet?

ISIDORE.

Hang I not ever on thy lips, dear father?

LORD IVON.

As thou didst enter, I was musing here
Upon this picture. 'Tis the face of one
I never knew; but, for its glorious pride,
I bought it of the painter. There has hung
Ever the cunning curse upon my soul
To love this look in woman. Not the flower
Of all Arcadia, in the Age of Gold,
Looked she a shepherdess, would be to me
More than the birds are. As the astrologer
Worships the half-seen star that in its sphere
Dreams not of him, and tramples on the lily
That flings, unasked, its fragrance in his way,
Yet both (as the high-born and the low)
Wrought of the same fine Hand—so, daringly,
Flew my boy-hopes beyond me. You are here
In a brave palace, Isidore! The gem
That sparkles in your hair, imprisons light
Drunk in the flaming Orient; and gold
Waits on the bidding of those girlish lips
In measures that Aladdin never knew—
Yet was I—lowly born!

ISIDORE.

Lord Ivon!

LORD IVON.

Ay,

You wonder; but I tell you that the Lord
Of this tall palace was a peasant's child!
And, looking sometimes on his fair domain,
Thy sire bethinks him of a sickly boy,
Nursed by his mother on a mountain side,
His only wealth a book of poetry,
With which he daily crept into the sun,

To cheat sharp pains with the bewildering dream
Of beauty he had only read of there.

ISIDORE.

Have you the volume still, sir?

LORD IVON.

'Twas the gift
Of a poor scholar wandering in the hills,
Who pitied my sick idleness. I fed
My inmost soul upon the witching rhyme—
A silly tale of a low minstrel boy,
Who broke his heart in singing at a bridal.

ISIDORE.

Loved he the lady, sir?

LORD IVON.

So ran the tale.

How well I do remember it!

ISIDORE.

Alas!

Poor youth!

LORD IVON.

I never thought to pity him.
The bride was a duke's sister; and I mused
Upon the wonder of his daring love,
Till my heart changed within me. I became Restless and sad; and in my sleep I saw Beautiful dames all scornfully go by;
And one o'er weary morn I crept away
Into the glen, and, flung upon a rock,
Over a torrent whose swift, giddy waters
Filled me with energy, I swore my soul
To better that false vision, if there were
Manhood or fire within my wretched frame.
I turned me homeward with the sunset hour,
Changed—for the thought had conquered even disease;
And my poor mother checked her busy wheel
To wonder at the step with which I came.

Oh, heavens! that soft and dewy April eve,
When, in a minstrel's garb, but with a heart
As lofty as the marble shafts upreared
Beneath the stately portico, I stood
At this same palace door!

ISIDORE.

Our own! and you

A minstrel boy!

LORD IVON.

Yes—I had wandered far
Since I shook off my sickness in the hills,
And, with some cunning on the lute, had learned
A subtler lesson than humility
In the quick school of want. A menial stood
By the Egyptian sphinx; and when I came
And prayed to sing beneath the balcony
A song of love for a fair lady's ear,
He insolently bade me to begone.
Listening not, I swept my fingers o'er
The strings in prelude, when the base-born slave
Struck me!

ISIDORE.

Impossible!

LORD IVON.

I dashed my lute
Into his face, and o'er the threshold flew;
And threading rapidly the lofty rooms,
Sought vainly for his master. Suddenly
A wing rushed o'er me, and a radiant girl,
Young as myself, but fairer than the dream
Of my most wild imagining, sprang forth,
Chasing a dove, that, wildered with pursuit,
Dropt breathless on my bosom.

ISIDORE.

Nay, dear father!

Was't so indeed?

LORD IVON.

I thanked my blessed star!
And, as the fair, transcendent creature stood

Silent with wonder, I resigned the bird
To her white hands; and, with a rapid thought,
And lips already eloquent of love,
Turned the strange chance to a similitude
Of my own story. Her slight, haughty lip
Curled at the warm recital of my wrong,
And on the ivory oval of her cheek
The rose flushed outward with a deeper red;
And from that hour the minstrel was at home,
And horse and hound were his, and none might cross
The minion of the noble Lady Clare.
Art weary of my tale?

ISIDORE.

Dear father!

LORD IVON.

Well!

A summer, and a winter, and a spring,
Went over me like brief and noteless hours.
For ever at the side of one who grew
With every morn more beautiful; the slave,
Willing and quick, of every idle whim;
Singing for no one's bidding but her own,
And then a song from my own passionate heart,
 Sung with a lip of fire, but ever named
As an old rhyme that I had chanced to hear;
Riding beside her, sleeping at her door,
Doing her maddest bidding at the risk
Of life—what marvel if at last I grew Presumptuous?

A messenger one morn
Spurred through the gate—"A revel at the court!
And many minstrels, come from many lands,
Will try their harps in presence of the king;
And 'tis the royal pleasure that my lord
Come with the young and lovely Lady Clare,
Robed as the queen of Faery, who shall crown
The victor with his bays."

Pass over all
To that bewildering day. She sat enthroned
Amid the court; and never twilight star
Sprang with such sweet surprise upon the eye
As she with her rare beauty on the gaze
Of the gay multitude. The minstrels changed
Their studied songs, and chose her for a theme;
And ever at the pause all eyes upturned
And fed upon her loveliness.

The last
Long lay was ended, and the silent crowd
Waited the king's award—when suddenly
The sharp strings of a lyre were swept without,
And a clear voice claimed hearing for a bard
Belated on his journey. Masked, and clad
In a long stole, the herald led me in.
A thousand eyes were on me; but I saw
The new-throned queen, in her high place, alone;
And, kneeling at her feet, I pressed my brow
Upon her footstool, till the images
Of my past hours rushed thick upon my brain;
Then, rising hastily, I struck my lyre;
And, in a story woven of my own,
I so did paint her in her loveliness—
Pouring my heart all out upon the lines
I knew too faithfully, and lavishing
The hoarded fire of a whole age of love
Upon each passionate word, that, as I sunk
Exhausted at the close, the ravished crowd
Flung gold and flowers on my still quivering lyre;
And the moved monarch in his gladness swore
There was no boon beneath his kingly crown
Too high for such a minstrel!

Did my star
Speak in my fainting ear? Heard I the king?
Or did the audible pulses of my heart
Seem to me so articulate? I rose,
And tore my mask away; and, as the stole
Dropped from my shoulders, I glanced hurriedly
A look upon the face of Lady Clare
It was enough! I saw that she was changed—
That a brief hour had chilled the open child

To calculating woman—that she read
With cold displeasure my o'er-daring thought;
And on that brow, to me as legible
As stars to the rapt Arab, I could trace
The scorn that waited on me! Sick of life,
Yet, even then, with a half-rallied hope
Prompting my faltering tongue, I blindly knelt,
And claimed the king's fair promise—

ISIDORE.

For the hand

Of Lady Clare?

LORD IVON.

No, sweet one—for a sword.

ISIDORE.

You surely spoke to her?

LORD IVON.

I saw her face

No more for years. I went unto the wars;
And when again I sought that palace door,
A glory heralded the minstrel boy
That monarchs might have envied.

ISIDORE.

Was she there?

LORD IVON.

Yes—and, O God! how beautiful! The last,
The ripest seal of loveliness, was set
Upon her form; and the all-glorious pride
That I had worshipped on her girlish lip,
When her scared dove fled to me, was matured
Into a queenly grace; and nobleness
Was bound like a tiara to her brow,
And every motion breathed of it. There lived
Nothing on earth so ravishingly fair.

ISIDORE.

And you still loved her?

LORD IVON.

I had periled life

In every shape—had battled on the sea,
And burnt upon the desert, and outgone
Spirits most mad for glory, with this one
O'ermastering hope upon me. Honor, fame,
Gold, even, were as dust beneath my feet;
And war was my disgust, though I had sought
Its horrors like a bloodhound—for her praise.
My life was drunk up with the love of her.

ISIDORE.

And now she scorned you not?

LORD IVON.

Worse, Isidore!

She pitied me! I did not need a voice
To tell my love. She knew her sometime minion—
And felt that she should never be adopted
With such idolatry as his, and sighed
That hearts so true beat not in palaces—
But I was poor, with all my bright renown,
And lowly born: and she—the Lady Clare!

ISIDORE.

She could not tell you this?

LORD IVON.

She broke my heart

As kindly as the fisher hooks the worm—
Pitying me the while!

ISIDORE.

And you—

LORD IVON.

Lived on!

But the remembrance irks me, and my throat
Chokes with the utterance!

ISIDORE.

Dear father!

LORD IVON.

Nay—

Thanks to sweet Mary Mother, it is past:

And in this world I shall have no more need
To speak of it.

ISIDORE.

But there were brighter days

In store. My mother and this palace—

LORD IVON.

You outrun

My tale, dear Isidore! But 'tis as well,
I would not linger on it.

Twenty years

From this heart-broken hour, I stood again
An old man and a stranger, at the door
Of this same palace. I had been a slave
For gold that time! My star had wrought with me!
And I was richer than the wizard king
Throned in the mines of Ind. I could not look
On my innumerable gems, the glare
Pained so my sun-struck eyes! My gold was countless.

ISIDORE.

And Lady Clare?

LORD IVON.

I met upon the threshold

Her very self—all youth, all loveliness—
So like the fresh-kept picture in my brain,
That for a moment I forgot all else,
And staggered back and wept. She passed me by
With a cold look—

ISIDORE.

Oh! not the Lady Clare!

LORD IVON.

Her daughter yet herself! But what a change
Waited me here! My thin and grizzled locks
Were fairer now than the young minstrel's curls;
My sun-burnt visage and contracted eye
Than the gay soldier in his gallant mien;
My words were wit, my looks interpreted;
And Lady Clare—I tell you, Lady Clare
Leaned fondly—fondly! on my wasted arm.
O God! how changed my nature with all this!
I, that had been all love and tenderness—
The truest and most gentle heart, till now,
That ever beat—grew suddenly a devil!
I bought me lands, and titles, and received
Men's homage with a smooth hypocrisy;
You will scarce believe me, Isidore—
I suffered them to wile their peerless daughter,
The image and the pride of Lady Clare,
To wed me!

ISIDORE.

Sir! you did not!

LORD IVON.

Ay! I saw

The indignant anger when her mother first
Broke the repulsive wish, and the degrees
Of shuddering reluctance as her mind
Admitted the intoxicating tales
Of wealth unlimited. And when she looked
On my age-stricken features, and my form,
Wasted before its time, and turned away
To hide from me her tears, her very mother
Whispered the cursed comfort in her ear
That made her what she is!

ISIDORE.

You could not wed her,

Knowing all this!

LORD IVON.

I felt that I had lost

My life else. I had wrung, for forty years,
My frame to its last withers; I had flung
My boyhood's fire away—the energy
Of a most sinless youth—the toil, and fret,
And agony of manhood. I had dared,
Fought, suffered, slaved—and never for an hour
Forgot or swerved from my resolve; and now—
With the delirious draught upon my lips—
Dash down the cup!

ISIDORE.

Yet she never wronged you !

LORD IVON.

Thou'rt pleading for thy mother, my sweet child !
 And angels hear thee. But, if she was wronged,
 The sin be on the pride that sells its blood
 Coldly and only for this damning gold.
 Had I not offered youth first ? Came I not,
 With my hands brimmed with glory, to buy love—
 And was I not denied ?

ISIDORE.

Yet, dearest father,
 They forced her not to wed ?

LORD IVON.

I called her back
 Myself from the church threshold, and, before
 Her mother and her kinsmen, bade her swear
 It was her own free choice to marry me.
 I showed her my shrunk hand, and bade her think
 If that was like a bridegroom, and beware
 Of perjuring her chaste and spotless soul,
 If now she loved me not.

ISIDORE.

What said she, sir ?

LORD IVON.

Oh ! they had made her even as themselves :
 And her young heart was colder than the slab
 Unsunbened beneath Pentelicus. She pressed
 My withered fingers in her dewy clasp,
 And smiled up in my face, and chid "my lord"
 For his wild fancies and led on !

ISIDORE.

And no

Misgiving at the altar ?

LORD IVON.

None ! She swore
 To love and cherish me till death should part us,
 With a voice as clear as mine.

ISIDORE.

And kept it, father !

In mercy tell me so !

LORD IVON.

She lives, my daughter !

Long ere my babe was born, my pride had ebb'd,
 And let my heart down to its better founts
 Of tenderness. I had no friends—not one !
 My love gushed to my wife. I racked my brain
 To find her a new pleasure every hour—
 Yet not with me—I feared to haunt her eye !
 Only at night, when she was slumbering
 In all her beauty, I would put away
 The curtains till the pale night-lamp shone on her,
 And watch her through my tears.

One night her lips
 Parted as I gazed on them, and the name
 Of a young noble, who had been my guest,
 Stole forth in broken murmurs. I let fall
 The curtains silently, and left her there
 To slumber and dream on ; and gliding forth
 Upon the terrace, knelt to my pale star,
 And swore, that if it pleased the God of light
 To let me look upon the unborn child
 Lying beneath her heart, I would but press
 One kiss upon its lips, and take away
 My life—that was a blight upon her years.

ISIDORE.

I was that child !

LORD IVON.

Yes—and I heard the cry
 Of thy small "piping mouth" as 'twere a call
 From my remembering star. I waited only

Thy mother's strength to bear the common shock
 Of death within the doors. She rose at last,
 And, oh ! so sweetly pale ! And thou, my child !
 My heart misgave me as I looked upon thee ;
 But he was ever at her side whose name
She murmured in her sleep ; and, lingering on
 To drink a little of thy sweetness more
 Before I died, I watched their stolen love
 As she had been my daughter, with a pure,
 Passionless joy that I should leave her soon
 To love him as she would. I know not how
 To tell thee more.

Come, sweet ! she is not worthy
 Of tears like thine and mine.

She fled and left me
 The very night ! The poison was prepared—
 And she had been a widow with the morn
 Rich as Golconda. As the midnight chimed,
 My star rose. Gazing on its mounting orb,
 I raised the chalice—but a weakness came
 Over my heart ; and, taking up the lamp,
 I glided to her chamber, and removed
 The curtains for a last, a parting look Upon my child.

Had she but taken thee,
 I could have felt she had a mother's heart,
 And drained the chalice still. I could not leave
 My babe alone in such a heartless world !

ISIDORE.

Thank God ! Thank God !

TO ERMENGARDE.

I know not if the sunshine waste—

The world is dark since thou art gone !

The hours are, oh ! so leaden-paced !

The birds sing, and the stars float on,

But sing not well, and look not fair—

A weight is in the summer air,

And sadness in the sight of flowers,

And if I go where others smile,

Their love but makes me think of ours,

And heavier gets my heart the while.

Like one upon a desert isle,

I languish of the weary hours ;

I never thought a life could be

So flung upon one hope, as mine, dear love, on thee !

I sit and watch the summer sky,

There comes a cloud through heaven alone ;

A thousand stars are shining nigh—

It feels no light, but darkles on !

Yet now it nears the lovelier moon ;

And, flushing through its fringe of snow,

There steals a rosier die, and soon

Its bosom is one fiery glow !

The queen of light within it lies !

Yet mark how lovers meet to part !

The cloud already onward flies,

And shadows sink into its heart,

And (dost thou see them where thou art ?)

Fade fast, fade all those glorious dies !

Its light, like mine, is seen no more,

And, like my own, its heart seems darker than before

Where press this hour those fairy feet,

Where look this hour those eyes of blue !

What music in thine ear is sweet !

What odor breathes thy lattice through !

What word is on thy lip ? What tone—

What look—replying to thine own ?

Thy steps along the Danube stray—

Alas it seeks an orient sea !

Thou wouldst not seem so far away

Flowed but its waters back to me ?

I bless the slowly coming moon

Because its eye looked late in thine !

I envy the west wind of June

Whose wings will bear it up the Rhine ;

The flower I press upon my brow

Were sweeter if its like perfumed thy chamber now !

THE PITY OF THE PARK FOUNTAIN.

'Twas a summery day in the last of May—
Pleasant in sun or shade;
And the hours went by as the poets say,
Fragrant and fair on their flowery way;
And a hearse crept slowly through Broadway;
And the Fountain gayly played.

The Fountain played right merrily,
And the world looked bright and gay;
And a youth went by, with a restless eye,
Whose heart was sick, and whose brain was dry,
And he prayed to God that he might die—
And the Fountain played away.

Uprose the spray like a diamond throne,
And the drops like music rang—
And of those who marvelled how it shone,
Was a proud man, left in his shame alone,
And he shut his teeth with a smothered groan,
And the Fountain sweetly sang.

And a rainbow spanned it changefully,
Like a bright ring broke in twain;
And the pale, fair girl, who stopped to see,
Was sick with the pangs of poverty—
And from hunger to guilt she chose to flee,
As the rainbow smiled again.

And all as gay, on another day,
The morning will have shone;
And at noon, unmarked, through bright Broadway,
A hearse will take its silent way;
And the bard who sings will have passed away—
And the Fountain will play on!

"CHAMBER SCENE."

(An exquisite picture in the studio of a young artist at Rome.)

SHE rose from her untroubled sleep,
And put away her soft brown hair,
And in a tone as low and deep
As love's first whisper, breathed a prayer—
Her snow-white hands together pressed,
Her blue eyes sheltered in the lid,
The folded linen on her breast
Just swelling with the charms it hid—
And from her long and flowing dress
Escaped a bare and slender foot,
Whose shape upon the earth did press
Like a new snow-flake, white and "mute;"
And there, from slumber pure and warm,
Like a young spirit fresh from heaven,
She bowed her slight and graceful form,
And humbly prayed to be forgiven.

Oh God! if souls unsoiled as these Need daily mercy from thy throne—
If she upon her bended knees—
Our loveliest and our purest one—
She, with a face so clear and bright
We deem her some stray child of light—
If she, with those soft eyes in tears,
Day after day in her first years,
Must kneel and pray for grace from thee—
What far, far deeper need have we?
How hardly, if she win not heaven,
Will our wild errors be forgiven!

TO A STOLEN RING.

Oh for thy history now! Hadst thou a tongue
To whisper of thy secrets, I could lay
Upon thy jewelled tracery mine ear,
And dream myself in heaven. Thou hast been worn
In that fair creature's pride, and thou hast felt
The bounding of the haughtiest blood that e'er
Sprang from the heart of woman; and thy gold
Has lain upon her forehead in the hour
Of sadness, when the weary thoughts came fast,
And life was but a bitterness with all
Its vividness and beauty. She has gazed

In her fair girlhood on thy snowy pearls,
And mused away the hours, and she has bent
On thee the downcast radiance of her eye
When a deep tone was eloquent in her ear,
And thou hast lain upon her cheek, and prest
Back on her heart its beatings, and put by
From her veined temples the luxuriant curls,
And in her peaceful sleep, when she has lain
In her unconscious beauty, and the dreams
Of her high heart came goldenly and soft,
Thou hast been there unhidden, and hast felt
The swelling of the clear transparent veins
As the rich blood rushed through them, warm and

I am impatient as I gaze on thee,
Thou inarticulate jewel! Thou hast heard
With thy dull ear such music!—the low tone
Of a young sister's tenderness, when night
Hath folded them together like one flower—
The sudden snatch of a remembered song
Warbled capriciously—the careless word
Lightly betraying the inaudible thought
Working within the heart; and more than all,
Thou hast been lifted when the fervent prayer
For a loved mother, or the sleeping one
Lying beside her, trembled on her lip,
And the warm tear that from her eye stole out
As the soft lash fell over it, has lain
Amid thy shining jewels like a star.

TO HER WHO HAS HOPES FOR ME.

Oh stern, yet lovely mistress!
Thine eye should be of colder hue,
And on thy neck a paler tress
Should toy among those veins of blue!
For thou art to thy mission true—
An angel clad in human guise—
But sinners sometimes have such eyes,
And braid for love such tresses too;
And, while thou talkest to me of heaven,
I sigh that thou hast not a sin to be forgiven!

Night comes, with love upon the breeze,
And the calm clock strikes, stilly, "ten."
I start to hear it beat, for then
I know that thou art on thy knees—
And, at that hour, where'er thou be,
Ascends to heaven a prayer for me!
My heart drops to its bended knee—
The mirth upon my lip is dumb—
Yet, as a thought of heaven would come,
There glides, before it, one of thee—
Thou, in thy white dress, kneeling there!—
I fear I could leave heaven to see thee at thy prayer!

I follow up the sacred aisle,
Thy light step on the Sabbath day,
And—as perhaps thou pray'st the while—
My light thoughts pass away!
As swells in air the holy hymn,
My breath comes thick, my eyes are dim,
And through my tears I pray!
I do not think my heart is stone—
But, while for heaven it beats alone—
In heaven would willing stay—
One rustle of thy snow-white gown
Sends all my thoughts astray!
The preaching dies upon my ear—
What "is the better word" when thy dark eyes are here!

Yet pray! my years have been but few—
And many a wile the tempter weaves,
And many a saint the sinner grieves
Ere Mercy brings him through!
But oh, when Mercy sits serene
And strives to bend to me,
Pray, that the cloud which comes between
May less resemble thee!

The world that would my soul beguile
Taints all its roses with thy smile!

In heaven 'twere well to be!

But—to desire that blessed shore—

Oh lady! thy dark eyes must first have gone before!

THE DEATH OF HARRISON.

WHAT! soared the old eagle to die at the sun!
Lies he stiff with spread wings at the goal he had won!
Are there spirits, more blest than the "Planet of Even,"
Who mount to their zenith, then melt into Heaven—
No waning of fire, no quenching of ray,
But rising, still rising, when passing away?
Farewell, gallant eagle! thou'rt buried in light!
God-speed into Heaven, lost star of our night!

Death! Death in the White House! Ah, never before,
Trod his skeleton foot on the President's floor!
He is looked for in hovel, and dreaded in hall—
The king in his closet keeps hatchment and pall—
The youth in his birth-place, the old man at home,
Make clean from the door-stone the path to the tomb;—
But the lord of this mansion was cradled not here—
In a churchyard far off stands his beckoning bier!
He is here as the wave-crest heaves flashing on high—
As the arrow is stopped by its prize in the sky—
The arrow to earth, and the foam to the shore—
Death finds them when swiftmess and sparkle are o'er—
But Harrison's death fills the climax of story—
He went with his old stride—from glory to glory!

Lay his sword on his breast! There's no spot on its blade
In whose cankering brent his bright laurels will fade!
'Twas the first to lead on at humanity's call—
It was stayed with sweet mercy when "glory" was all!
As calm in the council as gallant in war,
He fought for his country, and not its "hurrah!"
In the path of the hero with pity he trod—
Let him pass—with his sword—to the presence of God!

What more! Shall we on, with his ashes! Yet, stay!
He hath ruled the wide realm of a king, in his day!
At his word, like a monarch's, went treasure and land—
The bright gold of thousands has passed through his hand—
Is there nothing to show of his glittering hoard?
No jewel to deck the rude hilt of his sword—
No trappings—no horses?—what had he, but now?
On!—on with his ashes!—HE LEFT BUT HIS PLOUGH!
Brave old Cincinnatus! Unwind ye his sheet!
Let him sleep as he lived—with his purse at his feet!

Follow now, as ye list! The first mourner to-day
Is the nation—whose father is taken away!
Wife, children, and neighbor, may moan at his knell—
He was "lover and friend" to his country, as well!
For the stars on our banner, grown suddenly dim,
Let us weep, in our darkness—but weep not for him!
Not for him—who, departing, leaves millions in tears!
Not for him—who has died full of honor and years!
Not for him—who ascended Fame's ladder so high
From the round at the top he has stepped to the sky!
It is blessed to go when so ready to die!

"SHE WAS NOT THERE."

"The bird
Let loose, to his far nest will flee,
And love, though breathed but on a word
Will find thee, over land and sea."

'Tis midnight deep—I came but now
From the close air of lighted halls;
And while I hold my aching brow
I gaze upon my dim-lit walls;
And feeling here that I am free
To wear the look that suits my mood,
And let my thoughts flow back to thee,
I bless my tranquil solitude,
And bidding all thoughts else begone,
I muse upon thy love alone.

Yet was the music sweet to-night,
And fragrant odors filled the air,
And flowers were drooping in the light,
And lovely women wandered there,
And fruits and wines with lavish waste
Were on the marble tables piled;
And all that tempts the eye and taste,
And sets the haggard pulses wild,
And wins from care, and deadens sadness,
Were there—but yet I felt no gladness.

I thought of thee—I thought of thee—
Each cunning change the music played,
Each fragrant breath that stole to me,
My wandering thought more truant made.
The lovely women passed me by,
The wit fell pow'rless on mine ear,
I looked on all with vacant eye,
I did not see—I did not hear!
The skilled musician's master-tone
Was sweet—thy voice were sweeter far!
They were soft eyes the lamps shone on—
The eyes I worship gentler are!
The halls were broad, the mirrors tall,
With silver lamps and costly wine—
I only thought how poor was all
To one low tone from lips like thine—
I only felt how well forgot

Were all the stars look on—and thy sweet eyes do not!

FAIL ME NOT THOU!

"Oh, by that little word
How many thoughts are stirred!—
The last, the last, the last!"

THE star may but a meteor be,
That breaks upon the stormy night;
And I may err, believing thee
A spark of heaven's own changeless light!
But if on earth beams aught so fair,
It seems, of all the lights that shine,
Serenest in its truth, 'tis there,
Burning in those soft eyes of thine.
Yet long-watched stars from heaven have rushed,
And long-loved friends have dropped away,
And mine—my very heart have crushed!
And I have hoped this many a day,
It lived no more for love or pain!
But thou hast stirred its depths again,
And to its dull, out-wearied ear,
Thy voice of melody has crept,
In tones it can not choose but hear;
And now I feel it only slept,
And know at ev'n thy lightest smile,
It gathered fire and strength the while.

Fail me not thou! This feeling past,
My heart would never rouse again.
Thou art the brightest—but the last!
And if this trust, this love is vain—
If thou, all peerless as thou art,
Be not less fair than true of heart—
My loves are o'er! The sun will shine
Upon no grave so hushed as this dark breast of mine.

SPIRIT-WHISPERS.

(Spirit-whisper—the poet's ear—MORNING.)

WAKE! poet, wake!—the morn has burst
Through gates of stars and dew,
And, winged by prayer since evening nursed,
Has fled to kiss the steeples first,
And now stoops low to you!
Oh poet of the loving eye
For you is drest this morning sky!

(Second whisper—NOON.)

Oh, poet of the pen enchanted!
A lady sits beneath a tree!
At last, the flood for which she panted—
The wild words for her anguish wanted,
Have gushed in song from thee!
Her dark curls sweep her knees to pray:—
"God bless the poet far away!"

(Third whisper—MIDNIGHT.)

King of the heart's deep mysteries!
Your words have wings like lightning wove!
This hour, o'er hills and distant seas,
They fly like flower-seeds on the breeze,
And sow the world with love!
King of a realm without a throne,
Ruled by restless tears alone!

TO M—— FROM ABROAD.

"The desire of the moth for the star—
Of the night for the morrow—
The devotion to something afar
From the sphere of our sorrow."

SHELLEY.

"L'alma, quel che non ha, sogna e figura."

METASTASIO.

As, gazing on the Pleiades,
We count each fair and starry one,
Yet wander from the light of these
To muse upon the Pleiad gone—
As, bending o'er fresh gathered flowers,
The rose's most enchanting hue
Reminds us but of other hours
Whose roses were all lovely too—
So, dearest, when I rove among
The bright ones of this foreign sky,
And mark the smile, and list the song,
And watch the dancers gliding by,
The fairer still they seem to be,
The more it stirs a thought of thee!

The sad, sweet bells of twilight chime,
Of many hearts may touch but one,
And so this seeming careless rhyme
Will whisper to thy heart alone.
I give it to the winds! The bird
Let loose, to his far nest will flee,
And love, though breathed but on a word,
Will find thee, over land and sea.
Though clouds across the sky have driven,
We trust the star at last will shine,
And like the very light of heaven
I trust thy love. Trust thou in mine!

SUNRISE THOUGHTS AT THE CLOSE OF A BALL.

MORN in the East! How coldly fair
It breaks upon my fevered eye!
How chides the calm and dewy air!
How chides the pure and pearly sky!
The stars melt in a brighter fire—
The dew, in sunshine, leaves the flowers—
They, from their watch, in light retire,
While we, in sadness, pass from ours.

I turn from the rebuking morn—
The cold gray sky, a fading star—
And listen to the harp and horn,
And see the waltzers near and far—
The lamps and flowers are bright as yet,
And lips beneath more bright than they—
How can a scene so fair beget
The mournful thoughts we bear away!

'Tis something that thou art not here
Sweet lover of my lightest word!
'Tis something that my mother's tear
By these forgetful hours is stirred!
But I have long a loiterer been
In haunts where joy is said to be,
And though with Peace I enter in,
The nymph comes never forth with me.

TO A FACE BELOVED.

The music of the wakened lyre
Dies not upon the quivering strings,
Nor burns alone the minstrel's fire
Upon the lip that trembling sings;
Nor shines the moon in heaven unseen.
Nor shuts the flower its fragrant cells,
Nor sleeps the fountain's wealth, I ween,
For ever in its sparry wells—
The spells of the enchanter lie
Not on his own lone heart—his own rapt ear and eye.

I look upon a face as fair
As ever made a lip of heaven
Falter amid its music-prayer!
The first-lit star of summer even

Springs not so softly on the eye,
Nor grows, with watching half so bright,
Nor mid its sisters of the sky,
So seems of heaven the dearest light—
Men murmur where that face is seen,
My youth's angelic dream was of that look and mien.

Yet though we deem the stars are blest,
And envy, in our grief, the flower
That bears but sweetness in its breast,
And fear th' enchanter for his power,
And love the minstrel for his spell,
He winds out of his lyre so well—
The stars are almoners of light,
The lyrist of melodious air,
The fountain of its waters bright
And everything most sweet and fair
Of that by which it charms the ear,
The eye of him that passes near—
A lamp is lit in woman's eye
That souls, else lost on earth, remember angels by.

UNSEEN SPIRITS.

THE shadows lay along Broadway,
'Twas near the twilight-tide—
And slowly there a lady fair
Was walking in her pride.
Alone walked she; but, viewlessly,
Walked spirits at her side.

Peace charmed the street beneath her feet,
And honor charmed the air;
And all astir looked kind on her,
And called her good as fair—
For all God ever gave to her
She kept with chary care.

She kept with care her beauties rare
From lovers warm and true—
For her heart was cold to all but gold,
And the rich came not to woo—
But honored well are charms to sell
If priests the selling do.

Now walking there was one more fair—
A slight girl, lily-pale;
And she had unseen company
To make the spirit quail—
'Twixt Want and Scorn she walked forlorn,
And nothing could avail.

No mercy now can clear her brow
For this world's peace to pray;
For as love's wild prayer dissolved in air,
Her woman's heart gave way!
But the sin forgiven by Christ in heaven
By man is curst away!

BETTER MOMENTS.

My mother's voice! how often creeps
Its cadence on my lonely hours!
Like healing sent on wings of sleep,
Or dew to the unconscious flowers.

I can forget her melting prayer
While leaping pulses madly fly,
But in the still, unbroken air,
Her gentle tone comes stealing by—
And years, and sin, and manhood flee,
And leave me at my mother's knee.

The book of nature, and the print
Of beauty on the whispering sea
Give aye to me some lineament
Of what I have been taught to be.
My heart is harder, and perhaps
My manliness hath drank up tears;
And there's a mildew in the lapse
Of a few miserable years—
But nature's book is even yet
With all my mother's lessons writ.

I have been out at eventide
 Beneath a moonlight sky of spring,
 When earth was garnished like a bride,
 And night had on her silver wing—
 When bursting leaves, and diamond grass,
 And waters leaping to the light,
 And all that make the pulses pass
 With wilder fleetness, thronged the night—
 When all was beauty—then have I
 With friends on whom my love is flung
 Like myrrh on wings of Araby,
 Gazed up where evening's lamp is hung,
 And when the beautiful spirit there
 Flung over me its golden chain,
 My mother's voice came on the air
 Like the light dropping of the rain—
 And resting on some silver star
 The spirit of a bended knee,
 I've poured out low and fervent prayer
 That our eternity might be
 To rise in heaven, like stars at night,
 And tread a living path of light.

I have been on the dewy hills,
 When night was stealing from the dawn,
 And mist was on the waking rills,
 And tints were delicately drawn
 In the gray East—when birds were waking,
 With a low murmur in the trees,
 And melody by fits was breaking
 Upon the whisper of the breeze,
 And this when I was forth, perchance
 As a worn reveller from the dance—
 And when the sun sprang gloriously
 And freely up, and hill and river
 Were catching upon wave and tree
 The arrows from his subtle quiver—
 I say a voice has thrilled me then,
 Heard on the still and rushing light,
 Or, creeping from the silent glen,
 Like words from the departing night,
 Hath stricken me, and I have pressed
 On the wet grass my fevered brow,
 And pouring forth the earliest
 First prayer, with which I learned to bow,
 Have felt my mother's spirit rush
 Upon me as in by-past years,
 And, yielding to the blessed gush
 Of my ungovernable tears,
 Have risen up—the gay, the wild—
 As humble as a very child.

THE ANNOYER.

"Common as light is love,
 And its familiar voice wearies not ever."—SHELLEY.

Love knoweth every form of air,
 And every shape of earth,
 And comes, unbidden, everywhere,
 Like thought's mysterious birth.
 The moonlit sea and the sunset sky
 Are written with Love's words,
 And you hear his voice unceasingly,
 Like song in the time of birds.

He peeps into the warrior's heart
 From the tip of a stooping plume,
 And the serried spears, and the many men,
 May not deny him room.
 He'll come to his tent in the weary night,
 And be busy in his dream;
 And he'll float to his eye in morning light
 Like a fay on a silver beam.

He hears the sound of the hunter's gun,
 And rides on the echo back,
 And sighs in his ear, like a stirring leaf,
 And flits in his woodland track.
 The shade of the wood, and the sheen of the river,
 The cloud and the open sky—
 He will haunt them all with his subtle quiver,
 Like the light of your very eye.

The fisher hangs over the leaning boat,
 And ponders the silver sea,
 For Love is under the surface hid,
 And a spell of thought has he;
 He heaves the wave like a bosom sweet,
 And speaks in the ripple low,
 Till the bait is gone from the crafty line,
 And the hook hangs bare below.

He blurs the print of the scholar's book,
 And intrudes in the maiden's prayer,
 And profanes the cell of the holy man,
 In the shape of a lady fair.
 In the darkest night, and the bright daylight,
 In earth, and sea, and sky,
 In every home of human thought,
 Will love be lurking nigh.

ANDRE'S REQUEST TO WASHINGTON

It is not the fear of death
 That damps my brow,
 It is not for another breath
 I ask thee now;
 I can die with a lip unstirred
 And a quiet heart—
 Let but this prayer be heard
 Ere I depart.

I can give up my mother's look—
 My sister's kiss;
 I can think of love—yet brook
 A death like this!
 I can give up the young fame
 I burned to win—
 All—but the spotless name
 I glory in.

Thine is the power to give,
 Thine to deny,
 Joy for the hour I live—
 Calmness to die.
 By all the brave should cherish,
 By my dying breath,
 I ask that I may perish
 By a soldier's death!

DAWN.

"That line I learned not in the old sad song."—CHARLES LAMB.

Throw up the window! 'Tis a morn for life
 In its most subtle luxury. The air
 Is like a breathing from a rarer world;
 And the south wind is like a gentle friend,
 Parting the hair so softly on my brow.
 It has come over gardens, and the flowers
 That kissed it are betrayed; for as it parts,
 With its invisible fingers, my loose hair,
 I know it has been trifling with the rose,
 And stooping to the violet. There is joy
 For all God's creatures in it. The wet leaves
 Are stirring at its touch, and birds are singing
 As if to breathe were music, and the grass
 Sends up its modest odor with the dew,
 Like the small tribute of humility.

I had awoke from an unpleasant dream,
 And light was welcome to me. I looked out
 To feel the common air, and when the breath
 Of the delicious morning met my brow
 Cooling its fever, and the pleasant sun
 Shone on familiar objects, it was like
 The feeling of the captive who comes forth
 From darkness to the cheerful light of day.
 Oh! could we wake from sorrow; were it all
 A troubled dream like this, to cast aside
 Like an untimely garment with the morn;
 Could the long fever of the heart be cooled
 By a sweet breath from nature; or the gloom
 Of a bereaved affection pass away
 With looking on the lively taint of flowers—
 How lightly were the spirit reconciled
 To make this beautiful, bright world its home!

THE LADY JANE, AND OTHER POEMS.

THE LADY JANE,

A NOVEL IN RHYME.

I.

There was a lady fair, and forty too.

There was a youth of scarcely two and twenty.

The story of their loves is strange, yet true.

I'll tell it you! Romances are so plenty

In prose, that you'll be glad of something new.

And so (in rhyme) for "what the devil meant he!"

You think he was too young!—but tell me whether

The moth and humming-bird grow old together!

II.

Nature, that made the ivy-leaf and lily,

Not of one warp and woof hath made us all!

Bent goes the careful, and erect the silly,

And wear and tear make difference—not small;

And he that hath no money—will-he, nill-he—

Is thrust like an old man against the wall!

Grief out of some the very life-blood washes;

Some shed it like ducks' backs and "Mackintoshes."

III.

The Lady Jane was daughter of an Earl—

Shut from approach like sea-nymph in her shell

Never a rude breath stir'd the floating curl

Upon her marble temple, and naught fell

Upon the ear of the patrician girl

But pride-check'd syllables, all measured well

Her suitors were her father's and not hers—

So were her debts at "Storr-and-Mortimer's."

IV.

Her health was lady-like. No blood, in riot,

Tangled the tracery of her veined cheek,

Nor seem'd her exquisite repose the quiet

Of one by suffering made sweet and meek.

She ate and drank, and probably lived by it,

And liked her cup of tea by no means weak!

Untroubled by debt, lovers, or affliction,

Her pulse beat with extremely little friction.

V.

Yet was there fire within her soft gray eye,

And room for pressure on her lip of rose;

And few who saw her gracefully move by,

Imagined that her feelings slept, or froze.

You may have seen the cunning florist tie

A thread about a bud, which never blows,

But, with shut chalice from the sun and rain,

Hoards up the morn—and such the Lady Jane.

VI.

The old Lord had had offers for her hand,

The which he answer'd—by his secretary.

And, doubtless, some were for the lady's land,

The men being old and valetudinary;

But there were others who were all unmann'd,

And fell into a life of wild vagary,

In their despair. To tell his daughter of it,

The cold Earl thought, would be but little profit.

VII.

And so she bloom'd—all fenced around with care;

And none could find a way to win or woo her.

When visible at home—the Earl was there!

Abroad—her chaperon stuck closely to her!

She was a sort of nun in open air,

Known to but few, and intimate with fewer:

And, always used to conversation guarded,

She thought all men talk'd just as her papa did

VIII.

Pause while you read, oh, Broadway demoiselle!

And bless your stars that long before you marry,

You are a judge of passion pleaded well!

For you have listen'd to Tom, Dick, and Harry,

And, if kind Heaven endow'd you for a belle,

At least your destiny did not miscarry!

"You've had your fling!"—and now, all wise and steady,

For matrimony's cares you're cool and ready!

IX.

And yet the bloom upon the fruit is fair!

And "ignorance is bliss" in teaching love!

And guarding lips, when others have been there,

Is apt uneasy reveries to move!

I really think mammas should have a care!

And though of nunneries I disapprove,

'Tis easier to make blushes hear to reason

Than to unteach a "Saratoga Season."

X.

In France, where, it is said, they wiser are,

Miss may not walk out, even with her cousin;

And when she is abroad from bolt and bar,

A well-bred man should be to her quite frozen;

And so at last, like a high-priced attar

Hermetically seal'd in silk and resin,

She is deliver'd safe to him who loves her;

And then—with whom she will she's hand and glove, sir!

XI.

I know this does not work well, and that ours

Are the best wives on earth. They love their spouses,

Who prize them—as you do centennial flowers,

For having bloom'd, though not in your green-houses.

'Tis a bold wooer that dare talk of dowers.

And where I live, the milking of the cows is Too rude a task for females! Well. 'Twould hurt you,

Where women are so prized, to sneer at virtue.

XII.

"Free-born Americans," they must have freedom!

They'll stay—if they have leave to run away.

They're ministering angels when you need 'em,

But 'specially want credit in Broadway.

French wives are more particular how you feed 'em.

The English drag you oftener to the play.

But ours we quite enslave—(more true than funny)—

With "heav'n-born liberty," and trust—or money!

XXX.

Upon her thirtieth birth-day, Lady Jane
 Thought sadly on the twenties! Ev'n the 'teens,
 That she had said farewell to, without pain—
 Leaves falling from a flower that nothing means—
 Seem'd worth re-gathering to live again;
 But not like Ruth, fares Memory, who gleams
 After the careful Harvester of years:—
 The Lady Jane thought not with bitter tears!

XIV.

She glided to her mirror. From the air
 Glided to meet her, with its tearful eyes,
 A semblance sad, but beautifully fair;
 And gradually there stole a sweet surprise
 Under her lids, and as she laid the hair
 Back from her snowy brow, Madonna-wise,
 "Time, after all," she said, "a harmless flirt is!"
 And from that hour took kindly to her thirties.

XV.

And, with his honors not at all unsteady,
 The Decal elect stept coolly in;
 And having all his nights and mornings ready,
 He'd very little trouble to begin.
 And Twenty was quite popular,—they said he Went out of office with so little din!
 The old Earl did not celebrate (nor ought he)
 Her birth-days more. And like a dream came Forty.

XVI.

And on the morn of it she stood to dress,
 Mock'd by that flattering semblance, as before,
 And lifted with a smile the raven tress,
 That darkening her white shoulder, swept the floor.
 Time had not touch'd her dazzling loveliness!
 "Yet is it time," she said, "that I give o'er—
I'm an old maid!—and tho' I suffer by it, I Must change my style and leave off gay society."

XVII.

And so she did. Her maid by her desire
 Comb'd her luxuriant locks behind her ears;
 She had her dresses alter'd to come higher,
 Tho' it dissolved the dress-maker in tears!
 And flung a new French hat into the fire,
 Which she had bought, "forgetful of her years."
 This t' anticipate "the world's dread laugh!"
 Most persons think too much of it, by half.

XVIII.

I do not mean to say that generally
 The "virtuous single" take too soon to tea;
 But now and then you find one who could rally
 At forty, and go back to twenty-three—
 A handsome, plump, affectionate "Aunt Sally,"
 With no taste for cats, flannel, and Bohea!
 And I would have her, spite of "he or she says,"
 Up heart, and pin her kerchief as she pleases.

XIX.

Some men, 'tis said, prefer a woman fat—
 Lord Byron did. Some like her very spare.
 Some like a lameness. (I have known one that
 Would go quite far enough for your despair,
 And halt in time.) Some like them delicate
 As lilies, and with some "the only wear"
 Is one whose sex has spoiled a midshipman.
 Some only like what pleased another man.

XX.

I like one that likes me. But there's a kind
 Of women, very dangerous to poets,
 Whose hearts beat with a truth that seems like mind—
 A nature that, tho' passionate, will show its Devotion by not being rash or blind;
 But by sweet study grows to love. And so it's Not odd if they are counted cold, tho' handsome,
 And never meet a man who understands 'em.

XXI.

By never I mean late in life. But ah!
 How exquisite their love and friendship then!
 Perennial of soul such women are,
 And readers of the hearts of gifted men;
 And as the deep well mourns the hidden star,
 And mirrors the first ray that beams again,
 They—the lov'd light lost or dimly burning,
 Feel all its clouds, and trust its bright returning.

XXII.

In outward seeming tranquil and subdued,
 Their hearts beneath beat youthfully and fast.
 Time and imprison'd love make not a prude;
 And warm the gift we know to be the last;
 And pure is the devotion that must brood
 Upon your hopes alone—for hers are past!
 Trust me, "a rising man" rose seldom higher,
 But some dear, sweet old maid has pull'd the wire.

XXIII.

The Lady Jane, (pray do not think that hers
 Was quite the character I've drawn above.
 Old maids, like young, have various calibres,
 And hers was moderate, tho' she was "a love;"
 The Lady Jane call'd on the Dowagers—
 Mainly her slight acquaintance to improve,
 But partly with a docile wish to know
 What solaces of age were comme il faut.

XXIV.

They stared at her plain hat and air demure,
 But answered her with some particularity;
 And she was edified you may be sure,
 And added vastly to her popularity.
 She found a dozen mad on furniture,
 Five on embroidery, and none on charity;
 But her last call—the others were but short ones—
 Turn'd out to Lady Jane of some importance.

XXV.

The door was open'd by a Spanish page—
 A handsome lad in green with bullet buttons,
 Who look'd out like a trulian from a cage,
 And deign'd to glance at the tall mental but once,
 Then bent, with earnestness beyond his age,
 His eyes (you would have liked to see them shut once,
 The fringes were so long—) on Lady Jane.
 The varlet clearly thought her not so plain.

XXVI.

And bounding up the flower-laden stair,
 He waited her ascent, then open flung
 A mirror, clear as 'twere a door of air,
 Which on its silver hinge with music swung—
 Contrived, that never foot should enter there
 Unheralded by that melodious tongue.
 This delicate alarm is worth while
 More 'specially with carpets of three-pile.

XXVII.

Beyond a gallery extended, cool,
 And softly lighted, and from dome to floor,
 Hung pictures—mostly the Venetian school;
 Each "worth a Jew's eye"—very likely more;
 And drapery, gold-broider'd in Stamboul,
 Closed the extremity in lieu of door.
 This the page lifted, and disclosed to view
 The boudoir of the Countess Pasiblen.

XXVIII.

It was a small pavilion lined with pink,—
 Mirrors and silk all, save the door and sky-light,
 The latter of stain'd glass. (You would not think How juvenescent is a rosy high light!)
 Upon the table were seen pen and ink,
 (Two things I cannot say have stood in my light)
 Amid a host of trinkets, toys, and fans;
 The table in the style of Louis Quinze.

XXIX.

A singular and fragile little creature
Upon the cushions idly lay,
With waning life in each transparent feature,
But youth in her bright lips' ethereal play;
In short, the kind of creature that would meet your Conception of a transmigrating fay—
The dark eyes, not at all worn out or weary,
Kindling for transfer to some baby Peri!

XXX.

The rest used up, past mending. Yet her tones
Were wildly, deeply, exquisitely clear;
Tho' voice is not a thing of flesh and bones,
And probably goes up when they stay here.
(I do not know how much of Smith and Jones
Will bear translating to "the better sphere,"
But ladies, certainly, when they shall climb to't,
Will get their dimples back—tho' not the rhyme to't.)

XXXI.

Her person was dress'd very like her soul—
In fine material most loosely worn.
A cobweb cashmere struggled to control
Ringlets that laugh'd the filmy folds to scorn,
And, from the shawls in which she nestled, stole
The smallest slipper ever soil'd or torn.
You would not guess her age by looking at her,
Nor, from my sketch, of course. We'll leave that matter.

XXXII.

"My dear!" the Countess said, (by this time she Had ceased the Weather, poor old man, to hammer—
He gets it, in these morning calls, pardee—
And Lady Jane had hinted with a stammer
Her errand—somewhat delicate, you see,)
"My dear, how very odd! I fear I am a
"Poor judge of age—(who made that funny bonnet?)
"Indeed, I always turn'd my back upon it!"

XXXIII.

"Time has no business in one's house, my dear!
"I'm not at home to any of my creditors.
"They send their nasty bills in, once a year,
"And Time's are like Mortality's—more 'dead letters.'
"Besides, what comfort is there living here,
"If every stupid hour's to throw Death's head at us?
" (Lend me a pin, dear!) 'Time at last will stop us,
"But, come to that—we're free by habeas corpus.

XXXIV

("Fie, what a naughty shawl! No exposit,
"I trust, love, eh? Hold there, thou virtuous pin!)
"And so you really have come out to-day
"To look you up some suitable new sin!"
"Oh, Countess!" "Did you never write a play?
"Nor novel? Well, you really should begin!
"For, (hark, my dear!) the publishers are biters,
"Not at the book's fine title—but the writer's.

XXXV.

"You're half an authoress; for, as my maid says,
" 'Begun's half done,' and you've your title writ.
"I quote from Colburn, and as what 'the trade' says
"Is paid for, it is well consider'd wit.
"Genius, undoubtedly, of many grades is,
"But as to us, we do not need a bit.
" 'Three volumes,' says the bargain, 'not too thin.'
"You don't suppose I'd throw him genius in!"

XXXVI.

"But fame, dear Countess!" At the word there flush'd
A color to her cheek like fever's glow,
And in her hand unconsciously she crush'd
The fringes of her shawl, and bending low
To hide the tears that suddenly had gush'd
Into her large, dark eyes, she murmur'd "No!
"Th' inglorious agony of conquering pain
"Has drunk that dream up. I have lived in vain!

XXXVII.

"Yet have I set my soul upon the string,
"Tense with the energy of high desire,
"And trembled, with the arrow's quivering spring,
"To launch upon ambition's flight of fire!
"And never lark so hush'd his heart to sing,
"Or, as he sang, nerved wing to bear it higher,
"As I have striven my wild heart to tame
"And melt its love, pride, passion—into fame!

XXXVIII.

"Oh, poor the flattery to call it mine
"For trifles which beguiled an hour of pain,
"Or, on the echoing heels of mirth and wine,
"Crept thro' the chambers of a throbbing brain.
"Worthily, have I never written line!
"And when they talk to me of fame I gain,
"In very bitterness of soul I mock it,—
"And put the nett proceeds into my pocket!

XXXIX.

"And so, my dear,—let not the market vary,—
"I bid the critics, pro and con, defiance;
"And then I'm fond of being literary,
"And have a tenderness for 'sucking lions.'
"My friend the Dutchess has a fancy dairy:—
"Cheeses or poets, curds or men of science—
"It comes to the same thing. But, truce to mocking—
"Suppose you try my color in a stocking!"

XL.

I need not state the ratiocination
By which the Lady Jane had so decided—
Not quite upon the regular vocation—
Of course you knew she was too rich, (or I did),
To care with Costard for "remuneration;"
But feeling that her life like Lethe glided,
She thought 'twould be advisable to bag her a
Few brace of rapids from her friend's Niagara.

XLI.

"Well, Countess! what shall be my premier pas?
"Must I propitiate the penny-a-liners?
"Or would a 'sucking lion' stoop so far
"As to be fed and petted by a dry nurse?
"I cannot shine—but I can see a star—
"Are there not worshippers as well as shiners?
"I will be ruled implicitly by you:—
"My stocking's innocent—how dye it blue?

XLII.

The Countess number'd on her fingers, musing:—
"I've several that I might make you ever,
"And not be inconsolable at losing;
"But, really, as you've neither spouse nor lover,
"Most any of my pets would be amusing,
"Particularly if you're not above a "Discreet flirtation. Are you? How's the Earl?
"Does he still treat you like a little girl?

XLIII.

"How do you see your visitors? Alone?
"Does the Earl sleep at table after dinner?
"Have you had many lovers? Dear me! None?
"Was not your father something of a sinner?
"Who is the nicest man you've ever known?
"Pray does the butler bring your letters in, or "First take them to the Earl? Is he not rather
"A surly dog?—the butler, not your father."

XLIV.

To these inquiries the Lady Jane
Replied with nods, or something as laconic,
For on the Countess rattled, might and main,
With a rapidity Napoleonic;
Then mused and said, " 'Twill never do, it's plain—
"The poet must be warranted Platonic!
"But, query—how to find you such an oddity?
"My dear, they all make love!—it's their commodity!

XLV.

"The poet's on the look-out for a scene—
 "The painter for a 'novel situation';
 "And either does much business between
 "The little pauses of a declaration—
 "Noting the way in which you sob, or lean,
 "Or use your handkerchief in agitation.
 "I've known one—making love like Roderick Random—
 "Get off his knees and make a memorandum!

XLVI.

"You see they're always ready for their trade,
 "And have a speech as pat as a town-crier;
 "And so, my dear, I'm naturally afraid
 "To trust you with these gentlemen-on-fire.
 "I knew a most respectable old maid
 "A dramatist made love to—just to try her!
 "She hung herself, of course—but in that way
 "He got some pretty touches for his play.

XLVII.

"How shall we manage it? I say with tears,
 "I've only two that are not rogues at bottom;
 "And one of these would soon be 'over ears'
 "In love with you,—but that he hasn't got 'em!
 "They were cut off by the New Zealanders—
 "(As he invariably adds) 'od-rot-'em!
 "(Meaning the savages.) He's quite a poet,
 "(He wears his hair so that you wouldn't know it.)

XLVIII.

"In his ideas, I mean. (I really am at a "Stand-still about you.) Well—in this man, one day,
 "Took in his head to own the earth's diameter,
 "From zenith thro' to nadir! ('They do say
 "He kill'd his wife—or threw a ham at her—
 "Or something—so he had to go away—
 "That's neither here nor there.) His name is Wieland,
 "And under him exactly lies New Zealand.

XLIX.

"I am not certain if his 'seat' 's, or no,
 "In the Low Countries. But the sky above it
 "Of course is his; and for some way below
 "He has a right to dig and to improve it;
 "But under him, a million miles or so,
 "Lies land that's not his,—and the law can't move it.
 "It cut poor Wieland's nadir off, no doubt—
 "And so he sailed to buy the owner out.

L.

"I never quite made out the calculation—
 "But plump against his cellar floor, bin 2,
 "He found a tribe had built their habitation,
 "Whose food was foreigners and kangaroo.
 "They would sell out—but, to his consternation,
 "They charged him—all the fattest of his crew!
 "At last they caught and roasted every one—
 "But he escaped by being under-done!"

LII.

That such a lion was well worth his feed,
 Confess'd with merry tears the Lady Jane;
 But, that he answer'd to her present need,
 (A literary pet,) was not so plain.
 She thought she'd give the matter up, indeed,
 Or turn it over and so call again.
 However, as her friend had mention'd two,
 Perhaps the other might be made to do.

LII.

"I'm looking," said the Countess, "for a letter
 "From my old playmate, Isabella Gray.
 "'Tis Heaven knows how long since I have met her;
 "She ran away and married one fine day—
 "Poor girl! She might have done a great deal better!
 "The boy that she has sent to me, they say,
 "Is handsome, and has talents very striking.
 "So young, too—you can spoil him to your liking.

LIII.

"Her letter will amuse you. You must know
 "That, from her marriage-day, her lord has shut her
 "Securely up in an old French chateau;
 "Where, with her children and no woman but her,
 "He plays the old-school gentleman; and so
 "Her worldly knowledge stopp'd at bread and butter.
 "She thinks I may be changed by time—for, may be,
 "I've lost a tooth or got another baby.

LIV.

"Heigho!—'tis evident we're made of clay,
 "And harden unless kept in tears and shade;
 "This fashionable sunshine dries away
 "Much that we err in losing, I'm afraid!
 "I wonder what my guardian angels say
 "About the sort of woman I have made!
 "I wish I could begin my life again!
 "What think you of Pythagoras, Lady Jane?"

LV.

The Countess, all this while, was running over
 The pages of a letter, closely cross'd:—
 "I wish," she said, my most devoted lover
 "Took half the trouble that this scrawl has cost!
 "Though some of it is quite a flight above a
 "Sane woman's comprehension. Tut! Where was't!
 "There is a passage here—the name's Beaulevres—
 "His chateau's in the neighborhood of Sevre's

LVI.

"The boy's called Jules. Ah, here it is! My child
Brings you this letter. I've not much to say
More than you know of him, if he has smiled
When you have seen him. In his features play
The light from which his soul has been beguiled—
The blessed Heaven I lose with him to-day.
I ask you not to love him—he is there!
And you have loved him—without wish or prayer!

LVII.

His father sends him forth for fame and gold—
An angel, on this errand! I have striven
Against it—but he is not mine to hold,
They say 'tis wrong to wish to stay him, even,
And that my pride 's poor—my ambition cold!
Alas! to get him only back to Heaven
Is my one passionate prayer! Think me not wild—
'Tis that I have an angel for my child!

LVIII.

They say that he has genius. I but see
That he gets wisdom as the flow'r gets hue,
While others hive it like the toiling bee;
That, with him, all things beautiful keep new,
And every morn the first morn seems to be—
So freshly look abroad his eyes of blue!
What he has written seems to me no more
Than I have thought a thousand times before!

LIX.

Yet not upon his gay career to Fame
Broods my foreboding tear. I wish it won—
My prayer speeds on his spirit to its aim—
But in his chamber wait I for my son!—
When darken'd is ambition's star of fame—
When the night's fever of unrest is on—
With the unbidden sadness, the sharp care,
I fly from his bright hours, to meet him there!

LX.

Forgive me if I prate! Is't much—is't wild—
To hope—to pray—that you will sometimes creep
To the dream-haunted pillow of my child,
Keeping sweet watch above his fitful sleep?
Blest like his mother, if in dream he smiled,
Or, if he wept, still blest with him to weep;
Reward'd—Oh, for how much more than this!—
By his awaking smile—his morning kiss!

LXI.

*I know not how to stop! He leaves me well;
Life, spirit, health, in all his features speak;
His foot bounds with the spring of a gazelle: [streak
But watch him—stay! well thought on!—there's a
Which the first faltering of his tongue will tell,
Long ere the bright blood wavers on his cheek—
A little bursted vein, that, near his heart,
Looks like a crimson thread half torn apart.*

LXII.

*So, trusting not his cheek by morning light,
When hope sits mantling on it, seek his bed
In the more tranquil watches of the night,
And ask this tell-tale how his heart has sped.
If well—its branching tracery shows bright;
But if its sanguine hue look cold and dead,
Ah, Gertrude! let your ministering be
As you would answer it, in Heaven, to me!"*

LXIII.

Enter the page:—"Miladi's maid is waiting!"—
A hint, (that it was time to dress for dinner,) Which puts a stop in London to all prating.
As far as goes the letter, you're a winner,
The rest of it to fannel shirts relating—
When Jules should wear his thicker, when his thinner.
The Countess laughed at Lady Jane's adieu:
She thought the letter touching. Pray, don't you?

LXIV.

*I have observed that Heav'n, in answering prayer, (This is not meant to be a pious stanza—
Only a fact that has a pious air.)
(We're very sure, I think, to have an answer :)
But I've observed, I would remark, that where
Our plans are ill-contrived, as oft our plans are,
Kind Providence goes quite another way
'To bring about the end for which we pray.*

LXV.

In this connection I would also add,
That a discreet young angel, (bona fide,)
Accompanied our amiable lad;
And that he walk'd not out, nor stepp'd aside he,
Nor met with an adventure, good or bad,
(Although he enter'd London on a Friday,)
Nor ate, nor drank, nor closed his eye a minute,
Without this angel's guiding finger in it.

LXVI.

His mother, as her letter seems to show,
Expected him, without delay or bother,—
Portmanteau, carpet-bag, and all—to go [other !]
Straight to her old friend's house—(forsooth! what
The angel, who would seem the world to know,
Advised the boy to drive to Mivart's rather.
He did. The angel, (as I trust is plain.)
Lodged in the vacant heart of Lady Jane.

LXVII.

A month in town these gentlemen had been
At date of the commencement of my story.
The angel's occupations you have seen,
If you have read what I have laid before ye.
Jules had seen Dan O'Connell and the Queen,
And girded up his loins for fame and glory,
And changed his old integuments for better;
And then he call'd and left his mother's letter.

LXVIII.

That female hearts grow never old, in towns—
That taste grows rather young with dissipation—
That dowagers dress not in high-neck'd gowns—
Nor are, at fifty, proof against flirtation—
That hospitality is left to clowns,
Or elbowed from the world by ostentation—
That a "tried friend" should not be tried again—
That boys at seventeen are partly men—

LXIX.

Are truths, as pat as paying-stones, in cities.
The contrary is true of country air;
(Where the mind rusts, which is a thousand pities,
While still the cheek keeps fresh and debonnaire.)
But what I'm trying in this verse to hit is,
That Heav'n, in answering Jules's mother's prayer,
Began by thwarting all her plans and suavities;
As needs must—vide the just-named depravities.

LXX.

Some stanzas back, we left the ladies going,
At six, to dress for dinner. Time to dine
I always give in poetry, well knowing
That, to jump over it in half a line,
Looks, (let us be sincere, dear muse!) like showing
Contempt we do not feel, for meat and wine.
Dinner! Ye Gods! What is there more respectable!
For eating, who, save Byron, ever check'd a belle?

LXXI.

'Tis ten—say half-past. Lady Jane has dined,
And dress'd as simply as a lady may.
A card lies on her table 'To Remind'—
'Tis odd she never thought of it to-day.
But she is pleasantly surprised to find
'Tis Friday night, the Countess's soirée.
Back rolls the chariot to Berkeley Square.
If you have dined, dear reader, let's go there!

LXXII.

We're early. In the cloak-room smokes the urn,
The house-keeper behind it, fat and solemn;
Steady as stars the fresh-lit candles burn,
And on the stairs the new-blown what d'ye-call 'em
Their nodding cups of perfume overturn;
The page leans idly by a marble column,
And stiffly a tall footman stands above,
Looking between the fingers of his glove.

LXXIII.

All bright and silent, like a charmed palace—
The spells wound up, the fays to come at twelve;
The house-keeper a witch, (cum grano salis);
The handsome page, perhaps, a royal elf
Condemned to servitude by fairy malice;
(I wish the varlet had these rhymes to delve!)
Some magic hall, it seems, for revel bright,
And Lady Jane the spirit first alight.

LXXIV.

Alas! here vanishes the foot of Pleasure!
She—like an early guest—goes in before,
And comes, when all are gone, for Memory's treasure
But is not found upon the crowded floor;
(Unless, indeed, some charming woman says you're A love, which makes close quarters less a bore.)
I've seen her, down Anticipation's vista,
As large as life—and walk'd straight on, and miss'd her

LXXV.

With a declining taste for making friends,
One's taste for the fatigue of pleasure's past;
And then, one sometimes wonders which transcend—
The first hour of a gay night, or the last.
(Beginners "burn the candle at both ends,"
And find the middle brightest—that is fast!)
But a good rule at parties, (to keep up a Mercurial air,) is to come in at supper.

LXXVI.

I mean that you should go to bed at nine
And sleep 'till twelve—take coffee or green tea,
Dress and go out—(this was a way of mine
When looking up the world in '33)—
Sup at the ball—(it's not a place for wine)—
Sleep, or not, after, as the case may be.
You've the advantage, thus, when all are yawning
Of growing rather fresher toward morning.

LXXVII.

But, after thirty, here's your best "Elixir"
Breakfast betimes. Do something worth your while
By twelve or one—(this makes the blood run quick, Sir!)
Dine with some man or woman who will smile.
Have little cause to care how politics are,
"Let not the sun go down upon your" bile;
And, if well-married, rich, and not too clever,
I don't see why you shouldn't live for ever.

LXXVIII.

Short-lived is your "sad dog"—and yet, we hear,
"Whom the gods love die young." Of course the ladies
Are safe in loving what the gods hold dear;
And the result, I'm very much afraid, is,
That if he "has his day," it's "neither here Nor there!" But it is time our hero made his Appearance on the carpet, Lady Jane—
(I'll mend this vile pen, and begin again.)

LXXIX.

The Lady Jane walk'd thro' the bright rooms, breaking
The glittering silence with her flowing dress,
Whose pure folds seem'd a coy resistance making
To the fond air; while, to her loveliness
The quick-eyed mirrors breathlessly awaking,
Acknowledged not one radiant line the less
That not on them she look'd before she faded!
Neglected gentlemen don't do as they did:—

LXXX.

No!—for, 'twixt our quicksilver and a woman,
Nature has put no glass, for non-conductor,
And, while she's imaged in their bosoms, few men
Can make a calm, cold mirror their instructor;
For, when beloved, we deify what's human—
When piqued, we mock like devils! But I've pluck'd a Digression here. It's no use, my contending,— Fancy will ramble while the pen is mending!

LXXXI.

A small room on the left, (I'll get on faster
If you're impatient,) very softly lit
By lamps conceal'd in bells of alabaster,
Lipp'd like a lily, and "as white as it,"
With a sweet statue by a famous master,
Just in the centre, (but not dress'd a bit!)—
This dim room drew aside our early-comer,
Who thought it like a moonlight night in summer.

LXXXII.

And so it was. For, thro' an opening door,
Came the soft breath of a conservatory,
And, bending its tall stem the threshold o'er,
Swung in a crimson flower, the tropics' glory;
And, as you gazed, the vista lengthen'd more,
And statues, lamps and flowers—but, to my story!
The room was cushion'd like a Bey's divan;
And in it—(Heav'n preserve us!)—sat a man!

LXXXIII.

At least, as far as boots and pantaloons
Are symptoms of a man, there seem'd one there—
Whatever was the number of his Junes.
She look'd again, and started! In a chair,
Sleeping as if his eyelids had been moons,
Reclined, with flakes of sunshine in his hair,
(Or, what look'd like it,) a fair youth, quite real,
But of a beauty like the Greek ideal.

LXXXIV.

He slept, like Love by slumber overtaken,
His bow unbent, his quiver thrown aside;
The lip might to a manlier arch awaken—
The nostril, so serene, dilate with pride:
But, now, he lay, of all his masks forsaken,
And childhood's sleep was there, and naught beside;
And his bright lips lay smilingly apart,
Like a torn crimson leaf with pearly heart.

LXXXV.

Now Jules Beaulievres, Esq.—(this was he—)
Had never been "put up" to London hours;
And thinking he was simply ask'd to tea,
Had been, since seven, looking at the flowers—
No doubt extremely pleasant,—but, you see,
A great deal of it rather overpowers;
And possibly, that very fine exotic
He sat just under, was a slight narcotic.

LXXXVI.

At any rate, when it was all admired,—
As quite his notion of a Heav'n polite,
(Minus the angels,)—he felt very tired—
As one, who'd been all day sight-seeing, might!
And having by the Countess been desired
To make himself at home, he did so, quite.
He begg'd his early coming might not fetter her
And she went out to dine, the old—etcetera.

LXXXVII.

And thinking of his mother—and his bill
At Mivart's—and of all the sights amazing
Of which, the last few days, he'd had his fill—
And choking when he thought of fame—and gazing
Upon his varnish'd boots, (as young men will,)
And wond'ring how the shops could pay for glazing—
And also, (here his thoughts were getting dim,)
Whether a certain smile was meant for him—

LXXXVIII.

And murmur'ing over, with a drowsy bow,
The speech he made the Countess, when he met her,—
And smiling, with closed eyelids, (thinking how He should describe her in the morrow's letter)—
And sighing "Good-night!" (he was dreaming now)—
Jules dropp'd into a world he liked much better;
But left his earthly mansion unprotected,
Well, Sir! 'twas robb'd—as might have been expected.

LXXXIX.

The Lady Jane gazed on the fair boy sleeping,
And in his lips' rare beauty read his name;
And to his side with breathless wonder creeping,
Resistless to her heart the feeling came,
That, to her yearning love's devoted keeping,
Was giv'n the gem within that fragile frame.
And bending with almost a mother's bliss,
To his bright lips, she seal'd it with a kiss!

XC.

Oh, in that kiss how much of Heav'n united!
What haste to pity—cagerness to bless!
What thirsting of a heart, long pent and slighted,
For something fair, yet human, to caress!
How fathomless the love so briefly plighted!
What kiss thrill'd ever more—sinn'd ever less!
So love the angels, sent with holy mercies!
And so love poets—in their early verses!

XCI.

If, in well-bred society, ("hear! hear!")
If, in this "wrong and pleasant" world of ours
There beats a pulse that seraphs may revere—
If Eden's birds, when frighten'd from its flowers,
Clung to one deathless seed, still blooming here—
If Time cut ever down, 'mid blighted hours,
A bliss that will spring up in bliss again—
'Tis woman's love. This I believe. Amen!

XCII.

To guard from ill, to help, watch over, warn—
To learn, for his sake, sadness, patience, pain—
To seek him with most love when most forlorn—
Promised the mute kiss of the Lady Jane.
And thus, in sinless purity is born,
Always, the love of woman. So, again,
I say, that up to kissing—later even—
A woman's love may have its feet in Heaven.

XCIII.

Jules open'd (at the kiss) his large blue eyes,
 And calmly gazed upon the face above him,
 But never stirr'd, and utter'd no surprise—
 Although his situation well might move him.
 He seem'd so cool, (my lyre shall tell no lies),
 That Lady Jane half thought she shouldn't love him;
 When suddenly the Countess Pasibleu
 Enter'd the room with, "Dear me! how d'y'e do!"

XCIV.

Up sprang the boy—amazement on his brow!
 But the next instant, through his lips there crept
 A just awakening smile, and, with a bow,
 Calmly he said: "'Twas only while I slept
 The angels did not vanish—until now."
 A speech, I think, quite worthy an adept.
 The Countess stared, and Lady Jane began
 To fear that she had kiss'd a nice young man.

XCV.

Jules had that precious quality call'd tact;
 And having made a very warm beginning,
 He suddenly grew grave, and rather back'd;
 As if incapable of further sinning.
 'Twas well he did so, for, it is a fact,
 The ladies like, themselves, to do the winning.
 In female Shakspeares, Desdemonas shine;
 And the Othellos "seriously incline."

XCVI. {

So, with a manner quite reserved and plain,
 Jules ask'd to be presented, and then made
 Many apologies to Lady Jane
 For the eccentric part that he had play'd.
 Regretted he had slept—confess'd with pain
 He took her for an angel—was afraid
 He had been rude—abrupt—did he alarm
 Her much?—and might he offer her his arm?

XCVII.

And as they ranged that sweet conservatory,
 He heeded not the flowers he walk'd among;
 But such an air of earnest listening wore he,
 That a dumb statue must have found a tongue;
 And like a child that hears a fairy story,
 His parted lips upon her utterance hung.
 He seem'd to know by instinct, (else how was it?)
 That people love the bank where they deposit.

XCVIII.

And closer, as the moments faster wore,
 The slender arm within her own she press'd;
 And yielding to the magic spell he bore—
 The earnest truth upon his lips imprest—
 She lavishly told out the golden ore
 Hoarded a life-time in her guarded breast.
 And Jules, throughout, was beautifully tender—
 Although he did not always comprehend her.

XCIX.

And this in him was no deep calculation,
 But in good truth, as well as graceful seeming,
 Abandonment complete to admiration—
 His soul gone from him as it goes in dreaming.
 I wish'd to make this little explanation,
 Misgiving that his tact might go for scheming;
 I can assure you it was never plann'd;
 I have it from his angel, (second hand.)

C.

And from the same authentic source I know,
 That Lady Jane still thought him but a lad;
 Tho', why the deuce she didn't treat him so,
 Is quite enough to drive conjecture mad!
 Perhaps she thought that it would make him grow
 To take more beard for granted that he had.
 A funny friend to lend a nice young man to!
 I'm glad I've got him safely through one Canto.

CANTO II.

I.

The Countess Pasibleu's gay rooms were full,
 Not crowded. It was neither rout nor ball—
 Only "her Friday night." The air was cool;
 And there were people in the house of all
 Varieties, except the pure John Bull.
 The number of young ladies, too, was small—
 You seldom find old John, or his young daughters,
 Swimming in very literary waters.

II.

Indeed, with rare exceptions, women given
 To the society of famous men,
 Are those who will confess to twenty-seven;
 But add to this the next reluctant ten,
 And still they're fit to make a poet's heaven,
 For sumptuously beautiful is then
 The woman of proud mien and thoughtful brow;
 And one (still bright in her meridian now)

III.

Bent upon Jules, that night, her lustrous eye.
 A creature of a loftier mould was she
 Than in his dreams had ever glided by;
 And through his veins the blood flew startingly,
 And he felt sick at heart—he knew not why—
 For 'tis the sadness of the lost to see
 Angels look on us with a cold regard,
 (Not knowing those who never left their card.)

IV.

She had a low, sweet brow, with fringed lakes
 Of an unfathom'd darkness couch'd below;
 And parted on that brow in jetty flakes
 The raven hair swept back with wavy flow,
 Rounding a head of such a shape as makes
 The old Greek marble with the goddess glow.
 Her nostril's breaching arch might threaten storm—
 But love lay in her lips, all hush'd and warm.

V.

And small teeth, glittering white, and cheek whose red
 Seem'd Passion, there asleep, in rosy nest:
 And neck set on as if to bear a head—
 May be a lily, may be Juno's crest,—
 So lightly sprang it from its snow-white bed!
 So proudly rode above the swelling breast!
 And motion, effortless as stars awaking
 And melting out, at eve, and morning's breaking;

VI.

And voice delicious quite, and smile that came
 Slow to the lips, as 'twere the heart smiled thro':—
 These charms I've been particular to name,
 For they are, like an inventory, true,
 And of themselves were stuff enough for fame;
 But she, so wondrous fair, has genius too,
 And brilliantly her thread of life is spun—
 In verse and beauty both, the "Undying One!"

VII.

And song—for in those kindling lips there lay
 Music to wing all utterance outward breaking,
 As if upon the ivory teeth did play
 Angels, who caught the words at their awaking,
 And sped them with sweet melodies away—
 The hearts of those who listen'd with them taking.
 Of proof to this last fact there's little lack;
 And Jules, poor lad! ne'er got his truant back!

VIII.

That heart stays with her still. 'Tis one of two,
 (I should premise)—all poets being double,
 Living in two worlds as of course they do,
 Fancy and fact, and rarely taking trouble
 T' explain in which they're living, as to you!
 And this it is makes all the hubble-bubble,
 For who can fairly write a bard's biography,
 When, of his fancy-world, there's no geography!

IX.

Jules was at perfect liberty in fact

To love again, and still be true in fancy;

Else were this story at its closing act.

Nay, he in fact might wed, and in romance he Might find the qualities his sposa lack'd—

(A truth that I could easier make a man see,)

And woman's great mistake, if I may tell it, is

The calling such stray fancies "infidelities."

X.

Byron was man and bard, and Lady B.,

In wishing to monopolize him wholly,

Committed bigamy, you plainly see.

She, being very single, Guiccioli

Took off the odd one of the wedded three—

A change, 'twould seem, quite natural and holy.

The after sin, which still his fame environs,

Was giving Guiccioli both the Byrons.

XI.

The stern wife drove him from her. Had she loved

With all the woman's tenderness the while,

He had not been the wanderer he proved.

Like bird to sunshine fled he to a smile;

And, lightly though the changeful fancy roved,

The heart speeds home with far more light a while.

The world well tried—the sweetest thing in life

Is the unclouded welcome of a wife.

XII.

To poets more than all—for truthful love

Has, to their finer sense, a deeper sweetness;

Yet she who has the venturesous wish to prove

The poet's love when nearest to completeness,

Must wed the man and let the fancy rove—

Loose to the air that wing of eager fleetness,

And smile it home when wearied out—with air.

But if you scold him, Madam! have a care!

XIII.

All this time the "Undying One" was singing.

She ceased, and Jules felt every sound a pain

While that sweet cadence in his car was ringing;

So gliding from the arm of Lady Jane,

Which rather seem'd to have the whim of clinging,

He made himself a literary kind—

Punching and shoving every kind of writer

'Till he got out. (He might have been politer.)

XIV.

Free of "the press," he wander'd thro' the rooms,

Longing for solitude, but studying faces;

And, smitten with the ugliness of Brougham's,

He mused upon the cross with monkey races—

(Hieroglyphick'd on th' Egyptian tombs

And shown in France with very striking traces.)

"Rejected" Smith's he thought a head quite glorious;

And Hook, all button'd up, he took for "Boreas."

XV.

He noted Lady Stepany's pretty hand,

And Barry Cornwall's sweet and serious eye;

And saw Moore get down from his chair to stand,

While a most royal Duke went bowing by—

Saw Savage Landor, wanting goose and sand—

Saw Lady Chatterton take snuff and sigh—

Saw graceful Bulwer say "good-night," and vanish—

Heard Crofton Croker's brogue, and thought it Spanish.

XVI.

He saw Smith whispering something very queer,

And Hayward creep behind to overhear him;

Saw Lockhart whistling in a lady's ear,

(Jules thought so, till, on getting very near him,

The error—not the mouth—became quite clear;)

He saw "the Duke" and had a mind to cheer him;

And fine Jane Porter with her cross and feather,

And clever Babbage, with his face of leather.

XVII.

And there was plump and saucy Mrs. Gore,

And calm, old, lily-white Joanna Baillie,

And frisky Bowring, London's wisest bore;

And there was "devilish handsome" D'Israeli;

And not a lion of all these did roar;

But laughing, flirting, gossiping so gaily,—

Poor Jules began to think 'twas only mockery

To talk of "porcelain"—'twas a world of crockery.

XVIII.

'Tis half a pity authors should be seen!

Jules thought so, and I think so too, with Jules.

They'd better do the immortal with a screen,

And show but mortal in a world of fools;

Men talk of "taste" for thunder—but they mean

Old Vulcan's apron and his dirty tools;

They flock all wonder to the Delphic shade,

To know—just how the oracle is made!

XIX.

What we should think of Bulwer's works—without him,

His wife, his coat, his curls or other handle;

What of our Cooper, knowing naught about him,

Save his enchanted quill and pilgrim's sandal;

What of old Lardner, (gracious! how they flout him!)

Without this broad—(and Heavy—) side of scandal;

What of Will Shakespeare had he kept a "Boz?"

Like Johnson—would be curious questions, coz!

XX.

Jove is, no doubt, a gainer by his cloud,

(Which ta'en away, might cause irreverent laughter,)

But, out of sight, he thunders ne'er so loud,

And no one asks the god to dinner after;

And "Fame's proud temple," build it ne'er so proud,

Finds notoriety a useful rafter.

And when you've been abused awhile, you learn

All blasts blow fair for you—that blow astern!

XXI.

No "pro" without its "con;"—The pro is fame,

Pure, cold, unslander'd, like a virgin's frill;

The con is beef and mutton, sometimes game,

Madeira, Sherry, claret, what you will;

The ladies' (albums) striving for your name;

All, (save the woodcock,) yours without a bill;

And "in the gate," an unbelieving Jew,

Your "Mordecai!"—Why, clearly con's your cue!

XXII.

I've "reason'd" myself neatly "round the ring,"

While Jules came round to Lady Jane once more,

And supper being but a heavy thing,

(To lookers-on,) I'll show him to the door,

And his first night to a conclusion bring;

Not (with your kind permission, sir) before

I tell you what her Ladyship said to him

As home to Brook-street her swift horses drew him

XXIII.

"You're comfortably lodged, I trust," she said:

"And Mrs. Mivart—is she like a mother?"

"Have you mosquito curtains to your bed?"

"Do you sleep well without your little brother?"

"What do you eat for breakfast—baker's bread?"

"I'll send you some home-made, if you would rather

"What do you do to-morrow?—say at five,

"Or four—say four—I call for you to drive?"

XXIV.

"There's the New Garden, and the Coliseum—

"Perhaps you don't care much for Panoramas?"

"But there's an armadillo—you must see him!

"And those big-eyed giraffes and heavenly lamas!

"And—are you fond of music?—the Te Deum

"Is beautifully play'd by Lascarramas,

"At the new Spanish chapel. This damp air!

"And you've no hat on!—let me feel your hair!

XXV.

"Poor boy!"—but Jules's head was on her breast,
 Rock'd like a nautilus in calm mid ocean;
 And while its curls within her hands she press'd,
 The Lady Jane experienced some emotion:
 For, did he sleep? or wish to be caress'd?
 What meant the child?—she'd not the slightest notion!
 Arrived at home, he rose, without a shako—
 Trembling and slightly flush'd—but wide awake.

XXVI.

Loose rein! put spur! and follow, gentle reader!
 For I must take a flying leap in rhyme;
 And be to you both Jupiter and leader,
 Annihilating space, (we all kill time,)
 And overtaking Jules in Rome, where he'd a Delight or two, besides the pleasant clime.
 The Lady Jane and he, (I scorn your cavils—
 The Earl was with them, sir!) were on their travels.

XXVII.

You know, perhaps, the winds are no narcotic,
 As swallow'd 'twixt the Thames and Frith of Forth;
 And Jules had proved a rather frail exotic—
 Too delicate to winter so far north;
 The Earl was breaking, and half idiotic,
 And Lady Jane's condition little worth;
 So, thro' celestial Paris, (speaking virtual-ly,)
 They sought the sunnier clime of ill-fed Italy.

XXVIII.

Oh Italy!—but no—I'll tell its faults!
 It has them, tho' the blood so "nimble capers"
 Beneath those morning heavens and starry vaults,
 'That we forget big rooms and little tapers—
 Forget how drowsily the Romans waltz—
 Forget they've neither shops nor morning papers—
 Forget how dully sits, mid ancient glory,
 This rich man's heaven—this poor man's purgatory!

XXIX.

Fashion the world as one bad man would have it, he Would silence Harry's tongue, and Tom's, and Dick's;
 And doubtless it is pleasing to depravity
 To know a land where people are but sticks—
 Where you've no need of fair words, flattery, suavity,
 But spend your money, if you like, with kicks—
 Where they pass by their own proud, poor nobility,
 To welcome golden "Snooks" with base servility.

XXX.

Jules was not in the poor man's category—
 So Rome's condition never spoils his supper.
 The deuce (for him) might take the Curtian glory
 Of riding with a nation on his crupper.
 He lived upon a Marquis's first story—
 The venerable Marquis in the upper—
 And found it pass'd the time, (and so would you,)
 To do some things at Rome that Romans do.

XXXI.

The Marquis upon whom he chanced to quarter,
 (He took his lodgings separate from the Earl,)
 The Marquis had a friend, who had a daughter—
 The friend a noble like himself, the girl
 A diamond of the very purest water;
 (Or purest milk, if you prefer a pearl;)
 And these two friends, tho' poor, were hand and glove,
 And of a pride their fortunes much above.

XXXII.

The Marquis had not much besides his palace,
 The Count, beyond his daughter, simply naught;
 And, one day, died this very Count Pascalis,
 Leaving his friend his daughter, as he ought;
 And, tho' the Fates had done the thing in malice,
 The old man took her, without second thought,
 And married her. "She's freer than," he said,
 "And will be young to marry when I'm dead."

XXXIII.

Meantime, she had a title, house, and carriage,
 And, far from wearing chains, had newly burst 'em—
 For, as of course you know, before their marriage
 Girls are sad prisoners by Italian custom—
 Not meaning their discretion to disparage,
 But just because they're sure they couldn't trust 'em.
 When wedded, they are free enough—moreover,
 The marriage contract specifies one lover.

XXXIV.

Not that the Marchioness had one—no, no!—
 Nor wanted one. It is not my intention
 To hint it in this tale. Jules lodged below—
 But his vicinity's not my invention;
 And, if it seem to you more apropos
 Than I have thought it worth my while to mention,
 Why, you think as the world did—verbum sat—
 But still it needn't be so—for all that.

XXXV.

'Most any female neighbor, up a stair,
 Occasions thought in him who lodges under;
 And Jules, by accident, had walk'd in where
 (A "flight too high" 's a very common blunder.)
 He saw a lady whom he thought as fair
 As "from her shell rose" Mrs. Smith of Thunder.
 Tho' Venus, I would say were Vulcan by,
 Was no more like the Marchioness than I.

XXXVI.

For this grave sin there needed much remission;
 And t' assure it, oft the offender went.
 The Marquis had a very famous Titian,
 And Jules so often came to pay his rent,
 The old man recommended a physician,
 Thinking his intellects a little bent.
 And, pitying, he thought and talk'd about him,
 Till, finally, he couldn't live without him.

XXXVII.

And, much to the neglect of Lady Jane,
 Jules paid him back his love; and there, all day,
 The fair young Marchioness, with fickle brain,
 Tried him with changeful mood, now coy, now gay:
 And the old man lived o'er his youth again,
 Seeing those grown-up children at their play—
 His wife sixteen, Jules looking scarcely more,
 'Twas frolic infancy to eighty-four.

XXXVIII.

There seems less mystery in matrimony,
 With people living nearer the equator;
 And early, like the most familiar crony,
 Unheralded by butler, groom, or waiter,
 Jules join'd the Marquis at his macaroni,—
 The Marchioness at toast and coffee later;
 And if his heart throbb'd wild sometimes, he hid it;
 And if her dress required "doing"—did it.

XXXIX.

Now tho' the Marchioness in church did faint once,
 And, as Jules bore her out, they didn't grope ill;
 And tho' the spouses (as a pair) were quaint ones—
 She scarce a woman, and his age octuple—
 'Twas odd, extremely odd, of their acquaintance,
 To call Jules lover with so little scruple!
 He'd a caressing way—but la! you know it's
 A sort of manner natural to poets!

XL.

God made them prodigal in their bestowing;
 And, if their smiles were riches, few were poor!
 They turn to all the sunshine that is going—
 Swoop merrily at all that shows a lure—
 Their love at heart and lips is overflowing—
 Their motto, "Trust the future—now is sure!"
 Their natural pulse is high intoxication—
 (Sober'd by debt and mortal botheration.)

XLI.

Of such men's pain and pleasure, hope and passion,
 The symptoms are not read by "those who run;"
 And 'tis a pity it were not the fashion
 To count them but as children of the sun—
 Not to be baited like the "bulls of Bashan,"
 Nor liable, like clods, for "one pound one"—
 But revered—as Indians reverence fools—
 Inspired, tho' God knows how. Well—such was Jules.

XLII.

The Marquis thought him sunshine at the window—
 The window of his heart—and let him in!
 The Marchioness loved sunshine like a Hindoo,
 And she thought loving him could be no sin;
 And as she loved not yet as those who sin do,
 'Twas very well—wasn't not? Stick there a pin!
 It strikes me that so far—to this last stanza—
 The hero seems a well-disposed young man, sir!

XLIII.

I have not bored you much with his "abilities,"
 Tho' I set out to treat you to a poet,
 The first course commonly is "puerilities"—
 (A soup well pepper'd—all the critics know it!)
 Brought in quite hot. (The simple way to chill it is,
 For "spoons" to stir, and puffy lips to blow it.)
 Then, poet stuff'd, and by his kidney roasted,
 And last (with "lagrima,") "the devil" toasted.

XLIV.

High-scream between the devil and the roast,
 But no Sham-pain!—Hold there! the fit is o'er.
Obsta principis—one pun breeds a host—
 (Alarmingly prolific for a bore!)
 But he who never sins can little boast
 Compared to him who goes and sins no more!
 The "sinful Mary" walks more white in Heaven
 Than some who never "sinn'd and were forgiven!"

XLV.

Jules had objections very strong to playing
 His character of poet—therefore I
 Have rather dropp'd that thread, as I was saying.
 But tho' he'd neither frenzy in his eye,
 Nor much of outer mark the bard betraying—
 (A thing he piqued himself on, by the by—)
 His conversation frequently arose
 To what was thought a goodly flight for prose.

XLVI.

His beau ideal was to sink the attic,
 (Tho' not by birth, nor taste, "the salt above")—
 To pitilessly cut the air erratic
 Which ladies, fond of authors, so much love,
 And be, in style, calm, cold, aristocratic—
 Serene in faultless boots and primrose glove.
 But th' exclusive's made of starch, not honey!
 And Jules was cordial, joyous, frank, and funny.

XLVII.

This was one secret of his popularity,
 Men hate a manner colder than their own,
 And ladies—bless their hearts! love chaste hilarity
 Better than sentiment—if truth were known!
 And Jules had one more slight peculiarity—
 He'd little "approbateness"—or none—
 And what the critics said concern'd him little—
 Provided it touch'd not his drink and victual.

XLVIII.

Critics, I say—of course he was in print—
 "Poems," of course—of course "anonymous"—
 Of course he found a publisher by dint
 Of search most diligent, and far more fuss
 Than chemists make in melting you a flint.
 Since that experiment he reckons plus
 Better manure than minus for his bays—
 In short, seeks immortality—"that pays."

XLIX.

He writes in prose—the public like it better.
 Well—let the public! You may take a poet,
 And he shall write his grandmother a letter,
 And, if he's any thing but rhyme—he'll show it
 Prose may be poetry, without its fetter,
 And be it pun or pathos, high or low wit,
 The thread will show its gold, however twisted—
 (I wish the public flatter'd me that this did!)

L.

No doubt there's pleasant stuff that ill unravels.
 I fancy most of Moore's would read so-so,
 Done into prose of pious Mr. Flavel's—
 (That is my Sunday reading—so I know,)
 Yet there's his Child Harold—excellent good travels—
 And what could spoil sweet Robinson Crusoe!
 But tho' a clever verse-r makes a prose-r,
 About the vice-versa, I don't know, sir!

LI.

Verser 's a better word than versifier,
 (Unless 'tis verse on fire, you mean to say,)
 And I've long thought there's something to desire
 In poet's nomenclature, by the way.
 It sounds but queer to laud "the well-known lyre"—
 Call a dog "poet!" he will run away—
 And "songster," "rhymester," "bard," and "poetaster,"
 Are customers they're shy of at the Astor.

LII.

A "scribbler's" is a skittish reputation,
 And weighs a man down like a hod of mortar.
 Commend a suitor's wit, imagination—
 The merchant may think of him for his daughter;
 But say that "he writes poetry"—n!
 Her "Pa" would rather throw her in the water!
 And yet when poets wed, as facts will prove,
 Their bills stand all at pa, they much above!

LIII.

Jules had a hundred minds to cut the muses;
 And sometimes did, "forever!"—(for a week!)
 He found for time so many other uses.
 His superfluity was his poisique;
 And exercise, if violent, induces
 Blood to the head and flush upon the cheek;
 And, (tho' details are neither here nor there),
 Makes a man sit uneasy on his chair;

LIV.

Particularly that of breaking horses.
 The rate of circulation in the blood,
 Best suited to the meditative forces,
 Is quite as far from mercury as mud—
 That of the starry, not the racing-courses.
 No man can trim his style mid fire and flood,
 Nor in a passion, nor just after marriage;
 And, as to Cæsar's writing in his carriage,

LV.

Credat Judæus! Thought is free and easy;
 But language, unless wrought with labor limæ,
 Is not the kind of thing, sir, that would please ye!
 The bee makes honey, but his toil is thymy,
 And nothing is well done until it tease ye;
 (Tho' if there's one who would 'twere not so, I'm he!)
 Now Jules, I say, found out that filly-breaking,
 Tho' monstrous fun, was not a poet's making.

LVI.

True—some drink up to composition's glow;
 Some talk up to it—vide Neckar's daughter!
 But when the temperature's a fourth too low,
 Of course you make up the deficient quarter!
 Like Byron's atmosphere, which, chemists know
 Required hydrogen—(more gin and water.)
 And Jules's sanguine humor was too high,
 So, of the bottle he had need be shy!

LVII.

And of society, which made him thin
 With fret and fever, and of sunny sky—
 Father of idleness, the poet's sin!
 (John Bull should be industrious, by the by,
 If clouds without concentrate thought within.)
 In short, the lad could fag—(I mean soar high)—
 Only by habits, which (if Heaven let her choose)
 His mother would bequeath as Christian virtues!

LVIII.

Now men have oft been liken'd unto streams;
 (And, truly, both are prone to run down hill,
 And seldom brawl when dry, or so it seems!)
 And Jules, when he had brooded, long and still,
 At the dim fountain of the poet's dreams,
 Felt suddenly his veins with frenzy fill;
 And, urged, as by the torrent's headlong force,
 Ruthlessly rode—if he could find a horse.

LIX.

Yes, sir—he had his freshets like a river,
 And horses were his passion—so he rode,
 When he his prison'd spirits would deliver,
 As if he fled from—some man whom he owed—
 And glorious, to him, the bounding quiver
 Of the young steed in terror first bestrode!
 Thrilling as inspiration the delay—
 The arrowy spring—the fiery flight away!

LX.

Such riding galls the Muses, (tho' we know Old Pegasus's build is short and stocky,)
 But I'd a mind by these details to show
 What Jules might turn out, were the Muses baulky.
 This hint to his biographer I throw—
 In Jules, the bard, was spoil'd a famous jockey!
 Tho' not at all to imitate Apollo!
 Horse him as well, he'd beat that dabster hollow!

LXI.

'Tis one of the proprieties of story
 To mark the change in heroes, stage by stage;
 And therefore I have tried to lay before ye
 The qualities of Jules's second age.
 It should wind up with some memento mori—
 But we'll defer that till we draw the sage.
 The moral's the last thing, (I say with pain,)
 And now let's turn awhile to Lady Jane.

LXII.

The Earl, I've said, was in his idiocy,
 And Lady Jane not well. They therefore hired
 The summer palace of Rospigliosi,
 To get the sun as well as be retired.
 You shouldn't fail, I think, this spot to go see—
 That's if you care to have your fancy fired—
 It's out of Rome—it strikes me on a steep hill—
 A sort of place to go to with nice people.

LXIII.

It looks affectionate, with all its splendor—
 As loveable as ever look'd a nest;
 A palace I protest, that makes you tender,
 And long for — fol de rol, and all the rest.
 Guido's Aurora's there—you couldn't mend her;
 And Sainson, by Caracci—not his best;
 But pictures, I can talk of to the million—
 To you, I'll just describe one small pavilion.

LXIV.

It's in the garden just below the palace;
 I think, upon the second terrace—no;
 The first—yes, 'tis the first—the orange alleys
 Lead from the first flight down—precisely so!
 Well—half-way is a fountain, where, with malice
 In all his looks, a Cupid—'hem! you know
 You needn't notice that—you hurry by,
 And lo! a fairy structure fills your eye.

LXV.

A crescent colonnade folds in the sun,
 To keep it for the wooing South wind only—
 A thing I wonder is not oftener done,
 (The crescent, not the wooing—that's my own lie.)
 For there are months, and January's one,
 When winds are chill, and life in-doors gets lonely,
 And one quite longs, if wind would keep away,
 To sing i' the sunshine, like old King René.

LXVI.

The columns are of marble, white as light:
 The structure low, yet airy, and the floor
 A tessellated pavement, curious quite,—
 Of the same fashion in and out of door.
 The Lady Jane, who kept not warm by sight,
 Had carpeted this pavement snugly o'er,
 And introduced a stove, (an open Rumford)—
 So the pavilion had an air of comfort.

LXVII.

"The frescoes on the ceiling really breathe,"
 The guide-books say. Of course they really see:
 And, as I tell you what went on beneath,
 Of course those naked goddesses told me.
 They saw two rows of dazzling English teeth,
 Employ'd, each morn, on English "toast and tea;"
 And once, when Jules came in, they strain'd their eyes,
 But didn't see the teeth, to their surprise.

LXVIII.

The Lady Jane smiled not. Her lashes hung
 Low to the soft eye, and, so still they lay,
 Jules knew a tear was hid their threads among,
 And that she fear'd 'twould gush and steal away.
 The kindly greeting trembled on her tongue,
 The hand's faint pressure chill'd his touch like clay,
 And Jules with wonder felt the world all changing,
 With but the cloud of one fond heart's estranging.

LXIX.

Oh it is darkness to lose love!—how'er
 We little prized the fond heart—fond no more!
 The bird, dark-wing'd on earth, looks white in air!
 Unrecognized are angels, till they soar!
 And few so rich they may not well beware
 Of lightly losing the heart's golden ore!
 Yet—hast thou love too poor for thy possessing?—
 Loose it, like friends to death, with kiss and blessing

LXX.

You're naturally surprised, that Lady Jane
 Loved Mr. Jules. (He's Mr. now—not Master!)
 The fact's abruptly introduced, it's plain;
 And possibly I should have made it last a
 Whole Canto, more or less—but I'll explain.
Lumping the sentiment one gets on faster!
 Tho' it's in narrative, an art quite subtle,
 To work all even, like a weaver's shuttle.

LXXI.

Good "characters" in tales are "well brought up"— (Tho', by this rule, my Countess Pasibleu
 Is a bad character—yet, just to sup,
 I much prefer her house to a church pew—)
 But, pouring verse for readers, cup by cup,—
 So much a week,—what is a man to do?
 "Tis wish'd that if a story you begin, you'd Make separate scenes of each 'to be continued.'"

LXXII.

So writes plain "Jonathan," who tills my brains
 With view to crop—(the seed being ready money—)
 And if the "small-lot system" bring him gains,
 He has a right to fence off grave from funny—
 Working me up, as 'twere, in window-panes,
 And, I must own, where one has room to run, he
 Is apt, as Cooper does, to spread it thin,
 So now I'll go to lumping it again!

LXXIII.

"Love grows, by what" it gives to feed another,
And not by what "it feeds on." 'Tis divine,
If any thing's divine besides the mother
Whose breast, self-blessing, is its holy sign.
Much better than a sister loves a brother
'The Lady Jane loved Jules, and "line by line, Precept by precept," furnish'd him advice;
Also much other stuff he thought more nice.

LXXIV.

She got him into sundry pleasure clubs,
By pains that women can take, tho' but few will!
She made most of him when he got most rubs;
And once, in an inevitable duel,
She follow'd him alone to Wormwood Scrubs—
But not to hinder! Faith! she was a jewel!
I wish the star all manner of festivity
That shone upon her Ladyship's nativity!

LXXV.

All sorts of enviable invitations,
Tickets, and privileges, got she him;
Gave him much satin waistcoat, work'd with patience,
(Becoming to a youth so jimp and slim)—
Cut for his sake some prejudiced relations,
And found for him in church the psalm and hymn;
Sent to his "den" some things not found in Daniel's,
And kept him in kid gloves, cologne, and flannels.

LXXVI.

To set him down, upon her way chez elle,
She stay'd unreasonably late at parties;
To introduce him to a waltzing belle
She sometimes made a cessio dignitatis;
And one kind office more that I must tell—
She sent her maid, (and very stern your heart is If charity like this you find a sin in.)
In church-time, privately, to air his linen.

LXXVII.

Was Jules ungrateful? No! Was he obtuse?
Did he believe that women's hearts were flowing
With tenderness, like water in a sluice,—
Like the sun's shining,—like the breeze's blowing,—
And fancy thanking them was not much use?
Had he the luck of intimately knowing
Another woman, quite as kind, and nicer?
Had he a "friend" sub rosa? No, sir! Fie, sir!

LXXVIII.

Then why neglect her? Having said he did,
I will explain, as Brutus did his stab,—
(Tho' by my neighbors I'm already chid
For getting on so very like a crab)—
Jules didn't call, as oft as he was bid,
Because in Rome he didn't keep a cab—
A fact that quite explains why friendships, marriages,
And other ties depend on keeping carriages.

LXXIX.

Without a carriage men should have no card,
Nor "owe a call" at all—except for love.
And friends who need that you the "lean earth lard"
To give their memories a pasteboard shove,
On gentlemen a-foot bear rather hard!
It's paying high for Broadway balls, by Jove!
To walk next day half way to Massachusetts
And leave your name—on ladies that won't use it.

LXXX.

It really should be taught in infant schools
That the majority means men, not dollars;
And, therefore, that, to let the rich make rules,
Is silly in "poor pretty little scholars."
And this you see is apropos of Jules,
Who call'd as frequently as richer callers
While he'd a cab;—but courtesy's half horse—
A secret those who ride keep snug, of course.

LXXXI.

I say while he was Centaur, (horse and man,)
Jules never did neglect the Lady Jane;
And, at the start, it was my settled plan,
(Tho' I've lost sight of it, I see with pain,)
To show how moderate attentions can,
If once she love, a woman's heart reitain
True love is weak and humble, tho' so brittle;
And asks, 'tis wonderful how very little!

LXXXII.

For instance—Jules's every day routine
Was, breakfast at his lodgings, rather early;
A short walk in the nearest Park, the Green;
(Where, if address'd, he was extremely surly);
Five minutes at the club, perhaps fifteen;
Then giving his fine silk moustache a curl, he Stepp'd in his cab and drove to Belgrave Square,
Where he walk'd in, with quite a household air

LXXXIII.

And here he pass'd an hour—or two, or three—
Just as it served his purpose or his whim;
And sweeter haunt on earth could scarcely be
Than that still boudoir, rose-lit, scented, dim—
Its mistress, elsewhere all simplicity,
Dress'd ever sumptuously there—for him!
With all that taste could mould, or gold could buy,
Pampering fondly his reluctant eye.

LXXXIV.

And on the silken cushions at her feet
He daily dream'd these morning hours away,
Troubling himself but little to be sweet.
Poets are fond of reverie, they say,
But not with ladies whom they rarely meet.
And, if you love one, madam, (as you may!)
And wish his wings to pin as with a skewer,
Be careful of all manner of toujours!

LXXXV.

"Toujours perdrix," snipe, woodcock, trout, or rabbit
Offends the simplest palate, it appears,
And, (if a secret, I'm disposed to blab it,)
It's much the same with smiles, sighs, quarrels, tears,
The fancy mortally abhors a habit!
(Not that which Seraphina's bust inspheres!)
E'en one-tuned music-boxes breed satiety,
Unless you keep of them a great variety.

LXXXVI.

Daily to Jules the sun rose in the East,
And brought new milk and morning paper daily;
The "yield," of both the Editor and beast,
Great mysteries, unsolved by Brown or Paley;
But Jules—not plagued about it in the least—
Read his gazette, and drank his tea quite gaily:
And Lady Jane's fond love and cloudless brow
Grew to be like the Editor and cow.

LXXXVII.

I see you understand it. One may dash on
A color here—stroke there—and lo! the story!
And, speaking morally, this outline fashion
Befits a world so cramm'd yet transitory.
I've sketch'd for you a deep and tranquil passion
Kindled while nursing up a bard for glory;
And, having whisk'd you for that end to London,
Let's back to Italy, and see it undone.

LXXXVIII.

Fair were the frescoes of Rospigliosi—
Bright the Italian sunshine on the wall—
The day delicious and the room quite cozy—
And yet were there two bosoms full of gall!
So lurks the thorn in paths long soft and rosy!
Jules was not one whom trifles could appal,
But few things will make creep the lion's mane
Like ladies in a muff who won't explain!

LXXXIX.

Now I have seen a hadji and a cadi—
Have sojourn'd among strangers, oft and long—
Have known most sorts of women, fair and shady,
And mingled in most kinds of mortal throng—
But, in my life, I never saw a lady
Who had, the least, the air of being wrong!
The fact is, there's a nameless grace in evil
We never caught--'twas she who saw the devil!

XC.

In pedigree of sin we're mere beginners—
For what was Adam to the "morning star?"
She would take precedence—if sins were dinners,
And hence that self-assured "de haut en bas"
So unattainable by men, as sinners.
Of course, she plays the devil in a fracas—
Frowns better, looks more innocent, talks faster,
And argues like her grandmother's old master!

XCI.

And in proportion as the angel fades—
As love departs—the crest of woman rises—
Even in passion's softer, lighter shades,
With aristocracy's well-bred disguises;
For, with no tragic fury, no tirades,
A lady looks a man into a crisis!
And, to 'most any animal carnivorous
Before a belle aggrieved, the Lord deliver us!

XCII.

Jules had one thing particular to say,
The morn I speak of, but, in fact, was there,
With twenty times the mind to be away.
Uncomfortable seem'd the stuff'd arm-chair
In which the Earl would sometimes pass the day;
And there was something Roman in the air;
For every effort to express his errand
Ended in "um!"—as 'twere a Latin gerund.

XCIII.

He had received a little billet-doux
The night before—as plain as A B C—
(I mean, it would appear as plain to you,
Tho' very full of meaning you'll agree)—
Informing him that by advice quite new
The Earl was going now to try the sea;
And begging him to have his passport vised
For Venice, by Bologna—if he pleased!

XCIV.

Smooth as a melody of Mother Goose's
The gentle missive elegantly ran—
A sort of note the writer don't care who sees,
For you may pick a flaw in't if you can—
But yet a stern experimentum crucis,
Quite in the style of Metternich, or Van,—
And meant—without more flummery or fuss—
Stay with your Marchioness—or come with us!

XCV.

Here was to be "a parting such as wrings" [stay!
The blood from out young hearts"—for Jules would
The bird she took unfledged had got its wings,
And, though its cage be gold, it must away!
But this, and similar high-color'd things,
Refinement makes it difficult to say;
For, higher "high life" is, (this side an attic,)
The more it shrinks from all that looks dramatic.

XCVI.

Hence, words grow cold as agony grows hot,
'Twixt those who see in ridicule a Hades;
And tho' the truth but coldly end the plot,
(There really is no pathos for you, ladies!)
Jules cast the die with, simply "I think not!"
And her few words were guarded as he made his;
For rank has one cold law of Moloch's making—
Death, before outcry, while the heart is breaking!

XCVII.

She could not tell that boy how hot the tear
That seem'd within her eyeball to have died—
She could not tell him her exalted sphere
Had not a hope his boyish love beside:
The grave of anguish is a human ear—
Hers lay unburied in a pall of pride!
And life, for her, thenceforth, was cold and lonely,
With her heart lock'd on that dumb sorrow only!

XCVIII.

Calm, in her "pride of place," moves Lady Jane—
Paler, but beautifully pale, and cold—
So cold, the gazer believes joy nor pain
Has o'er that pulse of marble ever roll'd.
She loved too late to dream of love again,
And rich, fair, noble, and alone, grows old
A star, on which a spirit had alighted
Once, in all time, were like a life so blighted!

XCIX.

So, from the poet's woof was broke a thread
Which we have follow'd in its rosy weaving;
Yet merrily, still on, the shuttle sped.
Jules was not made of stuff to die of grieving,
But, that an angel from his path had fled,
He was not long in mournfully believing.
And "angel watch and ward" had fled with her—
For, virtuously loved, 'tis hard to err!

C.

Poets are moths, (or so some poet sings,
Or so some pleasant allegory goes,)
And Jules at many a bright light burnt his wings.
His first chaste scorching the foregoing shows;
But, while one passion best in metre rings,
Another is best told in lucid prose.
As to the marchioness, I've had a plan, sir!
To limn her in the quaint Spenserian stanza.

END.

To the Reader.

And now, dear reader! as a brick may be
A sample of a house—a bit of glass
Of a broad mirror—it has seem'd to me
These fragments for a tale may shift to pass.
(I am a poet much cut up, pardie!)
But "shorts" is poor "to running loose to grass."
Where there's a meadow to range freely over,
You pick to please you—timothy or clover.

Without the slightest hint at transmigration,
I wish hereafter we may meet in calf!
That you may read me with some variation— [laugh
This when you're moody—that when you would
In that case, I may swell this true narration,
And blow off here and there a speech of chaff.
I trust you think, that, were there more 'twere better, or
If cetera desunt, decent were the cetera!

P. S. I really had forgotten quite
To say to you, from Countess Pabiseul—
(Dying, 'tis thought, but quite too ill to write)—
Her Ladyship's best compliments to you,
And she's toujours chez elle on Friday night,
(Buckingham Crescent, May Fair, No. 2.)
This, (as her written missive would have said,)
Always in case her Ladyship's not dead.

AN APOLOGY

For avoiding, after long separation, a woman once loved.

SEE me no more on earth, I pray,
Thy picture, in my memory now,
Is fair as morn, and fresh as May!
Few were as beautiful as thou!

And still I see that willowy form—
And still that cheek like roses dyed—
And still that dark eye, deep and warm—
Thy look of love—thy step of pride!—
Thy memory is a star to me,
More bright as day-beams fade and flee.

But thou, indeed!—Ah! years have fled,
And thou, like others, changed the while—
For joy upon the lip lies dead
If pain but cloud the sunny smile!
And care will make the roses pale,
And tears will soil the lily's whiteness,
And ere life's lamp begins to fail
The eye forgets its trick of brightness!
Look for the rose of dawn at noon,
And weep for beauty—lost as soon!

Cold words that hide the envious thought!

I could not bear thy face to see—
But oh, 'tis not that time has wrought
A change in features dear to me!
No! had it been my lot to share
The fragrance of the flower decay'd—
If I had borne but half the care
That on thy brow its burden laid—
If in my love thou'dst burn'd away,
The ashes still had warm'd the heart so cold to-day!

TO HELEN IN A HUFF.

NAY, lady, one frown is enough
In a life as soon over as this—
And though minutes seem long in a huff,
They're minutes 'tis pity to miss!
The smiles you imprison so lightly
Are reckon'd, like days in eclipse;
And though you may smile again brightly,
You've lost so much light from your lips!
Pray, lady, smile!

The cup that is longest untasted
May be with our bliss running o'er,
And, love when we will, we have wasted
An age in not loving before!
Perchance Cupid's forging a fetter
To tie us together some day,
And, just for the chance, we had better
Be laying up love, I should say!
Nay, lady, smile!

CITY LYRICS.

Argument.—The poet starts from 'O Be a Young Green to take his sweet-heart up to Thompson's for an ice, or (if she is inclined for more) ices. He confines his muse to matters which any every-day man and young woman may see in taking the same promenade for the same innocent refreshment.

Come out, love—the night is enchanting!
The moon hangs just over Broadway;
The stars are all lighted and panting—
(Hot weather up there, I dare say!)
'Tis seldom that "coolness" entices,
And love is no better for chilling—
But come up to Thompson's for ices,
And cool your warm heart for a shilling!

What perfume comes balmily o'er us?
Mint juleps from City Hotel!
A loafer is smoking before us—
(A nasty cigar, by the smell!)
Oh Woman! thou secret past knowing!
Like lilacs that grow by the wall,
You breathe every air that is going,
Yet gather but sweetness from all!

On, on! by St. Paul's, and the Astor!
Religion seems very ill-plann'd!
For one day we list to the pastor,
For six days we list to the band!
The sermon may dwell on the future,
The organ your pulses may calm—
When—pest!—that remember'd cachucha
Upsets both the sermon and psalm!

Oh, pity the love that must utter
While goes a swift omnibus by!
(Tho' sweet is I scream* when the flutter
Of fans shows thermometers high)—
But if what I bawl, or I mutter,
Falls into your ear but to die,
Oh, the dew that falls into the gutter
Is not more unhappy than I!

TO THE LADY IN THE CHEMISSETTE WITH BLACK BUTTONS.

I know not who thou art, oh, lovely one!
Thine eyes were droop'd, thy lips half sorrowful—
Yet thou didst eloquently smile on me
While handing up thy sixpence through the hole
Of that o'er-freighted omnibus! Ah me!
The world is full of meetings such as this—
A thrill, a voiceless challenge and reply—
And sudden partings after! We may pass,
And know not of each other's nearness now—
Thou in the Knickerbocker Line, and I,
Lone, in the Waverley! Oh, life of pain!
And even should I pass where thou dost dwell—
Nay—see thee in the basement taking tea—
So cold is this inexorable world,
I must glide on! I dare not feast mine eye!
I dare not make articulate my love,
Nor o'er the iron rails that hem thee in Venture to fling to thee my innocent card—
Not knowing thy papa!

Hast thou papa?
Is thy progenitor alive, fair girl?
And what doth he for lucre? Lo again!
A shadow o'er the face of this fair dream!
For thou mayst be as beautiful as Love
Can make thee, and the ministering hands
Of milliners, incapable of more,
Be lifted at thy shapeliness and air,
And still 'twixt me and thee, invisibly,
May rise a wall of adamant. My breath
Upon my pale lip freezes as I name
Manhattan's orient verge, and eke the west
In its far down extremity. Thy sire
May be the signer of a temperance pledge,
And clad all decently may walk the earth—
Nay—may be number'd with that blessed few
Who never ask for discount—yet, alas!
If, homeward wending from his daily cares,
He go by Murphy's Line, thence eastward tending
Or westward from the Line of Kipp & Brown,—
My vision is departed! Harshly falls
The doom upon the ear, "She's not genteel!"
And pitiless is woman who doth keep
Of "good society" the golden key!
And gentlemen are bound, as are the stars,
To stoop not after rising!

But farewell,
And I shall look for thee in streets where dwell
The passengers by Broadway Lines alone!
And if my dreams be true, and thou, indeed,
Art only not more lovely than genteel—
Then, lady of the snow-white chemisette,
The heart which vent'rously cross'd o'er to thee
Upon that bridge of sixpence, may remain—
And, with up-town devotedness and truth,
My love shall hover round thee!

* Query.—Should this be Ice cream, or I scream?—Printer's Devil.

THE LADY IN THE WHITE DRESS,

Whom I helped into the Omnibus.

I know her not! Her hand has been in mine,
 And the warm pressure of her taper arm
 Has thrill'd upon my fingers, and the hem
 Of her white dress has lain upon my feet,
 Till my hush'd pulse, by the caressing folds,
 Was kindled to a fever! I, to her,
 Am but the undistinguishable leaf
 Blown by upon the breeze—yet I have sat,
 And in the blue depths of her stainless eyes,
 (Close as a lover in his hour of bliss,
 And steadfastly as look the twin stars down
 Into unfathomable wells,) have gazed!
 And I have felt from out its gate of pearl
 Her warm breath on my cheek, and while she sat
 Dreaming away the moments, I have tried
 To count the long dark lashes in the fringe
 Of her bewildering eyes! The kerchief sweet
 That enviously visits her red lip
 Has slumber'd, while she held it, on my knee,—
 And her small foot has crept between mine own—
 And yet, she knows me not!

Now, thanks to heaven
 For blessings chainless in the rich man's keeping—
 Wealth that the miser cannot hide away!
 Buy, if they will, the invaluable flower—
 They cannot store its fragrance from the breeze!
 Wear, if they will, the costliest gem of Ind—
 It pours its light on every passing eye!
 And he who on this beauty sets his name—
 Who dreams, perhaps, that for his use alone
 Such loveliness was first of angels born—
 Tell him, oh whisperer at his dreaming ear,
 That I too, in her beauty, sun my eye,
 And, unrebuked, may worship her in song—
 Tell him that heaven, along our darkling way,
 Hath set bright lamps with loveliness alight—
 And all may in their guiding beams rejoice;
 But he—as 'twere a watcher by a lamp—
 Guards out this bright one's shining.

THE WHITE CHIP HAT.

I pass'd her one day in a hurry,
 When late for the Post with a letter—
 I think near the corner of Murray—
 And up rose my heart as I met her!
 I ne'er saw a parasol handled
 So like to a dutchess's doing—
 I ne'er saw a sligher foot sandall'd,
 Or so fit to exhale in the shoeing—
 Lovely thing!

Surprising!—one woman can dish us
 So many rare sweets up together!
 Tournure absolutely delicious—
 Chip hat without flower or feather—
 Well gloved, and enchantingly boddiced—
 Her waist like the cup of a lily—
 And an air, that, while daintily modest,
 Repell'd both the saucy and silly—
 Quite the thing!

For such a rare wonder you'll say, sir,
 There's reason in straining one's tether—
 And, to see her again in Broadway, sir,
 Who would not be lavish of leather!
 I met her again, and as you know
 I'm sage as old Voltaire at Ferney—
 But I said a bad word—for my Juno
 Look'd sweet on a sneaking attorney—
 Horrid thing!

Away flies the dream I had nourish'd—
 My castles like mockery fall, sir!
 And, now, the fine airs that she flourish'd
 Seem varnish and crockery all, sir!

The bright cup which angels might handle
 Turns earthy when finger'd by asses—
 And the star that "swaps" light with a candle,
 Thenceforth for a pennyworth passes!—
 Not the thing!

YOU KNOW IF IT WAS YOU.

As the chill'd robin, bound to Florida
 Upon a morn of autumn, crosses flying
 The air-track of a snipe most passing fair—
 Yet colder in her blood than she is fair—
 And as that robin lingers on the wing,
 And feels the snipe's flight in the eddying air,
 And loves her for her coldness not the less,—
 But fain would win her to that warmer sky
 Where love lies waking with the fragrant stars—.
 So I—a languisher for sunnier climes,
 Where fruit, leaf, blossom, on the trees forever
 Image the tropic deathlessness of love—
 Have met, and long'd to win thee, fairest lady,
 To a more genial clime than cold Broadway!

Tranquil and effortless thou gliest on,
 As doth the swan upon the yielding water,
 And with a cheek like alabaster cold!
 But as thou didst divide the amorous air
 Just opposite the Astor, and didst lift
 That veil of languid lashes to look in
 At Leary's tempting window—lady! then
 My heart sprang in beneath that fringed veil,
 Like an adventurous bird that would escape
 To some warm chamber from the outer cold!
 And there would I delightedly remain,
 And close that fringed window with a kiss,
 And in the warm sweet chamber of thy breast,
 Be prisoner forever!

UNSEEN SPIRITS.

THE shadows lay along Broadway—
 'Twas near the twilight-tide—
 And slowly there a lady fair
 Was walking in her pride.
 Alone walk'd she; but, viewlessly,
 Walk'd spirits at her side.

Peace charm'd the street beneath her feet,
 And Honor charm'd the air;
 And all astir look'd kind on her,
 And call'd her good as fair—
 For all God ever gave to her
 She kept with chary care.

She kept with care her beauties rare
 From lovers warm and true—
 For her heart was cold to all but gold,
 And the rich came not to woo—
 But honor'd well are charms to sell
 If priests the selling do.

Now walking there was one more fair—
 A slight girl, lily-pale;
 And she had unseen company
 To make the spirit quail—
 'Twixt Want and Scorn she walk'd forlorn,
 And nothing could avail.

No mercy now can clear her brow
 For this world's peace to pray;
 For, as love's wild prayer dissolved in air,
 Her woman's heart gave way!—
 But the sin forgiven by Christ in heaven
 By man is curst away!

LOVE IN A COTTAGE.

THEY may talk of love in a cottage,
 And bowers of trellised vine—
 Of nature bewitchingly simple,
 And milkmaids half divine;
 They may talk of the pleasure of sleeping
 In the shade of a spreading tree,
 And a walk in the fields at morning,
 By the side of a footstep free!

But give me a sly flirtation
 By the light of a chandelier—
 With music to play in the pauses,
 And nobody very near;
 Or a seat on a silken sofa,
 With a glass of pure old wine,
 And mamma too blind to discover
 The small white hand in mine.

Your love in a cottage is hungry,
 Your vine is a nest for flies—
 Your milkmaid shocks the Graces,
 And simplicity talks of pies!
 You lie down to your shady slumber
 And wake with a bug in your ear,
 And your damsel that walks in the morning
 Is shod like a mountaineer.

True love is at home on a carpet,
 And mightily likes his ease—
 And true love has an eye for a dinner,
 And starves beneath shady trees.

His wing is the fan of a lady,
 His foot's an invisible thing,
 And his arrow is tipp'd with a jewel,
 And shot from a silver string.

THE DECLARATION.

'Twas late, and the gay company was gone,
 And light lay soft on the deserted room
 From alabaster vases, and a scent
 Of orange leaves, and sweet verbenas came Through the unshutter'd window on the air,
 And the rich pictures with their dark old tints
 Hung like a twilight landscape, and all things
 Seem'd hush'd into a slumber. Isabel,
 The dark-eyed, spiritual Isabel
 Was leaning on her harp, and I had stay'd
 To whisper what I could not when the crowd
 Hung on her look like worshippers. I knelt,
 And with the fervor of a lip unused
 To the cool breath of reason, told my love.
 There was no answer, and I took the hand
 That rested on the strings, and press'd a kiss
 Upon it unforbidden—and again
 Besought her, that this silent evidence
 That I was not indifferent to her heart,
 Might have the seal of one sweet syllable.
 I kiss'd the small white fingers as I spoke,
 And she withdrew them gently, and upraised
 Her forehead from its resting-place, and looked Earnestly on me—She had been asleep!

TORTESA, THE USURER,

DRAMATIS PERSONÆ.

DUKE OF FLORENCE.

COUNT FALCONE.

TORTESA—a usurer.

ANGELO—a young painter.

TOMASO—his Servant.

ISABELLA DE FALCONE.

ZIPPA—a Glover's daughter.

Other characters—a Counsellor, a page, the Count's Secretary, a Tradesman, a Monk, Lords, Ladies, Officer, Soldiers, &c.

ACT I.

SCENE I.

[A drawing-room in Tortesa's house. Servant discovered reading the bill of a tradesman, who is in attendance.]

Servant (reading). "Silk hose, doublet of white satin, twelve shirts of lawn." He'll not pay it to-day, good mercer!

Tradesman. How, master Gaspar? When I was assured of the gold on delivery? If it be a credit account, look you, there must be a new bill. The charge is for ready money.

Servant. Tut—tut—man, you know not whom you serve. My master is as likely to overpay you if you are civil, as to keep you a year out of your money if you push him when he is crossed.

Tradesman. Why, this is the humor of a spendthrift, not the careful way of a usurer.

Servant. Usurer! humph. Well, it may be he is—to the rich! But the heart of the Signor Tortesa, let me tell you, is like the bird's wing—the dark side is turned upward. To those who look up to him he shows neither spot nor stain! Hark! I hear his wheels in the court. Step to the ante-room—for he has that on his hands to-day which may make him impatient. Quick! Give way! I'll bring you to him if I can find a time.

Tortesa (speaking without). What ho! Gaspar!

Servant. Signor!

Tortesa. My keys! Bring me my keys!

[Enter Tortesa, followed by Count Falcone.]

Come in, count.

Falcone. You're well lodged.

Tortesa. The duke waits for you To get to horse. So, briefly, there's the deed! You have your lands back, and your daughter's mine—So ran the bargain!

Falcone (coldly). She's betrothed, sir, to you!

Tortesa. Not a half hour since, and you hold the parchment!

A free transaction, see you!—for you're paid, And I'm but promised!

Falcone. (Aside)—What a slave is this, To give my daughter to! My daughter? Psha! I'll think but of my lands, my precious lands!)

Sir, the duke sets forth—

Tortesa. Use no ceremony! Yet stay! A word! Our nuptials follow quick On your return?

Falcone. That hour, if it so please you!

Tortesa. And what's the bargain if her humor change?

Falcone. The lands are yours again—'tis understood so.

Tortesa. Yet, still a word! You leave her with her maids.

I have a right in her by this betrothal. Seal your door up till you come back again! I'd have no foplings tampering with my wife! None of your painted jackdaws from the court, Sneering and pitying her! My lord Falcone! Shall she be private?

Falcone. (Aside)—Patience! for my lands!)

You shall control my door, sir, and my daughter!

Farewell now! [Exit Falcone.]

Tortesa. Oh, omnipotence of money!

Ha! ha! Why, there's the haughtiest nobleman That walks in Florence. He!—whom I have bearded—Checked—made conditions to—shut up his daughter—And all with money! They should pull down churches And worship it! Had I been poor, that man Would see me rot ere give his hand to me.

I—as I stand here—dressed thus—looking thus—

The same in all—save money in my purse—

He would have scorned to let me come so near

That I could breathe on him! Yet, that were little—

For pride sometimes outdoes humility,

And your great man will please to be familiar,

To show how he can stoop. But halt you there!

He has a jewel that you may not name!

His wife's above you! You're no company

For his most noble daughter! You are brave—

'Tis nothing! comely—nothing! honorable—

You are a phoenix of all human virtues—

But, while your blood's mean, there's a frozen bar

Betwixt you and a lady, that will melt—

Not with religion—scarcely with the grave—

But like a mist, with money!

[Enter a Servant.]

Servant. Please you, sir! A tradesman waits to see you!

Tortesa. Let him in! [Exit Servant.]

What need have I of forty generations

To build my name up? I have bought with money

The fairest daughter of their haughtiest line!

Bought her! Falcone's daughter for so much!

No wooing in't! Ha! ha! I harped on that

Till my lord winced! "My bargain!" still "my bargain!"

Naught of my bride! Ha! ha! 'Twas excellent!

[Enter Tradesman.]

What's thy demand?

Tradesman. Ten ducats, please your lordship!

Tortesa. Out on "your lordship!" There are twelve for ten!

Does a lord pay like that? Learn some name sweeter

To my ears than "Your lordship!" I'm no lord!

Give me thy quittance! Now, begone! Who waits?

Servant. The Glover's daughter, please you, sir!

[Enter Zippa.]

Tortesa. Come in,

My pretty neighbor! What! my bridal gloves!

Are they brought home?

Zippa. The signor pays so well,

He's well served.

Tortesa. Um! why, pertinently answered!

And yet, my pretty one, the words were sweeter

In any mouth than yours!

Zippa. That's easy true!

Tortesa. I would 'twere liking that had spurred your service—

Not money, Zippa, sweet! (She presents her parcel to him, with a meaning air.)

Zippa. Your bridal gloves, sir!

Tortesa. (Aside—What a fair shrew it is!) My gloves are paid for!

And will be thrown aside when worn a little.

Zippa. What then, sir!

Tortesa. Why, the bride is paid for, too!

And may be thrown aside, when worn a little!

Zippa. You mock me now!

Tortesa. You know Falcone's palace,

And lands, here, by Fiesole? I bought them

For so much money of his creditors,

And gave them to him, in a plain, round bargain,

For his proud daughter! What think you of that?

Zippa. What else but that you loved her!

Tortesa. As I love

The thing I give my money for—no more!

Zippa. You mean to love her?

Tortesa. 'Twas not in the bargain!

Zippa. Why, what a monster do you make yourself! Have you no heart?

Tortesa. A loving one, for you!

Nay, never frown! I marry this lord's daughter

To please a devil that inhabits me!

But there's an angel in me—not so strong—

And this last loves you!

Zippa. Thanks for your weak angel!

I'd sooner 'twere the devil!

Tortesa. Both were yours!

But for the burning fever that I have

To pluck at their proud blood.

Zippa. Why, this poor lady

Can not have harmed you!

Tortesa. Forty thousand times!

She's noble-born—there's one wrong in her cradle!

She's proud—why, that makes every pulse an insult—

Sixty a minute! She's profuse in smiles

On those who are, to me, as stars to glow-worms—

So I'm disparaged! I have passed her by,

Summer and winter, and she ne'er looked on me!

Her youth has been one tissue of contempt!

Her lovers, and her tutors, and her heart,

Taught her to scorn the low-born—that am I!

Would you have more?

Zippa. Why, this is moonstruck madness.

Tortesa. I'd have her mine, for all this—jewelled, perfumed—

Just as they've worshipped her at court—my slave!

They've mewed her breath up in their silken beds—

Blancher her with baths—fed her on delicate food—

Guarded the unsunned dew upon her skin—

For some lord's pleasure! If I could not get her,

There's a contempt in that, would make my forehead

Hot in my grave!

Zippa. (Aside—Now Heaven forbid my fingers should make your bridal gloves!) Forgive me, signor! I'll take these back, so please you! (Takes up the parcel again.)

Tortesa (not listening to her). But for this—

This devil at my heart, thou shouldst have wedded

The richest commoner in Florence, Zippa!

Tell me thou wouldst!

Zippa. (Aside—Stay! stay! A thought! If I could feign to love him, and so work on him

To put this match off, and at last to break it—

'Tis possible—and so befriend this lady,

Whom, from my soul, I pity! Nay, I will!)

Signor Tortesa!

Tortesa. You've been dreaming now,

How you would brave it in your lady-gear;

Was't not so?

Zippa. No!

Tortesa. What then?

Zippa. I had a thought,

If I dare speak it.

Tortesa. Nay, nay, speak it out!

Zippa. I had forgot your riches, and I thought

How lost you were!

Tortesa. How lost?

Zippa.

Which far outweigh your treasure, thrown away

On one who does not love you!

Tortesa.

Thrown away?

Zippa. Is it not so to have a gallant shape,

And no eye to be proud on't—to be full

Of all that makes men dangerous to women,

And marry where you're scorned?

Tortesa.

There's reason there!

Zippa. You're wise in meaner riches! You have gold,

'Tis out at interest!—lands, palaces,

They bring in rent. The gifts of nature only

Worth to you, signor, more than all your gold,

Lie profitless and idle. Your fine stature—

Tortesa. Why—so, so!

Zippa. Speaking eyes—

Tortesa. Ay, passable!

Zippa. Your voice, uncommon musical—

Tortesa. Nay, there,

I think you may be honest!

Zippa. And you look,

In all points lofty, like a gentleman!

(Aside—That last must choke him!)

Tortesa. You've a judgment, Zippa,

That makes me wonder at you! We are both

Above our breeding—I have often thought so—

And loved you—but to-day so more than ever,

That my revenge must have drunk up my life,

To still sweep over it. But when I think

Upon that proud lord and his scornful daughter—

I say not you're forgot—myself am lost—

And love and memory with me! I must go

And visit her! I'll see you to the door—

Come, Zippa, come!

Zippa. (Aside—I, too, will visit her!

You're a brave signor, but against two women

You'll find your wits all wanted!)

Tortesa. Come away!

I must look on my bargain! my good bargain!

Ha! ha! my bargain! [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.

[The painter's studio. Angelo painting. Tomaso in the foreground, arranging a meager repast.]

Tomaso. A thrice-picked bone, a stale crust, and—excellent water! Will you to breakfast, Master Angelo?

Angelo. Look on this touch, good Tomaso, if it be not life itself—(draws him before his easel.) Now, what thinkest thou?

Tomaso. Um—fair! fair enough!

Angelo.

No more?

Tomaso. Till it mend my breakfast, I will never praise it! Fill me up that outline, Master Angelo! (Takes up the naked bone.) Color me that water! To what end dost thou dabble there?

Angelo. I am weary of telling thee to what end. Have patience, Tomaso!

Tomaso (coaxingly). Wouldst thou but paint the goldsmith a sign, now, in good fair letters!

Angelo. Have I no genius for the art, thinkest thou?

Tomaso. Thou! ha! ha!

Angelo. By thy laughing, thou wouldst say no!

Tomaso. Thou a genius! Look! Master Angelo! Have I not seen thee every day since thou wert no bigger than thy pencil?

Angelo. And if thou hast?

Tomaso. Do I not know thee from crown to heel? Dost thou not come in at that door as I do? sit down in that chair as I do? eat, drink, and sleep, as I do? Dost thou not call me Tomaso, and I thee Angelo?

Angelo. Well!

Tomaso. Then how canst thou have genius? Are there no marks? Would I clap thee on the back, and say good morrow? Nay, look thee! would I stand here telling thee in my wisdom what thou art, if thou wert a genius? Go to, Master Angelo! I love thee well, but thou art comprehensible!

Angelo. But thinkest thou never of my works, Tomaso?

Tomaso. Thy works ! Do I not grind thy paints ? Do I not see thee take up thy palette, place thy foot thus, and dab here, dab there ? I tell thee thou hast never done stroke yet, I could not take the same brush and do after thee. Thy works, truly !

Angelo. How thinkst thou would Donatello paint, if he were here ?

Tomaso. Donatello ! I will endeavor to show thee ! (Takes the palette and brush with a mysterious air.) The picture should be there ! His pencil (throws down Angelo's pencil, and seizes a broom), his pencil should be as long as this broom ! He should raise it thus—with his eyes rolling thus—and with his body thrown back thus !

Angelo. What then ?

Tomaso. Then he should see something in the air—a sort of a hm—ha—r—r—rrr—(you understand). And he first strides off here and looks at it—then he strides off there and looks at it—then he looks at his long brush—then he makes a dab ! dash ! flash ! (Makes three strokes across Angelo's picture.)

Angelo. Villain, my picture ! Tomaso ! (Seizes his sword.) With thy cursed broom thou hast spoiled a picture Donatello could ne'er have painted ! Say thy prayers, for, by the Virgin !—

Tomaso. Murder ! murder ! help ! Oh, my good master ! Oh, my kind master !

Angelo. Will say thy prayers, or die a sinner ? Quick ! or thou'rt dead ere 'tis thought on !

Tomaso. Help ! help ! mercy ! oh, mercy !

[Enter the duke hastily, followed by Falcone and attendants.]

Duke. Who calls so loudly ? What ! drawn swords at mid-day !

Disarm him ! Now what mad-cap youth art thou ?

(To Angelo.)

To fright this peaceful artist from his toil ?

Rise up, sir ! (To Tomaso.)

Angelo. (Aside—Could my luckless star have brought The duke here at no other time !)

Duke (looking round on the pictures). Why, here's Matter worth stumbling on ! By Jove, a picture Of admirable work ! Look here, Falcone ! Didst think there was a hand unknown in Florence Could lay on color with a skill like this !

Tomaso (aside to Angelo). Didst thou hear that ?

(Duke and Falcone admire the pictures in dumb show.)

Angelo. (Aside to Tomaso—The palette's on thy thumb— Swear 'tis thy work !)

Tomaso. Mine, master ?

Angelo. Seest thou not

The shadow of my fault will fall upon it

While I stand here a culprit ? The duke loves thee

As one whom he has chanced to serve at need,

And kindness mends the light upon a picture,

I know that well !

Falcone (to Tomaso). The duke would know your name, sir !

Tomaso (as Angelo pulls him by the sleeve). Tom—

Angelo, my lord !

Duke (to Falcone). We've fallen here

Upon a treasure !

Falcone. 'Twas a lucky chance

That led you in, my lord !

Duke. I blush to think

That I might ne'er have found such excellence

But for a chance cry thus ! Yet now 'tis found

I'll cherish it, believe me.

Falcone. 'Tis a duty

Your grace is never slow to.

Duke. I've a thought—

If you'll consent to it ?

Falcone. Before 'tis spoken,

My gracious liege !

Duke. You know how well my dutchess

Loves your fair daughter. Not as maid of honor

Lost to our service, but as parting child,

We grieve to lose her.

Falcone. My good lord !

Duke. Nay, nay—

She is betrothed now, and you needs must wed her !

My thought was, to surprise my grieving dutchess

With a resemblance of your daughter, done
By this rare hand, here. 'Tis a thought well found,
You'll say it is !

Falcone (hesitating). Your grace is bound away
On a brief journey. Were't not best put off
Till our return ?

Duke (laughing). I see you fear to let
The sun shine on your rosebud till she bloom
Fairly in wedlock. But this painter, see you
Is an old man, of a poor, timid bearing,
And may be trusted to look close upon her.
Come, come ! I'll have my way ! Good Angelo,

(To Tomaso.)

A pen and ink ! And you, my lord Falcone !
Write a brief missive to your gentle daughter
To admit him privately.

Falcone.

I will, duke.

[Writes.]

Angelo

(Aside—Now

Shall I go back or forward ? If he writes

Admit this Angelo, why I am he,

And that rare phoenix, hidden from the world,

Sits to my burning pencil. She's a beauty

Without a parallel, they say in Florence.

Her picture 'll be remembered ! Let the duke

Read me with horses, it shall ne'er be said

I dared not pluck at Fortune !)

Tomaso (aside to Angelo). Signor !

Angelo.

(Hush !

Betray me, and I'll kill thee !)

Duke.

Angelo !

Angelo (aside to Tomaso). Speak, or thou diest.

Tomaso (to the duke).

My lord !

Duke.

Thou hast grown old

In the attainment of an excellence

Well worth thy time and study. The clear touch,

Won only by the patient toil of years,

Is on your fair works yonder.

Tomaso (astonished).

Those, my lord !

Duke. I shame I never saw them until now,

But here's a new beginning. Take this missive

From Count Falcone to his peerless daughter.

I'd have a picture of her for my palace.

Paint me her beauty as I know you can,

And as you do it well, my favor to you

Shall make up for the past.

Tomaso (as Angelo pulls his sleeve). Your grace is kind !

Duke. For this rude youth, name you his punishment !

(Turns to Angelo.)

His sword was drawn upon an unarmed man.

He shall be fined, or, as you please, imprisoned.

Speak !

Tomaso. If your grace would bid him pay—

Duke.

What sum ?

Tomaso. Some twenty flasks of wine, my gracious

liege,

If it so please you. 'Tis a thriftless servant

I keep for love I bore to his dead father.

But all his faults are nothing to a thirst

That sucks my cellar dry !

Duke.

He's well let off !

Write out a bond to pay of your first gains

The twenty flasks !

Angelo.

Most willingly, my liege.

[Writes.]

Duke (to Tomaso). Are you content ?

Tomaso. Your grace, I am !

Duke.

Come then !

Once more to horse ! Nay, nay, man, look not black !

Unless your daughter were a wine flask, trust me

There's no fear of the painter !

Falcone.

So I think,

And you shall rule me. 'Tis the roughest shell

Hides the good pearl. Adieu, sir ! (to Tomaso.)

[Exeunt duke and Falcone.]

(Angelo seizes the missive from Tomaso, and strides up and down the stage, reading it exultingly. After looking at him a moment, Tomaso does the same with the bond for the twenty flasks.)

Give me the letter !

Angelo.

Oh, here is golden opportunity—

The ladder at my foot, the prize above,

And angels beckoning upward. I will paint

A picture now, that in the eyes of men
Shall live like loving daylight. They shall cease
To praise it for the constant glory of it.
There's not a stone built in the palace wall
But shall let through the light of it, and Florence
Shall be a place of pilgrimage for ever
To see the work of low-born Angelo.
Oh that the world were made without a night,
That I could toil while in my fingers play
This dexterous lightning, wasted so in sleep.
I'll out, and muse how I shall paint this beauty,
So, while the night away. [Exit.]

Tomaso (coming forward with his bond). Prejudice aside, that is a pleasant-looking piece of paper! (Holds it off, and regards it with a pleased air.) Your bond to pay, now is an ill-visaged rascal—you would know him across a church—nay—with the wind fair, smell him a good league! But this has, in some sort, a smile. It is not like other paper. It reads mellifluously. Your name is in the right end of it for music. Let me dwell upon it! (Unfolds it and reads) "I, Tomaso, promise to pay"—stay! "I, Tomaso—I, Tomaso, promise to pay to Angelo, my master, twenty flasks of wine!" (Rubs his eyes, and turns the note over and over.) There's a damnable twist in it that spoils all. "I Tomaso"—why that's I. And "I promise to pay"—Now, I promise no such thing! (Turns it upside down, and after trying in vain to alter the reading, tears it in two.) There are some men that can not write ten words in their own language without a blunder. Ont, filthy scraps. If the glove's daughter have not compassion upon me, I die of thirst! I'll seek her out! A pest on ignorance!
(Pulls his hat sulkily over his eyes, and walks off.)

SCENE III.

[An apartment in the Falcone Palace. Angelo discovered listening.]

Angelo. Did I hear footsteps? (He listens.) Fancy plays me tricks

In my impatience for this lovely wonder!
That window's to the north! The light falls cool.
I'll set my easel here, and sketch her—Stay!
How shall I do that? Is she proud or sweet?
Will she sit silent, or converse and smile?
Will she be vexed or pleased to have a stranger
Pry through her beauty for the soul that's in it?
Nay, then I heard a footstep—she is here!

(Enter Isabella, reading her father's missive.)

Isabella. "The duke would have your picture for the dutchess

Done by this rude man, Angelo! Receive him
With modest privacy, and let your kindness
Be measured by his merit, not his garb."

Angelo. Fair lady!

Isabella. Who speaks?

Angelo. Angelo!

Isabella. You've come, sir,

To paint a dull face, trust me!

Angelo. (Aside—Beautiful, Beyond all dreaming!)

Isabella. I've no smiles to show you,

Not ev'n a mock one! Shall I sit?

Angelo.

No, lady!

I'll steal your beauty while you move, as well!

So you but breathe, the air still brings to me

That which outdoes all pencilling.

Isabella (walking apart). His voice

Is not a rude one. What a fate is mine,

When ev'n the chance words on a poor youth's tongue,

Contrasted with the voice which I should love,

Seems rich and musical!

Angelo (to himself as he draws). How like a swan,

Drooping his small head to a lily-cup,

She curves that neck of pliant ivory!

I'll paint her thus!

Isabella. (Aside—Forgetful where he is,

He thinks aloud. This is, perhaps, the rudeness

My father feared might anger me.)

Angelo.

What color

Can match the clear red of those glorious lips?

Say it were possible to trace the arches,

Shaped like the drawn bow of the god of love—
How tent them, after?

Isabella. Still, he thinks not of me,
But murmurs to his picture. 'Twere sweet praise,
Were it a lover whispering it. I'll listen,
As I walk, still.

Angelo. They say, a cloudy veil
Hangs ever at the crystal-gate of heaven,
To bar the issue of its blinding glory.
So droop those silken lashes to an eye
Mortal could never paint!

Isabella. There's flattery,
Would draw down angels!

Angelo. Now, what alchymy
Can mock the rose and lily of her cheek!

I must look closer on't! (Advancing.) Fair lady, please
you,

I'll venture to your side.

Isabella. Sir!

Angelo (examining her cheek). There's a mixture
Of white and red here, that defeats my skill.
If you'll forgive me, I'll observe an instant,
How the bright blood and the transparent pearl
Melt to each other!

Isabella (receding from him). You're too free, sir.

Angelo (with surprise).

Isabella. (Aside—) And yet, I think not so. He must look on it,

To paint it well.)

Angelo. Lady! the daylight's precious!

Pray you, turn to me! In my study, here,

P've tried to fancy how that ivory shoulder

Leads the white light off from your arching neck,

But can not, for the envious sleeve that hides it.

Please you, displace it!

(Raises his hand to the sleeve.)

Isabella. Sir, you are too bold!

Angelo. Pardon me, lady! Nature's masterpiece

Should be beyond your hiding, or my praise!

Were you less marvellous, I were too bold;

But there's a pure divinity in beauty,

Which the true eye of art looks on with reverence,

Though, like the angels, it were all unclad!

You have no right to hide it!

Isabella.

How? No right!

Angelo. 'Tis the religion of our art, fair madam!

That, by oft looking on the type divine

In which we first were moulded, men remember

The heaven they're born to! You've an errand here,

To show how look the angels. But, as Vestals

Cherish the sacred fire, yet let the priest

Light his lamp at it for a thousand altars,

So is your beauty unassailed, though I

Ravish a copy for the shut-out world!

Isabella. (Aside—) Here is the wooing that should win a maid!

Bold, yet respectful—free, yet full of honor!

I never saw a youth with gentler eyes;

I never heard a voice that pleased me more;

Let me look on him?

(Enter Tortesa, unperceived.)

Angelo. In a form like yours,

All parts are perfect, madam! yet, unseen,

Impossible to fancy. With your leave

I'll see your hand ungloved.

Isabella (removing her glove). I have no heart

To keep it from you, signor! There it is!

Angelo (taking it in his own). Oh God! how beautiful thy works may be!

Inimitably perfect! Let me look

Close on the tracery of these azure veins!

With what a delicate and fragile thread

They weave their subtle mesh beneath the skin,

And meet, all blushing, in these rosy nails!

How soft the texture of these tapering fingers!

How exquisite the wrist! How perfect all!

(Tortesa rushes forward.)

Tortesa. Now have I heard enough! Why, what are you,

To palm the hand of my betrothed bride

With this licentious freedom?

(Angelo turns composedly to his work.)

And you, madam!

With a first troth scarce cold upon your lips—

Is this your chastity?

Isabella. My father's roof

Is over me! I'm not your wife!

Tortesa. Bought! paid for!

The wedding toward—have I no right in you?

Your father, at my wish, bade you be private;

Is this obedience?

Isabella. Count Falcone's will

Has, to his daughter, ever been a law;

This, in prosperity—and now, when chance

Frowns on his broken fortunes, I were dead

To love and pity, were not soul and body

Spent for his smallest need! I did consent

To wed his ruthless creditor for this!

I would have sprung into the sea, the grave,

As questionless and soon! My troth is yours!

But I'm not wedded yet, and, till I am,

The hallowed honor that protects a maid

Is round me, like a circle of bright fire!

A savage would not cross it—nor shall you!

I'm mistress of my presence. Leave me, sir!

Tortesa. There's a possession of some lordly acres

Sold to Falcone for that lily hand!

The deed's delivered, and the hand's my own!

I'll see that no man looks on't.

Isabella. Shall a lady

Did you begone twice?

Tortesa. Twenty times, if't please you!

(She looks at Angelo, who continues tranquilly painting.)

Isabella. Does he not wear a sword? Is he a coward,

That he can hear this man heap insult on me,

And ne'er fall on him?

Tortesa. Lady! to your chamber!

I have a touch to give this picture, here,

But want no model for't. Come, come.

(Offers to take her by the arm.)

Isabella. Stand back!

Now, will he see this wretch lay hands on me,

And never speak? He can not be a coward!

No, no! some other reason—not a coward!

I could not love a coward!

Tortesa. If you will,

Stay where you're better missed—'tis at your pleasure;

I'll hew your kisses from the saucy lips

Of this bold painter—look on't, if you will!

And first, to mar his picture!

(He strikes at the canvass, when Angelo suddenly draws, attacks and disarms him.)

Angelo. Hold! What wouldst thou?

Fool! madman! dog! What wouldst thou with my picture?

Speak!—But thy life would not bring back a ray

Of precious daylight, and I can not waste it!

Begone! begone!

(Throws Tortesa's sword from the window, and returns to his picture.)

I'll back to paradise!

'Twas this touch that he married! So! fair again!

Tortesa (going out). I'll find you, sir, when I'm in cooler blood!

And, madam, you! or Count Falcone for you,

Shall rue this scorn! [Exit.

Isabella (looking at Angelo). Lost in his work once more!

I shall be jealous of my very picture!

Yet one who can forget his passions so—

Peril his life, and, losing scarce a breath,

Turn to his high, ambitious toil again—

Must have a heart for whose belated waking

Queens might keep vigil!

Angelo. Twilight falls, fair lady!

I must give o'er! Pray Heaven, the downy wing

Of its most loving angel guard your beauty!

Good night!

(Goes out with a low reverence.)

Isabella. Good night!

(She looks after him a moment, and then walks thoughtfully off the stage.)

ACT II.

SCENE I.

[Tomaso discovered sitting at his supper, with a bottle of water before him.]

Tomaso. Water! (Sips a little with a grimace.) I think since the world was drowned in it, it has tasted of sinners. The pious throat refuses it. Other habits grow pleasant with use—but the drinking of water lessens the liking of it. Now, why should not some rivers run wine? There are varieties in the eatables—will any wise man tell me why there should be but one drinkable in nature—and that water? My mind's made up—it's the curse of transgression.

(A rap at the door.)

Come in!

[Enter Zippa, with a basket and bottle.]

Zippa. Good even, Tomaso!

Tomaso. Zippa! I had a presentiment—

Zippa. What! of my coming?

Tomaso. No—of thy bottle! Look! I was stinting myself in water to leave room!

Zippa. The reason is superfluous. There would be room in thee for wine, if thou wert drowned in the sea.

Tomaso. God forbid!

Zippa. What—that thou shouldst be drowned?

Tomaso. No—but that being drowned, I should have room for wine.

Zippa. Why, now?—why?

Tomaso. If I had room for wine, I should want it—and to want wine in the bottom of the sea, were a plague of Sodom.

Zippa. Where's Angelo?

Tomaso. What's in thy bottle? Show! Show!

Zippa. Tell me where he is—what he has done since yesterday—what thought on—what said—how he has looked, and if he still loves me; and when thou art thirsty with truth-telling—(dry work for such a liar as thou art),—thou shalt learn what is in my bottle!

Tomaso. Nay—learning be hanged!

Zippa. So says the fool!

Tomaso. Speak advisedly! Was not Adam blest till he knew good and evil?

Zippa. Right for once.

Tomaso. Then he lost Paradise by too much learning.

Zippa. Ha! ha! Hadst thou been consulted, we should still be there!

Tomaso. Snug! I would have had my inheritance in a small vineyard!

Zippa. Tell me what I ask of thee.

Tomaso. Thou shalt have a piece of news for a cup of wine—pay and take—till thy bottle be dry!

Zippa. Come on, then! and if thou must lie, let it be flattery. That's soonest forgiven.

Tomaso. And last forgotten! Pour out! (She pours a cup full, and gives him.) The duke was here yesterday.—

Zippa. Lie the first!

Tomaso. And made much of my master's pictures.

Zippa. Nay—that would have made two good lies. Thou'rt prodigal of stuff!

Tomaso. Pay two glasses, then, and square the reckoning!

Zippa. Come! Lie the third!

Tomaso. What wilt thou wager it's a lie, that Angelo is painting a court lady for the dutchesse?

Zippa. Oh Lord! Take the bottle! They say there's truth in wine—but as truth is impossible to thee, drink thyself, at least, down to probabilities!

Tomaso. Look you there! When was virtue encouraged? Here have I been telling God's truth, and it goes for a lie. Hang virtue! Produce thy cold chicken, and I'll tell thee a lie for the wings and two for the side-bones and breast. (Offers to take the chicken.)

Zippa. Stay! stay! It's for thy master, thou glutton!

Tomaso. Who's ill a-bed, and forbid meat. (Angelo enters.) I would have told thee so before, but feared to grieve thee. (She would have a lie!)

Zippa (starting up). Ill! Angelo ill! Is he very ill, good Tomaso?

Tomaso. Very! (Seizes the chicken, as Angelo claps him on the shoulder.)

Angelo. Will thy tricks never end?

Tomaso. Ehem! ehem! (Thrusts the chicken into his pocket.)

Angelo. How art thou, Zippa?

Zippa. Well, dear Angelo! (Giving him her hand.) And thou wert not ill, indeed!

Angelo. Never better, by the test of a true hand! I have done work to-day, I trust will be remembered?

Zippa. Is it true it's a fair lady?

Angelo. A lady with a face so angelical, Zippa, that—

Zippa. That thou didst forget mine!

Angelo. In truth, I forgot there was such a thing as a world, and so forgot all in it. I was in heaven!

Tomaso. (Aside, as he picks the leg of the chicken.) Prosperity is excellent whitewash, and her love is an old score!

Zippa (bitterly). I am glad thou wert pleased, Angelo!—very glad!

Tomaso. (Aside)—Glad as an eel to be fried.)

Zippa. (Aside)—"In heaven," was he! If I pay him not that, may my brains rot! By what right, loving me, is he "in heaven" with another?

Tomaso. (Aside)—No more wine and cold chicken from that quarter!

Zippa. (Aside)—Tortesa loves me, and my false game may be played true. If he wed not Falcone's daughter, he will wed me, and so I am revenged on this fickle Angelo! I have the heart to do it!

Angelo. What dost thou muse on, Zippa?

Zippa. On one I love better than thee, signor!

Angelo. What, angry? (Seizes his pencil.) Hold there till I sketch thee! By Jove, thou'rt not half so pretty when thou'rt pleased!

Zippa. Adieu, signor! your mockery will have an end! (Goes out with an angry air.)

Angelo. What! gone? Nay, I'll come with thee, if thou'rt in earnest! What whim's this? (Takes up his hat.) Ho, Zippa! (Follows in pursuit.)

Tomaso (pulls the chicken from his pocket). Come forth last of the chickens! She will ne'er forgive him, and so ends the succession of cold fowl! One glass to its memory, and then to bed! (Drinks, and takes up the candle.) A woman is generally unsafe—but a jealous one spoils all confidence in drink. [Exit, muttering.]

SCENE II.

[An Apartment in the Falcone Palace. Enter Servant, showing in Zippa.]

Servant. Wait here, here, if't please you!

Zippa. Thanks! (Exit Servant.) My heart misgives me!

'Tis a bold errand I am come upon—

And I a stranger to her! Yet, perchance

She needs a friend—the proudest does sometimes—

And mean ones may be welcome. Look! she comes!

Isabella. You wished to speak with me?

Zippa. I did—but now

My memory is crept into my eyes;

I can not think for gazing on your beauty!

Pardon me, lady!

Isabella. You're too fair yourself

To find my face a wonder. Speak! Who are you?

Zippa. Zippa, the glover's daughter, and your friend!

Isabella. My friend?

Zippa. I said so. You're a noble lady

And I a lowborn maid—yet I have come

To offer you my friendship.

Isabella. This seems strange!

Zippa. I'll make it less so, if you'll give me leave.

Isabella. You'll please me!

Zippa. Briefly—for the time is precious

To me as well as you—I have a lover,

A true one, as I think, who yet finds boldness

To seek your hand in marriage.

Isabella. How? We're rivals!

Zippa. Tortesa loves me, and for that I'd wed him.

Yet I'm not sure I love him more than you—And you must hate him.

Isabella. So far freely spoken—

What was your thought in coming to me now?

Zippa. To mar your match with him, and so make mine!

Isabella. Why, free again! Yes, as you love him not 'Tis strange you seek to wed him!

Zippa. Oh no, madam!

Woman loves once unthinkingly. The heart

Is born with her first love, and new to joy,

Breathes to the first wind its delicious sweetness,

But gets none back! So comes its bitter wisdom!

When next we think of love, 'tis who loves us!

I said Tortesa loved me!

Isabella. You shall have him

With all my heart! See—I'm your friend already!

And friends are equals. So approach, and tell me,

What was this first love like, that you discourse

So prettily upon?

Zippa. (Aside)—Dear Angelo!

'Twill be a happiness to talk of him!

I loved a youth, kind madam! far beneath

The notice of your eyes, unknown and poor.

Isabella. A handsome youth?

Zippa. Indeed, I thought him so!

But you would not. I loved him out of pity;

No one cared for him.

Isabella. Was he so forlorn?

Zippa. He was our neighbor, and I knew his toil

Was almost profitless; and 'twas a pleasure

To fill my basket from our wasteful table,

And steal, at eve, to sup with him.

Isabella (smiling). Why, that

Was charity, indeed! He loved you for it—

Was't not so?

Zippa. He was like a brother to me—

The kindest brother sister ever had.

I built my hopes upon his gentleness;

He had no other quality to love.

Th' ambitious change—so do the fiery-hearted:

The lowly are more constant.

Isabella. And yet, he

Was after all, a false one?

Zippa. Nay, dear lady!

I'll check my story there! 'Twould end in anger,

Perhaps in tears. If I am not too bold,

Tell me, in turn, of all your worshippers—

Was there ne'er one that pleased you?

Isabella. (Aside)—Now could I

Prate to this humble maid, of Angelo,

Till matins rang again! My gentle Zippa!

I have found all men prompt to talk of love,

Save only one. I will confess to you,

For that one could I die! Yet, so unlike

Your faithless lover must I draw his picture,

That you will wonder how such opposites

Could both be loved of women.

Zippa. Was he fair,

Or brown?

Isabella. In truth, I marked not his complexion.

Zippa. Tall?

Isabella. That I know not.

Zippa. Well—robust, or slight?

Isabella. I can not tell, indeed! I heard him speak—

Looked in his eyes, and saw him calm and angered—

And see him now, in fancy, standing there—

Yet know not limb or feature!

Zippa. You but saw

A shadow, lady!

Isabella. Nay—I saw a soul!

His eyes were light with it. The forehead lay

Above their fires in calm tranquillity,

As the sky sleeps o'er thunder-clouds. His look

Was mixed of these—earnest, and yet subdued—

Gentle, yet passionate—sometimes half god-like

In its command, then mild and sweet again,

Like a stern angel taught humility!

Oh! when he spoke, my heart stole out to him!

There was a spirit-echo in his voice—

A sound of thought—of under-playing music—

As if, before it ceased in human ears,
The echo was caught up in fairy-land!
Zippa. Was he a courtier, madam?
Isabella. He's as lowly
In birth and fortunes, as your false one, Zippa!
Yet rich in genius, and of that ambition,
That he'll outlast nobility with fame.
Have you seen such a man?

Zippa. Alas! sweet lady!
My life is humble, and such wondrous men
Are far above my knowing. I could wish
To see one ere I died!

Isabella. You shall, believe me!
But while we talk of lovers, we forget
In how brief time you are to win a husband.
Come to my chamber, Zippa, and I'll see
How with your little net you'll snare a bird
Fierce as this rude Tortesa!

Zippa. We will find
A way, dear lady, if we die for it!
Isabella. Shall we? Come with me, then!
[Exeunt.]

SCENE III.

[An apartment in the Falcone Palace. Tortesa alone awaiting the return of the Count.]

Tortesa (musing). There are some luxuries too rich for purchase.

Your soul, 'tis said, will buy them, of the devil—Money's too poor! What would I not give, now,
That I could scorn what I can hate and ruin!
Scorn is the priceless luxury! In heaven,
The angel's pity. They are blessed to do so;
For, pitying, they look down. We do't by scorn!
There lies the privilege of noble birth!
The jewel of that bloated toad is scorn!
You may take all else from him. You—being mean—
May get his palaces—may wed his daughter—
Sleep in his bed—have all his peacock menials
Watching your least glance, as they did "my lord's;"
And, well-possessed thus, you may pass him by
On his own horse; and while the vulgar crowd
Gape at your trappings, and scarce look on him—
He, in his rags, and starving for a crust—
You'll feel his scorn, through twenty coats-of-mail,
Hot as a sun-stroke! Yet there's something for us!
Th' archangel fiend, when driven forth from heaven,
Put on the serpent, and found sweet revenge
Trailing his slime through Eden! So will I!

[Enter Falcone booted and spurred.]

Falcone. Good morrow, signor,
Tortesa. Well-arrived, my lord!
How sped your riding?

Falcone. Fairly! Has my daughter
Left you alone?

Tortesa. She knows that I am here.
Nay—she'll come presently! A word in private,
Since we're alone, my lord!

Falcone. I listen, signor!
Tortesa. Your honor, as I think, outweighs a bond?
Falcone. 'Twas never questioned.

Tortesa. On your simple word,
And such more weight as hangs upon the troth
Of a capricious woman, I gave up
A deed of lands to you.

Falcone. You did.
Tortesa. To be
Forfeit, and mine again—the match not made?

Falcone. How if you married it?
Tortesa. I? I'm not a boy!
What I would yesterday, I will to-day!

I'm not a lover—
Falcone. How, so near your bridal,
And not a lover? Shame, sir!

Tortesa. My lord count,
You take me for a fool!
Falcone. Is't like a fool
To love a high-born lady, and your bride?
Tortesa. Yes; a thrice-sodden fool—if it were I!
I'm not a mate for her—you know I am not!

You know, that, in her heart, your haughty daughter
Scorns me—ineffably!

Falcone. You seek occasion
To slight her, signor!

Tortesa. No! I'll marry her
If all the pride that cast down Lucifer
Lie in her bridal-ring! But, mark me still!
I'm not one of your humble citizens,
To bring my money-bags and make you rich—
That, when we walk together, I may take
Your shadow for my own! These limbs are clay—
Poor, common clay, my lord! And she that weds me,
Comes down to my estate.

Falcone. By this you mean not
To shut her from her friends?

Tortesa. You'll see your daughter
By coming to my house—not else! D'ye think
I'll have a carriage to convey my wife
Where she will hear me laughed at?—buy fine horses
To prance a measure to the mocking jeers
Of fools that ride with her? Nay—keep a table
Where I'm the skeleton that mars the feast?
No, no—no, no!

Falcone. (Aside—With half the provocation,
I would, ere now, have struck an emperor!
But baser pangs make this endurable.
I'm poor—so patience!) What was it beside
You would have said to me?

Tortesa. But this: Your daughter
Has, in your absence, covered me with scorn!
We'll not talk of it—if the match goes on,
I care not to remember it! (Aside—She shall—
And bitterly!)

Falcone. (Aside—My poor, poor Isabella!
The task was too much!)

Tortesa. There's a cost of feeling—
You may not think it much—I reckon it
A thousand pounds per day—in playing thus
The sutor to a lady crammed with pride!
I've writ you out a bond to pay me for it!
See here!—to pay me for my shame and pains,
If I should lose your daughter for a wife,
A thousand pounds per day—dog cheap at that!
Sign it, my lord, or give me back my deeds,
And traffic cease between us!

Falcone. Is this earnest,
Or are you mad or trifling? Do I not Give you my daughter with an open hand?
Are you betrothed, or no?

[Enter a Servant.]

Who's this?

Servant. A page
Sent from the duke.

Falcone. Admit him!

[Enter Page, with a letter.]

Page. For my lord,

The Count Falcone.
Tortesa. (Aside—In a moment more
I would have had a bond of such assurance
Her father on his knees should bid me take her.)

(Looking at Falcone, who smiles as he reads.)

What glads him now?

Falcone. You shall not have the bond!
Tortesa. No? (Aside—Here's a change! What hunt from duke or devil
Stirs him to this?) My lord, 'twere best the bridal Took place upon the instant. Is your daughter Ready within?

Falcone. You'll never wed my daughter!

[Enter Isabella.]

Tortesa. My lord!

Falcone. She's fittler mated! Here she comes!
My lofty Isabella! My fair child!
How dost thou, sweet?

Isabella (embracing him). Come home, and I not know it!

Art well? I see thou art! Hast ridden hard?
My dear, dear father!

Falcone. Give me breath to tell thee
Some better news, my loved one!

Isabella. Nay, the joy
To see you back again 's enough for now.
There can be no news better, and for this
Let's keep a holyday twixt this and sunset!
Shut up your letter and come see my flowers,
And hear my birds sing, will you?
Falcone. Look, my darling,
Upon this first! (Holds up the letter.)
Isabella. No! you shall tell me all
You and the duke did—where you slept, where ate,
Whether you dreamed of me—and, now I think on't,
Found you no wild-flowers as you crossed the mountain?
Falcone. My own bright child! (Looks fondly upon her.)

Tortesa. (Aside—'Twill mar your joy, my lord!
To see the glover's daughter in your palace,
And your proud daughter houseless!)

Falcone (to Isabella). You'll not hear
The news I have for you!

Tortesa (advancing). Before you tell it,
I'll take my own again!

Isabella. (Aside—Tortesa here! (courtesies.)
I crave your pardon, sir; I saw you not!
(Oh hateful monster!—Aside.)

Falcone. Listen to my news,
Signor Tortesa! It concerns you, trust me!

Isabella. (Aside—More of this hateful marriage!)

Tortesa. Tell it briefly,
My time is precious!

Falcone. Sir, I'll sum it up
In twenty words. The duke has information,
By what means yet I know not, that my need
Spurs me to marry an unwilling daughter.
He bars the match!—redeems my lands and palace,
And has enriched the young Count Julian,
For whom he bids me keep my daughter's hand!
Kind, royal master! (Reads the note to himself.)

Isabella. (Aside—Never!)

Tortesa. (Aside, with suppressed rage—'Tis a lie!
He's mad, or plays some trick to gain the time—
Or there's a woman hatching devilry!
We'll see.) (Looks at Isabella.)

Isabella. (Aside—I'll die first! Sold and taken back,
Then thrust upon a husband paid to take me!
To save my father I have weighed myself,
Heart, hand, and honor, against so much land!—
I—Isabella! I'm nor hawk nor hound,
And, if I change my master, I will choose him!

Tortesa. (Aside—She seems not over-pleased!)

Page. Your pardon, count!

I wait your answer to the duke!

Falcone. My daughter
Shall give it you herself. What sweet phrase have you,
Grateful and eloquent, to bear your thanks?
Speak, Isabella!

Isabella. (Aside—There's but one way left!
Courage, poor heart, and think on Angelo!)
(Advances suddenly to Tortesa.)

Signor Tortesa!

Tortesa. Madam!
Isabella. There's my hand!
Is't yours, or no?

Tortesa. There was a troth between us!
Isabella. Is't broke?

Tortesa. I have not broke it!
Isabella. Then why stand you

Mute as a statue, when 'tis struck asunder
Without our wish or knowledge? Would you be Half so indifferent had you lost a horse?

Am I worth having?

Tortesa. Is my life worth having?

Isabella. Then are you robbed! Look to it!

Falcone. Is she mad!

Tortesa. You'll marry me?

Isabella. I will!

Falcone. By Heaven, you shall not!

What, shall my daughter wed a leprosy—
A bloated money-canker? Leave her hand!
Stand from him, Isabella!

Isabella. Sir! you gave me
This "leper" for a husband, three days gone;

I did not ask my heart if I could love him!
I took him with the meekness of a child,
Trusting my father! I was shut up for him—
Forced to receive no other company—
My wedding-clothes made, and the match proclaimed Through Florence?

Falcone. Do you love him?—tell me quickly!

Isabella. You never asked me that when I was bid
To wed him!

Falcone. I am dumb!

Tortesa. Ha! ha! well put!
At him again, 'Bel! Well! I've had misgivings
That there was food in me for ladies' liking.
I've been too modest!

Isabella. (Aside—Monster of disgust!)

Falcone. My daughter! I would speak with you in private!

Signor! you'll pardon me.

Isabella. Go you, dear father!

I'll follow straight. [Exit Falcone.]

Tortesa. (Aside—She loiters for a kiss!
They're all alike! The same trick woos them all!)
Come to me, 'Bel!

Isabella (coldly). To-morrow at this hour
You'll find the priest here, and the bridesmaids waiting.
Till then, adieu! [Exit.]

Tortesa. Hola! what, gone? Why, 'Bella!
Sweetheart! I say! So! She would coy it with me!
Well, well, to-morrow! 'Tis not long, and kisses
Pay interest by seconds! There's a leg!
As she stood there, the calf showed handsomely.
Faith 'tis a shapely one! I wonder now,
Which of my points she finds most admirable!
Something I never thought on, like as not,
We do not see ourselves as others see us.
'Twould not surprise me now, if 'twere my beard—
My forehead! I've a hand indifferent white!
Nay, I've been told my waist was neatly turned.
We do not see ourselves as others see us!
How goes the hour? I'll home and fit my hose
To tie triun for the morrow. (Going out.) Hem! the door's

Lofty. I like that! I will have mine raised.
Your low door makes one stoop! [Exit]

ACT III.

SCENE I.

[Angelo discovered in his studio, painting upon the picture of Isabella.]

Angelo. My soul is drunk with gazing on this face,
I reel and faint with it. In what sweet world
Have I traced all its lineaments before?
I know them. Like a troop of long-lost friends,
My pencil wakes them with its eager touch,
And they spring up, rejoicing, oh, I'll gem
The heaven of Fame with my irradiate pictures,
Like kindling planets—but this glorious one
Shall be their herald, like the evening star,
First-lit, and lending of its fire to all.
The day fades—but the lamp burns on within me.
My bosom has no dark, no sleep, no change
To dream or calm oblivion. I work on
When my hand stops. The light tints fade. Good night,
Fair image of the fairest thing on earth,
Bright Isabella!

(Leans on the rod with which he guides his hand, and remains looking at his picture.)

[Enter Tomaso, with two bags of money.]

Tomaso. For the most excellent painter, Angelo, two hundred ducats! The genius of my master flashes upon me. The duke's greeting and two hundred ducats! If I should not have died in my blindness but for this eye-water, may I be hanged. (Looks at Angelo.) He is studying his picture. What an air there is about him—lofty, unlike the vulgar! Two hundred ducats! (Observes Angelo's hat on the table.) It strikes me now that I can see genius in that hat. It is not like a common hat. Not like a bought hat. The rim turns to the crown with an intelligence. (Weights the ducats in his hand.) Good heavy ducats. What it is to refresh the vision! I have looked round, ere now, in this very chamber, and fancied that the furniture expressed a melancholy dulness. When he hath talked to me of his pictures, I have seen the chairs smile. Nay, as if ashamed to listen, the very table has looked foolish. Now, all about me expresseth a choice peculiarity—as you would say, how like a genius to have such chairs! What a painter-like table! Two hundred ducats!

Angelo. What hast thou for supper?

Tomaso. Two hundred ducats, my great master!

Angelo (absently). A cup of wine! Wine, Tomaso!

[Sits down.]

Tomaso. (So would the great Donatello have sat upon his chair! His legs thus! His hand falling thus!) (Aloud.) There is naught in the cellar but stale beer, my illustrious master! (Now, it strikes me that his shadow is unlike another man's—of a pink tinge, somehow—yet that may be fancy.)

Angelo. Hast thou no money? Get wine, I say!

Tomaso. I saw the duke in the market place, who called me Angelo (we shall rue that trick yet), and with a gracious smile asked me if thou hadst paid the twenty flasks.

Angelo (not listening). Is there no wine?

Tomaso. I said to his grace, no! Pray mark the sequel; In pity of my thirst, the duke scolded me two—ahem!—one hundred ducats. Here they are!

Angelo. Didst thou say the wine was on the lees?

Tomaso. With these fifty ducats we shall buy nothing but wine. (He will be rich with fifty.)

Angelo. What saidst thou?

Tomaso. I spoke of twenty ducats sent thee by the duke. Will thou finger them ere one is spent?

Angelo. I asked thee for wine—I am parched.

Tomaso. Of these ten ducats, thinkst thou we might spend one for a flask of better quality?

Angelo. Lend me a ducat, if thou hast one, and buy wine presently. Go!

Tomaso. I'll lend it thee, willingly, my illustrious master. It is my last, but as much mine as thine.

Angelo. Go! Go!

Tomaso. Yet wait! There's a scrap of news. Falcone's daughter marries Tortesa, the usurer? To-morrow is the bridal.

Angelo. How?

Tomaso. I learned it in the market-place! There will be rare doings!

Angelo. Dog! Villain! Thou hast lied! Thou dar'st not say it!

Tomaso. Hey! Art thou mad? Nay—borrow thy ducat where thou canst! I'll spend that's my own. Adieu, master!

(Exit Tomaso, and enter Tortesa with a complacent smile.)

Angelo. Ha!—well arrived! [Draws his sword.]

Tortesa. Good eve, good Signor Painter.

Angelo. You struck me yesterday.

Tortesa. I harmed your picture—

For which I'm truly sorry—but not you!

Angelo. Myself! myself! My picture is myself!

What are my bones that rot? Is this my hand?

Is this my eye?

Tortesa. I think so.

Angelo. No, I say!

The hand and eye of Angelo are there!

There—there—(Points to his pictures)—immortal!

Wound me in the flesh,

I will forgive you upon fair excuse.

'Tis the earth round me—'tis my shell—my house;

But in my picture lie my brain and heart—

My soul—my fancy. For a blow at these

There's no cold reparation. Draw, and quickly!

I'm in the mood to fight it to the death.

Stand on your guard!

Tortesa. I will not fight with you.

Angelo. Coward!

Tortesa. I'm deaf.

Angelo. Feel then!

(Tortesa catches the blow as he strikes him, and coldly flings back his hand.)

Tortesa. Nay, strike me not!

I'll call the guard, and cry out like a woman.

Angelo (turning from him contemptuously).

What scent of dog's meat brought me such a cur!

It is a whip I want, and not a sword.

Tortesa (folding his arms). I have a use for life so far above

The stake you quarrel for, that you may choose Your words to please yourself. They'll please me, too. Yet you're in luck. I killed a man on Monday

For spitting on my shadow. Thursday's sun

Will dry the insult, though it light on me!

Angelo. Oh, subtle coward!

Tortesa. I am what you will,

So I'm alive to marry on the morrow!

'Tis well, by Jupiter! Shall you have power

With half a breath to pluck from me a wife!

Shall I, against a life as poor as yours—

Mine being precious as the keys of heaven—

Set all upon a throw, and no odds neither?

I know what honor is as well as you!

I know the weight and measure of an insult—

What it is worth to take or fling it back.

I have the hand to fight if I've a mind;

And I've a heart to shut my sunshine in,

And lock it from the scowling of the world,

Though all mankind cry "Coward!"

Angelo. Mouthing braggart!

Tortesa. I came to see my bride, my Isabella!

Show me her picture! (Advances to look for it.)

Angelo. Do but look upon't,

By heaven's fair light, I'll kill you! [Draws.]

Tortesa. Soft, she's mine!

She loves me! and with that to make life precious,

I have the nerve to beat back Hercules,

If you were he!

Angelo (attacking him). Out! Out! thou shameless liar!

Tortesa (retreating on the defence).

Thy blows and words fall pointless! Nay thou'rt mad!

But I'll not harm thee for her picture's sake!

Angelo. Liar! she hates thee!

(Beats him off the stage and returns, closing the door violently.)

So! once more alone!

(Takes Isabella's picture from the easel, and replaces it with Zippa's.)

Back to the wall, deceitful loveliness!

And come forth, Zippa, fair in honest truth!

I'll make thee beautiful!

(Takes his pencil and palette to paint.)

[A knock is heard.]

Who knocks! come in!

[Enter Isabella, disguised as a monk.]

Isabella. Good morning, signor!

Angelo (turning sharply to the monk). There's a face, old monk,

Might stir your blood—ha? You shall tell me, now,

Which of these heavenly features hides the soul!

There is one! I have worked upon the picture

Till my brain's thick—I can not see like you.

Where is't?

Isabella. (Aside—A picture of the glover's daughter!

What does he, painting her!?) Is't for its beauty

You paint that face, sir?

Angelo. Yes—the immortal beauty!

Look here! What see you in that face? The skin—

Isabella. Brown as a vintage-girl's!

Angelo. The mouth—

Isabella. A good one

To eat and drink withal!

Angelo. The eye is—

Isabella. Grey!

You'll buy a hundred like it for a penny!

Angelo. A hundred eyes?

Isabella. No. Hazel-nuts!

Angelo. The forehead—

How find you that?

Isabella. Why, made to match the rest!

I'll cut as good a face out of an apple—

For all that's fair in it!

Angelo. Oh, Heaven, how dim
Were God's most blessed image did all eyes
Look on't like thine! Is't by the red and white—
Is't by the grain and tincture of the skin—
Is't by the hair's gloss, or the forehead's arching,
You know the bright inhabitant? I tell thee
The spark of their divinity in some
Lights up an inward face—so radiant,
The outward lineaments are like a veil
Floating before the sanctuary—forgot
In glimpses of the glory streaming through!

Isabella (mournfully). Is Zippa's face so radiant?

Angelo. Look upon it!
You see thro' all the countenance she's true!

Isabella. True to you, signor!

Angelo. To herself, old man!

Yet once, to me too! (Dejectedly.)

Isabella. (Aside).—Once to him! Can Zippa
Have dared to love a man like Angelo!
I think she dare not. Yet if he, indeed,
Were the inconstant lover that she told of—
The youth who was "her neighbor!" Please you, signor!

Was that fair maid your neighbor?

Angelo. Ay—the best!

A loving sister were not half so kind!

I never supped without her company.

Yet she was modest as an unsunned lily,

And bounteous as the constant perfume of it.

Isabella. (Aside).—'Twas he, indeed! Oh! what a fair outside

Has falsehood there! Yet stay! If it were I
Who made him false to her? Alas, for honor,
I must forgive him—tho' my lips are weary
With telling Zippa how I thought him perjured!
I can not trust her more—I'll plot alone!

(Turns, and takes her own picture from the wall.)

Isabella. What picture's this, turned to the wall, good signor?

Angelo. A painted lie!

Isabella. A lie!—nay—pardon me!

I spoke in haste. Methought 'twas like a lady

I'd somewhere seen!—a lady—Isabella!

But she was true!

Angelo. Then 'tis not she I've drawn.

For that's a likeness of as false a face

As ever devil did his mischief under.

Isabella. And yet methinks 'tis done most lovingly!

You must have thought it fair to dwell so on it.

Angelo. Your convent has the picture of a saint Tempted, while praying, by the shape of woman.

The painter knew that woman was the devil,

Yet drew her like an angel!

Isabella. (Aside).—It is true

He praised my beauty as a painter may—

No more—in words. He praised me as he drew

Feature by feature. But who calls the lip

To answer for a perjured oath in love?

How should love breathe—how not die, choked for utterance,

If words were all. He loved me with his eyes.

He breathed it. Upon every word he spoke

Hung an unuttered worship that his tongue

Would spend a life to make articulate.

Did he not take my hand into his own?

And, as his heart sprang o'er that bridge of veins,

Did he not call to mine to pass him on it—

Each to the other's bosom! I have sworn

To love him—wed him—die with him—and yet

He never heard me—but he knows it well,

And, in his heart holds me to answer for it.

I'll try once more to find this anger out.

If it be jealousy—why—then, indeed,

He'll call me black, and I'll forgive it him!

For then my errand's done, and I'll away

To play the cheat out that shall make him mine.)

(Turns to Angelo.) Fair signor, by your leave, I've heard it said

That in the beauty of a human face

The God of Nature never writ a lie.

Angelo. 'Tis likely true!

Isabella. That howsoever the features
Seem fair at first, a blemish on the soul
Has its betraying speck that warns you of it.

Angelo. It should be so, indeed!

Isabella. Nay—here's a face

Will show at once if it be true or no.

At the first glance 'tis fair!

Angelo. Most heavenly fair!

Isabella. Yet, in the lip, methinks, there lurks a shadow—

Something—I know not what—but in it lies

The devil you spoke of!

Angelo. Ay—but 'tis not there!

Not in her lip! Oh, no! Look elsewhere for it,

'Tis passionately bright—but lip more pure

Ne'er passed unchallenged through the gate of heaven.

Believe me, 'tis not there!

Isabella. How falls the light?

I see a gleam not quite angelical

About the eye. Maybe the light falls wrong—

Angelo (drawing her to another position).

Stand here! Dy'e see it now?

Isabella. 'Tis just so here!

Angelo (sweeps the air with his brush).

There's some curst cobweb hanging from the wall

That blurs your sight. Now, look again!

Isabella. I see it

Just as before.

Angelo. What! still! You've turned an eyelash

Under the lid. Try how it feels with winking.

Is't clear?

Isabella. 'Twas never clearer!

Angelo. Then, old man!

You'd best betake you to your prayers apace!

For you've a failing sight, death's sure forerunner—

And can not pray long. Why, that eye's a star,

Sky-lit as Hesperus, and burns as clear.

If you e'er marked the zenith at high noon,

Or midnight, when the blue lifts up to God—

Her eye's of that far darkness!

Isabella (smiling aside). Stay—'tis gone!

A blur was on my sight, which passing from it,

I see as you do. Yes—the eye is clear.

The forehead only, now I see so well,

Has in its arch a mark infallible

Of a false heart beneath it.

Angelo. Show it to me!

Isabella. Between the eyebrows there!

Angelo. I see a tablet

Whereon the Savior's finger might have writ

The new commandment. When I painted it

I plucked a just-blown lotus from the shade,

And shamed the white leaf till it seemed a spot—

The brow was so much fairer! Go! old man,

Thy sight fails fast. Go! go!

Isabella. The nostril's small—

Is't not?

Angelo. No!

Isabella. Then the cheek's awry so near it,

It makes it seem so!

Angelo. Out! thou cavilling fool!

Thou'rt one of those whose own deformity

Makes all thou seest look monstrous. Go and pray

For a clear sight, and read thy missal with it.

Thou art a priest, and livest by the altar,

Yet dost thou recognise God's imprest seal,

Set on that glorious beauty!

Isabella. (Aside).—Oh, he loves me!

Loves me as genius loves—ransacking earth

And ruffling the forbidden flowers of Heaven

To make celestial incense of his praise.

High-thoughted Angelo! He loves we well!

With what a gnash of all my soul I thank him—

But he's to win yet, and the time is precious.)

(To Angelo.) Signor, I take my leave.

Angelo. Good day, old man!

And, if thou com'st again, bring new eyes with thee,

Or thou wilt find scant welcome.

Isabella. You shall like

These same eyes well enough when next I come!

[Exit.]

Angelo. A crabbed monk! (Turns the picture to the wall again.) I'll hide this fatal picture from sight once more, for till he made me look on't I did not know my weakness. Once more, Zippa, I'll dwell on thy dear face, and with my pencil Make thee more fair than life, and try to love thee!

(A knock.)

Come in!

[Enter Zippa.]

Zippa. Good day, Signor Angelo!

Angelo. Why, Zippa! is't thou? is't thou, indeed!

Zippa. Myself, dear Angelo!

Angelo. Art well?

Zippa. Ay!

Angelo. Hast been well!

Zippa. Ay!

Angelo. Then why, for three long days, hast thou not been near me?

Zippa. Ask thyself, Signor Angelo!

Angelo. I have—a hundred times since I saw thee.

Zippa. And there was no answer?

Angelo. None!

Zippa. Then shouldst thou have asked the picture on thy easel!

Angelo. Nay—I understand thee not.

Zippa. Did I not find thee feasting thy eyes upon it?

Angelo. True—thou didst?

Zippa. And art thou not enamored of it—wilt tell me truly?

Angelo (smiling). 'Tis a fair face!

Zippa. Oh, unkind Angelo!

Angelo. Look on't! and, seeing its beauty, if thou dost not forgive me, I will never touch pencil to it more.

Zippa. I'll neither look on't, nor forgive thee. But if thou wilt love the picture of another better than mine, thou shalt paint a new one!

(As she rushes up to dash it from the easel, Angelo catches her arm, and points to the picture. She looks at it, and, seeing her own portrait, turns and falls on his bosom.)

My picture! and I thought thee so false! Dear, dear Angelo! I could be grieved to have wronged thee, if joy would give me time. But thou'lt forgive me?

Angelo. Willingly! Willingly!

Zippa. And thou lovest me indeed, indeed! Nay, answer not! I will never doubt thee more! Dear Angelo!

Yet—(Suddenly turns from Angelo with a troubled air.)

Angelo. What ails thee now?

(Zippa takes a rich veil from under her cloak, throws it over her head, and looks on the ground in embarrassed silence.)

Dost thou stand there for a picture of Silence?

Zippa. Alas! dear Angelo! When I said I forgave and loved thee, I forgot that I was to be married to-morrow!

Angelo. Married! to whom?

Zippa. Tortesa, the usurer!

Angelo. Tortesa, saidst thou?

Zippa. Think not ill of me, dear Angelo, till I have told thee all! This rich usurer, as thou knowest, would for ambition marry Isabella de Falcone.

Angelo. He would, I know.

Zippa. But for love, he would marry your poor Zippa.

Angelo. Know you that?

Zippa. He told me so the day you angered me with the praises of the court lady you were painting. What was her name, Angelo?

Angelo (composedly). I—I'll tell thee presently! Go on!

Zippa. Well—jealous of this unknown lady, I vowed, if it broke my heart, to wed Tortesa. He had told me Isabella scorned him. I flew to her palace. She heard me, pitied me, agreed to plot with me that I might wed the usurer, and then told me in confidence that there was a poor youth whom she loved and would fain marry.

Angelo (in breathless anxiety). Heard you his name?

Zippa. No! But as I was to wed the richer and she the poorer, she took my poor veil, and gave me her rich one. Now canst thou read the riddle?

Angelo. (Aside)—A "poor youth!" What if it is I? he "loves and will wed him!" Oh! if it were I!

Zippa. Nay, dear Angelo! he not so angry! I do not love him! Nay—thou know'st I do not!

Angelo. (Aside)—It may be—nay—it must! But I will know! If not, I may as well die of that as of this jealous madness.)

(Prepares to go out.)

Zippa. Angelo! where go you? Forgive me, dear Angelo! I swear to thee I love him not!

Angelo. I'll know who that poor youth is, or suspense will kill me!

(Goes out hastily, without a look at Zippa. She stands silent and amazed for a moment.)

Zippa. Why cares he to know who that poor youth is! "Suspense will kill him?" Stay! a light breaks on me! If Isabella were the court lady whom he painted! If it were Angelo whom she loved! He is a poor youth!—The picture! The picture will tell all!

(Hurriedly turns round several pictures turned to the wall, and last of all, Isabella's. Looks at it an instant, and exclaims—)

Isabella!

(She drops on her knees, overcome with grief, and the scene closes.)

SCENE II.

[A Lady's dressing-room in the Falcone Palace. Isabella discovered with two vials.]

Isabella. Here is a draught will still the breath so nearly,

The keenest-eyed will think the sleeper dead,—

And this kills quite. Lie ready, trusty friends,

Close by my bridal veil! I thought to baffle

My ruffian bridegroom by an easier cheat;

But Zippa's dangerous, and if I fail

In mocking death, why death indeed be welcome!

(Enter Zippa angrily.)

Zippa. Madam!

Isabella. You come rudely!

Zippa. If I offend you more, I still have cause—

Yet as the "friend" to whom you gave a husband,

(So kind you were!) I might come unannounced!

Isabella. What is this anger?

Zippa. I'm not angry, madam!

Oh no! I'm patient!

Isabella. What's your errand, then?

Zippa. To give you back your costly bridal veil,

And take my mean one.

Isabella. 'Twas your wish to change.

'Twas you that plotted we should wed together—

You in my place, and I in yours—was't not?

Zippa. Oh, Heaven! you're calm! Had you no plotting, too?

You're noble born, and so your face is marble—

I'm poor, and if my heart aches, 'twill show through.

You've robbed me, madam!

Isabella. I?

Zippa. Of gold—of jewels!—

Gold that would stretch the fancy but to dream of,

And gems like stars!

Isabella. You're mad!

Zippa. His love was worth them!

Oh, what had you to do with Angelo?

Isabella. Nay—came you not to wed Tortesa freely?

What should you do with Angelo?

Zippa. You mock me!

You are a woman though your brow's a rock,

And know what love is. In a ring of fire

The tortured scorpion stings himself, to die—

But love will turn upon itself, and grow

Of its own fang immortal!

Isabella. Still, you left him

To wed another?

Zippa. 'Tis for that he's mine!

What makes a right in anything, but pain?

The diver's agony beneath the sea

Makes the peril his—pain gets the miser's gold—

The noble's coronet won first in battle,

Is his by bleeding forth—and Angelo

Is ten times mine because I gave him up—

Crushing my heart to do so!

Isabella. Now you plead
Against yourself. Say it would kill me quite,
If you should wed him? Mine's the greater pain,
And so the fairer title!

Zippa (falling on her knees). I implore you Love him no more! Upon my knees I do!
He's not like you! Look on your snow-white arms!
They're formed to press a noble to your breast—
Not Angelo! He's poor—and fit for mine!
You would not lift a beggar to your lips!—
You would not lean from your proud palace-stairs
To pluck away a heart from a poor girl
Who has no more on earth!

Isabella. I will not answer!

Zippa. Think what it is! Love is to you like music—

Pastime! You think on't when the dance is over—
When there's no revel—when your hair's unbound,
And its bright jewels with the daylight pale—
You want a lover to press on the hours
That lag till night again! But I—

Isabella. Stop there!

I love him better than you've soul to dream of!

Zippa (rising). 'Tis false! How can you? He's to you a lamp

That shines amid a thousand just as bright!
What's one amid your crowd of worshippers?
The glow-worm's bright—but oh! 'tis wanton murder
To raise him to the giddy air you breathe,
And leave his mate in darkness!

Isabella. Say the worm

Soar from the earth on his own wing—what then?

Zippa. Fair reasons can not stay the heart from breaking.

You've stolen my life, and you can give it back!

Will you—for Heaven's sweet pity?

Isabella. Leave my presence!

(Aside—I pity her—but on this fatal love Hangs my life, too.) What right have such as you
To look with eyes of love on Angelo?

Zippa. What right?

Isabella. I say so. Where's the miracle

Has made you fit to climb into the sky—

A moth—and look with love upon a star!

Zippa (mournfully). I'm lowly born, alas!

Isabella. Your soul's low born!

Forget your anger and come near me, Zippa,
For e'er I'm done you'll wonder! Have you ever,
When Angelo was silent, marked his eye—
How, of a sudden, as 'twere touched with fire,
There glows unnatural light beneath the lid?

Zippa. I have—I've thought it strange!

Isabella. Have you walked with him

When he has turned his head, as if to list

To music in the air—but you heard none—

And presently a smile stole through his lips,

And some low words, inaudible to you,

Fell from him brokenly.

Zippa. Ay—many times!

Isabella. Tell me once more! Hast never heard him speak

With voice unlike his own—so melancholy,

And yet so sweet a voice, that, were it only

The inarticulate moaning of a bird,

The very tone of it had made you weep?

Zippa. 'Tis strangely true, indeed!

Isabella. Oh, Heaven! You say so—

Yet never dreamt it was a spirit of light

Familiar with you!

Zippa. How?

Isabella. Why, there are seraphs

Who walk this common world, and want, as we do—

Here, in our streets—all seraph, save in wings—

The look, the speech, the forehead like a god—

And he the brightest!

Zippa (incredulously). Nay—I've known him long!

Isabella. Why, listen! There are worlds, thou doubting fool!

Farther to flee to than the stars in heaven,

Which Angelo can walk as we do this—

And does—while you look on him!

Zippa. Angelo!

Isabella. He's never at your side one constant minute
Without a thousand messengers from thence!
(O block! to live with him, and never dream on't!)
He plucks the sun's rays open like a thread,
And knows what stains the rose and not the lily—
He never sees a flower but he can tell
Its errand on the earth—(they all have errands—
You know not that, oh dulness!) He sees shapes
Flushed with immortal beauty in the clouds—
(You've seen him mock a thousand on his canvass,
And never wondered!) Yet you talk of love!
What love you?

Zippa. Angelo—and not a dream!

Take you the dream and give me Angelo!

You may talk of him till my brain is giddy—

But oh, you can not praise him out of reach

Of my true heart.—He's here, as low as I!

Shall he not wed a woman, flesh and blood?

Isabella. See here! There was a small, earth-creeping mole,

Born by the low nest of an unfledged lark.

They lived an April youth amid the grass—

The soft mole happy, and the lark no less,

And thought the bent sky leaned upon the flowers.

By early May the fledgling got his wings;

And, eager for the light, one breezy dawn,

Sprang from his nest, and buoyantly away,

Fled forth to meet the morning. Newly born

Seemed the young lark, as in another world

Of light, and song, and creatures like himself,

He soared and dropped, and sang unto the sun,

And pitied everything that had not wings—

But most the mole, that wanted even eyes

To see the light he floated in!

Zippa. Yet still

She watched his nest, and fed him when he came—

Would it were Angelo and I indeed!

Isabella. Nay, mark! The bird grew lonely in the sky.

There was no echo at the height he flew!

And when the mist lay heavy on his wings

His song broke, and his flights were brief and low—

And the dull mole, that should have sorrowed with him,

Joyed that he sang at last where she could hear!

Zippa. Why, happy mole again!

Isabella. Not long!—for soon

He found a mate that loved him for his wings!

One who with feeble flight, but eyes still on him,

Caught up his dropped song in the middle air,

And, with the echo, cheered him to the sun!

Zippa. (Aside—I see! I see! His soul was never mine!

I was the blind mole of her hateful story!

No, no! he never loved me! True, we ate,

And laughed, and danced together—but no love—

He never told his thought when he was sad!

His folly and his idleness were mine—

No more! The rest was locked up in his soul!

I feel my heart grow black!) Fair madam, thank you!

You've told me news! (She shall not have him neither,

If there's a plot in hate to keep him from her!

I must have room to think, and air to breathe—

I choke here!) Madam, the blind mole takes leave!

Isabella. Farewell! [Exit Zippa.

(Takes the vial from the table.)

And now, come forth, sweet comforter!

I'll to my chamber with this drowsy poison,

And from my sleep I wake up Angelo's,

Or wake no more! [Exit.

ACT IV.

SCENE I.

[A sumptuous Drawing-room in the Falcone Palace. Guests assembled for the bridal. Lords and ladies promenading, and a band of musicians in a gallery at the side of the stage.]

1st Lord. Are we before the hour? or does the bridegroom

Affect this tardiness?

2d Lord. We're bid at twelve.
 1st Lord. 'Tis now past one. At least we should have music
 To wile the time. (To the musicians.) Strike up, good fellows!
 2d Lord. Why,
 A man who's only drest on holidays
 Makes a long toilet. Now, I'll warrant he Has vexed his tailor since the break of day
 Hoping to look a gentleman. D'ye know him?
 1st Lord. I've never had occasion!
 2d Lord. Poor Falcone!
 He'd give the best blood in his veins, I think,
 To say as much!
 1st Lord. How's this! I see no stir
 Among the instruments. Will they not play?
 2d Lord. Not they! I asked before you, and they're bid
 To strike up when they hear Tortesa's horses
 Prance thro' the gateway—not a note till then!

(Music plays.)

1st Lord. He comes!
 (Enter Tortesa, dressed over-richly.)
 Tortesa. Good day, my lords!
 1st Lord. Good day!
 2d Lord. The sky
 Smiles on you, signor! 'Tis a happy omen
 They say, to wed in sunshine.
 Tortesa. Why, I think
 The sun is not displeased that I should wed.
 1st Lord. We're happy, sir, to have you one of us.
 Tortesa. What have I been till now! I was a man
 Before I saw your faces! Where's the change?
 Have I a tail since? Am I grown a monkey?
 (Lords whisper together, and walk from him.)
 Oh for a mint to coin the world again
 And melt the mark of gentleman from clowns!
 It puts me out of patience! Here's a fellow
 That by much rubbing against better men,
 Has, like a penny in a Jew's close pocket,
 Stolen the color of a worthier coin,
 And thinks he rings like sterling courtesy!
 Yet look! he can not phrase you a good morrow,
 Or say he's sad, or glad, at anything,
 But close beneath it, rank as verdigris,
 Lies an insulting rudeness! He was "happy"
 That I should now be one of them. Now! Now!
 As if, till now, I'd been a dunghill grub,
 And was but just turned butterfly!

(A Lady advances.)

Lady. Fair sir,
 I must take leave to say, were you my brother,
 You've made the choice that would have pleased me best!
 Your bride's as good as fair.

Tortesa. I thank you, madam!
 To be your friend, she should be—good and fair!
 (The Lady turns, and walks up the stage.)

How like a drop of oil upon the sea
 Falls the apt word of woman! So! her "brother!"
 Why, there could be no contumely there!
 I might, for all I look, have been her brother,
 Else her first thought had never coupled us.
 I'll pluck some self-contentment out of that!

(Enter suddenly the count's secretary.)

How now!
 Secretary. I'm sent, sir, with unwelcome tidings.
 Tortesa. Deliver them the quicker!

Secretary. I shall be Too sudden at the slowest.
 Tortesa. Pshaw! what is it?

I'm not a girl! Out with your news at once!
 Are my ships lost?

Secretary (hesitatingly). The lady Isabella—Tortesa. What? run away!

Secretary. Alas, good sir! she's dead!
 Tortesa. Bah! just as dead as I! Why, thou dull blockhead!

Can not a lady faint, but there must be
 A trumpeter like thee to make a tale on't?

Secretary. Pardon me, signor, but—
 Tortesa. Who sent you hither?
 Secretary. My lord the count.
 Tortesa (turning quickly aside). He put it in the bond,
 That if by any humor of my own,
 Or accident that sprang not from himself,
 Or from his daughter's will, the match were marred,
 His tenure stood intact. If she were dead—
 I don't believe she is—but if she were,
 By one of those strange chances that do happen
 If she were dead, I say, the silly fish
 That swims with safety among hungry sharks
 To run upon the pin-hook of a boy,
 Might teach me wisdom!

(The secretary comes forward, narrating eagerly to the company.)

Now, what says this jackdaw?
 Secretary. She had refused to let her bridesmaids in—
 Lady. And died alone?

Secretary. A trusty serving maid
 Was with her, and none else. She dropped away,
 The girl said, in a kind of weary sleep.

1st Lord. Was no one told of it?
 Secretary. The girl watched by her,
 And thought she slept still; till, the music sounding,
 She shook her by the sleeve, but got no answer;
 And so the truth broke on her!

Tortesa. (Aside—Oh indeed!
 The plot is something shallow!)

2d Lord. Might we go
 And see her as she lies!

Secretary. The holy father
 Who should have married her, has checked all comers,
 And staying for no shroud but bridal dress,
 He bears her presently to lie in state
 In the Falcone chapel.

Tortesa. (Aside—Worse and worse—
 They take me for a fool!)

1st Lord. But why such haste?

Secretary. I know not. Let us to the chapel!

Tortesa. (Drawing his sword, and stepping between them and the door.)

Hold!

Let no one try to pass!

1st Lord. What mean you, sir!
 Tortesa. To keep you here till you have got your story
 Pat to the tongue—the truth on't and no more!
 Lady. Have you a doubt the bride is dead, good signor?

Tortesa. A palace, see you, has a tricky air!
 When I am told a tradesman's daughter's dead,
 I know the coffin holds an honest corpse,
 Sped in sad earnest, to eternity.
 But were I stranger in the streets to-day,
 And heard that an ambitious usurer,
 With lands and money having bought a lady
 High-born and fair, she died before the bridal,
 I would lay odds with him that told me of it
 She'd rise again—before the resurrection.
 So stand back all! If I'm to fill to-day
 The pricking ears of Florence with a lie,
 The bridal guests shall tell the tale so truly,
 And mournfully, from eyesight of the corpse,
 That even the shrewdest listener shall believe,
 And I myself have no misgiving of it.
 Look! where they come!

(Door opens to funeral music, and the body of Isabella is borne in, preceded by a monk, and followed by Falcone and mourners. Tortesa confronts the Monk.)

What's this you bear away?

Monk. Follow the funeral, but stay it not.

Tortesa. If thereon lie the lady Isabella,
 I ask to see her face before she pass!

Monk. Stand from the way, my son, it can not be!

Tortesa. What right have you to take me for a stone?
 See what you do! I stand a bridegroom here.
 A moment since the joyous music playing
 Which promised me a fair and blushing bride.

The flowers are fragrant, and the guests made welcome;
And while my heart beats at the opening door,
And eagerly I look to see her come,—
There enters in her stead a covered corse!
And when I ask to look upon her face—
One look before my bride is gone for ever,—
You find it in your hearts to say me nay!—
Shame! Shame!

Falcone (fiercely). Lead on!

Tortesa. My lord, by covenant—

By contract writ and sealed—by value rendered—
By her own promise—nay, by all, save taking,
This body's mine! I'll have it set down here
And wait my pleasure! See it done, my lord,
Or I will, for you!

Monks (to the bearers). Set the body down!

Tortesa (takes the veil from the face).

Come hither all! Nay, father, look not black!
If o'er the azure temper of this blade
There come no mist, when laid upon her lips,
I'll do a penance for irreverence,
And fill your sack with penitential gold!
Look well!

(Puts his sword blade to Isabella's lips, and after watching it with intense interest a moment, drops on his knees beside the bier.)

She's dead indeed! Lead on!

[The procession starts again to funereal music, and Tortesa follows last.]

SCENE II.

[A Street in Florence. The funereal music dying away in the distance. Enter Zippa, straining her eyes to look after it.]

Zippa. 'Tis Angelo that follows close behind,
Laying his forehead almost on her bier!
His heart goes with her to the grave! Oh Heaven!
Will not Tortesa pluck out of his hand
The tassel of that pall?

(She hears a footstep.)

Stay, stay, he's here!

(Enter Tortesa, musing. Zippa stands aside.)

Tortesa. I've learned to-day a lord may be a Jew,
I've learned to-day that grief may kill a lady;
Which touches me the most I can not say,
For I could fight Falcone for my loss,
Or weep, with all my soul, for Isabella.

(Zippa touches him on the shoulder.)

Zippa. How is't the signor follows not his bride?

Tortesa. I did—but with their melancholy step
I fell to musing, and so dropped behind—
But here's a sight I have not seen to-day!

(Takes her hand smilingly.)

Zippa. What's that?

Tortesa. A friendly face, my honest Zippa!
Art well? What errand brings thee forth?

Zippa. None, signor!

But passing by the funeral, I stopped,
Wondering to see the bridegroom lag behind,
And give his sacred station next the corse
To an obtrusive stranger.

Tortesa. Which is he?

Zippa (points after Angelo). Look there!

Tortesa. His face is buried in his cloak.
Who is't?

Zippa. Not know him? Had I half the cause
That you have, to see through that mumming cloak
The shadow of it would speak out his name!

Tortesa. What mean you?

Zippa. Angelo! What right has he
To weep in public at her funeral?

Tortesa. The painter?

Zippa. Ay—the peasant Angelo!
Was't not enough to dare to love her living,
But he must fling the insult of his tears
Betwixt her corse and you? Are you not moved?
Will you not go and pluck him from your place?

Tortesa. No, Zippa! for my spirits are more apt
To grief than anger. I've in this half hour
Remembered much I should have thought on sooner,—
For, had I known her heart was capable
Of breaking for the love of one so low,
I would have done as much to make her his
As I have done, in hate, to make her mine.
She loved him, Zippa! (Walks back in thought.)

Zippa. (Aside—Oh to find a way
To pluck that fatal beauty from his eyes!
'Tis twilight, and the lamp is lit above her,
And Angelo will watch the night out there,
Gazing with passionate worship on her face.
But no! he shall not!)

Tortesa (advancing). Come! what busy thought
Vexes your brain now?

Zippa. Were your pride as quick

As other men's to see an insult, signor!
I had been spared the telling of my thought.

Tortesa. You put it sharply!

Zippa. Listen! you are willing
That there should follow, in your place of mourner,
A youth, who, by the passion of his grief,
Shows to the world he's more bereaved than you!

Tortesa. Humpf! well!

Zippa. Still follows he without rebuke;
And in the chapel where she lies to-night,
Her features bared to the funereal lamp,
He'll, like a mourning bridegroom, keep his vigil,
As if all Florence knew she was his own.

Tortesa. Nay, nay! he may keep vigil if he will!

The door is never locked upon the dead
Till bell and mass consign them to the tomb;
And custom gives the privilege to all
To enter in and pray—and so may he.

Zippa. Then learn a secret which I fain had spared
My lips the telling. Question me not now,
But I have chanced to learn, that Angelo,
To-night, will steal the body from its bier!

Tortesa. To-night! What! Angelo! Nay, nay, good

Zippa!

If he's enamored of the corse, 'tis there—
And he may watch it till its shape decay,
And holy church will call it piety.
But he who steals from consecrated ground,
Dies, by the law of Florence. There's no end
To answer in't.

Zippa. You know not, Angelo!
You think not with what wild, delirious passion
A painter thirsts to tear the veil from beauty.
He painted Isabella as a maid,
Coy as a lily turning from the sun.

Now she is dead, and, like a star that flew
Flashing and hiding thro' some fleecy rack,
But suddenly sits still in cloudless heavens,
She slumbers fearless in his steadfast gaze,
Peerless and unforbidding. O, to him
She is no more your bride! A statue fairer
Than ever rose enchanted from the stone,
Lies in that dim-lit chapel, clad like life.
Are you too slow to take my meaning yet?
He can not loose the silken boddice there!
He can not, there, upon the marble breast
Shower the dark locks from the golden comb!

Tortesa. Hold!

Zippa. Are you moved? Has he no end to compass
In stealing her away from holy ground?
Will you not lock your bride up from his touch?

Tortesa. No more! no more! I thought not of all this!
Perchance it is not true. But twilight falls,

And I will home to doff this bridal gear,
And, after, set a guard upon the corse.
We'll walk together. Come!

Zippa. (Aside—He shall not see her!)

[Exit]

SCENE III.

[A Street in front of the Falcone Palace. Night. Enter Isabella in her white bridal dress. She falters to her father's door, and drops exhausted.]

Isabella. My brain swims round! I'll rest a little here!

The night's cold, chilly cold! Would I could reach
The house of Angelo! Alas! I thought
He would have kept one night of vigil near me,
Thinking me dead. Bear up, good heart! Alas!
I faint! Where am I? (Looks around.)

'Tis my father's door.
My undirected feet have brought me home—
And I must in, or die! (Knocks with a painful effort.)
So ends my dream!

Falcone (from above).

Who's that would enter to a mourning house?

Isabella. Your daughter!

Falcone. Ha! what voice is that I hear?

Isabella. Poor Isabella's.

Falcone.

Art thou come to tell me,
That with unnatural heart I killed my daughter?
Just Heaven! thy retribution follows fast!
But oh, if holy and unnumbered masses
Can give thee rest, perturbed and restless spirit!
Haunt thou a weeping penitent no more!
Depart! I'll in, and pass the night in prayer!
So shalt thou rest! Depart!

(He closes the window, and Isabella drops with her forehead to the marble stair.)

(Enter Tomaso, with a bottle in his hand.)

Tomaso. It's like the day after the deluge. Few stirring and nobody dry. I've been since twilight looking for somebody that would drink. Not a beggar athirst in all Florence! I thought that, with a bottle in my hand, I should be scented like a wild boar. I expected drunkards would have come up out of the ground—like worms in a shower. When was I ever so difficult to find by a moist friend? Two hundred ducats in good wine and no companion! I'll look me up a dry dog. I'll teach him to tipple, and give up the fellowship of mankind.

Isabella (faintly). Signor!

Tomaso. Hey! What!

Isabella. Help, signor!

Tomaso. A woman! Ehem! (Approaching her.) Would you take something to drink by any chance? (Offers her the bottle.) No? Perhaps you don't like to drink out of the bottle.

Isabella. I perish of cold!

Tomaso. Stay! Here's a cloak! My master's out for the night, and you shall home with me. Come! Perhaps when you get warmer, you'd like to drink a little. The wine's good! (Assists her in rising.) By St. Genevieve, a soft hand! Come! I'll bring you where there's fire and a clean flagon.

Isabella. To any shelter, signor!

Tomaso. Shelter! nay, a good house, and two hundred ducats in ripe wine. Steady now! (This shall pass for a good action!) If my master smell a rat, I'll face him out the woman's honest! This way, now! Softly! That's well stepped! Come!

(Goes out, assisting her to walk.)

ACT V.

SCENE I.

Angelo's Studio. A full-length picture, in a large frame, stands on the floor against an easel, placed nearly in the centre of the room. Two curtains, so arranged as to cover the picture when drawn together. Angelo stands in an imploring attitude near the picture, his pencil and palette in his hands, appealing to Isabella, who is partly turned from him in an attitude of refusal. The back wall of the room such as to form a natural ground for a picture.]

Angelo. Hear me, sweet!

Isabella. No, we'll keep a holiday,
And waste the hours in love and idleness.
You shall not paint to-day, dear Angelo!

Angelo. But listen!

Isabella. Nay, I'm jealous of my picture;
For all you give to that is stolen from me.
I like not half a look that turns away
Without an answer from the eyes it met!

I care not you should see my lips' bright color
Yet wait not for the breath that floats between!

Angelo. Wilt listen?

Isabella. Listen? Yes! a thousand years!
But there's a pencil in those restless fingers,
Which you've a trick of touching to your lips—
And while you talk, my hand would do as well!
And if it's the same tale you told before
Of certain vigils you forgot to keep,
Look deep into my eyes till it is done—
For, like the children's Lady-in-the-well,
I only hark because you're looking in!
Will you talk thus to me?

Angelo.

Come night I will!

But close upon thy voice, sweet Isabella!
A boding whisper sinks into mine ear
Which tells of sudden parting! If 'tis false,—
We shall have still a lifetime for our love,
But if 'tis true, oh think that, in my picture,
Will lie the footprint of an angel gone!
Let me but make it clearer!

Isabella.

Now, by Heaven!

I think thou lov'st the picture, and not me!

So different am I, that, did I think

To lose thee presently, by death or parting,
For thy least word, or look, or slightest motion—
Nay, for so little breath as makes a sigh
I would not take, to have it pass untreasured,
The empire of a star!

(While she was uttering this reproach. Angelo has looked at her with delight, and touched his portrait with a few rapid strokes.)

Angelo.

My picture's done!

(Throws his pencil to the ground.)

Break, oh enchanted pencil! thou wilt never

On earth, again, do miracle so fair!

Oh Isabella! as the dusky ore

Waits for the lightning's flash to turn to gold—

As the dull vapor waits for Hesperus,

Then falls in dew-drops, and reflects a star—

So waited I that fire upon thy lips,

To make my masterpiece complete in beauty!

Isabella. This is ambition when I looked for love,
The fancy flattering where the heart should murmur.
I think you have no heart!

Angelo.

Your feet are on it!

The heart is ever lowly with the fortunes,

Tho' the proud mind sits level with a king!

I gave you long ago both heart and soul,

But only one has dared to speak to you!

Yet, if astonishment will cure the dumb,

Give it a kiss—

Isabella (smiling). Lo! Where it speaks at last!

(A loud knock is heard.)

Hark, Angelo!

(He flies to the window, and looks out.)

Angelo.

Tortesa with a guard!

Alas! that warning voice! They've traced thee hither!
Lost! Lost!

Isabella. (Hastily drawing the curtain, and disappearing behind it.)

No! no! defend thy picture only,

And all is well yet!

Angelo.

Thee and it with life!

(Draws his sword, and stands before the curtain in an attitude of defiance. Enter Tortesa with officers and guard.)
What is your errand?

Tortesa.

I'm afraid, a sad one!

For, by your drawn sword and defying air,

Your conscious thought foretells it.

Angelo.

Why,—a blow—

(You took one, signor, when you last were here—

If you've forgot it, well!—) but, commonly,

The giver of a blow needs have his sword

Promptly in hand. You'll pardon me!

Tortesa.

I do!

For, if my fears are just, good signor painter!

You've not a life to spare upon a quarrel!

In brief, the corse of a most noble lady

Was stolen last night from holy sanctuary.

I have a warrant here to search your house ;
And, should the body not be found therein,
I'm bid to see the picture of the lady—
Whereon (pray, mark me!) if I find a trace
Of charms fresh copied, more than may beseem
The modest beauty of a living maid,
I may arrest you on such evidence
For instant trial!

Angelo. Search my house and welcome!
But, for my picture, though a moment's glance
Upon its pure and hallowed loveliness
Would give the lie to your foul thought of me,
It is the unseen virgin of my brain!
And as th' inviolate person of a maid
Is sacred ev'n in presence of the law,
My picture is my own—to bare or cover!
Look on it at your peril!

Tortesa (to the guard). Take his sword.

(The guards attack and disarm him.)

Angelo. Coward and villain!

(Tortesa parts the curtains with his sword, and Angelo starts amazed to see Isabella, with her hands crossed on her breast, and her eyes fixed on the ground, standing motionless in the frame which had contained his picture. The tableau deceives Tortesa, who steps back to contemplate what he supposes to be the portrait of his bride.)

Tortesa. Admirable work!
'Tis Isabella's self! Why, this is wondrous!
The brow, the lip, the countenance—how true!
I would have sworn that gloss upon the hair,
That shadow from the lash, were nature's own—
Impossible to copy! (Looks at it a moment in silence.)

Yet methinks

The color on the cheek is something faint!

Angelo (hurriedly). Step this way further!

Tortesa (changing his position). Ay—'tis better here!
The hand is not as white as Isabella's—
But painted to the life! If there's a feature
That I would touch again, the lip, to me,
Seems wanting in a certain scornfulness
Native to her! It scarcely marred her beauty.
Perhaps 'tis well slurred over in a picture!
Yet stay! I see it, now I look again!
How excellently well!

(Guards return from searching the house.)

What! found you nothing?

Soldier (holding up Isabella's veil).

This bridal veil—no more.

Angelo (despairingly). Oh! luckless star!

Tortesa. Signor! you'll trust me when I say I'm sorry
With all my soul! This veil, I know it well—
Was o'er the face of that unhappy lady
When laid in sanctuary. You are silent!
Perhaps you scorn to satisfy me here!
I trust you can—in your extremity!
But I must bring you to the duke! Lead on!
Angelo. An instant!
Tortesa (courteously). At your pleasure!
Angelo (to Isabella, as he passes close to her).

I conjure you

By all our love, stir not!

Isabella (still motionless). Farewell!

(Tortesa motions for Angelo to precede him with the guard, looks once more at the picture, and with a gesture expressive of admiration, follows. As the door closes, Isabella steps from the frame.)

Isabella.

I'll follow

Close on thy steps, beloved Angelo!

And find a way to bring thee home again!
My heart is light, and hope speaks cheerily!
And lo! bright augury!—a friar's hood
For my disguise! Was ever omen fairer!

Thanks! my propitious star!

(Envelops herself in the hood, and goes out hastily.)

SCENE II.

[A Street. Enter Tomaso, with his hat crushed and pulled sulkily over his eyes, his clothes dirty on one side, and other marks of having slept in the street. Enter Zippa from the other side, meeting him.]

Zippa. Tomaso! Is't thou? Where's Angelo?

Tomaso. It is I, and I don't know!

Zippa. Did he come home last night?

Tomaso. "Did he come home!" Look there! (Pulls off his hat and shows his dirty side.)

Zippa. Then thou hast slept in the street!

Tomaso. Ay!

Zippa. And what has that to do with the coming home of Angelo?

Tomaso. What had thy father to do with thy having such a nose as his!

(Zippa holds up a ducat to him.)

What! gave thy mother a ducat?—cheap as dirt!

Zippa. Blockhead, no! I'll give thee the ducat if thou wilt tell me, straight on, what thou know'st of Angelo!

Tomaso. I will—and thou shalt see how charity is rewarded.

Zippa. Begin!—begin!

Tomaso. Last night, having prayed later than usual at vespers—

Zippa. Ehem!

Tomaso. I was coming home in a pious frame of mind—

Zippa. —And a bottle in thy pocket.

Tomaso. No!—in my hand. What should I stumble over—

Zippa. —But a stone.

Tomaso. A woman!

Zippa. Fie! what's this you're going to tell me?

Tomaso. She was dying with cold. Full of Christian charity—

Zippa. —And new wine.

Tomaso. Old wine, Zippa! The wine was old!

Zippa. Well!

Tomaso. I took her home.

Zippa. Shame!—at thy years?

Tomaso. And Angelo being out for the night—

Zippa. There! there! you may skip the particulars.

Tomaso. I say my own bed being in the garret—

Zippa. Well, well!

Tomaso. I put her into Angelo's.

Zippa. Oh, unspeakable impudence! Didst thou do that?

Tomaso. I had just left her to make a wine posset (for she was well nigh dead), when in popped my master, —finds her there—asks no questions,—kicks me into the street, and locks the door! There's the reward of virtue!

Zippa. Did he not turn out the woman, too?

Tomaso. Not as I remember.

Zippa. Oh worse and worse! And thou hast not seen him since?

Tomaso. I found me a soft stone, said my prayers, and went to sleep.

Zippa. And hast thou not seen him to-day?

Tomaso. Partly, I have!

Zippa. Where? Tell me quickly!

Tomaso. Give me the ducat.

Zippa (gives it to him). Quick! say on!

Tomaso. I have a loose recollection, that, lying on that stone Angelo called me by name. Looking up, I saw two Angelos, and two Tortesas, and soldiers with two spears each. (He figures in the air with his finger as if trying to remember.)

Zippa. (Aside—Ha! he is apprehended for the murder of Isabella! Say that my evidence might save his life! Not unless he love me!) What way went he, Tomaso?

(Tomaso points.)

This way? (Then has he gone to be tried before the duke.) Come with me, Tomaso! Come.

Tomaso. Where?

Zippa. To the duke's palace! Come! (Takes his arm.)

Tomaso. To the duke's palace? There'll be kicking of heels in the anti-chamber!—Dry work! I'll spend thy ducat as we go along. Shall it be old wine, or new? [Exeunt.

SCENE III.

[Hall of judgment in the ducal palace. The duke upon a raised throne on the left. Falcone near his chair, and Angelo on the opposite side of the stage with a guard. Isabella behind the guard, disguised as a monk. Tortesa stands near the centre of the stage, and Zippa and Tomaso in the left corner, listening eagerly. Counsellors at a table, and crowd of spectators at the sides and rear.]

Duke. Are there more witnesses?
 Counsellor. None more, my liege!
 Duke. None for the prisoner?
 Counsellor. He makes no defence
 Beyond a firm denial.
 Falcone. Is there wanting
 Another proof, my liege, that he is guilty?
 Duke. I fear he stands in deadly peril, count.
 (To the counsellor.) Sum up the evidence.
 (He reads.)

Counsellor. 'Tis proved, my liege,
 That for no honest or sufficient end,
 The pris'ner practised on your noble grace
 And Count Falcone a contrived deceit,
 Whereby he gained admittance to the lady.
 (Tomaso exhibits signs of alarm.)

Duke. Most true!
 Counsellor. That, till the eve before her death,
 He had continual access to the palace;
 And, having grown enamored of the bride,
 Essayed by plots that never were matured,
 And quarrels often forced on her betrothed,
 To stay the bridal. That, against the will
 Of her most noble father and the duke,
 The bride was resolute to keep her troth;
 And so, preparing for the ceremony,
 Upon her bridal morning was found dead.
 'Tis proved again—that, while she lay in state,
 The guard, at several periods of the night,
 Did force the pris'ner from the chapel door;
 And when the corse was stolen from sanctuary
 All search was vain, till, in the pris'ner's hands
 Was found the veil that shrouded her. To these
 And lighter proofs of sacrilege and murder
 The prisoner has opposed his firm denial—
 No more!

Duke. Does no one speak in his behalf?
 Tortesa. My liege! so far as turns the evidence
 Upon the prisoner's quarrels with myself,
 I'm free to say that they had such occasion
 As any day may rise 'twixt men of honor.
 As one of those aggrieved by his offences,
 You'll wonder I'm a suitor for his pardon—
 But so I am! Besides that there is room
 To hope him innocent, your grace's realm
 Holds not so wondrous and so rare a painter!
 If he has killed the lady Isabella,
 'Tis some amends that in his glorious picture
 She's made immortal! If he stole her corse,
 He can return, for that disfigured dust,
 An Isabella fresh in changeless beauty!
 Were it not well to pardon him, my lord?

Isabella. (Aside.—Oh, brave Tortesa!)
 Duke. You have pleaded kindly
 And eloquently, signor! but the law
 Can recognise no gift as plea for pardon.
 For his rare picture he will have his fame;
 But if the Isabella he has painted
 Find not a voice to tell his innocence,
 He dies at sunset!
 Isabella. (despairingly). He is dead to me!
 Yet he shall live!

(She drops the cowl from her shoulders, and with her arms folded, walks slowly to the feet of the duke.)

Falcone. (rushing forward). My daughter!
 Angelo. (with a gesture of agony). Lost!
 Tortesa. Alive!
 Zippa. (energetically). Tortesa 'll have her!

(Isabella retires to the back of the stage with her father, and kneels to him, imploring in dumb show; the duke and others watching.)

Tortesa. (Aside.—So! all's right again?
 Now for my lands, or Isabella?—Stay!
 'Tis a brave girl, by Heaven!
 (Reflects a moment.)

A sleeping draught,
 And so to Angelo! Her love for me
 A counterfeit to take suspicion off!
 It was well done! I feel my heart warm to her!
 (Reflects again.)
 Where could he hide her from our search to-day?

(Looks round at Isabella.)

No? Yet the dress is like! It was the picture!
 Herself—and not a picture! Now, by Heaven,
 A girl like that should be the wife of Caesar!

(Presses his hand upon his heart.)

I've a new feeling here!

(Falcone comes forward, followed by Isabella with gestures of supplication.)

Falcone. I will not hear you!
 My liege, I pray you keep the prisoner
 In durance till my daughters fairly wed.
 He has contrived against our peace and honor,
 And howso'er this marvel be made clear,
 She stands betrothed, if he is in the mind,
 To the brave signor, yonder!

Duke. This were well—
 What stays Tortesa?

Tortesa. If my liege permit,
 I will address my answer to this lady.

(Turns to Isabella.)

For reasons which I need not give you now,
 Fair Isabella! I became your suitor.
 My motives were unworthy you and me—
 Yet I was true—I never said I loved you!
 Your father sold you me for lands and money—
 (Pardon me, duke! And you, fair Isabella!
 You will—ere I am done!) I pushed my suit!
 The bridal day came on, and closed in mourning;
 For the fair bride it dawned upon was dead.
 I had my shame and losses to remember—
 But in my heart sat sorrow uppermost,
 And pity—for I thought your heart was broken.
 (Isabella begins to discover interest in his story, and Angelo watches her with jealous eagerness.)

I see you here again! You are my bride!
 Your father holds me to my bargain for you!
 The lights are burning on the nuptial altar—
 The bridal chamber and the feast, all ready!
 What stays the marriage now?—my new-born love!
 That nuptial feast were fruit from Paradise—
 I can not touch it till you bid me welcome!
 That nuptial chamber were the lap of Heaven—
 I can not enter till you call me in!

(Takes a ring from his bosom.)

Here is the golden ring you should have worn.
 Tell me to give it to my rival there—
 I'll break my heart to do so! (Holds it toward Angelo.)

Isabella. (looking at her father). Would I might!

Tortesa. You shall, if I please you!

Falcone. I command thee, never!
 My liege, permit me to take home my daughter!
 And, signor, you—if you would keep your troth—
 To-morrow come, and end this halting bridal!
 Home! Isabella! (Takes his daughter's hand.)

Tortesa. (taking it from him). Stay! she is not yours!
 My gracious liege, there is a law in Florence,
 That if a father, for no guilt or shame,
 Disown, and shut his door upon his daughter,
 She is the child of him who succors her;
 Who, by the shelter of a single night,
 Becomes endowed with the authority
 Lost by the other. Is't not so?

Duke. So runs
 The law of Florence, and I see your drift—
 For, look, my lord (to Falcone), if that dread apparition
 You saw last night, was this your living daughter,
 You stand within the peril of that law.

Falcone. My liege!

Isabella. (looking admiringly at Tortesa).

Oh noble signor!

Tortesa. (to Isabella). Was't well done?
 Shall I give Angelo the ring?
 (As she is about to take it from him, Tomaso steps in behind, and pulls Isabella by the sleeve.)

Tomaso. Stay there!
 What wilt thou do for dowry? I'm thy father?
 But—save some flasks of wine—
 Isabella. (sorrowfully). Would I were richer
 For thy sake, Angelo!

(Tortesa looks at her an instant, and then steps to the table and writes.)

Angelo (coming forward with an effort). Look, Isabella!

I stand between thee and a life of sunshine.
Thou wert both rich and honored, but for me!
That thou couldst wed me, beggar as I am,
Is bliss to think on—but see how I rob thee!
I have a loving heart—but am a beggar!
There is a loving heart—

(Points to Tortesa.)

With wealth and honor!

(Tortesa steps between them, and hands a paper to Angelo.)

Tortesa (to Isabella). Say thou wilt wed the poorer?

Isabella (offers her hand to Angelo). So I will!

Tortesa. Then am I blest, for he's as rich as I—

Yet, in his genius, has one jewel more!

Isabella. What say'st thou?

(Angelo reads earnestly.)

Tortesa. In a mortal quarrel, lady!

'Tis thought ill-luck to have the better sword;

For the good angels, who look sorrowing on,

In heavenly pity take the weaker side!

Isabella. What is it, Angelo?

Angelo. A deed to me

Of the Falcone palaces and lands,

And all the moneys forfeit by your father!—

By Heaven, I'll not be mocked!

Tortesa. The deed is yours—

What mockery in that?

Isabella (tenderly to Tortesa). It is not kind

To make refusal of your love a pain!

Tortesa. I would 'twould kill you to refuse me, lady!

So should the blood plead for me at your heart!

Shall I give up the ring? (offers it.)

Isabella (hesitatingly). Let me look on it!

Tortesa (withdrawing it). A moment yet! You'll give it ere you think!

Oh is it fair that Angelo had days,

To tell his love, and I have not one hour?

How know you that I can not love as well?

Isabella. 'Tis possible!

Tortesa. Ah! thanks!

Isabella. But I have given

My heart to him!

Tortesa. You gave your troth to me!

If, of these two gifts you must take back one,

Rob not the poorer! Shall I keep the ring?

(Isabella looks down.)

Angelo. She hesitates! I've waited here too long!

(Tears the deed in two.)

Perish your gift, and farewell Isabella!

Isabella (advancing a step with clasped hands).

You'll kill me, Angelo! Come back!

Tortesa (seizing him by the hand as he hesitates, and flinging him back with a strong effort).

He shall!

Angelo. Stand from my path! Or, if you care to try
Some other weapon than a glozing tongue,
Follow me forth where we may find the room!

Tortesa. You shall not go.

Angelo (draws).

Have at thee then!

(Attacks Tortesa, who disarms him, and holds his sword-point to his breast. Duke and others come forward.)

Tortesa.

The bar

'Twixt me and heaven, boy! is the life I hold

Now at my mercy! Take it, Isabella!

And with it the poor gift he threw away!

I'll write a new deed ere you've time to marry,

So take your troth back with your bridal ring,

And thus I join you!

(Takes Isabella's hand, but Angelo refuses his.)

Angelo (proudly). Never! But for me,

The hand you hold were joyfully your own!

Shall I receive a life and fortune from you,

Yet stand 'twixt you and that!

Isabella (turning from Angelo). Thou dost not love me!

Tortesa. Believe it not! He does! An instant more

I'll brush this new-spun cobweb from his eyes.

(Crosses to Zippa.)

Fair Zippa! in this crossed and tangled world

Few wed the one they could have loved the best,

And fewer still wed well for happiness!

We each have lost to-day what best we love.

But as the drops that mingled in the sky,

Are torn apart in the tempestuous sea,

Yet with a new drop tremble into one,

We two, if you're content, may swim together!

What say you?

Zippa (giving her hand). I have thought on it before,

When I believed you cold and treacherous.

'Tis easy when I know you kind and noble.

Tortesa. To-morrow then we'll wed; and now, fair signor,

(To Angelo.)

Take you her hand, nor fear to rob Tortesa!

(Turns to the duke.)

Shall it be so, my liege?

Duke. You please me well.

And if you'll join your marriage feast together

I'll play my part, and give the brides away!

Tortesa. Not so, my liege! I could not see her wed him.

To give her to him has been all I could;

For I have sought her with the dearest pulses

That quicken in my heart, my love and scorn.

She's taught me that the high-born may be true.

I thank her for it—but, too close on that Followed the love, whose lightning flash of honor

Brightens, but straight is dark again! My liege,

The poor who leap up to the stars for duty

Must drop to earth again! and here, if't please you,

I take my feet for ever from your palace,

And, matched as best besseems me, say farewell.

(Takes Zippa's hand, and the curtain drops.)

END OF TORTESA.

BIANCA VISCONTI;

OR

THE HEART OVERTASKED.

DRAMATIS PERSONÆ.

FRANCESCO SFORZA—A Condottiero of the 14th century, afterward Duke of Milan.

BRUNORIO—His Lieutenant.

SARPELLIONE—Ambassador at Milan from Alfonso, king of Naples.

ROSSANO—A Milanese Captain, formerly companion in arms to Sforza.

PASQUALI.—A whimsical Poet.

BIANCA VISCONTI—*Daughter of Philip Visconti,* the bed-ridden Duke of Milan, and heiress-apparent to the crown.*

GIULIO—Her Page, afterward discovered to be her brother and heir to the crown.

FIAMETTA—Waiting Women to Bianca, and partial to Pasquali. Lords of Council, Priest, Messengers, Sentinels, &c.

ACT I.

SCENE I.

[Pasquali the poet's chamber. Fiametta mending his hose while he writes.]

Fiametta. Why dost thou never write verses upon me?

Pasquali. Didst thou ever hear of a cauliflower struck by lightning?

Fiametta. If there were honesty in verses, thou wouldst sooner write of me than of Minerva thou talkest of. Did she ever mend thy hose for thee?

Pasquali. There is good reason to doubt if Minerva ever had hose on her leg.

Fiametta. There now! She can be no honest woman! I thought so when thou saidst she was most willing at night.

Pasquali. If thy ignorance were not endless, I would instruct thee in the meanings of poetry. But thou'lt call Jupiter a cow driver, till the thunderbolt thou takest for a bunch of twigs, strike thee dead for profanity. This once understand: Minerva is no woman, but wit; and when the poet speaks of unwilling Minerva, he talks of sluggish wit—that hath nothing to do with chastity.

Fiametta. Are there two names for all things then, Master Pasquali?

Pasquali. Ay—nearly.

Fiametta. What is the learned name for honest wife?

Pasquali. Spouse.

Fiametta. When shall I be thy spouse then?

Pasquali. When thou canst make up thy mind to forego all hope of living in poetry.

Fiametta. Nay, if I am not to be put in verse, I may as well have a plain man for a husband.

Pasquali. If thou wouldst be put in verse, thou shalt have no husband at all.

Fiametta. Now, wilt thou tell me why—in good common words, Master Pasquali.

Pasquali. Thus—dost thou think Petrarch had e'er made Laura so famous if she had been honestly his wife?

Fiametta. An' she were thrifty, I think he might.

Pasquali. I tell thee no! His sonnets had then been as dull as the praises of the just. No man would remember them.

* This eccentric duke, the last of the Viscontis, passed the latter part of his life in utter seclusion, seen by no one but his physician. His habits were loathsome, and his character harsh and unnatural.

Fiametta. Can no honest women be famous then?

Pasquali. Virtue disqualifies. There is no hope for her in poetry if she be not a sinner. Mention me the most famous woman in history.

Fiametta. Helen of Troy, in the ballad, I think.

Pasquali. Wouldst thou be more virtuous than she?

Fiametta. Nay, that were presumption.

Pasquali. Knowest thou why she is sung in an Iliad? I will tell thee: being the wife to Menelaus, she ran away with the prince of Troy.

Fiametta. Then is it a shame to remember her.

Pasquali. So thou sayest in thy ignorance. Yet for that sin she hath been remembered near three thousand years. Look through all poetry, and thou'lt find it thrives upon making sinners memorable. To be famous, thou must sin. Wilt thou qualify?

[A rap at the door.]

Page. Master Pasquali! Master Pasquali!

Fiametta. Holy Virgin! it is my mistress's page. An' I be found here now, I were as qualified as Helen of Troy.

[She conceals herself. Enter the page.]

Pasquali. How now, Master Giulio! Thou'rt impatient.

Page. Zounds, Pasquali! If thou hadst been a prince, I had not been kept longer at the door.

Pasquali. If thou wert of age to relish true philosophy, I could prove to thee that the poet were the better waited for of the two. But what is thy errand?

Page. A song—I want a new song!

Pasquali. To what tune?

Page. To a new tune on the old theme. Could I tell thee a secret without danger now! Hast thou ne'er a cat that will mew it out?

Pasquali. No! not even a wall that has ears. What is thy news?

Page. My mistress Bianca hath lost all taste for my singing!

Pasquali. A pin's head might pay for that news.

Page. But, good Pasquali, wilt thou not write me a new song?

Pasquali. Upon what theme?

Page. Sforza—still Sforza! But it must be melancholy.

Pasquali. Why melancholy?

Page. Did I not tell thee once in confidence that she loved him?

Pasquali. Ay—and I write a song in his praise.

Page. I now tell thee in confidence that she hath lost him; for she is to marry Lionel of Ferrara!

Pasquali. Here's news, indeed.

Page. It's the duke's will, and my lady is grieved to the degree I tell thee. She'll have none of my music. Wilt thou write me the song?

Pasquali. Must it be mournful, say you?

Page. Ay—as the jug-jug of her nightingale. She's full of tears. Wilt thou write it now? Shall I hold the ink while thou writest it?

Pasquali. Bless the boy's wits! Dost thou think songs are made like pancakes, by turning the hand over?

Page. Why, isn't it now in thy head?

Pasquali. Ay—it is.

Page. And how long will it take thee to write eight lines upon parchment?

Pasquali. Not long—if Minerva were willing.

Page. Shall I have it by vespers then?

Pasquali. Ay—if thou wilt leave me presently.

Page. Farewell then! Let it be melancholy, good

Pasquali.

[Exit.]

[Fiametta comes out.]

Fiametta. Now must I hurry to my mistress, ere that monkey-page gets to the palace.

Pasquali. Stands he well with her!

Fiametta. If he were her born child, she could not love him more. She fancies the puppy-dog has an eye of her color. Good day, Master Pasquali.

Pasquali. Stay! I will she marry this Lionel, think you?

Fiametta. Can you know anything by tears?

Pasquali. Not so much by a woman's—but doth your lady weep?

Fiametta. Ay—like an aqueduct!

Pasquali. Then it's more like she loves than hates him!

Fiametta. Now, enlighten me that!

Pasquali. Thus:—a woman, if she be a lady (for clowns like thee, are of a constitution more dull and reasonable);—a lady, I say, hath usually in her composition, two spirits—one angelical, the other diabolical. Now, if you stir me up the devil, he will frown—but if you touch me the angel, he will weep! If your lady weep, therefore, it is more like this match hath waked the angel than stirred the devil—for I never saw woman yet, who, if her heart were crossed, would not play the devil ere she knocked under!

Fiametta. How canst thou think such brave thoughts on what does not concern thee!

Pasquali. Does it concern me if I shall live for ever?

Fiametta. Surely it doth!

Pasquali. By what shall I live then?

Fiametta. By faith in the catechism, I think!

Pasquali. By poetry, I tell thee! And now digest this paradox! Though poetry be full of lies, it is unworthy to be called poetry if it be not true as prophecy.

Fiametta. But how can that be true which is false?

Pasquali. I will show thee! Thy lady's page would have a song, now, full of lamentation for Sforza. In it, I should say, the heavens wept—(which would be a lie)—that the winds whispered mournfully his name (which would be a lie), and that life without him were but music out of tune (which would be a consumed lie)! Yet if she loved Sforza, see you not that my verses, which are nothing but lies, have a poetic truth. When if she love him not—they are poetically false!

Fiametta. 'Tis like thy flatteries then! When thou sayest my cheek is like a peach, it is true, because it hath down upon it, and so hath a peach—yet it is false—because my cheek hath no stone in it!

Pasquali. Let me taste the savor of that peach. Thou art wiser than I thought thee.

Fiametta. I must go now.

Pasquali. Find me out if she love him! I would fain write no more verses on Sforza—whom I hate that he hath only a brute courage, and no taste for poesy. Now, Lionel's father was Petrarch's friend, and thy lady loving my verses, it were more convenient if she loved Lionel, who would love them too. Go thy ways now.

Fiametta. Farewell, Master Pasquali!

Pasquali. Stay—there be rude men in this poor quarter. I will come with thee to the piazza. Come along, mistress!

SCENE II.

[The Camp before Milan. The tent of Sforza at the side and watchfires in the distance. Enter Sforza and Brunorio.]

Sforza. Is the guard set?

Brunorio. All set, my lord!

Sforza. And blaze

The watch-fires where I ordered?

Brunorio. Every one.

Hold up your purpose, sir?

Sforza. To-night, at twelve,

I will set on! This fickle Duke of Milan

Has changed for the last time. Brunorio!

Brunorio. You seem disturbed, sir.

Sforza.

I would have to-night

The best blood up that ever rose for Sforza.

Are your spears resolute?

Brunorio.

As yourself, my lord!

Sforza. We'll sleep in Milan then. By Heaven! I know not

Why I have waited on the changing pleasure Of this old duke so long.

Brunorio.

Twelve years ago

He promised you his daughter.

Sforza.

Did he not?

And every year he has renewed and broken

This promise of alliance.

Brunorio.

Can you hold

Milan against the Florentine, my lord?

'Tis said the fair Bianca is betrothed

To their ally Ferrara! They will join

Naples against you, and cry out "usurper!"

Sforza. Ay—I have thought on't. I'm the second

Sforza!

The first hewed wood! There lies enough to bar me,

Were I another Caesar, from authority!

'Tis by this whip I have been driven so long—

'Tis by the bait of this old man's alliance

I have for ten years fought the wars of Milan.

They've fooled me year by year, and still found means

With their cursed policy, to put me off—

And, by the saints, they've reason. Could I point

The world to such a thread twixt me and Milan

As weaves a spider through the summer air,

P'd hang a crown upon it. Once possessed

Of a fair seat in Lombardy, my spears

Would gladden in St. Mark's!

Brunorio.

And thence to Naples!

Sforza. Ay—with what speed we might! My brave lieutenant,

You echo my own thought!

[Enter a sentinel.]

Sentinel.

A flag of truce

By torch-light comes from Milan.

[Enter Sarpellione, in haste.]

Sarpellione.

Noble Sforza!

I've rudely used my privilege to seek you!

Sforza. By right of office you are ever welcome.

Sarpellione. If I might speak to you a timely word

In haste and privacy?

Sforza.

Brunorio, leave us!

Sarpellione. A flag of truce comes presently from

Milan

With terms of peace. The duke would give his daughter

To save his capital.

Sforza.

The duke does well!

Sarpellione. You'll wed her then!

Sforza.

If fairly offered me,

Free of all other terms save peace between us,

I'll wed her freely.

Sarpellione.

Then I pray you pardon!

You're not the Sforza that should be the son

Of him who made the name!

Sforza.

Bold words, ambassador!

But you are politic, and speak advisedly.

What bars my marriage with Duke Philip's daughter?

Sarpellione. Brief—for this herald treads upon my heels—

Bianca was not born in wedlock!

Sforza.

Well!

Sarpellione. She's been betrothed to other suitors—

Sforza.

Well!

Sarpellione. Is't well that you can ne'er through her inherit

The ducal crown? Is't well to have a wife

Who has made up her mind to other husbands—

Who has been sold to every paltry prince

Twixt Sicily and Venice?

Sforza.

Is that all?

Sarpellione. No—nor the best of it. There lives a son,

By the same mother to the Duke of Milan.

Sforza (seizing him by the arm). Said you a son?

Sarpellione.

A son!—and—had I time—

Sforza. Without there! Pray the embassy from Milan

To grant me but a moment.

[Turning to Sarpellione.]

Is it sure?

Sarpellione. Upon the honor of my royal master,
Who'll make it good.

Sforza. Have you authority
For what you say?

Sarpellione. In court or camp, Alfonso
Will prove this story true. His mother fled,
As the world knows—in peril of her life—
To Naples.

Sforza. From the jealousy of the duke—
I well remember.

Sarpellione. Ere he could demand her
From young Alfonso, newly king, she died;
But in her throes brought prematurely forth
A son; whom, fearing for his life, she hid,
And reared him, ever like a prince, till now,
Sforza. Some fourteen years.

Sarpellione. Scarce that—but he is forward,
And feels his blood already.

Sforza. Say he does—

What make you out of it to change my purpose?

Sarpellione. Seeing you can not thrive by conquering
Milan,

Which Milan's allies will pluck back from you
To put the prince upon his father's seat—
My royal master wishes you forewarned.

Sforza. He's kind—if that is all!

Sarpellione. He'd make a friend
Of the best sword in Italy.

Sforza. What scheme

Lies under this?

Sarpellione. No scheme—but your own glory!
Your star stoops to the south. Alfonso's army
Gathers at Capua to war on Florence!

(More earnestly.) He'll add Ravenna to your marquisate
For but a thousand spears!

Sforza. I'll take Ravenna
Without his leave! Admit the herald there!

No, count! your policy has overshot!
The King Alfonso needs no spears of mine—
But he would have them farther off from Milan—
A blind mole would see that!

Sarpellione. My lord! My lord!
Sforza. Hear me, Sarpellione! I have been Too long the sport of your fine policy!

With promises of power and fair alliance
I've fought for every prince in Italy—
And against all, in turn; now leagued with Venice
To beat back Florence from the Brenta; now
With Florence against Milan; then with Milan
To drive the Tuscan home again, and all
For my own glory, by some politic reason.

I'll have a place, or I'll be in the track on't—
Where the poor honor that my hand may pluck
Shall be well garnered. By Visconti's daughter
I set my foot in Milan. My poor laurels,
Such as they are, shall root there!—and, by Heaven,
I'll find a way to make their branches flourish!
Call in the herald, there!

Sarpellione. But Lionel,
Prince of Ferrara, whom Bianca loves—

Sforza. Glory has been my mistress many years
And will suffice me still. If it should chance
Bianca loves another, 'tis an evil
To wed with me, which I will recompense
With chainless freedom after. In my glory
She'll find a bright veil that will hide all errors,
Save from the heart that pardons her.

Sarpellione. Farewell!
You'll hear o' the young prince soon!

Sforza. I'll never wrong him—
If there be one!—Our stars will rise together!
There's room enough!

[Exit Sarpellione and enter Rossano.]

Fair welcome, brave Rossano!

Rossano. The duke sends greeting to you—

Sforza. And offers me his daughter—is't not so?

Rossano. Seeing your preparations as I came
I marvel you anticipate so well!

Sforza. A bird i' the air brings news, they say—but this

Came by a serpent. How's the spear-wound now,
You took for me at Pisa? Brave Rossano!
We'll break a lance once more in company.
It warms my blood to find myself again
O' the same side. Come out in the open air!
We'll talk more freely, as we used to do,
Over a watch-fire. Come out, old comrade!

[Exit Sforza and Rossano.]

SCENE III.

[The apartment of Bianca. Fiametta embroidering, and the page thrumming his guitar.]

Page. I'd give my greyhound now—gold collar and silken leash—to know why the duke sent for my lady.

Fiametta. Would you, Master Curiosity?

Page. Mistress Pert, I would—and thy acquaintance into the bargain.

Fiametta. Better keep the goods you come honestly by.
I would you knew as well how your mistress came by you.

Page. I came to her from heaven—like her taste for my music. (Hums a tune.)

Fiametta. Did you! do they make sacks in heaven?

Page. There's a waiting woman's question for you!
Why sacks?

Fiametta. Because I think you came in one, like a present of a puppy-dog.

Page. Silence, dull pin-woman! here comes my mistress!

[Takes off his cap as Bianca enters. She walks across the stage without heeding her attendants.]

Bianca.

To marry Sforza!

My dream come true! my long, long cherished dream!

The star come out of heaven that I had worshipped!

The paradise I built with soaring fancy

And filled with rapture like a honey-bee

Dropped from the clouds at last! Am I awake?—

Am I awake, dear Giulio?

Page (half advancing to her). Noble mistress!

Bianca. Thank God, they speak to me! It is no dream?

It was this hand my father took to tell me—

It was with these lips that I tried to speak—

It was this heart that beat its giddy prison—

As if the exulting joy new-sprung within it
Would out and fill the world! . . . . .

. . . . . Wed him to-morrow!

So suddenly a wife! Will it seem modest,

With but twelve hours of giddy preparation

To come a bride to church! Will he remember

I was ten years ago affianced to him?

I have had time to think on't! Oh, I'll tell him—

When I dare speak, I'll tell him—how I've loved him!

And day and night dreamed of him, and through all

The changing wars treasured the solemn troth

Broke by my father! If he listens kindly,

I'll tell him how I fed my eyes upon him

In Venice at his triumph—when he walked

Like a descended god beside the doge,

Who thanked him for his victories, and the people,

From every roof and balcony, by thousands

Shouted out "Sforza! Live the gallant Sforza!"

I was a child then—but I felt my heart

Grow, in one hour, to woman!

Page. Would it please you

To hear my new song, lady?

Bianca. No, good Giulio!

My spirits are too troubled now for music.

Get thee to bed! Yet stay! hast heard the news?

Page. Is't from the camp?

Bianca. Ay—Sforza's taken prisoner!

Page. I'm vexed for that.

Bianca. Why vexed?

Page. In four years more

I shall bear sword and lance. There'll be no Sforza

To kill when I'm a man! Who took him, lady?

Bianca. A blind boy, scarcely bigger than yourself;

And gave him, bound, to me! In brief, dear Giulio!

Not to perplex those winking eyelids more,
The wars are done, and Sforza weds to-morrow
Your happy mistress!

Page. Sforza! We shall have A bonefire then!

Bianca. Ay—twenty!
Page. And you'll live
Here in the palace, and have masks and gambols
The year round, will you not?

Bianca. My pretty minion,
You know not yet what love is! Love's a miser,
That plucks his treasure from the prying world
And grudges e'en the eye of daylight on it!
Another's look is theft—another's touch
Robs it of all its value. Love conceives
No paradise but such as Eden was
With two hearts beating in it.

[Leaves the Page and walks thoughtfully away.]

Oh, I'll build
A home upon some green and flowery isle
In the lone lakes, where we will use our empire
Only to keep away the gazing world.
The purple mountains and the glassy waters
Shall make a hushed pavilion with the sky,
And we two in the midst will live alone,
Counting the hours by stars and waking birds,
And jealous but of sleep! To bed, dear Giulio!
And wake betimes.

Page. Good night, my dearest lady!
Bianca. To bed, Fiametta! I have busy thoughts,
That needs will keep me waking.

Fiametta. Good night, lady.
Bianca. Good night, good night! The moon has fellowship
For moods like mine. I'll forth upon the terrace,
And watch her while my heart beats warm and fast.

ACT II.

SCENE I.

[The square of Milan. The front of the cathedral on the right. People kneeling round the steps, and the organ heard within. Enter Pasquali and Fiametta in haste.]

Fiametta. Now, Master Pasquali! said I not we should be too late?

Pasquali. Truly, there seems no room!

Fiametta. And I her first serving-woman! If it were my own wedding I should not grieve more to have missed it.
You would keep scribbling, scribbling, and I knew it was past twelve.

Pasquali. Consider, Mistress Fiametta! I had no news of this marriage till the chimes began; and the epithalamium must be writ! I were shamed else, being the bard of Milan.

Fiametta. The what, of Milan?

Pasquali. The bard, I say! Come aside, and thou shalt be consoled. I'll read thee my epithalamium.

Fiametta. Is it something to ask money of the bridegroom?

Pasquali. Dost thou think I would beg?

Fiametta. Nay, thou'rt very poor!

Pasquali. Look thee, Mistress Fiametta! that's a vulgar error, thou hast best be rid of. I, whom thou callest poor, am richer than the duke.

Fiametta. Now if thou'rt not out of thy ten senses, the Virgin bless us.

Pasquali. I'll prove it even to thy dull apprehension.
Answer me truly. How many meals eats the duke in a day?

Fiametta. Three, I think, if he be well.

Pasquali. So does Pasquali! How much covering has he?

Fiametta. Nay—what keeps him warm.

Pasquali. So has Pasquali! How much money carries he on his person.

Fiametta. None, I think. He is a duke, and needs none.

Pasquali. Even so Pasquali! He is a poet, and needs none. What good does him the gold in his treasury?

Fiametta. He thinks of it.

Pasquali. So can Pasquali! What pleasure hath he in his soldiers?

Fiametta. They keep him safe in his palace.

Pasquali. So they do Pasquali in his chamber. Thus far, thou'lt allow, my state is as good as his—and better—for I can think of his gold, and sleep safe by his soldiers, yet have no care of them.

Fiametta. I warrant he has troubled thoughts.

Pasquali. Thou sayst well. Answer me once more, and I'll prove to thee in what I am richer. Thou'st ne'er heard, I dare swear, of imagination.

Fiametta. Is't a pagan nation or a Christian?

Pasquali. Stay—I'll convey it to thee by a figure.
What were the value of thy red stockings over black; if it were always night?

Fiametta. None.

Pasquali. What were beauty if it were always dark?

Fiametta. The same as none.

Pasquali. What were green leaves better than brown—diamonds better than pebbles—gold better than brass—if it were always dark?

Fiametta. No better, truly.

Pasquali. Then the shining of the sun, in a manner, dies your stockings, creates beauty, makes gold and diamonds, and paints the leaves green?

Fiametta. I think it doth.

Pasquali. Now mark! There be gems in the earth, qualities in the flowers, creatures in the air, the duke ne'er dreams of. There be treasures of gold and silver, temples and palaces of glorious work, rapturous music, and feasts the gods sit at—and all seen only by a sun, which, to the duke, is black as Erebus.

Fiametta. Lord! Lord! Where is it, Master Pasquali!

Pasquali. In my head. (Fiametta discovers signs of fear.) All these gems, treasures, palaces, and fairy harmonies I see by the imagination I spoke of. Am I not richer now?

Fiametta (retreating from him). The Virgin help us!
He thinks there's a sun in his head! I thought to have married him, but he's mad.

[She falls to weeping.]

[*The cathedral is flung open, and the organ plays louder.
The bridal procession comes out of church and passes across the stage. As they pass Pasquali, he offers his epithalamium to Sforza.*]

Sforza. What have we here—petitions?

Bianca. Nay, my lord!

Pasquali's not a beggar. You shall read

Something inventive here! He's a clear fancy,

And sings your praises well. Good chamberlain!

Bring him with honor to the palace! Please you,

My lord, wilt on!

Page (to Pasquali). You'll come to the feast now, wont you?

We'll sit together, and have songs and stories,

And keep the merriest end on't!

[As the procession passes off, Sarpellione plucks Pasquali by the sleeve, and retains him.]

Sarpellione. A fair bride, sir!

Pasquali. What would you, noble count?

Sarpellione. The bridegroom, now,

Should be a poet, like yourself, to know

The worth of such a jewel!

Pasquali. Haply so—

But we are staying from the marriage feast—

Sarpellione. One word! (Pulls him aside.) Have you ambition?

Pasquali. Like the wings

Upon a marble cherub—always spread,

But fastened to a body of such weight

'Twill never rise till doomsday. I would drink

Sooner than talk of it!—Come on! my lord!

Sarpellione. Signor Pasquali—I have marked you oft

For a shrewd, rapid wit. As one who looks

Of on the sun, there needs no tedious care

Lest the light break too suddenly upon you.

Is it not so?

Pasquali. Say on!

Sarpellione. You know how Naples
Has over it a sky all poetry.

Pasquali. I know it well.

Sarpellione. The radiant Giovanna
 Cherished Bocaccio and Petrarch there,
 And 'tis the quality of the air they breathed—
 Alphonso feels it! Brief and to the point!
 My royal master sends for you. He'd have
 A galaxy around him!

Pasquali. Noble count!

[Enter Page.]

Page. I'm sent to bid you to the feast, sirs!

Sarpellione. Go!
 We'll follow straight. [Exit Page.]

This leaden-headed soldier
 Slights you, I see—He took you for a beggar!

Pasquali. Humph! 'tis his wedding day, and I forgive him!

Sarpellione. You're used to wrong, I knew.

Pasquali. To-day, my lord,
 I'm bent upon a feast—wake not a devil
 To mar my appetite!

Sarpellione. One single word!

This brainless spear-head would be duke of Milan.

Pasquali. What! while the duke lives!

Sarpellione. While the duke's son lives,
 For there is one—I'll prove it when you will—
 And he will murder him to take his crown.

Pasquali. How know you that?

Sarpellione. Alfonso, king of Naples,
 Would have this usurpation and this murder
 In time prevented.

Pasquali. How!

Sarpellione. By Sforza's death.
 There's no way else—but 'tis a dangerous theme
 To talk on here—come out o' the way a little,
 And you shall have such reasons for the deed—

Pasquali (flings him from him with contempt).
 What "deed!" Dost take me for a murderer?

My lord! I'm poor. I have a thirst for honors
 Such as you offered me but now, that burns
 Like fire upon my lips—I could be tortured
 Through twenty deaths to leave a name behind me.

But nay, I prate—I'll turn not out to thee

The golden inside of a soul of honor—

(Leaving him.) When next you want a hand for a bad deed,

Look to your equals—there are those beneath you
 Who, from their darkling wells, see guiding-stars
 Far o'er your head, my lord!

Sarpellione. Such men as this [Exit.]

Do not betray e'en villains! I shall find

Another and a fitter. To the feast now!

And watch my time and means. [Exit.]

SCENE II.

[An ante-room, with a feast seen beyond. Enter Sforza and Rossano.]

Rossano. I've a new culverin
 Invented here by the duke's armorer;

Will you walk forth?

Sforza. Most willingly. Within there!
 My helmet!

[Enter Bianca.]

Bianca. Is there fresh alarm, my lord?

You would not go abroad?

[She takes the helmet from the page as he brings it in.]

Sforza. A little way, sweet,

To look at some new arms.

Bianca. To-morrow, surely,

Will do as well. Here are some loving verses

Writ on your marriage!

Rossano. I've the gonfalon

Your father gave me at the siege of Parma.

The rags wave yet!

Sforza. I'd rather see a thread on't
 Than feast a hundred years!

Bianca. My lord, will't please you

Come in, and hear the verses? There's a wine

You did not taste, grown on Vesuvius;

Pray you come in!

Rossano.

I've, in my tent, the sword
 Your father plucked from a retreating soldier

To head the fight at Pisa. 'Tis well hacked!

Sforza. I'll come, Rossano!

(To Bianca.) Nay, sweet! by your leave
 (Takes his helmet.)

We'll go abroad a little! You shall see us

Betimes at supper. Keep the revels toward!

We'll taste your wine anon. Come, brave Rossano!

[They go out. Bianca looks after them thoughtfully a few moments, and then walks back slowly to the banquetting room.]

SCENE III.

[The ramparts at night. Enter Sforza and Rossano.]

Rossano. She's loving in her nature, and methought
 Seemed grieved when you came forth!

Sforza. I should have thought so,
 But that I had some private information
 She loved another!

Rossano. You're perhaps abused!

Sforza. Nay—say—how should she love me? I'm well on

To my meridian, see you!—a rough soldier—
 Who never learned the courtly phrase of love.

And she—the simplest maiden in a cot,

Is not more tender-eyed, nor has a heart

Apter to know love's lesson ere 'tis time.

She's loved ere now, Rossano!

Rossano. Happy so—

Yet be not rude too rashly.

Sforza. Rude! I'll make

This forced link that policy puts on her

Loose as a smoke-curl! She shall know no master,

And be no slave for me!

Rossano. You'll not neglect her!

Sforza. The sun of woman's world is love, Rossano!

When that sun sets, if no unpyling cloud

Trouble her sky, there rises oftentimes

A crescent moon of memory, whose light

Makes the dark pathway clear again. Bianca's

May have gone down for me! I'll be no cloud

To mar the moon as well.

Rossano. Stand by—there comes

A footfall this way. (They stand aside.)

[Enter Pasquali hiccupping, and talking to himself.]

Pasquali. That wine was grown on Vesuvius. That's the reason it makes such an eruption. If it breaks out o' the top o' my head how—as I think it will—for it gets hotter and hotter—I shall know if wit be in the brains or the belly.

Rossano. (Aside—Stay—my lord! This is Pasquali, whose verses Bianca sometimes sings to her lute. Ten to one now but you may gather from his drunkenness if Bianca loves another.) (Rossano comes forward.) Good even, Master Pasquali.

Pasquali. That's an everyday phrase—this is holiday!

Rossano. A merry good even then!

Pasquali. Ay, that's better! For we're all merry—except the bride. And that's the way of it.

Rossano. What's the way of it?

Pasquali. See here! Who is it that never weeps at a funeral?

Rossano. You shall tell me.

Pasquali. The dead man, that hath most cause.

Rossano. And what hath that to do with a bridal?

Pasquali. A great deal. Of all people at a bridal, who should be most merry? Why, the bride! now I have just left a bride that is sad enough for a funeral.

Rossano. For what cause, think you?

Pasquali. There are some things which can have but one cause. There's but one cause for drunkenness, and there's but one grief on a wedding-day.

Rossano. And what's that?

Pasquali. Wine—causes drunkenness!

Rossano. And what causes grief in a bride?

Pasquali. Want of love for the bridegroom.

Rossano. How know you that, sir?

Pasquali. Listen to in-spi-ra-tion!

"When first young Lionel did catch mine eye,
"Sforza, the valiant, passed unheeded by!"

Rossano. Villain! these are thine own lying verses!

Pasquali (pulling out his sword). The figures of speech are lies of verse. But if thou sayest that it is a lie that Bianca loves Lionel best, thou liest in prose, and so, come on! (Attacks Rossano, and Sforza comes forward, and strikes up their swords.)

Sforza. Get home, thou drunkard! Come, away, Rossano.

He writes what's palatable, and but echoes
That which is rung at court. She loved this prince—
Sarpellione told me so before.

We'll to the field and our old mistress, glory.
Come on—we'll talk of battles and forget her.

[Exeunt.]

Pasquali. Fighting's not my vocation; but I have an itching that way, and I'll after him. Halloo! Were there two men? I think there were two. The last man called me a drunkard! That's no offence! a poet may be a drunkard! But 'villain!' that's incompatible, and must be pricked back. Halloo!

[Exit.]

SCENE IV.

[Bianca's chamber at midnight. She sits on a couch in a white undress, and Sforza beside her in his armor.]

Bianca. Dost think this ring a pretty one, my lord?

Sforza. Ay, 'tis a pretty ring! I have one here Marancio gave me—Giacomo Marancio.

The ring his wife sent—but you've heard the story?

Bianca. I think I never heard it.

Sforza. She's a woman
The heart grows but to speak of. She was held
A hostage by the Milanese (I pray you Pardon the mention), when, twixt them and me
Marancio held a pass. Her life was threatened
If by his means I crossed the Adige. She—(Brave heart! I warn to speak of her!) found means
To send to him this ring; wherein is writ
"He who loves most, loves honor best." You'll see it
Here o' the inside.

Bianca. Did you see this lady?

Sforza. I hazarded a battle three days after
With perilous odds, only to bring her off—
And would have sold my life for't.

Bianca. Did you see her?

Sforza. I gave her to Marancio when I took
The ring of him.

Bianca. My lord! speak you so warmly
Of any other woman?

Sforza (rising and taking his helmet).

Nay, I know not.

There are some qualities that women have
Which are less worthy, but which warm us more
Than speaking of their virtues. I remember
The fair Giovanna in her pride at Naples.
Gods! what a light enveloped her! She left
Little to shine in history—but her beauty
Was of that order that the universe
Seemed governed by her motion. Men looked on her
As if her next step would arrest the world;
And as the sea-bird seems to rule the wave
He rides so buoyantly, all things around her—
The glittering army, the spread gonfalon
The pomp, the music, the bright sun in heaven—
Seemed glorious by her leave.

Bianca (rising and going to the window).

Of such sweet praise, my lord! Did you not hear
The faint note of a nightingale?

Sforza. More like
A far-heard clarion, methought! They change
The sentinels perchance. 'Tis time Rossano
Awaits me on the ramparts.

Bianca. Not to-night!

Go not abroad again to-night, my lord!

Sforza. For a brief hour, sweet! The old soldier loves

To gossip of the fields he's lost and won,

And I, no less, to listen. Get to bed!
I'll follow you anon.

[Exit Sforza.]

Bianca.

He does not love me!

I never dreamed of this! To be his bride
Was all the heaven I looked for! Not to love me
When I have been ten years affianced to him!—
When I have lived for him—shut up my heart,
With every pulse and hope, for his use only—
Worshipped—oh God! idolatrously loved him!

Why has he sought to marry me? Why still
Renew the broken pledge my father made him?
Why, for ten years, with war and policy,
Strive for my poor alliance?

He must love me,
Or I shall break my heart! I never had
One other hope in life! I never linked
One thought, but to this chain! I have no blood—
No breath—no being—separate from Sforza!
Nothing has any other name! The sun
Shined like his smile—the lightning was his glory—
The night his sleep, and the hushed moon watched o'er him;

Stars writ his name—his breath hung on the flowers—
Music had no voice but to say I love him,
And life no future, but his love for me!
Whom does he love? Marancio's wife? He praised Only her courage! Queen Giovanna's beauty?
'Tis dust these many years! There is no sign
He loves another; and report said ever
His glory was his mistress. Can he love?
Shame on the doubt! 'Twas written in the ring
"He who loves most, loves honor best"—and Sforza
Is made too like a god to lack a heart.
And so, I breathe again! To make him love me
Is all my life now! to pry through his nature,
And find his heart out. That's wrapt in his glory!
I'll feed his glory then! He praised Giovanna
That she was royal and magnificent—
Ay—that's well thought on, too! How should an eye,
Dazzled with war and warlike pomp, like Sforza's,
Find pleasure in simplicity like mine!

(Looks at her dress.)

I'm a duke's daughter, and I'll wear the look on't!
Unlock my jewels and my costly robes,
And while I keep his show-struck eye upon me,
Watch for a golden opportunity
To build up his renown! . . . . .
. . . . . And so farewell
The gentle world I've lived in! Farewell all
My visions of a world for two hearts only—
Sforza's and mine! If I outlive this change,
So brief and yet so violent within me,
I'll come back in my dreams, oh, childish world!
If not—a broken heart blots out remembrance.

[Exit into her bridal chamber, which is seen beyond on opening the door.]

ACT III.

SCENE I.

[An ante-chamber of the palace. Brunorio leaning sullenly on his sword by the door. Enter Sarpellione.]

Sarpellione. What's this?—the brave Brunorio turned lackey?

Brunorio. Nay, count! I wait my turn.

Sarpellione. If a civilian
May have a judgment of a soldier's duty,
You're out of place, sir! This is not the camp!
You're not on guard here! There's a difference
Twixt patience at your post, and kicking heels
In my lord's antechamber!

Brunorio. By the saints
My own thought, noble count! As you came in
I brooded on't.

Sarpellione. (Aside)—This blockhead may be turned
To a shrewd use now! I have marked his brows

Blackening upon Rossano, who usurps
His confidence with Sforza. Could I seize
The lightning in this jealous thunder-cloud—
I'll see the depth on't.) Sforza knows you're here?
Brunorio. I had a message by a varlet page,
Who bid me wait here.

Sarpellione. By a page? Sacristie!
Fair treatment for a soldier! Say, Brunorio!
What wasn't I heard of the Pope's standard-bearer
Clove to the wrist?

Brunorio. Heard you of that, my lord?
You see the weapon, here!

Sarpellione. Wasn't thine, I' faith?
I thought promotion had been won with service!
Wasn't thou, indeed? I heard the King Alfonso
Say 'twas the best blow and the bravest followed
He'd know in his time. How it came to his ears
I know not but he made the court ring with it!

Brunorio. The king?
Sarpellione. How long since thou wast made lieutenant?

Brunorio. Five years come March!
Sarpellione. Zounds! how this peasant's son
Treads merit in the dust! Sforza keeps back
His betters, brave Brunorio!

(Rossano passes out.)

Ay—there!
That man cuts off your sunshine, or I know
Nothing of courts! I, that have no part in it,
Have marked how you are slighted for Rossano!
Forgive my touching on't! 'Tis my respect
For a brave soldier makes me speak so freely.
But were I of your counsel—

Brunorio. Noble count,
My heart speaks through your lips. Since this Rossano
Has had my lord's ear, I've been thrust aside
Like a disgraced hound.

Sarpellione. Frankly, brave Brunorio!
And between us,—I've heard you lightly mentioned
By this ungrateful Sforza!

Brunorio. How, my lord?
Sarpellione. I would not tell you but to serve you in it—

He told Rossano, there, that you had strength,
And struck a sharp blow—and so did an axe!
But for your brains—and then he tossed his head—
You've seen the scorn upon his lip?

Brunorio. Curse on him!
I've a sharp blow left yet—and brains enough
To find a time to strike it! Did you say
Alfonso had spoke well of me, my lord?

Sarpellione. So well, that, on my own authority—
If you'd take service with a better master—
You're captain from this hour.

Brunorio. My lord! So promptly
I take your offer, that your commendations
Will find no swifter bearer than myself
To King Alfonso.

Sarpellione. Stay—I'm not just now
On the best terms with Sforza, and you'll see
With half a glance, that while he's here in Milan
His best sword could not leave him for Alfonso,
But it would throw suspicion upon me,
And touch my credit here. I'll write your warrant,
Which you shall keep, and use it when you please.
But for the present shut your bosom up,
And bear your wrongs. Sforza awaits you now—
Go in. I'll see you as you pass again!

[Exit Brunorio.]

He's a fit tool! This o'er-ambitious Sforza
Must not be duke—and if I fret this cur
Till he will tear his master, why, 'twill save
A worthier hand the trouble on't.

[Exit Sarpellione.]

SCENE II.

[*Sforza discovered sitting thoughtfully in his apartment.
The page curiously examining his sword.*]

Sforza (yawning). This is dull work!

Page. My lord, will't please you, teach me
A trick of fence?

Sforza. Ay—willingly! Hast thou
A weapon in that needle-case of thine?

Page (drawing). A weapon! If I had your legs to stand on

I'd give you all the odds twixt it and yours!
Look at that blade! (Bends it.) Damascus!

[Sforza smiles, and unbuckles his scabbard.]

By the gods
You shall not laugh at me! I'll give you odds,—
With anything to stand on!

Sforza. Nay—I'll sit—
And you shall touch me if you can! Come on!
And see I do not rap you o'er the cockscomb!

Page. Have at you fairly! Mind! for I'm in earnest!
(They fence.)

Sforza. One—two—well thrust, by Jupiter! Again!
One—two!

Page (makes a lunge). Three! there you have it!
Sforza (starting up). Zounds!

This is no play. What! does the needle prick?

(Wipes it with his handkerchief.)

Sforza. 'Tis a Damascus if thou wilt! I'll laugh
No more at it or thee. Come here, thou varlet!
Where got thy mistress such a ready hand
As thou art?

Page (fencing with the chair).

From an eagle's nest, my lord!
Sforza. I'll swear to it! Thou hast the eagle's eye!
But tell me—what brave gentleman of Milan
Has thy blood in his veins?

Page. I'm not of Milan.
Sarpellione brought me here from Naples.

Sforza. Thou'rt not his child. I'll answer for't.
Page. Not I!

I hate him! Come! Wilt try another pass?
Sforza. Stay! is the count thy master then?

Page. My master?
He's an old snake! But I'll say this for him,
Were I a royal prince—(as I may be—
Who knows!)—Sarpellione could not treat me
With more becoming honor.

Sforza (starting up suddenly). What if this Should be the duke's son that he told me of?
Come hither, sir! What know you of your father?
(Aside.)—'Tis the Visconti's lip!

Page. I'll tell you all
I know, my lord. Alfonso sent me here,
Five years ago, in quality of page.

I was to serve my lady and no other,
And to be gently nurtured. The king gave me
A smart new feather—bade me bear myself
Like a young prince at Milan—

Sforza (starting away from him). It is he!—
Princely in spirit, and Visconti's impress
On every feature! He'll be duke of Milan!

Page. Heard you the duke was worse to-day, my lord?

Sforza. What duke?
Page. Nay, sir! you ought to know what duke!

I heard the doctor say you'd wear his crown
In three days. Never say I told you of it!
He whispered it to old Sarpellione,
Who—

Sforza. What?

Page. Looked daggers at him!

Sforza. (Aside)—Now the devil
Plucks at my soul indeed! If the duke die,
The crown lies in the gift of my new wife,
And I were duke as sure as he were dead—
But for this boy!

(Walks rapidly up and down.)

I'd set my foot in Venice
In half a year!—Ferrara—then Bologna—
Florence—and thence to Naples! I'd be king
Of Italy before their mourning's threadbare—
But for this boy!

(The page still fences with the chair.)

..... I'd found a dynasty!—

Be second of the name—but the first king—
And there should go, e'en with the news, to France,
A bold ambassador from one Francesco,—
Sforza by birth and king of Italy—
But for this boy! . . . . .

. . . . . I would he were a man!
I would an army barred me from the crown,
Sooner than this boy's right! But he might die!
He might have run upon my sword just now!
'Twere natural,—and so it were to fall
In playing with't, and bleed to death unheard,
From a ripped vein. That would be natural!
He might have died in many ways and I
Have had no part in't.

Page. Will you fence, my lord?
Sforza (clutches his sword, and suddenly sheaths it, and walks from him. Aside.)

(Get thee gone, devil! After all his glory Shall Sforza be the murderer of a child!)
No—No! I'll not fence with thee! Go and play!
I—I—I—(turns from him.)

Stay! I shall such a grain of sand
As a boy's life, check Sforza's bold ambition!
I, who have hewn down thousands in a day
For but the play on't—I, upon whose hand
Sat slaughter, like a falcon, to let loose
At all that flew above me! I—whose conscience
Carries the reckoning of unnumbered souls
Sped unto hell or heaven, for this ambition!—
Shall I mar all now with a woman's pity
For a fair stripling!

(Draws his sword, and the page, who has been regarding him attentively, comes up and pulls him by the sleeve.)

Page. Look you here, my lord!
If I have harmed you—for you seem so angry
I think I have—more than I meant to do—
Take my own sword, and wound me back again!
I'll not cry out—and when you see me bleed,
You'll pardon me that I was so unhappy
As to have chanced to wound you!

(Kneels, opens his bosom, and offers his sword-hilt to Sforza.)

Sforza. Angels keep me!

Give me thy hand, boy!

(Looks at him a moment, and passes his hand across his eyes.)

Page. You'll forgive me, sir?
Letting of blood—when done in fair play, mind you!
Has no offence in't.

Sforza. Leave me now, sweet boy!
I'll see thee at the feast to-night! Farewell!

(Page kisses his hand, and exit.)

Shade of my father! If from heaven thou lookest
Upon the bright inheritance of glory
I took from thee—pluck from my tortured soul
These thoughts of hell—and keep me worthy of thee!

(Walks up and down thoughtfully, and then presses the crucifix to his lips.)

As I am true to honor and that child,
Help me, just Heaven!

[Exit.]

SCENE III.

[A bridal feast seen through a glass door in the rear of the stage. Enter from the banqueting room, Bianca, dressed with great magnificence, followed by Sforza, Rossano, Brunorio, and Sarpellione. A raised throne at the side. Music heard till the door is closed.]

Bianca. They who love stillness follow us! The brain

Grows giddy with the never-wearying dance,
And music's pause is sweet as its beginning.
Shut the doors, Giulio! Sarpellione! enter!
You're welcome to Trophonius' cave! We'll hold
The Court of Silence, and I'll play the Queen.
My brave lord, you shall doff that serious air,
And be court favorite—sit you at our feet!

Sforza. Too envious a place and office both!
I'll sit here with Rossano. Honor's flower—

That lifts a bold head in the world—at court,
Looks for the lily's hiding-place.

Sarpellione. (Aside—What trick Lies in this new humility.) The lily
Is lowly born, and knows its place, my lord!

Bianca. Yet is it sought with pains while the rose wITHERS!

Sarpellione. The rose lifts to the sun its flowering tree,
And all its parts are honored—while the lily
Upon one fragile stem rears all its beauty—
And its coarse family of leaves are left
To lie on the earth they cling to.

Sforza (to Rossano, with whom he has been conversing apart.)
(I've sure news

He was worse yesterday!)

(Bianca rising with dignity, and descending from the ducal chair.)

Bianca. Now, since the serpent
Misdid our mother, never was fair truth
So subtly turned to error. If the rose
Were born a lily, and, by force of heart
And eagerness for light, grew tall and fair,
'Twere a true type of the first fiery soul
That makes a low name honorable. They
Who take it by inheritance alone—
Adding no brightness to it—are like stars
Seen in the ocean, that were never there
But for the bright originals in heaven!

Sarpellione (snertingly). Rest to the gallant soul of the first Sforza!

Bianca. Amen! but triple glory to the second!
I have a brief tale for thine ear, ambassador!

Sarpellione. I listen, lady!

Bianca. Mark the moral, sir!

An eagle once from the Eugeanean hills
Soared bravely to the sky. (To Sf.) (Wilt please my lord List to my story?) In his giddy track
Scarce marked by them who gazed upon the first,
Followed a new-fledged eaglet, fast and well.
Upward they sped, and all eyes on their flight
Gazed with admiring awe, when suddenly,
The parent bird, struck by a thunderbolt,
Dropped lifeless through the air. The eaglet paused,
And hung upon his wings; and as his sire
Plashed in the far-down wave, men looked to see him
Flee to his nest affrighted!

Sforza (with great interest). Did he so?

Bianca. My noble lord—he had a monarch's heart!
He wheeled a moment in mid air, and shook
Proudly his royal wings, and then right on,
With crest uplifted and unwavering flight,
Sped to the sun's eye, straight and gloriously.

Page. Lady—is that true?

Bianca. Ay—men call those eagles
Sforza the First and Second!

(The bell tolls, and enter a messenger.)

Messenger. Pardon, madam!
For my sad news! your royal father's dead!

Bianca (aside, with great energy).
(Sforza'll be duke!)

(Turning to the messenger.)

Died he in much pain, know you?

Messenger. Madam—

Bianca. (Aside—The crown is mine! He will remember

The crown was mine.)

(Turns to the messenger.)

Sent he for any one

In his extremity?

Messenger. Most honored madam—

Bianca. (Aside—Ingratitude is not the lion's fault—
He can not hate me when I make him royal!
It would be monstrous if he did not love me!)

(To the messenger.)

Said you my father sent for me?

Messenger. No! Madam,

He died as he had lived, unseen of any
Save his physician!

Bianca. (Aside—Sforza must be crowned
And then our mourning will shut out the world!

He'll be alone with me and his new glory—
All royal, and all mine! (To Sforza) Please you, my lord,
Dismiss the revellers! My father's dead!
(Aside.—There are no more Viscontis—Sforza's children Shall now be dukes of Milan! Think on that!
He'll think on't, and his heart will come down to me,
Or there's no truth in nature!) (To Sforza) My brave lord!
Shall we go in?

Sforza. Go you in first! (hands her in) Rossano
Will forth with me, to see the funeral
Fittingly arranged.

Bianca. You'll come back soon, my lord!
Sforza. Ay—presently! [Exit Bianca.]

Rossano. With what a majesty
She walks!

Sforza. She knows not that she has a brother,
And in her port already mocks the dutchess.

Rossano. She would have made a glorious queen, my lord!

Sforza. She should have made one—but I can not talk on't!

Let's forth upon our errand, and forget
There was a crown in Milan.

[Exeunt.]

ACT IV.

SCENE I.

[Pasquali's chamber. Fiametta sitting with his cap in her hand.]

Fiametta. What wilt thou do for a black feather, Pasquali?

Pasquali. Hast thou no money?

Fiametta. No—save my dowry of six pieces.

Pasquali. Give the pieces to me, and thy dowry will be ten times greater.

Fiametta. An it be not six times less, I will never trust counting upon fingers.

Pasquali. Hast thou no dread of dying uncelebrated?

Fiametta. If it be sin, I have a dread of it by baptism.

Pasquali. Is it a sin to neglect thy immortality?

Fiametta. Ay—it is.

Pasquali. Then take heed how thou fallest into sin—for to be the friend of a poet is to be immortal, and thou art no friend of mine if I have not thy six pieces.

Fiametta. But how shall I have six times more, Master
Pasquali?

Pasquali. In reputation! Wouldst thou marry a fool?

Fiametta. No, truly.

Pasquali. Then if thy husband be wise, he will be more proud that thou art famous, than covetous of thy six pieces.

Fiametta. And shall I be famous? (Gives him the money.)

Pasquali. Thou wilt live when Sforza is dead!

Fiametta. Is not Sforza famous, then?

Pasquali. He hath fame while he lives, and so had King
Priam of Troy. But if Homer had not written, Priam would have been forgot and Troy too; and if Sforza live not in poetry, he is as dead in a century—as thou and Laura were, but for thy favors to Petrarch and Pasquali.

Fiametta. Why does not Sforza give thee six pieces and be immortal?

Pasquali. Truly—he pays more for a less matter! It is the blindness of great men that they slight the poets.
Look here now—hath not Sforza shed blood, and wasted treasure, and taken a thousand murders on his soul, to leave a name after him?

Fiametta. I misdoubt he hath.

Pasquali. Now will I whom he thinks less worthy than a trumpeter, sit down, and with a scrape of my pen, make a dog's name more known to posterity.

Fiametta. When thou speakest of a dog, I think of my lady's page. Canst thou tell me why she should love him so out of reason?

Pasquali. Canst thou tell me why the moon riseth not every night, as the sun every day?

Fiametta. No—truly.

Pasquali. Neither can I give thee reason for a woman's fancy—which is as unaccountable in its caprice as the moon in its changes. Hence the sun is called "he," the moon
"she."

Fiametta. Holy Virgin—what it is to be learned!

Pasquali. Come, Fiametta! spend thy dowry while thy mind is enlightened!

Fiametta. If I should repent now!

Pasquali. Think not of it. If thou shouldst repent tomorrow, I shall still go beseechingly to the funeral, and thou wilt be famous past praying for. Come away!

SCENE II.

[The garden of the palace of Milan. Enter Bianca in mourning, followed by Sarpellione.]

Bianca. Liar—'tis not true!

Sarpellione. Wilt please you read this letter from the king,

Writ when he sent him to you—

Bianca (plucks it from him, and tears it to pieces).

'Tis a lie

Writ by thyself—

Sarpellione (taking up the pieces).

The king has written here

The story of his birth, and that he is

Your brother, pledges his most royal honor—

Bianca. Lie upon lie—

Sarpellione. And will maintain the same
With sword and battle!

Bianca. Let him! There's a Sforza

Will whip him back to Naples! Tell him so!

There'll be a duke upon the throne of Milan

In three days more, whose children will be kings!

Sarpellione. Your brother, madam!

Bianca. Liar, no! my husband!

The crown is mine, and I will give it him!

Sarpellione. Pardon me, lady, 'tis not yours to give!

While a Visconti lives—and one does live—

Princely and like his father—'tis not yours—

And Sforza dare not take it.

Bianca. He has taken it,

In taking me. Sforza is duke, I say!

Sarpellione. Am I dismissed to Naples with this news?

Bianca. Ay—on the instant!

Sarpellione. Will you give me leave

To bid the prince make ready for his journey?

Bianca. What prince?

Sarpellione. Your brother, madam, who'll come back

With the whole league of armed Italy

To take the crown he's born to.

Bianca. I've a page

I love, called Giulio! If you mean to ask me

If he goes with you—lying traitor! no!

I love him, and will keep him!

Sarpellione. Ay—till Milan

Knows him for prince, and then farewell to Sforza!

He's flown too near the sun!

Bianca. Foul raven, silence!

What dost thou know of eagles who wert born

To mumble over carrion! Hast thou looked

On the high front of Sforza! Hast thou heard

The thunder of his voice? Hast met his eye?

'Tis writ upon his forehead: "born a king!"

Read it, blind liar!

Sarpellione. Upon your brother's, lady,

The world shall read it.

Bianca. Wilt thou drive me mad?

They say all breathing nature has an instinct

Of that which would destroy it. I of thee

Feel that abhorrence! If a glistering serpent

Hissed in my path, I could not shudder more,

Nor would I kill it sooner—so begone!

I'll strike thee dead else!

Sarpellione. Madam!

(Exit Sarpellione.)

Bianca. 'Tis my brother!

At the first word with which he broke it to me

My heart gave nature's echo! 'Tis my brother!

I would that he were dead—and yet I love him—

Love him so well, that I could die for him—

Yet hate him that he bars the crown from Sforza.

He's betwixt me and heaven! were he but dead!

Sforza and I would, like the sun and moon,

Have all the light the world has! He must die!

Milan will rise for him—his boyish spirit
Is known and loved in every quarter of it.
Naples is powerful, and Venice holds
Direct succession holy, and the lords
Of all the Marches will cry "down usurper!"
For Sforza's glory has o'ershadowed theirs.
Both can not live, or I must live unloved—
And that were hell—or die, and heaven without him
Were but a hell—for I've no soul to go there!
Nothing but love! no memory but that!
No hope! no sense!—Heaven were a madhouse to me!
Hark! who comes here?

(Enter Sarpellione and Brunorio. Bianca conceals herself.)

Sarpellione. Strike but this blow, Brunorio—
And thou'rt a made man!

Brunorio. Sforza sleeps not well.

Sarpellione. Art thou less strong of arm than he who called thee
A brainless ass!

Brunorio. 'Sdeath, he did call me so!

Sarpellione. And more I never told thee. Pay him for it—

And thou wilt save a prince who'll cherish thee,
And Sforza's soul a murder—for he'll kill him
Ere one might ride to Naples.

Brunorio. Think'st thou so?

Sarpellione. Is it not certain? If this boy were dead
Sforza were duke. With Milan at his back
He were the devil. Rather than see this,
Alfonso would share half his kingdom with thee.

Brunorio. I'll do it!

Sarpellione. Thou wilt save a prince's life
Whom he would murder. Now collect thy senses,
And look around thee! On that rustic bank,
Close by the fountain, with his armor off,
He sleeps away the noon.

Brunorio. With face uncovered?

Sarpellione. Sometimes—but oftener with his mantle drawn

Quite over him! But thou must strike so well,
That, should he see thee, he will never tell on't.

Brunorio. I'd rather he were covered.

Sarpellione. 'Tis most likely—
But mark the ground well. By this alley here,
You'll creep on unperceived. If he's awake—
You're his lieutenant, and may have good reason
To seek him any hour? Are you resolved?

Brunorio. I am!

Sarpellione. Once more look round you!

Brunorio. If he sleep

To-morrow, he'll ne'er wake!

Sarpellione. Why, that's well said—
Come now and try the horse I've chosen for you.
We'll fly like birds with welcome news to Naples!

(Exeunt Sarpellione and Brunorio.)

Bianca. Thank God that I was here! Can there be souls

So black as these—to plot so foul a murder!

Oh unretributive and silent Heavens!

Heard you these men? Thank God that I can save him!

The sun shone on them—on these murderers—

As it shines now on me!—Would it were Giulio

They thought to murder!—Ha! what ready fiend

Whispered me that? Giulio instead of Sforza!

Why that were murder—too!—Brunorio's murder!—

Not mine!—my hands would show no blood for it!

If Giulio were asleep beneath the mantle

To-morrow noon, and Sforza in his chamber—

What murder lies upon my soul for that?

I'll come again to-night, and see the place,

And think on't in the dark! [Exit Bianca.]

ACT V.

SCENE I.

[Same scene in the garden. Enter Bianca.]

Bianca. No! no! come hate—come worse indifference!

Come anything—I will not! He is gone
To bring me flowers now, for he sees I'm sad;
Yet, with his delicate thought, asks not the reason,
But tries to steal it from me!—could I kill him!
His eyes grew moist this morn, for I was pale—
With thinking of his murder! could I kill him!
Oh Sforza! I could walk on burning ploughshares,
But not kill pitying Giulio! I could starve—
Or freeze with wintry cold—or swallow fire—
Or die a death for every drop of blood
Kneeling at my sad heart, but not kill Giulio!
No—no—no! no!

(Sforza comes in dejectedly.)

My lord! My noble lord!

Sforza. Give you good day, Bianca!

Bianca. Are you ill,

That you should drop your words so sorrowfully?

Sforza. I am not ill, nor well!

Bianca. Not well?

Sforza. The pulse

Beats on sometimes, when the heart quite runs down.

I'm very well!

Bianca. My lord, you married me—

The priest said so—to share both joy and sorrow.

For the last privilege I've shed sweet tears!—

If I'm not worthy—

Sforza. Nay—you are!—I thank you

For many proofs of gentle disposition,

Which, to say truth, I scarcely looked for in you—

Knowing that policy, and not your choice,

United us!

Bianca. My lord!

Sforza. I say you're worthy,

For this, to see my heart—if you could do so,

But there's a grief in't now which brings you joy,

And so you'll pardon me!

(Giulio comes in with a heap of flowers, which he throws down and listens.)

Bianca. That can not be!

Sforza. Listen to this. I had a falcon lately,

That I had trained, till, in the sky above him,

He was the monarch of all birds that flew.

I loved him next my heart, and had no joy,

But to unloose his feet, and see the eagle

Quail at his fiery swoop! I brought him here!

Sitting one day upon my wrist, he heard

The nightingale you love, sing in the tree,

While I applauded him. With jealous heart

My falcon sprang to kill him; and with fear

For your sweet bird, I struck him to my feet;

And since that hour, he droops. His heart is broke,

And he'll ne'er soar again!

Page.

Why, one such bird

Were worth a thousand nightingales.

Bianca.

(Aside.—Poor boy!

He utters his own doom!) (To Sf.) My lord, I have

A slight request, which you will not refuse me.

Please you, to-day sleep in your chamber. I

Will give you reason for't.

Sforza.

Be't as you will!

The noon creeps on apace, and in my dreams

I may forget this heaviness. (Goes in.)

Bianca.

Be stern,

Strong heart! and think on Sforza! Giulio!

Page.

Madam!

Bianca. (Aside.—He's hot and weary now, and will drink freely

This opiate in his cup, and from his sound

And sudden sleep he'll wake in Paradise.)

Giulio, I say! (She mizes an opiate.)

Page.

Sweet lady, pardon me!

I dreamed I was in heaven, and feared to stir

Lest I should jar some music. Was't your voice

I heard sing, 'Giulio?'

Bianca.

(Aside.—Oh, ye pitying angels,

Let him not love me most, when I would kill him.)

Drink! Giulio!

Page.

Is it sweet?

Bianca.

The sweetest cup

You'll drink in this world!

Page.

I can make it sweeter—

Bianca. And how?
Page. With your health in it!
Bianca. Drink it not!
 Not my health! Drink what other health thou wilt!
 Not mine—not mine!
Page. Then here's the noble falcon
 That Sforza told us of! Would you not kill
 The nightingale that broke his spirit, madam?
Bianca. Oh Giulio! Giulio! (Weeps.)
Page. Nay—I did not think
 You loved your singing bird so well, dear lady!
Bianca. (He'll break my heart!)
Page. Say truly! if the falcon
 Must pine unless the nightingale were dead,
 Would you not kill it?
Bianca. Though my life went with it—
 I must do so!
Page. Why—so I think! And yet
 If I had fed the nightingale, and loved him;
 And he were innocent, as, after all
 He is, you know—I should not like to kill him—
 Not with my own hands!
Bianca. Now, relentless heavens,
 Must I be struck with daggers through and through!
 Speaks not a mocking demon with his lips?
 I will not kill him!
Page. Sforza has gone in—
 May I sleep there, sweet lady, in his place?
Bianca. No, boy! thou shalt not!
Page. Then will you?
Bianca. Oh God!
 I would I could! and have no waking after!
 Come hither, Giulio! nay—nay—stop not there!
 Come on a little, and I'll make thy pillow
 Softer than ever mine will be again!
 Tell me you love me ere you go to sleep!
Page. With all my soul, dear mistress! (Drops asleep.)
Bianca. Now he sleeps!
 This mantle for his pall—but stay—his shape
 Looks not like Sforza under it. Fair flowers,
 (Heaps them at his feet, and spreads the mantle over all.)
 Your innocence to his! Exhale together,
 Pure spirit and sweet fragrance! So—one kiss!
 Giulio! my brother! Who comes there? Wake, Giulio!
 Or thou't be murdered! Nay—'twas but the wind!
 (Withdraws on tiptoe, and crouches behind a tree.)
 I will kneel here and pray!
 (Brunorio creeps in, followed by Sarpellione at a distance.)
 Hark!
Sarpellione. See—he sleeps.
 Strike well, and fear not!
Bianca (springing forward as he strikes.)
 Giulio! Giulio! wake!
 Ah God!
 (She drops on the body, the murderer escapes and Sforza rushes in. As he bends over her the scene closes.)

SCENE II.

[A road outside the walls of Milan. Enter Sarpellione and Brunorio, flying from the city, and met by Pasquali.]
Pasquali. What news, sirs?
 (As they attempt to pass him without answer, he steps before Sarpellione.)
 Stay, count, I've a word with you!
Sarpellione. Stand off, and let me pass!
Pasquali. Nay, with your leave
 One single word!
Sarpellione. Brunorio! hasten forward,
 And loose my bridle! I'll be there o' the instant!
 (Brunorio hastens on.)
 What would you say?
Pasquali. My lord! I hear the bell
 Tolling in Milan, that is never heard
 But at some dread alarm.
Sarpellione (pressing to go on.) Is that all?
Pasquali. Stay!
 I met a flying peasant here just now,
 Who muttered of some murder, and flew on!

Sarpellione. Slave! let me pass!
 (Draws, and Pasquali confronts him with his sword.)
Pasquali. My lord! you once essayed
 To tempt me to a murder. Something tells me
 That this hot haste has guilt upon its heels,
 And you shall stay till I know more of it.
 Down with your point!
Sarpellione. Villain! respect my office!
Pasquali. No "villain," and no murderer! In Milan
 They've soldiers' law, and if your skirts are bloody,
 You'll get small honor for your coat, ambassador!
 Bear back, I say!
 (They fight, and Sarpellione falls, disarmed on his knee.)
Sarpellione. In mercy, spare my life!
Pasquali. Up, coward! You shall go before to Milan,
 And meet the news! If you are innocent,
 I'll ne'er believe a secret prompting more.
 If not, I've done the state a worthy service.
 On, on, I say!
 (Drives Sarpellione out before him at the point of his sword.)

SCENE III.

[A room of state in the palace. Enter Rossano and a Priest.]
Rossano. Will she not eat?
Priest. She hath not taken food
 Since the boy died!
Rossano. Nor slept?
Priest. Nor closed an eyelid!
Rossano. What does she?
Priest. Still, with breathless repetition,
 Goes through the page's murder—makes his couch
 As he lay down 't the garden—heaps again
 The flowers upon him to eke out his length;
 Then kisses him, and hides to see him killed!
 'Twould break your heart to look on't.
Rossano. Is't the law
 That she must crown him?
Priest. If, upon the death
 Of any duke of Milan, the succession
 Fall to a daughter, she may rule alone,
 Giving her husband neither voice nor power
 If she so please. But if she delegate
 The crown to him, or in extremity
 Impose it, it is not legitimate,
 Save he is crowned by her own living hands
 In presence of the council.
 (Enter Sforza, hastily, in full armor, except the helmet.)
Sforza. Ho! Rossano!
Rossano. My lord!
Sforza. Send quick, and summon in the council
 To see the crown imposed! Bianca dies!
 My throne hangs on your speed! Fly!
 (Exit Rossano.)

Sentry, ho!
 Despatch a hundred of my swiftest horse
 Toward Naples! Bring me back Sarpellione!
 Alive or dead, a thousand ducats for him!
 Quick!
 (Exit sentinel, re-enter Rossano.)
Rossano. I have sped your orders!
 (Enter a messenger.)
 Please, my lord,
 Lady Bianca prays your presence with her!
Sforza. Away! I'll come! (To Rossano.) Go, man the citadel
 With my choice troops! Post them at every gate!
 Send for the Milanese to scout or forage,
 I care not what, so they're without the wall!
 And hark, Rossano! if you hear a knell
 Wait out before the coronation peal,—
 Telling to Milan that Bianca's dead,
 And there's no duke—down with the ducal banner,
 And, like an eagle, to the topmost tower
 Up with my gonfalon! Away!

(Re-enter the messenger from Bianca.)

My lord—

Sforza. I come! I come!

Pasquali (without). In, in!

(Enter Sarpellione, followed by Pasquali.)

Sarpellione (aghast at the sight of Sforza). Alive!

Sforza. Ha, devil!

Have you come back to get some fresher news?

Alfonso'd know who's duke! While you are hanging,

I'll ride to Naples with the news myself!

Ha! ha! my star smiles on me!

(Bianca rushes in and crouches at the side of Sforza, as if hiding from something beyond him.)

Bianca. Hark! I hear them!

Come! come! Brunorio!—If you come not quick,

My heart will break and wake him!

(Presses her hand painfully to her side.)

Crack not yet!

Nay, think on Sforza! Think 'tis for his love!

Giulio will be an angel up in heaven,

And Sforza will drink glory from my hand!

Come! come! Brunorio! (Screams piercingly.)

Ah, who murdered Giulio!

Not I!—not I! not I!

Sforza (watching her with emotion).

Oh God! how dearly

Are bought the proudest triumphs of this world!

Bianca. Will the bell never peal!

Priest (to an attendant). On that string only

Her mind plays truly now. Her life hangs on it!

The waiting for the bell of coronation

Is the last link that holds!

Sforza (raising her). My much-loved wife!

Bianca. Is it thee, Sforza? Has the bell pealed yet?

Sforza. Think not of that, but take some drink,

Bianca!

You'll kill me this way!

Bianca (dashing down the cup). Think you I'll drink fire!

Sforza. Then taste of this! (Offers her a pomegranate.)

Bianca (laughing bitterly). I'm not a fool! I know

The fruit of hell has ashes at the core!

Mock me some other way!

Sforza. My poor Bianca!

Bianca. Ha! ha! that's well done! You've the shape of Sforza,

And you're a devil, and can mock his voice,

But Sforza never spoke so tenderly!

You overdo it! Ha! ha! ha!

Sforza. God help me,

I would her brother had been duke in Milan

And I his slave—so she had lived and loved me!

Bianca. Can you see heaven from hence! I thought

'twas part

Of a soul's agony in hell to see

The blest afar off? Can I not see Giulio?

(Struggles, as if to escape something before her eyes.)

Sforza's between!

Sforza. Bianca! sayst thou that?

(Struggles with herself a moment.)

Nay, then, 'tis time to say farewell Ambition!

(Turns to the Priest.)

Look, father! I'm unskilled in holy things,

But I have heard, the sacrifice of that

Which the repenting soul loved more than heaven,

Will work a miracle!

(Takes his sword from his scabbard, and proceeds in a deeper voice.)

I love my sword

As never mother loved her rosy child!

My heart is in its hilt—my life, my soul,

Follow it like the light! Say thou dost think

If I give that up for a life of peace,

Heaven will give back her reason—

Priest (eagerly). Doubt it not!

Sforza. Then—take it!

(Drops the hilt into his hand, and holds it a moment.)

Sarpellione (in a hoarse whisper). Welcome news for King Alfonso!

Sforza (starting). Fiend! sayest thou so! Nay, then come back my sword.

I'll follow in its gleaming track to Naples

If the world perish!

(Enter Rossano.)

Now, what news, Rossano?

Rossano. In answer to your wish, the noble council

Consent to see the crown imposed in private,

Three delegated lords will presently

Attend you here!

Sforza (energetically). Tell him who strikes the bell,

To look forth from his tower and watch this window!

When he shall see a handkerchief wave hence

Let him peal out. (Attendant goes out.)

My gonfalon shall float

Over St. Mark's before Foscari dreams

There's a new duke in Milan! Let Alfonso

Look to the north!

(Enter attendant.)

Attendant. My lord! the noble council

Wait to come in!

(Sforza waves his hand, and they enter.)

1st Lord. Health to the noble Sforza!

Sforza. My lords, the deep calamity we suffer

Must cut off ceremony. Milan's heiress

Lies there before you failing momentarily,

But holds in life to give away the crown.

If you're content to see her put it on me

Let it be so as quickly as it may!

Give signal for the bell!

(The handkerchief is waved and the bell peals. Bianca rises to her feet.)

Bianca.

It peals at last!

Where am I? Bring some wine, dear Giulio!

(Looks round fearfully.)

Am I awake now! I've been dreaming here

That he was dead! Oh God! a horrid dream!

Come hither, Sforza! I have dreamt a dream,

If I can tell it you—will make your hair

Stand up with horror!

Sforza.

Tell it not!

Bianca.

This Giulio

Was, in my dream, my brother! how I knew it

I do not now remember—but I did!

And loved him—(that you know must be a dream)

Better than you!

Sforza.

What—better?

Wasn't not strange?

Being my brother, he must have the crown!

Stay!—is my father dead—or wasn't it the dream too?

Sforza. He's dead, Bianca!

Bianca.

Well! you loved me not,

And Giulio did—and somehow you should hate me

If he were duke; and so I killed him, loving me,

For you that loved me not! Is it not strange

That we can dream such things? The manner of it—

To see it in a play would break your heart—

It was so pitiless! Look here! this boy

Brings me a heap of flowers!—I'll show it you

As it was done before me in the dream!

Don't weep! 'twas but a dream—but I'll not sleep

Again till I've seen Giulio—the blood seemed

So ghastly natural! I shall see it, Sforza,

Till I have passed my hand across his side!

(Turning to the attendants.)

Will some one call my page?

Sforza.

My own Bianca,

Will you not drink?

(She drops the cup in horror.)

Bianca.

Just such a cup as that

Had liquid fire in't when the deed was done—

A devil mocked me with it!

(Another cup is brought, and she drinks.)

This is wine!

Thank God, I wake now!

(She turns to an attendant.)

Will you see if Giulio

Is in the garden?

Sforza. Strike the bell once more ?
Bianca. He kissed me ere he slept—wilt listen,
Sforza ?
Sforza. Tell me no more, sweet one !
Bianca. And then I heaped
The very flowers he brought me, at his feet,
To eke his body out as long as yours—
Was't not a hellish dream ?
(The bell strikes again, and she covers her ears in horror.)
That bell ! Oh God,
'Tis no dream—now I know—yes—yes—I know
These be the councillors—and you are Sforza,
And that's Rossano—and I killed my brother
To make you duke ! Yes, yes ! I see it all !
Oh God ! Oh God !
(She covers her face, and weeps.)
Sforza. My lords ! her reason rallies
Little by little. With this flood of tears,
Her brain's relieved, and she'll give over raving.
My wife ! Bianca ! If thou ever lovedst me,
Look on my face !
Bianca. Oh, Sforza, I have given
For thy dear love, the eyes I had to see it,
The ears to hear it. I have broke my heart
In reaching for't.
Sforza. Ay—but 'tis thine now, sweet one !
The life-drops in my heart are less dear to me !
Bianca. Too late ! you've crushed the light out of a gem
You did not know the price of ! Had you spoken
But one kind word upon my bridal night !
Sforza. Forgive me, my Bianca !
Bianca. I am parched
With thirst now, and my eyes grow faint and dim.
Are you here, Sforza ! mourn not for me long !
But bury me with Giulio ! (Starts from him.)
Hark ! I hear
His voice now ! Do the walls of Paradise

Jut over hell ? I heard his voice, I say !
(Strikes off Sforza, who approaches her.)
Unhand me, devil ! You've the shape of one Who upon earth had no heart ! Can you take
No shape but that ? Can you not look like Giulio ?
(Sforza falls back, struck with remorse.)
Hark ! 'tis his low, imploring voice again—
He prays for poor Bianca ! And look, see you !
The portals stir ! Slow, slow—and difficult—
(Creeps forward with her eyes upward.)
Pray on, my brother ! Pray on, Giulio !
I come ! (Falls on her face.)
(Sforza drops on his knee, pale and trembling.)
Sforza. My soul shrinks with unnatural fear !
What heard I then ? "Sforza, give up thy sword !"
Was it from heaven or hell !
(Shrinks as if from some spectre in the air.)
I will ! I will !
(Holds out his sword as if to the monk, and Sarpellione, who has been straining forward to watch Bianca, springs suddenly to her side.)
Sarpellione. She's dead ! Ha ! ha ! who's duke in Milan now ?
(Sforza rises with a bound.)
Sforza. Sforza !
(He flies to the window, and waves the handkerchief. The bell peals out, and as he rushes to Bianca, she moves, lifts her head, looks wildly around, and struggles to her feet. Rossano gives her the crown—she looks an instant smilingly on Sforza, and with a difficult but calm effort places it on his head. All drop on one knee to do allegiance, and as Sforza lifts himself to his loftiest height, with a look of triumph at Sarpellione, Bianca sinks dead at his feet.)
[Curtain falls.]
